LUIGHI. See LUNGH.

LUIKEN. See LUYKEN.

LUINI, or LOVINI, BERNARDINO, an eminent Italian painter, about the time of whose birth and death there is much disagreement. He was born at Luino, a small town in the Milanese, on the Lago Maggiore, some say in 1480, and died in 1530; and others, that he flourished from 1500 to 1550. In a picture dated 1525, he introduced his own portrait as that of an old man, which, if correct, would make his birth about 1455; but there is no certainty about this, for his son Aurelio was born in 1530. He is generally considered, from his style, to have been a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, but there is much dispute on this point. Padre Resta asserts that Luini did not visit Milan until after the departure of Vinci in 1500: on the other hand, the Abate Bianconi in his Guida di Milano, gives it as the opinion of all the best critics and connoisseurs, that he was a pupil of Vinci. Lanzi says he certainly frequented his academy. At all events, it is impossible for one artist to approach nearer to the style of another than Luini does to that of Vinci, in his best works; he exhibits the same taste in design and composition, the same peculiarity of color and extraordinary relief, so that, according to Lanzi, out of Milan, many of his works pass for those of that master. His two pictures of Mary Magdalene and St. John embracing his Lamb, in the Ambrosian Gallery at Milan, can hardly be called inferior to the works of Leonardo in the beauty and suavity of his pencil, and the piety and feeling of his expression. There are also many other pictures by him in the different collections at Milan, possessing nearly equal merit. To form a just idea of Luini's merit it would be necessary to contemplate his series of pictures at Saronò, representing the life of the Virgin, in which he approaches the dignity and grace of Raffaello. He was no less distinguished for his frescos, of which the most celebrated are Christ crowned with Thorns, in the Collegio del S. Sepolcro; and the choir of the Monistero Maggiore at Milan. Luini is scarcely known out of Milan, as his works are attributed to da Vinci—the sure fate of all imitators. The finest, Christ disputing with the Doctors, now in the English National Gallery, attributed to da Vinci, is now generally given by connoisseurs to Luini.

LUINI, AURELIO, was the son of the preceding, born at Milan in 1530, and died in 1593. According to Lomazzo, his cotemporary, residing at Milan, he was one of the most distinguished artists of his time in that city; and he especially commends him for his knowledge of anatomy and his skill in landscape and perspective, and says that he was a successful rival of Polidoro da Caravaggio in his large frescos. Lanzi says, "After a lapse of two centuries, Bianconi has written of him with more freedom, declaring that though the son, he was not the follower of Bernardino, the purity of whose style he was far from attaining. And in truth, if we except his composition, there is not much to please in this artist. We may indeed, often trace the paternal manner, much deteriorated and tainted with mannerism; his ideas are common, his attitudes less natural, the folds of his drapery are minute, and drawn in a mechanical manner." He then goes on to say that this is the character of his genuine works, but admits that there are others at Milan attributed to him, in better taste; and specifies the Baptism of Christ in the church of S. Lorenzo, as a work worthy of his father.

LUINI, EVANGELISTA, was the second son of Bernardino L. Lomazzo remarks that in the art of ornamenting and festooning he was equally ingenious and fanciful as his brother, and at the same time, he gives him a high rank as an historical painter; but he does not specify any of his works.

LUINI, GIULIO CESARE, a painter of the Milanese school, who studied under Gaudenzio Ferrari. He was a reputable artist, and there are some of his works in the chapels at Varallo. He flourished about 1550.

LUINI, PIETRO. See GNOCCHI.

LUINI, TOMMASO, who died in the pontificate of Urban VIII., aged 35 years. According to Baglioni, was the scholar of Andrea Sacchi, and painted in the style of Caravaggio, from which circumstance, and his quarrelsome disposition, he was called Il Caravaggino. He was a man of ability, and executed some esteemed works for the churches at Rome. Lanzi says he appears to the best advantage when he painted the designs of his master, as in the church of S. Maria in Via, where he combined his own ideas. His design was rather dry and his coloring too dark.

LUMLEY, GEORGE, an English amateur engraver, who resided at York about 1720, and executed a few mezzotinto portraits.

LUNARDUS, an old engraver on wood, by whom there are some frontispieces and book ornaments executed in a spirited and masterly manner, which appear to be after his own designs. He flourished about 1520.

 LUNDENS, GERRIT, or GERARD, a Dutch painter of interiors and conversations in low life, boozing, merry-makings, &c. Little is known of him. His pictures are executed in a very pleasing and spirited manner, and are admitted into good collections. He is supposed to have flourished from 1650 to 1670.

LUNGH, MARTINO, an Italian architect, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He was a native of Vigù, in the Milanese; and his first profession was that of a stone-cutter, after which, by study and practice, he became an architect. Under Gregory XIII., he erected that part of the pontifical palace on Monte Cavallo, at Rome, called the "Tower of the Winds." For the fathers of the Oratorio he erected the majestic Chiesa Nuova, on the usual plan of a Latin Cross. He also designed the façade of S. Girolamo degli Schiavoni, at Ripetta, in a very beautiful and correct style. Among his other works, are the Campanile of the Campidoglio; the palace of the Dukes of Attempis at Apollinare; and the Palazzo Borghese at Rome.

LUNGH, ONORIO, an Italian architect, the son and scholar of Martino L., was born in 1569. He became quite distinguished in civil and military architecture. His most esteemed work is the church of S. Carlo, on the Corso at Rome, designed in a beautiful and magnificent style, with three naves, in the form of a Latin cross. Among his other productions, are the court, gallery, and loggia. of the Palazzo Verospi, on the Corso; and the church of S. Maria, at Campo Vaccino. He was but little esteemed for his private character, rendering himself odious by his unsocial and calumniating disposition. He died in 1619.

LUNGHI, MARTINO, an Italian architect, the son and scholar of Onorio L., flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He visited Sicily, Naples, Venice, and Milan, and erected a variety of edifices. At Rome, he restored the church of S. Adriano; erected the façade of the Madonna del' Orto; and the grand altar of S. Carlo, on the Corso. His best work is the staircase, made by order of Cardinal Gaetano, in his palace on the Corso. It is generally cited as the most perfect in Rome, but Milizia has contrived to find a number of defects in this beautiful work. The Cardinal Ginetti was greatly delighted with it, and commissioned Lungi to erect a similar one in his palace at Venice. He died in 1657.

LUNGHI, ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1685. He studied under Gio. Giuseppe dal Sole, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He was chiefly employed for the churches and convents of Bologna and the vicinity. Among other works, one of Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, is highly commended. He died in 1757.

LURAGO, ROCCO, a Lombard architect, a native of Pelsopra, flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. His principal work is the Palazzo Doria Tursi, in Strada Nuova, at Genoa, greatly praised by the citizens and foreigners, but is more admired for its extraordinary size, and the abundance of marble with which it is decorated, than for the purity of its architecture. This is the judgment of Milizia, who also says that this edifice surprises at the first view, and conveys an idea of something more than ordinary magnificence. By order of Pius V., Lurago erected at Bosco, the convent and church of the Dominican friars. This edifice so pleased the pontiff, and his nephew, the Cardinal Ghisleri, that they invited the architect to Rome, but could not prevail upon him to leave Genoa. He died in 1590.

LUSARCHE, ROBERT DE, an old French architect who flourished about 1220, and designed, according to Felibien, the Cathedral of Amiens, which was continued by Tommaso of Charmont, and completed by his son Rinaldo, in 1269. This edifice is of great size and beauty, in the Gothic style prevalent in those days. The principal nave is 213 feet long, and the choir 153 feet; making the entire length of the edifice 366 feet. The transverse nave is 182 feet, and its width forty-nine feet. The roof is 132 feet high; the choir, the nave, and the transept, are surrounded by small aisles eighteen feet wide, and forty-two feet high, which have also recessed chapels.

LUTI, CAV. BENEDETTO, a Florentine painter, born in 1666. His parents were very poor, and unable to give him any education, but he early showed a love for the fine arts, and amused himself by sketching everything that struck his fancy, and at length acquired so much skill as to attract the notice of Antonio Domenico Gabbiani, who generously took the youth into his studio, instructed him in the art, and was so highly pleased with his deportment, talents and assiduity, that he recommended him to the patronage of the Grand Duke, who sent him to Rome to study under Ciro Ferri. On his arrival there, he had the misfortune to find that that master had recently died. He did not place himself under any other instructor, but diligently studying the works of the best masters, he formed for himself a style which, without exactly resembling that of any other master, was distinguished for elegance of design and snavity of color, together with an excellent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. One of his earliest works at Rome was the Death of Abel, publicly exhibited at the festival of St. Bartholomew, when it excited universal admiration by the sublimity of its composition and the characteristic expression of the head of the murderer. This work established his reputation, and he was commissioned by Pope Clement XI. to paint a picture of the Prophet Isaiah in St. John of Lateran, and other works, which were executed so much to the pontiff's satisfaction that he conferred on him the honor of knighthood of the order of the Holy Cross. He acquired a great reputation, and was considered among the ablest artists of his time. The Elector of Mentz presented him a valuable diamond cross. Among his other most admired works at Rome are St. Anthony of Padua in the church of the Apostles; Mary Magdalene anointing the feet of Christ, in S. Caterina da Siena. His portrait, by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery. It is to be regretted that this talented artist should have devoted so much of his time to crayon painting, so transient in its nature, when he possessed powers for nobler exertions. He died in 1724. He executed a few spirited etchings, among which are the Crucifixion, with St. John and Mary Magdalene at the foot of the Cross, after his own design, and a landscape, after Guercino.

LUTMA, ABRAHAM, a Dutch engraver of whom little is known. There is a portrait by him of Rubens after Vandyck.

LUTMA, JANUS, or JOHN, a Dutch engraver and goldsmith, born at Amsterdam about 1629. He was the inventor of a method of engraving, which he called opus mallei, and which has nothing to recommend it. It is done with a punch, or chisel and mallet. Fair impressions of his plates are now extremely scarce, and for this reason, valuable. They are as follow:

The Portrait of his Father; Janus Lutma, Posterii fati; opus mallei per Janum, fec. His own Portrait; Janus Lutma Batavus, per se opere Mallei 1681. J. Vondelius. Olor Batavus. Opus mallei, per J. Lutma. P. C. Hooft. Alter Tacitus. Opus mallei, per J. Lutma. We have also by him two portraits, engraved in the style of Rembrandt, which are scarce, and highly esteemed, viz.—Joannes Lutma Aurifex. It is the portrait of his father, in a furred robe, holding a port-crayon in one hand, and his spectacles in the other; signed Joannes Lutma, Junior, fecit Ao. 1656. Joannes Lutma Junior. He is seated at a table drawing, with a large hat, which throws a shadow over the face; this portrait is extremely scarce. He also engraved some views of ruins, &c., in a style executed with the point, and assisted with the mezzotinto tool, one of which represents a Fountain, with Statues, and the Trajan Column; dated 1656.

LUTMA, JAMES. This engraver was the son of the preceding. He etched and finished with the graver a set of ornamental plates, of shields and foliage, from the designs of his father. He also engraved a plate of three portraits, in a frame, in-

LUTTEREL, HENRY, an Irish painter and engraver, born at Dublin about 1650. He went early in life to London, and was educated for the law, but abandoned that profession, and studied portrait painting with Ashfield. About this time Bloteling had established himself in London, and his mezzotinto prints were in great repute. Lutterel contrived to possess himself of his secrets, and afterwards formed a connection with Isaac Becket; and they became the earliest English engravers in mezzotinto. He acquired a high reputation in his time, and executed quite a number of portraits of distinguished persons. His crayon portraits too, were highly esteemed. He died about 1710.

LUTZELBURGER, or LEUTZELBURGER, HANS, called also HANS FRANK, a Swiss wood engraver, who flourished at Basle in the early part of the 16th century. Little is known of him. He is supposed by some to have cut the blocks of the celebrated Dance of Death, attributed to Hans Holbein. This supposition is founded on the facts of his having been, as is supposed, cotemporary with Holbein, a native of the same place, and from one of the cuts being marked H. L. But there is no certainty in this. There are many other celebrated old cuts, singly and in sets, some of them after drawings by Holbein, which are attributed to Lutzelburger. Those who are curious about the facts, with regard to these and other disputed points, may find a detailed statement of the views of all parties in Dr. Nagler's Neues Allgemeines Künstler-Lexicon.

LUYKEN, JOHN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1649. He studied painting and design under Martin Zaagmoolen, and for some time applied himself to the practice of the art; but not succeeding in his expectations, he turned his attention to engraving, and became very eminent in that branch. He executed a multitude of works, very many of them after his own designs. Bohn, in his new catalogue, mentions upwards of 900, all having the name of this indefatigable artist. He discovers great fertility of invention, and a remarkable facility of execution, and his plates are executed with neatness and spirit. His compositions are crowded with an infinite number of figures. These qualities procured for him the honorable title of the Callot of Holland. He died in 1712. The following are among his principal plates:

A set of sixty-two plates of Histories of the Bible, exhibiting uncommon power of invention and freedom of execution. Some of the plates for Mortier's Bible. A set of ten plates of the Commandments. Seventeen plates for the History of Finland. Seventeen plates for the Voyages Orientaux de M. Thevenot. One hundred and five plates for the History of the Martyrs. The Prophet Jonas preaching to the Ninevites. The Assassination of Henry IV. of France. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew; in two sheets. A great variety of emblematical subjects, fairs, public ceremonies, book ornaments, &c.

LUYKEN, GASPAN, was the son and pupil of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1670. He designed and engraved in the manner of his father, but his works are every way inferior to him. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. Among his works are the following: Twelve plates of the Months of the Year; Four, of the Seasons;

St. Francis Xavier preaching before the Emperor of Japan; the Miracle of the Loaves.

LUZIO, ROMANO, a Roman painter, who studied under Pierino del Vaga; was his ablest scholar, and assisted him in his works. According to Vasari, Luzio and some Lombards painted four chambers in the Ducal Palace at Genoa, after the cartoons of his master. He executed some excellent works at Rome from his own designs. A frieze by him in the Palazzo Spada still exists, and is highly commended. He flourished about 1530.

LUZZO, PIETRO, DA FELTRO. See MORTO DA FELTRO.

L or L LYS, or LIS, JOHN VANDER, (not Jan, as frequently called) a Dutch painter, born at Breda in 1600. He studied under Cornelius Poelmburg, whose manner he imitated so successfully that many of his works are attributed to that master. He painted historical subjects, conversations and landscapes. He is supposed to have been the same as Giovanni Lutz of the Italians, after whom Mogalli engraved the subject of Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac. His works are very highly finished. There is a famous picture by this artist at Rotterdam, representing Diana in the Bath, attended by her nymphs. His works are found in the best collections, not only in Holland but in England.

LYSIPPUS, a celebrated Greek sculptor, was a native of Sicyon, and flourished about B. C. 325, in the time of Alexander the Great. He at first applied himself to painting, until taught by his talents and inclination that he was born to excel in sculpture. He improved the art of statuary by a better imitation of the hair, and by an attentive study of symmetry, in which he considered how the human figure appears to the eye, not what are its exact proportions. For this reason he was the first that reduced the size of his heads, and thereby made his figures appear more tall and elegant. His reputation was so high, and he was so much favored by Alexander, that that monarch forbid any sculptor but Lysippus to make his statue. He executed a series of figures of Alexander, beginning from his childhood; and likewise made statues of Hephestion and his other friends; all of which were taken to Rome by Metellus, after the conquest of Macedonia. Among his works, the figure of a man scraping himself with a strigil, called Apoxyomenos, was particularly admired. It was placed by Marcus Agrippa before his public baths; but being removed by Tiberius into his own chamber, the Roman people were so clamorous for its restoration, that the Emperor thought best to give way to their wishes. A chariot of the sun at Rhodes was one of his great works; which, however, was surpassed by a colossus at Tarentum, forty cubits high. He also executed a statue of Hercules, which was removed to Rome from Alyzia, in Acarnania; one of Socrates; one of Æsop; a statue of Opportunity, represented as a youth with wings attached to his ancles, in the act of rising from the ground. This work is admirably described by Welcker. The statues of Lysippus were 610 in number, and in the age of Augustus, his works were sold for their weight in gold.

LYSISTRATUS, a Greek sculptor, the brother, or brother-in-law of Lysippus, flourished about B. C. 325. The only work mentioned as by him, is the Head of Menalippe, a woman distinguished for her wisdom. He was principally distinguished as the inventor of taking impressions in plaster from the human form, which produced an accurate resemblance.

M.

MAAN, or MAN, CORNELIUS DE, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1621. After receiving some instruction in the art in his native city, he went to Paris while young, where he met with sufficient encouragement to enable him to visit Italy, which was the object of his wishes. He traveled through Lyons to Lombardy, and spent two years in Florence, where he executed some considerable works for a nobleman, who wished to continue him in his service; but the artist declined his commissions, as he was anxious to go to Rome, whither he proceeded, and during a residence of three years in that metropolis of art, he applied himself to the study of the antique and the best masters with great assiduity, and became an able designer. He next went to Venice, where he carefully studied the works of Titian, particularly his portraits, and strove to imitate his delicacy and glowing colors. After an absence of nine years, he returned to his own country, and settled in his native city, where he greatly distinguished himself as an historical and portrait painter. He particularly excelled in portraits. One of his most admired paintings is a large picture in the Hall of the Surgeons at Delft, in which he introduced the portraits of the most eminent medical men of his time. His compositions partake more of the Italian than of the Dutch school, and his coloring is founded on that of the Venetian. Brulliot, who erroneously calls his name Charles, says he engraved several portraits in a style approaching that of Jean Morin, but doubtless the prints he refers to were engraved by another artist of the name of Maan. He died in 1706.

MAAT. See BLANKHOF.

MABUSE, JOHN DE, a Flemish painter; born at Maubeuge, a small town in Hainault, according to Harms in 1492, and to Descamps in 1499. There is an astonishing contradiction among authors as to the name, time of nativity, death, merits, and works of this artist. He is called by some Jan (James) and others John de Mabuse, Maubeuge, and Malbeugius. From a singular whim of the artist, his name is found differently written on his works, as Joannes Melbogijs, Joas Malbogijs, Johannes or Joannes Malbodius, and Joas Malbogi. We cannot discuss these matters here, but proceed to give what is authentic. His family name was Gossaert or Gossard. It is not known under whom he first studied. He went to Italy when very young, where he made extraordinary improvement, and was the first among the Flemish masters who treated historical and allegorical subjects according to strict rules of art, and the first to introduce the nude into his compositions, which had never before been practised among them. To appreciate the extraordinary merits of this artist, it is necessary to see some of his genuine works, instead of the wretched remains of Gothicity which are attributed to him, and which have caused the contradictions as to his merits. His design surpasses his cotemporaries of the Flemish school; his coloring is fresh and clear, and his pictures are of a finish so precious and polished that they are not surpassed by the productions of Mieris or Douw. There can be no greater proof of his merit than the fact that the fame of his Descent from the Cross, in the great church at Middleburg, induced both Albert Durer and Lucas van Leyden to make a journey to that city expressly to see the picture, and that they both expressed their admiration of the work in the strongest terms. He bestowed extraordinary labor in finishing his works. His Wise Men's Offering, painted for the church of the Abbey of Grammont, according to the register of that Abbey, occupied him seven years, and he received 2000 golden pistoles for it. This picture, after having passed through the hands of various princes and nobles, is now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle. His history is very confused. He was a considerable time in the service of the Marquis de Veren, and for him painted some of his most capital works, one of which was a picture of the Virgin and Infant, in which he complimented his patron by making the heads of his lady and his son the models for his figures. He was immoderately given to dissipation, and spent all his money as fast as he earned it in carousing with his boon companions. It is related that, when the Emperor Charles V. visited the Marquis de Veren, the latter gave Mabuse a splendid court dress to appear in, which he sold at a tavern, and painted a paper one in which he made his appearance, and that it so exactly resembled brocade that the Emperor would not be convinced of the deception till he examined it with his own hands. Van Mander says he went to England, and was patronized by Henry VII. and some of the nobility; Pilkington and Bryan, on his authority, state the same. Fiorillo emphatically denies that he ever was in England, and Stanley is of this opinion. There is, however, a picture in the royal collection at Windsor, containing the portraits of three of the children of Henry VII. attributed to him. It is probable that he led a short and merry life. The earliest authenticated picture bearing his signature is dated 1516, and the latest discovered, 1527. By the general concurrence of most writers of authority, he was born between 1496 and 1500. If so, he must have painted his Neptune and Amphitrite, now in the Royal Museum at Berlin, dated 1516, at a very early age. Descamps says he died in 1562; but it is believed that he died in 1532, from the latest date found on his pictures, 1527, and from a print of his portrait published by Philip Galle, on which is inscribed Fuit Hanno patrii Malbodensis, obiit Antwerpice anno 1532. Yet, if he bestowed as much labor on all his pictures as he did on his Wise Men's Offering, he could never have executed a tenth part of the pictures considered genuine by him. The following are claimed as original by him. Many others are cited by authors, but in such general terms as to make it impossible to specify them.

PICTURES BY, AND ATTRIBUTED TO, JOHN DE MABUSE.

1. Neptune and Amphitrite. This picture is signed Jo-

Johannes Malbodius, pingebat, 1516. In the Royal Museum at Berlin.

2. Danaë receiving the Shower of Gold. This picture is signed Joannes Malbodius pingebat, 1527. In the Pinacothek.

3. Justice, drawing of the Figure of a Female in a circle. In the collection of the Archduke Charles at Vienna.

4. Lucretia, a picture mentioned by Karel van Mander.

5. Adam and Eve, formerly in Charles I.'s collection, and now, or lately, at Kensington Palace.

6. Adam and Eve, mentioned by K. van Mander, formerly at Amsterdam.

7. Adam and Eve near the Tree of Knowledge. In the Museum at Berlin.

8. Noah drunk and asleep. The figures are imitations of the fresco of Michelangelo in the Sistine chapel.

9. Abimelech offering presents to Abraham; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.

10. The Visitation, right wing only, at Althorp.

11. Adoration of the Shepherds, in the royal chateau at Wurzburg.

12. The Adoration of the Magi, a rich composition, with about thirty principal figures. This is one of the most important works of Jan de Mabuse. It was formerly in the Orleans Gallery, and is now at Castle Howard.

13. Adoration of the Magi (probably by Mabuse), in the gallery at Dresden.

14. The Holy Family. Mary and Anne seated on a throne, surrounded by their relations of both sexes. In the Pinacothek.

15. The Virgin and Child, on a Throne, St. Joseph, St. Catherine, and another Saint, who is offering a Pear to the Virgin. At Corsham House, if it has not been sold recently.

16. The Virgin, Child, and St. Joseph. In the chapel St. Maurice, at Nuremberg. Another of the same subject, formerly in the Boisserée collection, in which Christ extends his hand to take an Apple. This has been lithographed by Heindel.

17. Holy Family. In the Pinacothek.

18. The Virgin. A picture mentioned by Karel van Mander.

19. The Virgin and Infant, under a Gothic canopy, surrounded by six angels. In the collection of Sir Thomas Baring.

20. The Virgin holding the Child on her Knees, who has his hands full of Cherries; after a composition of L. da Vinci. At Berlin.

21. The Virgin offering a Grape to the Child. At Berlin.

22. Mary holding the sleeping Child to her Breast. In the style of Mabuse. At Berlin.

23. Mary holding the Child on a Cornice. In the chapel St. Maurice, at Nuremberg.

24. Mary holding the Child on a Cornice, on which she is seated; the picture is signed Johannes Malbodius pingebat, 1527. In the Pinacothek.

25. The Virgin seated in a Niche, holding the Infant on her Knees. At Vienna.

26. The Virgin on a Throne. In the ducal palace at Genoa.

27. Mary, with the Child seated on a Throne, in the form of a shell, with two Saints and a third person. The Archduke Charles, at Vienna.

28. Mary, with the Child asleep on her Knees. Engraved by G. Wyns.

29. Mary seated, the Infant standing. An engraving with the date 1599.

30. Jesus with the rich Young Man. In the palace at Kensington.

31. Christ led out from before Pilate. A grisaille, in the collection of the councillor Kirschbaum, at Munich.

32. The Crucifixion, a picture containing a great number of figures. In the lower part, in a separate compartment, is seen the Flagellation and the Crowning with Thorns. In the Pinacothek.

33. Descent from the Cross. Formerly at Middelbourg, but destroyed by fire. Vasari mentions it: "di sua mano in Silvano è una gran tribuna nella badia di Middelborgo."

34. Descent from the Cross, mentioned by Karel van Mander.

35. Descent from the Cross; on the wings are St. John the Baptist and St. Peter, in the middle of rich architecture. This picture formerly ornamented the church of St. Donat at Bruges, and was afterwards in the possession of Mr. Edward Solly, of London; it is signed Joanes Malbogi, pingebat, anno 1521.

36. Christ at the house of Simon the Pharisee; the middle part of a triptique. In the Museum at Brussels.

37. The Resurrection of Lazarus; the left wing of the preceding. In the Museum at Brussels.

38. Resurrection of the Magdalene; right wing of the same. In the Museum at Brussels.

39. The Dead Body of Christ, surrounded by three Men and two Women; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles.

40. Mary seated at the foot of the Cross, with the body of Christ extended on the ground and supported by her knees; in the distance is the city of Jerusalem. An engraving which bears the following inscriptions: Joan. Mabusi inventor. Hieronymus Wierinx (Wierix?) sculpsit; Gerardus de Jode, excudit.

41. Christ in Glory, with the symbols of the four Evangelists. In the Pinacothek.

42. Twelve subjects from the Life of St. Augustine. Collection of the king of Holland. These form one picture, the subjects being separated by ornaments.

43. The Pope reading the Mass, surrounded by Cardinals and Priests. In the church of St. James at Lubeck.

44. Jesus appearing on the Altar, while a Priest is consecrating the Host. A very rare engraving; in the possession of the Chevalier van Eersel.

45. Bust of St. Jerome; middle of an altar-piece. At Althorp.

46. The Decollation of St. James, en grisaille. Formerly at Amsterdam, according to Van Mander.

47. St. John the Baptist; one of the wings of a folding picture, formerly in the church of St. Donat at Bruges, and afterwards in the collection of Mr. Edward Solly, at London.

48. The Archangel Michael. In the Pinacothek. Lithographed by Strixner in 1821.

49. The Apostle St. Peter, formerly in the church of St. Donat, at Bruges, afterwards in the collection of Mr. Edward Solly.

50. The legendary Tale of Albanacht presenting his three daughters naked to King Alfred; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.

51. Portrait of the Mother of Henry VIII.; at Corsham. Waagen believes it to be of the time of Holbein.

52. Marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York; attributed to Mabuse.

53. The three Children of Henry VII.; at Hampton Court; attributed to Mabuse.

54. A repetition of the same; at Kensington.

55. A copy of the same; at Corsham House.

56. Francis and Maximilian Sforza, dukes of Milan; left wing of a triptique; at Althorp.

57. Portraits; formerly in the gallery at Whitehall.

58. At Lee Priory there were formerly some pictures attributed to Mabuse.

59. A small painting in one of the armories, in the library of the Vatican.

MAC ARDELL. See ARDELL.

MACCHI, FLORIO, an Italian painter, who studied under Lodovico Caracci, and was an able disciple of his school. He executed many works for the churches at Bologna, among which is a Crucifixion, in the church of S. Andrea del Mercato, and the Raising of Lazarus in la Morte, are the most admired. His greatest work is a grand fresco, representing the Annunciation, in the church of Il Spirito Santo, which has often been taken for a work of his master. Malvasia states that he was a native of Bologna, and flourished about 1620. Orlandi speaks of him also as an engraver, but he does not specify any of the productions of his burin.

MACCHIETTI, GIROLAMO, called DEL CROCI-FISSAIO, from his father having been a carver of crucifixes, was born at Florence in 1535. After studying some time under Michele Ridolfi de Ghirlandajo, he became the pupil of Giorgio Vasari, whom he assisted for some years in the execution of his works in the Ducal Palace at Florence. He then went to Rome, remained there two years, and then returned to Florence, where he acquired considerable reputation, and executed some excellent works for the churches, the chief of which is the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Lorenzo; and the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Maria Novella. These works are highly commended by Lomazzo and Borghini. Lanzi also commends his works. His best works are said to be at Naples, Pisa, and Benevento. He also painted some battle-pieces in the Hall of the Albani, at S. Giovanni in Urbino. Lanzi says he also went to Spain.

MACÉ, or MASSÉ, CHARLES, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris about 1631. He was much employed by M. Jabach to make designs from his celebrated collection of drawings, and to etch them. The set consists of two hundred and eighty prints, engraved by him in conjunction with his brothers, Corneille and Rousseau M., and Jean Pesne. There is a set of twelve etchings of landscapes and figures illustrative of biblical subjects, after Benedetto Castiglione, executed in a bold, free style, which M. Huber attributes to this artist. They are marked C. Macé sculp., in the margin. Dumesnil gives a list of one hundred and twenty-three prints by him.

MACERATA, GIUSEPPINO DA, an Italian painter, born at Macerata about 1600. He is said by tradition to have studied under Agostino Caracci. His works have a strong resemblance to the school of the Caracci in grandeur of style and chastity of composition. His works are to be seen in the two collegiate churches of Fabriano, viz.: an Annunciation, in oil, in S. Niccolo, and two chapels in S. Venanzio, painted in fresco, in one of which he represented the Miracles of the Apostles, in which Lanzi says he surpassed himself in the beauty of the heads, and in the general composition. Two of his works remain in his native place; the Virgin and Infant, surrounded with a Glory of Angels, with Sts. Nicola and Girolamo, in the church of the Carmelites, and St. Peter receiving the Keys at that of the Capuchins. Both these pictures are in the Caracci style; the latter is so much like the composition of Guido's picture of the same subject in the church of the Fillippini at Fano, that it may be considered a copy. It is signed Jos. Ma. faciebat. 1630.

MACHELLI, ROLANDO, a Genoese artist, born in 1664, and died there in 1728. He was a reputable painter of portraits and history.

MACHEREN, PHILIP VAN, a Dutch marine painter, who flourished at Middlebourg in the latter part of the 17th century. In 1672 he entered one of the vessels of war, for the express purpose of seeing and depicting the horrors of a naval combat. He also made several voyages in Danish and Swedish vessels for the same purpose. His works are rarely seen with his name, nor are there any further particulars recorded of him, except that Balkema says he died at Amsterdam, and Immerzeel at Rotterdam.

MACHUCA, a Spanish architect, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century, and erected, according to Milizia, the royal palace of Granada, entirely of wrought stone, by order of Charles

V. The principal façade is rustic, with three large gates, and eight Doric columns on pedestals, sculptured with historical bas-reliefs. The second story is Ionic, with eight columns, and above them pilasters. The internal vestibule is circular, with a portico and gallery, on columns of the same order; the architraves are one single piece of marble. Unfortunately there are arches springing from the columns; but the rest of the work is well arranged; the vestibule, especially, is ingeniously managed, and of good proportions.

MACOURT, C., a German artist who, according to Lord Orford, resided several years in London, was a member of the Chartered Society of Artists, in whose rooms he exhibited his works from 1761 to 1767. He painted portraits in oil and in miniature. One of his best works is a three-quarter portrait of Morier, the animal painter, which has great merit. He died in 1768.

MACRET, CHARLES FRANÇOIS ADRIEN, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1752, and died at Paris in 1783. He studied under N. G. Dupuis, at Paris, and engraved several plates in a neat and pleasing style, among which the following are the principal:

Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after Vanderwerf. The Arrival of Rousseau in the Elysian Fields; after Moreau. The Reception of Voltaire in the Elysian Fields; after Fauvel. The Sacrifice to Cupid; after Greuze. The First Fruits of Self-love; after Gonzalez.

MACRINO, D'ALBA, a native of Alladio, and a citizen of Alba, whence he signed his name Macrinus de Alba. Lanzi says his real name was Gio. Giacomo Fava, but he is known at Turin and other places by the name of Maerino. He was an excellent painter, and there are many of his works, both large and small historical pictures, at Turin and other places, especially at Asti and Alba, which are held in high esteem. It is not known with whom he studied, or when he was born or died, but some of his works are dated about 1508.

MADDERSTEG, MICHAEL, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1659. He studied under Backhuysen, and, according to Houbraken, was his ablest scholar, and imitated his style with extraordinary success. His sea-pieces and storms approach so near the works of his master that they have been mistaken for them. He was invited to the Court of Berlin, where he passed the greater part of his life. His works are mostly confined to the collections at Berlin, and other parts of Germany. He died in 1709.

MADERNO, DA Como, a painter of Como, who flourished about 1700. Lanzi says he painted interiors of kitchens, with all kinds of household utensils, in the taste of the Bassani, with whom less experienced judges are apt to confound him. His works of this kind display great ingenuity and beauty. He also painted flower-pieces, tastefully composed, and beautifully executed.

MADERNO, CARLO, an eminent Italian architect, born at Bissone, in the Comasco, in 1556. He was a nephew of Domenico Fontana, and visited Rome to study under that master. According to Milizia, his first profession was that of stuccoing, but from practising with Fontana, and studying his works, he became an architect; though he always retained an attachment to his original pursuit, his buildings being invariably loaded with stuccoes. Like the Fontanas and others, he fell into the extravagancies of Buonarotti, without his excellencies, and erected many works which gained him great reputation in his time, but which cannot stand the test of enlightened criticism. He completed the church of S. Giacomo degl' Incurabili, and made the façade of two orders of pilasters, the first Doric, with plain metopes, very improperly placed; the second Corinthian, with separated pedestals, but at very small distances. The whole work abounds in defects. His façade of Santa Suseanna is grand and rich in travertine and sculpture, but is a group of absurdities.

Maderno was appointed to complete the building of St. Peter's, in which nothing remained to be done but to finish that part toward the entrance, giving it the same form as that at the upper end, and thus complete the Greek cross, which had been the intention of Bramante, Peruzzi, and Buonarotti. Instead of doing this, however, he changed the Greek into the Latin cross, and destroyed the harmony of the whole edifice. According to Milizia, this work is exceedingly disproportioned. He says, "the effect produced on the spectator who enters St. Peter's for the first time will be that of an ordinary church, appearing much less than it really is. It is easy to see whence this grand defect arises, when we consider the disproportion between the two lateral aisles added by Maderno, and the grand centre nave planned by Buonarotti, the former being no wider than one of the many altars which are in them. This result, by incorrect judges, has been attributed to the beauty of the proportions; and even Montesquieu, in his Treatise on Taste, subscribes to this singular opinion. But the real effect of just proportions is to make an edifice appear larger than it really is, as is the case in the Sforza chapel in S. Maria Maggiore; that of the Medici in S. Lorenzo at Florence; the Library in the same church; the temple of the Madonna degli Angeli, near Assisi, reduced by Michael Angelo to its present proportions. When one enters these or similar edifices, the heart expands, becomes ennobled, and more capable of receiving the grand impressions which the building is calculated to inspire. Were one to enter St. Peter's with the eyes closed, and not open them until he reached one of the lateral arms, in which is the altar of St. Simon and St. Jude, or that of Sts. Processo and Martiniano, he would be astonished at the surrounding grandeur, magnificence, and vastness, which are not evident upon entering the principal gate." In addition to the above, Milizia severely criticises the façade, and many other additions by Maderno, and concludes by calling him "a perfect master of distorted architecture."

Notwithstanding the imperfections of Maderno, his work at St. Peter's gained him such great reputation, that scarcely an edifice was erected without his designs and advice. His reputation extended beyond Rome, and many of his designs were sent to the first cities in Italy, Spain, and France. He completed the palace at Monte Cavallo; removed a column from the ancient Temple of Peace, and erected it in the square of S. Maria Maggiore. He was commanded by the Pope to examine the different ports of the State, and to take the plan of the fortress of Ferrara. Among his other works are the church and monastery of Santa Lucia in Selce; that of Santa Chiara; the choir and cupola of Santa Andrea della Valle, characterized by simplicity; and the Palazzo Mattei, which does great honor to the architect, being majestic and well disposed, and the doors and windows well set out. His last work was the magnificent Barberini palace of Urban VIII., which he did not live to finish. He died in 1629.

MADERNO, STEFANO, an Italian sculptor, born in Lombardy in 1576. During the first years of his professional career, he made many models after the antique, which were afterwards executed in bronze. In the Pauline chapel of S. Maria Maggiore, he executed a marble bas-relief, representing a Battle; also the model of a bas-relief in bronze, representing the History of the Foundation of S. Maria Maggiore. After executing a large number of good works, he was presented by Count Gasparo Rivaldi with a commission in the civil government of Ripetta, which completely occupied his time, so that he relinquished the art. Maderno died at Rome in 1636.

MADIONA, ANTONIO, a Sicilian painter, was born at Syracuse in 1650, and died in 1719. He studied under Agostino Scilla, at Rome, and afterwards accompanied Cav. Preti to Malta. According to Lanzi, he was an able artist. He painted some pictures at Malta, and more after his return to his native country, executed in a strong, vigorous style, resembling those of both his masters.

MADONNE, DALLE, an epithet applied by Italians to some artists who excelled or had some peculiarity in painting Madonnas. Thus Carlo Dolci and Carlo Maratti were called Carlo dalle Madonne, and Lippo Dalmasio, Lippo dalle Madonne, &c.

MADONNINA, FRANCESCO, a painter who flourished at Modena about 1550. According to Vidriani, he was one of the most celebrated artists of that city, but Lanzi says there are not enough of his works remaining in Modena to form a judgment of his style.

MAENNL. See MANNL.

MAES, or MAAS, ARNOLD, a Dutch painter, born at Gouda in 1620. He studied under David Teniers the younger, and for a time imitated his style and subjects with considerable success and spirit, and it is supposed he would have arrived at eminence, had he devoted his powers in this line; but aspiring to a higher department of art, he went to Italy for the purpose of studying the works of the great Italian historical painters.—After a residence of several years at Rome, he returned to Holland, and died soon after his arrival; Balkema says in 1664, while on his way home. He left a large number of designs, which are still preserved and esteemed in the collections of connoisseurs. Descamps states that he etched several plates, and that he studied engraving under Renier Persyn, but he does not specify any of his prints. Zani also mentions him as an engraver.

MAES, or MAAS, DIRK or THEODORE, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1656. After studying some time under Hendrick Mommers, disliking his style and subjects (markets and still-life), he placed himself under Nicholas Berghem, whose works were then held in the highest estimation, and with which he was highly delighted, and it is supposed that he would have become eminent had he confined himself to this master, and adopted his subjects; but happening to see some of the works of John van Huchtenburg, he quitted Berghem for that master, whose style and subjects he adopted, and painted ever afterwards, battles, skirmishes, huntings, horse-fairs, &c. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and touched with an intelligent and spirited pencil. He particularly excelled in his horses, which he designed and drew in various attitudes, with surpassing spirit and correctness. He went to England in the reign of King William, where he met with some encouragement, and, among other works, painted the Battle of the Boyne for the Earl of Portland, of which there is a print engraved in two sheets. He also etched some spirited prints, from his own designs, among which is a Cavalier on Horseback, fine and scarce. He died at Haerlem in 1715.

MAES, or MAAS, PETER, a Dutch engraver, and probably a painter, who flourished about 1578. Little is known of him. He etched a few prints in a slight but spirited style. There are some by him, copied from Henry Goltzius, marked with his name. Peter Maes. Bryan mentions a print by him, representing the Virgin and Child, signed P. Maas, fecit, in aqua forti. Brulliot gives two prints marked with his monogram, dated 1577 and 1578, one of which is a portrait of Mary Queen of Scots.

MAES, or MAAS, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1632. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Amsterdam, and entered the school of Rembrandt. Under that master he became an excellent colorist, and, on leaving him, distinguished himself as a painter of historical subjects of small size, in which he imitated with great success the richness of tone and harmony of effect to be found in the works of Rembrandt. Finding portrait painting a more profitable pursuit, and possessing great facility of execution and a spirited pencil, he devoted himself afterwards almost exclusively to this branch of the art, in which he found such abundant employment that it was accounted a great favor to get a portrait painted by him. His cabinet pictures are very scarce. Smith, with all his research, specifies only forty-five in his Catalogue raisonné and supplement. They are chiefly found in public galleries, and the private collections of opulent persons, and they are so much esteemed that they bring very high prices when they appear in the public sales. There are some of his finest subjects in the public galleries and the collections of the nobility of England, particularly the Idle Servant, and a Girl seated by a Cradle with a Child asleep, in the National Gallery. His works so nearly approach Rembrandt, that it requires a connoisseur to distinguish them from those of that master. He signed his name N. Maes, not Maas. He died in 1693.

MAES, or MAAS, GODFREY, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1660. He was the son of an obscure painter, who instructed him in the elements of the art. Possessing genius and a deep love of art, and being surrounded with the grand productions of Rubens and other eminent artists, he studied them so attentively that he became one of the most eminent artists of his time. He painted sacred and historical subjects in the grand Flemish style, which are to be found in the churches and public edifices of the different cities of the Netherlands, especially of Antwerp, where his works appear to the greatest advantage. In the Cathedral of that city is a fine picture by him, representing the Death of St. Lucia; in the church of St. George is his celebrated altar-piece of the death of that Saint; and in the church of the Hospital is his Assumption of the Virgin, composed and executed in the great style of Rubens. In 1682, when he was admitted a member of the Academy at Antwerp, he painted for his reception picture a subject emblematical of the Liberal Arts, which is one of the most admirable works in the Hall. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, his design more correct than is usual with the Flemish painters, and like the generality of his countrymen, he was an excellent colorist. He draped his figures elegantly, with broad folds, and was a strict observer of the propriety of costume. His back-grounds were enriched with noble architecture, or the vestiges of ancient magnificent buildings in appropriate landscapes. He was constantly employed in executing works for the churches, the palaces of the nobility, and for several foreign princes. He was appointed to the honorable office of Director of the Academy of Antwerp. He died in 1722.

There are many other artists of the name of Maes, whose biography has not been written, but the foregoing are the principal.

MAFFEI, FRANCESCO, was a native of Vicenza, and studied under Santo Peranda, some of whose pictures left unfinished at his death, he completed. He afterwards adopted the manner of Paul Veronese with considerable success. His style is on a lofty scale, insomuch that Boschini calls him a great mannerist and a painter of giants. According to Lanzi and other authors, he displays so much originality of design, with so much grace, that he cannot be ranked among the mannerists. His coloring too, exhibits the true glow of the Venetian school. Lanzi says his picture of St. Anna at San Michele di Vicenza, besides many works produced at the same place for the public edifices, and elsewhere, extremely poetical, full of fine portraits, and colored in the best Venetian style, show that he was able to compete with his ablest cotemporaries. His great fault was that he did not finish his works, or at least some of them, with sufficient care, often leaving some of his heads and figures incomplete. He was scanty in his coloring, employing dark grounds, and painted rather for immediate effect, than for permanence. His grand picture of Paradise, in the church of S. Francesco at Padua, owing to this method, has lost almost every trace of color, so that the praise of Boschini, that with four strokes of his pencil he could make the beholder raise his eyes in admiration, should rather be a warning to our expeditious artists who wish to preserve their reputation to posterity. He died at Padua in 1660.

MAFFEI, JACOPO, a Venetian painter, who, according to Lanzi, was an admirable painter of marines and incidents at sea, some of which were engraved by Boschini. He flourished in 1663.

MAGAGNOLO, FRANCESCO, a painter of Modena, who flourished there about 1500. According to Tiraboschi, he was an excellent artist, and one of the first who drew his countenances in such a manner as to appear looking at the spectator at whatever point of view he might observe them.

MAGANZA, GIO. BATTISTA, the ELDER, was born at Vicenza in 1509. He was brought up in the school of Titian, whose style he imitated with great success, especially in portraits, which are his best works, though he left some historical pictures at Vicenza which evince a chaste and refined taste. He was the head of a family of artists who did honor to their country. He was also quite famous as a poet, and wrote verses in the rustic idiom of Parma, under the name of "Magagno," while such cotemporaries as Tasso, Trissino, Sperone, and other celebrated wits, not ignorant of the dialect, applauded the excellence of his rude sylvan strains. He died in 1589.

MAGANZA, ALESSANDRO, the son of the preceding, was born at Vicenza in 1556. After receiving instructions from his father, he studied with Gio. Antonio Fasolo, who inspired him with his own taste. He was also a fine imitator of Zelotti and Paul Veronese, as he has shown by his Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Domenico, and the Martyrdom of S. Giustina, in S. Pietro, at Vicenza. Lanzi says he executed many works which are to be found in the private and public edifices at Vicenza, and in the provinces and adjacent cities. He had great facility of execution, was judicious in his composition, and pleasing in his countenances, which are often repeated in different works. He enriched his pictures with noble architecture. Lanzi says that his flesh tints incline towards white, the folds of his draperies are somewhat hard and monotonous; and that he not unfrequently presents us with the same features, and the same attitudes and motions. This last could not be from want of genius, which some of his works show to have been of a high order, but from the necessities of a numerous family for whom he had to provide. He was exceedingly unfortunate as a father. His son Gio. Battista died in 1617, leaving a young family to the care of their grandfather. His second son, Girolamo, who had also to provide for his own children, and Marc' Antonio, his third son, then a youth, afterwards assisted their father in his works, and began to acquire distinction themselves, when the great plague that ravaged Italy in 1630, swept the whole family away, first his two sons, then all his grandchildren, one after another, until, "left the last of his race," to lament over the destruction of his kindred, he soon followed them to the tomb, in the same year, aged 74.

MAGANZA, GIO. BATTISTA, the YOUNGER, was the son of Alessandro M., born at Vicenza in 1577, and died in 1617. He studied under his father, whom he afterwards assisted in many of his principal works, and whom he nearly equalled, as is proved by his fine picture of St. Benedetto in the church of S. Giustina at Padua.

MAGATTI, PIETRO, a native of Varese, who flourished at Milan about 1770. He was a good artist, and executed some works for the churches. Lanzi says his works are somewhat tinged with the greenish hues, introduced by Solimena in Naples, and which spread over Italy.

MAGGI, GIOVANNI, an Italian painter and engraver, who flourished at Rome in the last part of the 16th, and first part of the 17th centuries.

He painted landscapes and architectural views, but is more known as an engraver. In 1618, in conjunction with Domenico Parasachi, he published a series of plates representing the principal fountains of Rome. He also undertook to engrave a plan of Rome, with its principal edifices, on a very extended scale, but it was abandoned for want of patronage. The following prints are also by him: A Landscape with Ruins and a Waterfall, with figures; J. Maius, in. et. fec. 1595. Figura della Vita humana; Joh. Maius, fec. 1600. The portrait of a Cardinal; as large as life.

MAGGI, PIETRO, a Milanese painter, who studied under Filippo Abbiati, whose manner he imitated. He was a reputable artist, and flourished about 1700.

MAGGIERI, CESARE, a painter of Urbino, who, according to Lazzari, was a good and an industrious artist, and executed many works for the churches of his native city and other places. Lanzi says his style inclines to that of Barocci and the Roman school. In a picture of St. Agostino, at Castel di Castello, he signs his name Maccarius. He died in 1629.

MAGGIERI, BASILIO, a painter of Urbino, probably a brother of the preceding, who flourished about the same time, and excelled in portraits.

MAGGIOTTO, DOMENICO, a Venetian painter, who studied under Gio. Battista Piazzetta, whose style he adopted, though much subdued. He painted history with considerable reputation, and some of his works have been engraved at Venice and in Germany. He died in 1794, at an advanced age.

MAGISTRIS, SIMONE DE, a native of Caldarola, who flourished in the Roman States about 1585. He acquired considerable eminence, both as a painter and a sculptor, and left many works in the provinces. His best works are at Ascoli; and his Madonna del Rosario in the church of S. Domenico, and another of the same subject at S. Rocco, are highly commended by Orsini. None of his sculptures are mentioned.

MAGLIAR, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, born at Naples in 1692. He engraved some plates after Franceso Solimena. He had a son named Gioseffo, whom he instructed in the art, and who gave promise of uncommon ability, but died very young. He engraved a plate representing Christ appearing to St. Guglielmo, after Solimena.

MAGLIONE. See BENINCASA.

MAGNANI, CRISTOFORO, a native of Pizzighettone; studied under Bernardino Campi. He was an artist of great promise, but died young about 1580. Antonio Campi laments the shortness of his career, and Lamo mentions him and Trotti as the two greatest geniuses of the school of Cremona. He painted some considerable frescos in conjunction with Cav. Molosso and Mainardi. Lanzi says nothing of his works remain that has not been questioned. His chief talent lay in portraits, and it is said his memory was so retentive that he could draw the portrait of any person he had ever seen.

MAGNASCO, ALESSANDRO, called Lissandri-no, was born at Genoa in 1681. He was the son of Stefano M., a pupil of Valerio Castello, who died while he was in his infancy. He studied under Filippo Abbiati at Milan, and though he painted different subjects, on a smaller scale than those of his master, yet he acquired much of the boldness and spirit of his touch. He was very fond of painting military evolutions, public processions, schools of girls and boys, chapters of friars, artists' shops, Jewish synagogues, &c., which he painted with great humor and delight. His figures are seldom more than a span in length, executed with a bold, simple stroke of the pencil. Lanzi calls him the Cerquozzi of the Genoese school. There are many of his works in the private and public collections at Milan, and especially at Florence, where he resided many years, and was a great favorite with the Grand Duke Gio. Guastone, and all his court. Several are in the Pitti Gallery. He was an eccentric character, and when he inserted the figures in the works of his brother artists, which he was often solicited to do, he frequently added the most opposite subjects, which produced a most comical effect. This he did in the architectural ruins of Clemente Spera, and in the landscapes of Tavella and others. He died in 1747.

MAHUE, WILHELM, an eminent Dutch portrait painter, born at Brussels in 1517, and died there in 1569. Little is known of the events of his life. He is said to have enjoyed great reputation in his day. His works are rare, and mostly confined to his own country.

MAIA, GIOVANNI STEFANO, a native of Genoa, was born in 1672, and died in 1747. According to Ratti, he went to Naples and studied under Solimena. He was a reputable painter, and excelled in portraits.

MAIANO, GIULIANO DA, a Florentine architect, a native of the village of Maiano, near Fiesole. His father was a stone cutter, and wished him to pursue a literary career; but the son first devoted himself to sculpture, and afterwards to architecture. Invited to Naples by King Alfonso, he erected the magnificent palace of Poggio Reale, in the form of a square, with an arched portico in the centre, at the wings of which are Ionic pilasters, on high pedestals. The second floor has Corinthian pilasters, between which are windows, with a pediment. He erected a noble gate to the Castel Nuovo of Naples in the Corinthian style, like a triumphal arch, enriched with large figures and bas-reliefs. He also made designs for various works, particularly for many fountains in private palaces, contrived in a very ingenious manner. Being invited to Rome by Paul II., he made a court yard in the Vatican palace, which appears, according to Milizia, to be that now called S. Damaso, surrounded on three sides by three galleries of three orders. His principal work, however, was the palace and church of St. Mark, where he employed a great quantity of travertine stone taken from the ruins of the Coliseum. The pope sent him to Loretto, to adorn the body of that church, and he then returned to Naples, to complete the edifices he had commenced in that city. Vasari says that he died at Naples in 1447, in the reign of King Alfonso; but this statement is evidently incorrect, from the fact of Giuliano being employed by Paul II., who was pope from 1464 to 1471. Rumohr has clearly ascertained that Maiano was living at Florence in 1471.

MAIANO, BENEDETTO DA, the nephew of Giuliano da M., was born in 1444. He studied sculpture and architecture with success, and also gained great reputation for his performances in inlaid work, of which several specimens may be seen in the sacristy of S. Maria del Fiore at Florence, remarkable for their richness, good taste, and finished ornaments. King Alfonso of Naples invited him to that city, where his uncle was at that time employed, and he executed several works; but on receiving an invitation from Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary, he visited that country, and remained some time in the King's service. Returning to Florence, he was commissioned to erect the grand entrance to the Hall of Audience, and executed the sculptures, besides the admirable portraits of Dante and Petrarch in inlaid work. By order of Lorenzo the Magnificent, he executed a marble bust of Giotto, placed in the church of S. Maria del Fiore. He was invited to Naples, and commissioned with many works, among which were a marble bas-relief of the Annunciation, in the monastery of Monte Oliveto. He afterwards returned to Florence, and executed the grand marble pulpit in the church of Santa Croce, representing the History of St. Francesco, which has been engraved in the Notizie delle Chiese Florentine, by P. Richa, vol. I., plate 56. Maiano died in 1498, and was buried with honors in the church of S. Lorenzo at Florence.

MAILLET, JOSEPH, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1775. There are some plates of landscapes engraved by him in a neat, pleasing style.

MAINARDI, LATTANZIO, a Bolognese painter, who studied in the school of the Caracci, and went to Rome where he was employed in the Vatican in the Pontificate of Sextus V. He possessed genius, and the works he conducted there, gave promise of great renown, but he died at the early age of 27 years. Baglione calls him Lattanzio Bolognese.

MAINARDI, ANDREA, called IL CHIAVEGHINO, was a native of Cremona, where he exercised his art from 1590 to 1613. He was brought up in the school of Bernardino Campi, was one of his ablest scholars, and instructed several pupils. In conjunction with his nephew, Marc' Antonio Mainardi, he executed several considerable works at Cremona. One of his best pictures is the Marriage of St. Anna in the church of the Eremitani, which is pronounced an admirable performance in design, coloring, and execution. Unfortunately for his reputation, he did not always bestow equal care and attention upon his works, some of which show negligence in design, and haste in execution.

MAINARDI, MARC' ANTONIO, was a native of Cremona, and studied under Campi. He was an excellent artist; assisted his uncle Andrea M. in many of his works, and also painted several pictures from his own designs, one of which, at Castel Buttano, in the Cremonese, is dated 1629.

MAINARDI, BASTIANO, a reputable mosaic painter, and a native of Florence, who studied under Domenico del Ghirlandaio.

MAINERO, GIO. BATTISTA, a Genoese painter, born in 1610. He studied under Luciano Borzone, under whose instruction he made rapid progress, and at an early age distinguished himself by some cabinet pictures of historical subjects, which were much admired. He excelled in portraits, and meeting with ample patronage from the nobility and gentry, he afterwards made this branch his exclusive occupation. He died of the plague in 1657.

MAIR, an old German engraver, who flourished about 1499. From resemblance of style, it is supposed that he was a disciple of Martin Schoen, though greatly inferior to that master. Their design is equally Gothic. He is said to have been the inventor of that species of engraving called chiaro-scuro. There are some fifteen or sixteen prints attributed to him, generally marked with his name, and dated 1499, among which are the following :

Samson carrying the Gates of Gaza. The Wise Men's Offering. The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian. A Man talking to a Woman, seen through the door of a house, with a Dog snarling at a Monkey. The Virgin and Infant, with St. Anne. The Virgin and Infant, with St. Joseph holding a Candle; in chiaro-scuro.

MAIR, ALEXANDER, a German engraver on wood and copper, who flourished at Augsburg about 1600. He was chiefly employed in engraving plates and frontispieces for the booksellers, some of which are executed in so masterly a manner, that it is regretted his talents had not been employed on more important subjects. He usually marked his plates with a monogram of his initials, as above.

MAIR, a German painter of insects, serpents, lizards, and other reptiles, in the manner of Otho Maseus or Marcellis, to whom his works are generally attributed, though they are painted on a lighter ground. He particularly excelled in painting butterflies. Little is known of him, except that he lived at Nimeguen in the 18th century.

MAISON-NEUVE, a modern French engraver, briefly mentioned by Basan. He engraved several portraits, among which is one of Jacques Theodore Klein. He also engraved the French Parnassus, from a bronze.

MAITRE, Roux. See Rosso.

MAJOLI, or MAJOLA, CLEMENTE, a painter of Ferrara, was born about 1640, and studied at Rome under P. da Cortona. He acquired considerable reputation, and there are some of his works in the Rotunda at Rome, and many in the churches at Ferrara and other cities, which are commended, especially a picture of S. Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi in the church of S. Paolo, and S. Niccolo da Tolentino, supported by an Angel, in the church of S. Giuseppe at Ferrara.

MAJOR, ISAAC, a German painter and engraver, born at Frankfort about 1576. He went to Prague, and studied painting for some time under Roland Savery, the painter to Rodolphus II. He afterwards studied engraving under Giles Sadeler, in whose style he engraved several plates, which have considerable merit, though they are greatly inferior to the works of his master. In the execution of his plates he united the point and the graver. The following are among his best prints :

A set of six Landscapes, Views in Bohemia; after P. Stephani. A set of nine romantic Views, numbered; Isaac Major, fec. A very large Landscape, with the figure of St. Jerome; after Roland Savery. Isaac Major, sul., Vienna. 1622. The Emperor in a Triumphal Car, with Swans and Eagles; inscribed Ite Triumphalis fecit, &c.

MAJOR, THOMAS, an English engraver, born about 1715. According to Strutt, he went to Paris while young, where he learned the art, and engraved several plates after Berghem, Wouwerman, and others. On his return to England he settled in London, where he distinguished himself by a variety of plates of portraits, landscapes, and other subjects, executed in a neat, firm style. In 1768 he published a set of twenty-four prints, entitled The Ruins of Paestum, otherwise Posidonia, in Magna Græcia, after the designs of J. B. Borra. On some of his earlier prints after Berghem and others, he put his name in an anagram, as Jorma, or Jor. sculp. The following are his best plates :

PORTRAITS.

John Carteret, Earl of Granville. 1757. Cardinal Pole.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Departure of Jacob; after F. Lauri. The Good Shepherd; after Murillo. Two Landscapes; after Gaspar Poussin. A Landscape, with a Man driving Sheep; after Rubens. Two Flemish Festivals; after Teniers. The Manege; after Wouwerman. The Travelers; after N. Berghem. Two Landscapes; Morning and Evening; do. The Four Seasons; after Ferg. A View near Haerlem; after Vander Neer. A Sea-port; after Claude. A View of Ponte Mole, near Rome; do.

MALAGAVAZZO, CORIOLANO, born at Cremona about 1555, was a pupil of Bernardino Campi, whom he assisted in his great work in the church of S. Gismondo, at Cremona. He is more known as the coadjutor of that eminent artist than from any original productions of his own. His principal work is a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with Sts. Francis and Ignatius, in the church of S. Silvestro at Cremona, which is a fine picture, and supposed by Lanzi, Zaist, and others, to have been executed from the designs of Campi. It is dated 1585.

MALBONE, EDWARD G., an American portrait painter, was a native of Newport, Rhode Island. He early manifested an inclination for art, and during boyhood, he delighted in sketching objects from nature. Possessing few advantages for improvement, he was accustomed to frequent the theatre, to witness the illusions of scenery, and finally attracted the attention of the scene-painter, who gave him opportunities of exercising his talent. He occupied his leisure hours in drawing heads, and finally devoted his entire energies to painting miniature portraits. He practised the art with considerable success in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia; and in the winter of 1800, he went to Charleston, where he received considerable patronage. In May, 1801, he visited England, and passed several months at London, studying the best works of art in that city. Mr. West, the president of the Academy, gave Malbone free access to his study, and showed him every attention. He even encouraged the young artist to remain in England; but Malbone returned to Charleston in the winter of 1801, and practised the art with success in different American cities, until 1806, when he was obliged to relinquish it, on account of ill health. He died at Charleston in 1807.

MALDUCCI, MAURO, a priest of Forli, who, according to Guarienti, studied with Carlo Cignani, and was a reputable artist.

MALEUVRE, PIERRE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. He first studied under Beauvarlet, and afterwards went to London, and placed himself under Sir Robert Strange. On his return to Paris, he engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, in a neat, pleasing style, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden. Count d'Aranda. M. d'Alembert. M. de Lalande.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Dozer; after Craesbeck. The Satyr and the Peasant; after Dietricy. The Spoiled Child; after Greuze. A Sea-storm; after Backhuysen. Boors regaling; after Brouwer. The Bath of Diana; after Marillier.

MALINCONICO, ANDREA, a Neapolitan painter, born about 1600. According to Dominici, he studied under Cav. Massimo Stanzioni, and was one of his ablest scholars. His frescos are almost entirely perished, but there are many of his works in oil in the churches and public edifices of Naples, particularly in the church de' Miracoli, where he painted almost all the pictures himself. The best of these are the Four Evangelists, and the Doctors of the Church. Dominici says they are most beautiful pictures; the design is original, the attitudes noble, and the whole painted with the spirit of a great artist. Lanzi says there are other works by this artist, but several are feeble and spiritless, and not worthy of his reputation.

MALLERY, CHARLES DE, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp about 1576. It is not known with whom he studied, but from his style being founded on that of the Wierixes, it is supposed he was instructed by them. He wrought entirely with the graver, in a highly finished style, though his drawing is sometimes incorrect. He was an extremely laborious artist, and executed a multitude of prints, with the greatest delicacy. The Abbé de Marolles possessed three hundred and forty two prints by him. Vandyck painted his portrait among the celebrated artists of his time, which was engraved by Lucas Vorsterman. The following are some of his best prints :

The infant Jesus, with two Angels, in a landscape; C. de Mallery, fec. The Adoration of the Magi. The Holy Family, with Mary Magdalene. St. Francis. Several Heads of Christ, the Virgin, Saints, the Apostles, and other devotional subjects; from his own designs, and after Anthony Salaert, and other masters. Part of the plates of the great Huntings; after Stradan; engraved in conjunction with the Collaerts, the Galles, and others. The History of the Silkworm; in six plates; after Stradan. A set of plates of Horses, for a book entitled La Cavalerie Francoise. 1603. Four plates of the Miller, his Son, and the Ass; after Ambrose Franck; scarce.

MALLERY, PHILIP DE, a Flemish engraver, the scholar, and probably the son, of Charles de M., born at Antwerp in 1600. His plates are executed with a precision, delicacy, and taste resembling that of his instructor. He engraved the plates for a work entitled Typus Mundi, published at Antwerp in 1627, and afterwards in 1652. Among other prints there are by him the following: The portrait of John Lelio, Archbishop of Prague; the Crucifixion, with a Table at the foot of the Cross, where a number of Men and Women are engaged in merriment; twenty-three prints, entitled Ara Cæli; but the first one is by Anthony Wierix.

MALO, VINCENT, a Flemish painter, born at Cambray about 1625. He first studied under Rubens, and after the death of that great master, with David Teniers the Elder. Under those masters he acquired such excellence of design and beauty of coloring, that his works were eagerly sought after. He afterwards went to Italy, where he passed the remainder of his life, and where his reputation rose so high that he could scarcely execute all the orders he received, and almost every cabinet in Genoa, Florence, and Rome, possessed some of his works. He painted some sacred subjects for the churches at Genoa, but his forte lay in landscapes and battles, and humorous pieces. He died at Rome about 1670.

MALOMBRA, PIETRO, a Venetian painter, who studied under Giuseppe Porta, called Salviati. Born in easy circumstances, he acquired an excellent education, and imbued with a deep love of art, he strove to reach excellence, adopting the axiom, that "honor is better than gain." Meeting with reverses, he entered upon the art as his profession, and acquired considerable distinction. He made the works of Palma his model, but he was no servile imitator. His composition and design are more studied and correct than is usual with the Venetian painters. He was much employed in decorating the churches, and the public and private edifices of Venice. Among his most admired works are his four pictures in the church of S. Francesco de Paolo, representing the miracles of that saint, which Lanzi says display such an originality of design, precision of contours, elegance and grace, as to lead us to doubt whether they can belong to that epoch and to the Venetian school. He is still more admired for his easel pictures of historical subjects; and he painted portraits with equal success. He also painted architectural views of noted places in Venice, as the grand Piazza, and the great Hall of the Council, enriched with assemblages of figures, representing sacred and civil ceremonies, public audiences, processions, and grand spectacles, with such grandeur, truth, and spirit, that they extorted the plaudits of all ranks. He was born at Venice in 1550, and died in 1618.

MALOSSO. See TROTTI.

MALPIEDI, DOMENICO, a native of San Ginesio, and a painter of the Roman school who, according to Colucci, studied under Federigo Barocci. There are several of his works in the churches of his native place, especially two pictures of the Martyrdom of Saints Ginesio and Eleuterio, in the Collegiate church, are highly commended. He was esteemed an excellent artist, and received high prices for his works. He was living in 1596.

MALPIEDI, FRANCESCO, another painter of S. Ginesio, who flourished about the same time as the preceding at S. Ginesio. Lanzi mentions a Deposition from the Cross by him in the church of S. Francesco di Osimo, inscribed Franciscus Malpedius di S. Ginesio, which he says is feeble in composition, and little resembles the school of Barocci, except in coloring.

MALTESE, FRANCESCO, an artist so called from the place of his nativity. There are no particulars of his life recorded. He flourished about 1670. His subjects were fruit, caskets, jewels, shells, books, and musical instruments, placed upon tables covered with rich cloths and tapestry, which he executed with great truth and spirit. He was a perfect master of chiaro-scuro, and by a judicious distribution of his masses of light and shadow, he gave every object a surprising relief. His touch is bold and free, and his tone of coloring natural. The manner of his penciling was peculiar, being rough or smooth, according to the objects represented. Some of his compositions appear crowded, and he did not always make the most agreeable choice and disposition of his objects. Sandrart mentions two of his pictures in the gallery at Munich. There are some in England, others have been brought to the United States.

MALTON, THOMAS, an English designer and engraver, born in 1748. He wrote a "Treatise on Perspective, in Theory and Practice," and a "Picturesque Tour through London." He also engraved some aquatint plates of many of the principal edifices of London. He died about 1804.

MAN, CORNELIUS. See MAAN.

MANAIGO, SILVESTRO, a Venetian painter, born about 1680, and a scholar of Gregorio Lazzarini. He possessed a fertile invention, which was matured by an attentive study of nature and the antique, and his compositions evince both genius and taste; but his love of gain too often seduced him to negligence of design and rapidity of operation, so that he fell into the tameness and repetition of a mannerist. Lanzi says his works have a fine character, but he was too rapid, and too much of a mannerist. Zanetti praises his Joseph sold by his Brethren, formerly in the possession of Giuseppe Pedrini at Venice, in which the characters are so true to nature, as to make it a work "worthy of the greatest painter." Other fine works by this artist are Christ driving the Money Changers from the Temple, in the church of S. Felice, and a grand picture of St. Matthew in the church of S. Eustachio at Venice.

MANASAR, DANIEL, a German engraver, who flourished at Augsburg about 1626. He engraved chiefly architectural views, plans of buildings, &c., executed with the graver in a neat, but formal style. In conjunction with Wolfgang Kilian, he engraved the plates for a work entitled Basilicæ S. S. Udalrici et afræ Augustæ Vindelicorum Historicæ, published at Augsburg in 1626. He usually marked his plates with his initials, D. M. F.

MANCHETTI, MICHELE, a native of Genoa, born about 1550; who, according to Dominici, studied under Marco di Pino at Naples, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He executed some works for the churches of Naples, the best of which was a picture representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. John, Mary Magdalene, and Lucia, painted in 1586.

MANCINI, ANNIBALE, an historical painter, extolled by Marini, who flourished at Turin about 1610.

MANCINI, FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, was a native of S. Angelo, in Vado, and studied under Carlo Cignani at Bologna. Lanzi says, when he went to Rome he did not adhere exclusively to his master's manner, but rather attached himself to the facility and freedom of Franceschini. He designed well, colored in a charming manner, and was numbered among the first artists of his age in Rome. He executed many works for the churches at Rome and in various places in the dominions of the church. He painted the miracle of St. Peter, at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple, a picture which is now in the palace of Monte Cavallo, and is copied in mosaic in St. Peter's. This picture is a spirited and grand composition, and is considered his master-piece. He painted many pictures for foreign collections, and he was especially commended for his large compositions. He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1725, and died in 1758.

MANDER, KAREL VAN. See VANMANDER.

MANDROCLES, an ancient architect, who flourished about B. C. 500; and constructed the great bridge of boats across the Thracian Bosphorus, by order of Darius, King of Persia. It was joined together in such a firm and ingenious manner, that the army passed over it in safety. Herodotus mentions a picture in the Temple of Juno at Samos, representing the Bosphorus with the Bridge, King Darius enthroned, and the Persian army. Upon it was inscribed, Mandrocles, after having constructed a bridge of boats over the Bosphorus, by order of the King Darius of Persia, dedicated this monument to Juno, which does honor to Samos, his country, and the artificer.

MANDYN, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about 1450. He painted drolls, incantations, and grotesque subjects, conflagrations and rocky landscapes, with great ingenuity and wit, in a style resembling that of Jerome Bosche, of whom he is said to have been the imitator; yet Bosche was born in 1470, twenty years after him. There are great discrepancies among authors about this artist. He is called Jan and Johann Mandyn, Mandin, Madyn, and Madin. Balkema says he was born in 1450, and died in 1568, making him 118 years old. Immerzeel places his birth in 1568, and says he instructed Bartholomew Spranger, who was born in 1546, and it is generally stated by authors in their biography of Spranger, that he first studied under John Mandyn, which makes an error somewhere of an hundred years. Zani says, Mandyn died in 1500. So it is evident, from these and other contradictions, that there were two Mandyns, or a Mandyn and a Madyn, who lived a hundred years apart.

MANENTI, VINCENZIO, an Italian painter, born at Canimorto, in the province of Sabina in 1600, and died in 1674. He was the son of Ascanio M., who instructed him in the rudiments of the art. He afterwards studied at Rome, first under Giuseppe Cesari, and next Domenichino. Lanzi says there are several of his works at Tivoli, which, though they do not exhibit an artist of great genius, show one assiduous and expert in coloring, and he specifies his St. Stephen in the Duomo (cathedral), and his St. Saverio in the church of Il Gesu. In coloring he imitated Domenichino, and it should be recollected that when a severe critic and a connoisseur like Lanzi, (a profound scholar, brought up amidst the gems of ancient and modern art, and one who pays more attention to academy, or the strict rules of art, than to coloring,) commends such an artist, in some countries he would be called a Domenichino, whose pictures, the Italians say, will bleed if pricked.

MANETTI, or MANNETTI, RUTILIO, an eminent Sieneſe painter, born in 1571, and died in 1637, according to Lanzi, from authentic documents. He studied under Francesco Vanni, and at first imitated his graceful style and pleasing coloring, but he afterwards adopted much of the manner of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, whose fame was then captivating Italy. He acquired great reputation, and executed many works for the churches and monasteries at Pisa, Florence, and Siena. There is considerable discrepancy among authors as to his merits, but it is allowed that he was a man of genius, had a fine invention, was correct in design, and disposed his figures with elegance and grace. He enriched his pictures with noble architecture, and hence, at times he approaches nearer to Guercino than to Caravaggio. Lanzi says his pictures are easily recognized by a tenobrosity that injures a just balance of light and shade,—a fault that is doubtless partly owing to changes wrought by time, from an injudicious mixture of colors, for the historian of the cathedral of Siena, in describing his Elijah under the Juniper Tree, in that edifice, commends the force of the coloring, and says it is juicy and natural. Lanzi further says that in private collections, where pictures are better preserved than in churches, we find very beautiful Madonnas by this artist; and he mentions “a most exquisite Lucretia in the possession of the Bandinelli family.” There are many of his works at the Certosa, and the Carthusian monastery at Florence; his chef d’œuvre is the Rest of the Holy Family, in the church of S. Pietro, at Castelvecchio.

MANETTI, DOMENICO, a Sieneſe painter, probably a relative of the preceding, who acquired considerable reputation for his easel pictures of historical subjects, many of which are found in the private collections of Siena. Lanzi ſays his Baptism of Constantine, in the Casa Magnoni at Siena, has been highly commended.

MANFREDI, BARTOLOMEO, an Italian painter, born at Mantua in 1574. He firſt ſtudied under Criſtoforo Roncalli, but afterwards became a diſciple of Michel Angelo da Caravaggio, whoſe ſtyle he imitated with ſuch precision, that his works were often attributed to that maſter, though his pictures ſhow a ſuperior choice of forms, and a more dignified taſte of deſign. He did not work much for the churches, but painted easel pictures representing corps-de-garde, ſoldiers or peaſants gaming with cards and dice, fortune tellers, banditti; which he represented with appropriate ferocity of character, and an extraordinary effect of light and ſhadow. His pencil was free and firm, and his knowledge and ſkill in chiaro-scuro, enabled him to give his pictures a very ſtriking effect of broad maſſes of light and ſhadow. He is ſaid to have ſhortened his days by a diſſolute and irregular life. Zani, whoſe dates are often incorrect, ſays he was born in 1580, and died in 1617.

MANGIN, CHARLES, a French architect, born at Mitry, near Meaux, in 1721. His uncle cauſed him to be inſtructed in mathematics and deſign, and placed him under ſeveral good architects. After paſſing the period of his tutelage, he viſited Paris, and was commiſſioned to erect ſeveral important works, among which were the primitive Halle au Blé; the Seminaire du Saint-Eſprit; the church of Gros-Caillo; and the reſtoration of the grand entrance to S. Sulpice. He was much eſteemed by Soufflot and Chalgrin, and projected a plan for the embellishment of Paris, which gained him an honorable notice, and a gold medal. He died at Nantes in 1807.

MANGLARD, ADRIEN, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1688, or, according to Dumesnil, at Lyons in 1696. He went to Rome early in life, where he acquired a great reputation for his ſea-pieces and landſcapes, and met with conſiderable employment. He executed ſome of his choicest works for the Villa Albani, and the Palazzi Colonna and Rospigliosi at Rome. Joſeph Vernet was his ſcholar, and far ſurpaſſed him. He executed quite a number of ſpirited and pleaſing etchings after his own deſigns. Dumesnil deſcribes forty-four pieces by him. He died at Rome in 1761.

MANINI, GAETANO, a Milanese painter, born in 1730. He painted hiſtory in a gaudy and frivolous ſtyle, went to England about 1774, aſſumed the title of Cavaliere, occaſionally exhibited with the Chartered Society of Artists, and died about 1790.

MANLIO, FERDINANDO, an Italian architect of the 16th century. He was probably a pupil of Giovanni da Nola. According to Milizia, by order of the Viceroy of Toledo, he opened the road to the Porta Nolana; built a royal ſummer houſe at Pozzuoli; and drained a number of marſhes. He alſo executed the regulations of the Viceroy, duke d’Alcala, in opening the noble road of Monte Oliveto, and erecting palaces where there were originally only the gardens of monks. He enlarged the grotto of Pozzuoli, and built the bridge of Capua.

MANNINI, or MANINI, GIACOMO ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1646. He ſtudied under Domenico Santi, and according to Zanotti, became a very eminent painter of perſpective and architecture. He was exceedingly accurate, but ſlow in his work. Lanzi ſays that he was employed to decorate a chapel at Colorno for the Duke of Parma, in which the Cavaliere Draghi was employed as figurist, whoſe genius was as eager and rapid as Mannini’s was ſlow. Much like two ſteeds of oppoſite temper, yoked to the ſame vehicle, their ſole occupation ſeemed to be biting and kicking each other, till it became neceſſary to ſeparate them, and the ſlow one was ſent back to Bologna, where, owing to this blemish, he never met with the encouragement he deſerved. He etched ſome plates of architectural deſigns and perſpective views, full of taſte and ſpirit. Bartsch gives a detailed account of ſixteen perſpective views by him.—(P. Gr. tom. xix. p. 322.)

MANNL, or MAENNL, JACOB, a German mezzotinto engraver, born at Vienna about 1695. In 1720, Chriſtopher Lauch, the Inſpector of the Imperial Gallery, which had been augmented by the purchase of the collection of the Archduke Leopold, undertook to have all the pictures engraved, and employed Mannl for that purpoſe. But the death of both Lauch and Mannl happening about the ſame time, prevented the completion of the project, and only thirty-one were engraved. Heineken, in his idea of a complete collection of prints, gives a particular deſcription of them. They are as follows:

The Portrait of the Emperor Charles VI. The dead Chriſt, ſupported by an Angel; after Palma. The Virgin with the infant Chriſt, who is caressing St. John; after Vandyck. Mary Magdalene penitent, accompanied by an Angel; after Correggio. St. Francis praying; after Bassano. St. Clara kneeling; do. The Repentance of St. Peter; after Spagnoletto. The Martyrdom of St.

Bartholomew; after L. Giordano. Christ praying in the Garden; after M. A. Caravaggio. Venus, with Cupid holding a mirror; after Titian. Judith leaving the Tent of Holofernes; after P. Veronese. Christ disputing with the Doctors; after Spagnoletto. Samson delivered to the Philistines; after Vandyck. The Ecce Homo; half-length; after Titian. The Virgin, or Mater Dolorosa; do. A Philosopher meditating on a Skull; after L. Giordano. A Geometrician; do. St. Margaret treading on the Dragon; after Raffaello. Tobit restoring Sight to his Father; after M. A. Caravaggio. Christ taken in the Garden; after B. Manfredi. Susanna at the Bath; after Tintoretto. Susanna and the Elders; after Ann. Carracci. Jupiter and Mercury, with Baucis and Philemon; after Carlo Lotti. Diana and her Nymphs; after Wilhelm Boschaert and John Fyt. The Virgin and Infant; after Titian. A Warrior giving his Hand to a Man; after Giorgione. A dying Magdalene; after the younger Palma. Christ bearing his Cross; after Bassano. Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after A. Varotari. Judith; after Carlo Veneziano. A Child holding a Dog; after P. Veronese.

MANNOZZI, GIOVANNI, called GIOVANNI DA SAN GIOVANNI, from the place of his nativity, near Florence, was born in 1590. He studied under Matteo Roselli. He did not follow the chaste, correct, and finished style of his master, but possessing a lively imagination, ready invention, and great facility of execution, he struck out into a style of his own, which, though sometimes marked with absurd extravagancies, gained him an immense reputation, and he was considered one of the ablest fresco painters in Italy. He was employed by the Cardinal Bentivoglio at Rome, to paint a picture of Night, as a contrast to the Aurora of Guido. This excited envy among his enemies, and after he had made considerable progress with his work, one morning, he had the misfortune to find it entirely effaced; but the miscreants being detected, he commenced and completed a new one, which gained him immense applause. Lanzi says that, although he did not begin to study till he was eighteen years old, and died in his forty-eighth year, yet he executed an incredible number of works at Rome, in the Pontifical States, and at Florence. He died in 1636.

MANNOZZI, GIOVANNI GARZIA, was the son of the preceding, born about 1620. He was instructed in the art by his father, in whose style he painted with considerable reputation. There are some of his works in fresco in the churches at Pistoja. Time of his death not recorded.

MANRIQUE, MIGUEL, a native of Flanders, probably of Spanish descent, who flourished about 1650. He is said to have studied under Rubens, and having obtained a commission in the Spanish service, he went to Spain, and finally settled at Malaga, where he practised the art, and executed some works for the churches. He was a good colorist, and his works have the characteristics of the school of Rubens.

MANS, F. H. (Franz Herman?) a Dutch painter, by whom there are many pictures, small in size, of views of towns, villages, coast scenes, winter-pieces, &c., spiritedly executed, and signed with his name, and some of them dated about 1677. His winter pieces are in the manner of Klaas Molenaar, and painted with great truth and beauty.

MANSARD, FRANÇOIS, an eminent French architect, was born at Paris in 1598, and received instructions in architecture from his paternal uncle, Germain Gaultier. At the age of twenty-two he began to distinguish himself by his restoration of the Hotel Toulouse; and a short time afterwards he was commissioned to erect the portal of the church des Feuillants, in the Rue St. Honoré, since destroyed; the chateau de Berni, near Paris; and those of Ballerai, in Normandy, Blerancourt and Choisy. His only fault was instability, which frequently led him, while aiming at perfection, to alter his designs during their execution, and to demolish what was done, in order to begin afresh. This characteristic lost him the finishing of the fine abbey of Val-de-Grace at Paris, founded by Anne of Austria, which he had commenced in 1645, but when raised to the first story, the queen was informed that large sums were being uselessly expended on the edifice; and when Mansard was interrogated, he answered Her Highness with some rudeness. The direction of the church was immediately taken from him and given to others, who altered the design, and decorated the edifice with heavy sculpture. Notwithstanding this defect, Mansard was endowed with an exquisite taste, a strong mind, a habit of meditation, a fertile imagination, and great industry. His ideas for the general design of an edifice were noble and grand; and his choice in the outlines of all the members of architecture which he used was delicate and appropriate. He was employed by the President de Longueil to build his great Chateau de Maisons, near St. Germain en Laie; and when a part was erected, he pulled it down without the knowledge of the proprietor; but he afterwards completed it in a very noble style, and it is reckoned one of the finest architectural monuments of the age. Colbert applied to him for a plan of the principal front of the Louvre, and Mansard produced several sketches of great beauty; but when told that he must fix upon one to be invariably followed, if approved, he declined subjecting himself to such a condition. Milizia says that this was the reason why Bernini was invited to Paris. Mansard completed the chateau de Blois, which had been left unfinished by Gaston de France, Duke d'Orleans. In the palace of Fesora he afterwards built a chapel, which is considered a perfect model; and he invented the curb roof, called à la Mansarde. He adorned Paris and its environs, as well as several of the provinces, with fine edifices, of which the last was the portal of the church des Minimes in the Place Royale. He seems to have approved this work more than any other of his productions, but it is very likely he would have changed his opinion, had he not died soon after, in 1666.

MANSARD, JULES HARDOUIN, an eminent French architect, nephew of François M., born at Paris in 1645. He studied under his uncle, and became the favorite architect of Louis XIV., whose taste he suited through the variety and magnificence of his ideas. Though superior to his uncle in fortune, he did not equal him in merit. Milizia says he was too exuberant in his ideas, incorrect in his application of the orders; but ingenious in composition and the forms of his cupolas. His greatest work, the famous Palace of Versailles, has been severely, though perhaps justly criticised. Milizia says, "the taste of the exterior decoration is trifling, and full of defects; the palace imposes on the sight at a distance, from the large number of buildings, and its richness, the roof being all gilt; but our admiration diminishes on a nearer approach, and entirely disappears on arriving at that miserable court called La Cour du Marbre." Christopher Wren described it as composed of "heaps of littleness." It has also been denominated "a favorite without merit"; but the Orangery has Tuscan columns, and is managed in the most magnificent style. The chapel is also an admirable work, being adorned with isolated columns, with bold architraves. Among other important works of this architect, are the chateau de Clagny; the chateau of Marly and Trianon; the Mansion of St. Cyr; the Gallery of the Palais Royal; the Place Vendôme; the Places of Louis le Grand and des Victoires; and the dome and finishing of the Hotel des Invalides, commenced by Liberal Bruant. Jules Hardouin Mansard amassed an immense fortune under Louis XIV., who appointed him royal architect, cavalier of St. Michael, and general superintendent of the royal buildings, arts, and manufactures. He died suddenly at Marly, in 1708, and was buried in the parish church of St. Paul at Paris, where his tomb was sculptured by Coysevox.

MANSFELD, JOHN ERNEST, a German engraver, born at Prague in 1738. He went to Vienna when sixteen years of age, and learned design in the Imperial Academy. He engraved some portraits after eminent personages, and a few other subjects, mostly executed with the graver among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Empress Maria Theresa; J. E. Mansfeld, sc. The Emperor Joseph II.; do. Pope Pius V.; Hagenauer, pinx. 1782. Wenceslaus, Prince Kaunitz; after Vinazer. Francis Anthony, Count Kollowrat; do. Maurice, Count Laey; after Kollonitz. 1776. Frederick, Baron Trenck; J. E. Mansfeld, fec. Joseph Haydn; do. Anthony Stoerk; do. 1773. Sir Robert Murray Keith; after Graf.

SUBJECTS.

A Waterfall on the Danube; after Wenzely. The Coronation of the Emperor Leopold; after Schutz.

MANSUETI, GIOVANNI, a painter of the Venetian school, who flourished at Treviso about 1500, and painted for the churches and private collections. He was a good artist, though Lanzi says he did not observe the proprieties of costume, and that there is not sufficient delicacy in his contours.

MF  MANTEGNA, CAV. ANDREA.

There is a great deal of fiction interwoven in the history of this great artist, which our limits will not allow us to discuss. He was born at a small village near Padua, according to his picture in the church of S. Sofia at Padua, in 1431. Lanzi says he was born in 1430, and died in 1505 in his text and 1506 in his index; Pungilione 13th August 1506, and Zani 15th of September in the same year. He was the son of a poor herdsman, and Squarcione, observing him, then a lad, making some rude sketches on flat stones while tending his flock, took the lad to his own house, and instructed him in painting. He showed such extraordinary talents and made such progress, that he adopted him as his son. At an age when others usually commence the study of the art, he painted his celebrated altar-piece in the church of S. Sofia at Padua, which is inscribed Andreas Mantinea Patavinus annos VII. et X. natus sua manu pinxit. 1448. He soon after painted the Four Evangelists in the same church.

The celebrity of these performances, it is said, induced Jacopo Bellini, the rival of Squarcione, to bestow upon the young artist his daughter in marriage. This alliance with the bitter enemy of Squarcione is said to have changed his love for Mantegna into gall, and that he became as inveterate in his detraction of the merits of his pupil as he had been lavish of his praise; and that his severe and sarcastic criticism on his works proved of the greatest advantage to him, by stimulating him to reform his manner. But this must be taken with considerable allowance. Lanzi says that "Squarcione was so pleased with the early genius of Mantegna, that he adopted him as his own son, but afterwards regretted his generosity, when he found he repaid him with ingratitude by marrying the daughter of his rival, so that he blamed him, yet continued to instruct him better than ever." The truth doubtless is that Andrea, having been bred in an academy which adopted the study of marbles (for Squarcione had a rich museum of designs, statues, and busts, which he had spared no expense to procure in his travels throughout Italy and Greece; and his academy was at that early period the most famous in Italy, at one time frequented by one hundred and thirty students), and for which he indulged a profound admiration, neglected the study of nature, and being bent upon that chasteness of contours, the beauty of the ideas and of the figures, he not only adopted that straightness of the garment, those parallel folds, and that study of parts which so easily degenerate into stiffness and formality, but that he also neglected that portion of the art which animates the otherwise lifeless images—expression. This was the case with his Martyrdom of St. James, in the church of the Eremitani, which drew down upon the artist the sarcastic criticisms of Squarcione, and led him to change his manner in the picture of St. Mark writing his Gospel executed soon afterwards, in the church of S. Giustina, where he represented in the head of the Evangelist an admirable expression of the most fervid devotion. His relationship with the Bellini also doubtless contributed to this result. A knowledge of his defects also led him to the study of nature and of the works of the celebrated masters; for, during his short residence at Venice, Lanzi says "he did not fail to avail himself of the best portion of that school, and we thus perceive that some of his pictures, landscapes, and gardens have a Venetian character, besides showing a knowledge of colors not inferior to the best Venetian masters of his age."

Mantegna settled with his family at Mantua, where, under the patronage of the Marchese Lodovico Gonzaga, he acquired an immense reputation. He was invited to Rome by Pope Innocent VIII., and employed to paint several considerable works, among which a chapel in the Vatican still exists, though much injured by time. Some of his best works, executed both in oil and fresco in the maturity of his powers, are still to be found at Mantua. Of these, the most celebrated is a picture of Victory, painted on canvass in 1495, for the chapel of Gonzaga in the church of the Filipini, in commemoration of a victory gained by that prince over Charles VIII. of France, at the Battle of Formoni. Another famous picture by him is one of the Virgin, surrounded by the Archangel Michael and various saints, protecting Francesco Gonzaga. Speaking of this picture, Lanzi says "Mantua boasts no other specimen equally sought after and admired by strangers; and though painted in 1495, it is still free, in a conspicuous degree, from the effects of three centuries, which it has already survived. It is truly wonderful to behold carnations so delicate, coats of armor so glittering, draperies so finely varied, with ornamental fruits still so fresh and dewy to the eye. Each separate head might serve as a school, from its fine character and vivacity, and not a few from an imitation of the antique; while the design, as well in the naked as the clothed parts, expresses a softness which sufficiently repels the too general opinion that the stiff style and that of Mantegna are much the same thing. There is also a union of coloring, a delicacy of penciling, and a peculiar grace, that appears almost the last stage of the art towards that perfection which it acquired from Leonardo da Vinci." This gem was taken to Paris by the French, and restored in 1815. His master-piece, according to Vasari, was his Triumph of Julius Cæsar, represented in a series of nine pictures, painted for the great hall of the Palazzo S. Sebastiano. This work was taken to Germany when Mantua was sacked, and from thence found its way to England, and now adorns the royal collection at Hampton Court. For this picture he received the honor of knighthood from his patron. The style of Mantegna greatly influenced that of his age, and imitations of it are to be seen beyond his school, which was extremely flourishing at Mantua.

As an engraver, Andrea Mantegna claims our veneration as one of the earliest practisers of the art, and as having contributed more than all his cotemporaries in perfecting it, by his superior knowledge of design. Cotemporary with Antonio Pollajuoli, he resembles him in style of handling, but he greatly surpasses him in the drawing of his figures, particularly in the naked parts. His plates are generally executed by single strokes from one corner of the plate to the other, in a manner resembling drawing made with a pen, without hatching or cross-lines. His prints engraved after his own designs are distinguished by a simplicity and correctness of outline unusual before his time. He sometimes marked his plates with one of the above monograms, which are similar to those afterwards employed by Marc' Antonio Raimondi, and have led to some dispute as to which artist some plates should be attributed. Lanzi says that the science of foreshortening, originally attributed to Melozio, was greatly improved, and nearly brought to perfection, by Mantegna and his two sons. His Dead Christ, with the two Marys weeping, now in the Pinacoteca at Milan, is a model of excellence in this respect. "The foreshortening is so perfect, and the perspective so correct, that from whatever point it is viewed the body is still seen extended in its full proportion in length." There is a great deal of dispute as to the extent of his engravings. Vasari says, "Mantegna, having decorated the chapel of Innocent VIII. at Rome about 1490, from that date is entitled to the name of engraver, computing it from about his sixtieth year. He flourished more than sixteen years after this, during which period it is believed he executed that amazing number of engravings, amounting to more than fifty, of which about thirty appear to be genuine, on so grand a scale, so rich in figures, so finely studied and Mantegnesque in every part," &c. Our limits will not allow us to pursue this inquiry farther than to say it is now the opinion of the best critics that Mantegna commenced his career as an engraver at a much earlier period (though this cannot be positively decided, as there are no dates on his prints), and that he did not engrave above thirty plates. Bartsch describes twenty-three prints by him, and there are two more in the British Museum, one of which is of large dimensions, representing St. George and the Dragon, and cost £60 sterling. The following are his principal prints, as far as known:

The Virgin seated, with the infant Jesus in her Arms. The Scourging of Christ. The Entombing of Christ, inscribed, Humani generis Redemptori. Christ descending into Hell. Christ holding the Standard of the Cross between two Saints. Judith with the Head of Holofernes. A Battle of Sea Monsters, with the figures of two armed Warriors. A Battle of Sea Gods, with the figure of Neptune. Hercules between Virtue and Vice. This print is sometimes attributed to Marc' Antonio. Hercules strangling Anteus, inscribed, Divo Herculi invicto. Four Female Figures dancing. Bacchus, supported by Fauns and Satyrs. The Triumph of Julius Cæsar; in nine plates; after his pictures now in the King's collection. It is difficult to meet with a complete set of these plates. They have been copied in chiaro-seuro by Andrea Andreani.

MANTEGNA, FRANCESCO. The most perfect imitators of Andrea Mantegna were his two sons, Francesco, and another whose name is not mentioned, nor is the time of his birth or death recorded. Their father left many frescos unfinished, which they completed, particularly the Camera degli Sposi, in the castle at Mantua. Andrea painted the walls, and his sons the dome, or as Lanzi terms it, the beautiful vaulted recess. "In the same work appear several exquisitely drawn infantile figures, under different points of view, and admirably foreshortened." They also added two laterals to an altar-piece by their father, in a chapel in the church of S. Andrea at Mantua; and in the same place they erected a superb monument to his memory in 1517, which has led some to suppose that his death happened in that year.—These sons were exceedingly eminent artists, and acknowledged the best disciples of Mantegna's school, and it is singular that so little should now be known of them and their works. Lanzi says that Francesco certainly gave instructions to Correggio. The glory of the father has completely eclipsed that of the sons.

MANTEGNA, CARLO DEL, a Lombard, who was a favorite pupil of Andrea Mantegna, and one of the most successful followers of his school. Lanzi says he is supposed to have assisted the sons of Mantegna in the completion of his unfinished works at Mantua, and afterwards went to Genoa, where he "not only painted but taught, with a success that would appear almost incredible, were it not that the works of his imitators (at Genoa) were still in existence." None of his works are now clearly identified, most of them having perished, and others confounded, from resemblance of style, with those of his master, and of course attributed to him. No imitator of an eminent painter may ever hope for a lasting reputation; for names and dates are easily effaced, and others as easily supplied, when this will enhance the value of a work.

MANTOUANO, or MANTOVANO. See ANDREANI, see VENUSTI, see GHISI.

MANTOUANO, TEODORO. See GHIGI.

MANTOVANO, RINALDO. This painter was a native of Mantua; studied under Giulio Romano, and was one of his most distinguished scholars. He died very young; his premature death is regretted, as his compositions display a sublimity of conception and beauty of execution far beyond his age. His best work is a picture of the Virgin and Child, with St. Agostino and St. Girolamo, in the church of S. Agnes, in that city, so beautifully designed and executed that it gave rise to a suspicion of its having been painted from a design of his instructor.

MANTOVANO, CAMILLO, a painter of Mantua, whom Vasari commends for his landscapes. He was educated in the school of Giulio Romano, and was an excellent artist. Lanzi says he wrought chiefly at Venice and Urbino. There are still some of his frescos in his native place. In a chamber of the Ducal palace at Pesaro he painted a grove, executed with so much truth and taste that it seemed nature in reality. He flourished about 1540.

MANUEL, NICOLAS, a Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1484. It is said that he visited Venice, and studied under Titian; but as he only painted in fresco, his productions are lost. A Dance of Death, at Berne, is mentioned as by him, the figures of which represented persons living at the time; it has been copied by Kauw and Stettler. There were also two pictures of the Passion of Christ and the Seduction of Solomon by his Wives. Manuel was among the most zealous defenders of the Reformation. He died in 1530. (See Deutsch.)

MANZINI, RAIMONDO, a Bolognese painter, was born in 1668, and died in 1744. He excelled in painting cabinet pictures of fruit, flowers, birds, and animals. Lanzi says he was most successful in his cartoons or drawings, which were executed with such a truth to nature that, when exposed to a certain light, they deceived even painters themselves. For this excellence, Zanotti extols him as a modern Zeuxis.

MANZONI, RIDOLFO, a native of Castelfranco, was born in 1675, and died in 1743. He painted small historical pictures with great reputation and profit, which are prized in the best collections at Turin and in his native place. He also painted flowers and birds, tastefully composed and beautifully executed.

MANZONI, DA FAENZA, a young painter of great abilities and rising reputation, who is said to have been assassinated by Ferrau da Faenza, merely out of professional jealousy. There are several of his altar-pieces in the churches at Faenza, which are highly esteemed. Lanzi says he would have shone a distinguished ornament of the art, had his life not been untimely cut short by envy. His death happened about 1625.

MANZUOLI, MASO, called MASO DI SAN FRIANO, from the place of his nativity, near Florence, where he was born in 1536. He first studied under Pier Francesco di Jacopo, and afterwards with Carlo Portelli. Vasari does not hesitate to rank this artist with Battista Naldini and Alessandro Allori. His most capital picture was the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, painted for the church of S. Pietro Maggiore at Florence. This picture was painted when the artist was only thirty years old, and is regarded the ablest production of the Florentine school at the period in which he lived. It was transported to Rome, and now adorns a gallery in the Vatican. There are other works by him in the churches and public edifices at Florence, especially in the church of S. Trinità and in the Ducal gallery, though his works are not numerous, as he died in the prime of life, in 1575.

MARACCI, GIOVANNI. See MARRACCI.

MARAIS, HENRI, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1764. He first attained distinction by engraving several plates for the magnificent folio edition of Racine and P. Didot the Elder. He also materially assisted Wicar in his Galerie de Florence, and engraved the frontispiece of that work, after Moitte; also the Dance of the Muses, after Giulio Romano; the Triumph of Amphitrite, after Luca Giordano; the portrait of Mieris, painted by himself; the Three Fates, after Michael Angelo; Andromeda, after Furino. Marais died in 1800, at the age of 36.

MARASCA, JACOPINO, a painter of Cremona, commended by Zaist as an excellent artist of his age, who enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Francesco Sforza. He flourished about 1430.

MARATTI, CAY. CARLO. This eminent painter was born at Camurano, in the Marquisate of Ancona, in 1625. At a tender age he showed a natural taste for the fine arts, and when he was twelve years old, his father sent him to Rome, and placed him in the school of Andrea Sacchi, where he studied several years, and became his most favored disciple. By the advice of his master he made the works of Raffaele his chief study. He rose to great distinction, and during his life-time was considered one of the first artists in Europe. Mengs assigns to him the enviable distinction of having "sustained the art at Rome, where it did not degenerate as at other places." At the commencement of his career, he confined himself to painting Holy Families, pictures of the Virgin, and Madonnas, on which account the cotemporary artists, particularly Salvator Rosa, thought him incapable of higher productions, and satirically called him Carluccio dalle Madonne. To counteract the evil efforts of his enemies, Sacchi obtained for him a commission to paint a picture for the Baptistery of St. John of Lateran, where he represented Constantine destroying the Idols, a performance which stifled calumny and established his reputation as one of the ablest artists of his time. It also procured him the patronage of Alexander VII., under whose protection, and that of his successors, he became the most popular and the most employed artist at Rome. He was commissioned to restore the great frescos of Raffaele in the Vatican and the Farnesian palace, which had begun to suffer from the effects of time—a task, says his biographer Bellori, "requiring infinite care and judgment, and which he performed to the satisfaction of his patron." Lanzi says that "Maratti was no machinist, therefore neither he nor his scholars ever distinguished themselves in frescos or in large compositions. At the same time, he had no fear of engaging in works of that kind, and willingly undertook the decoration of the Duomo of Urbino, which he peopled with his figures."—This work, with the enpola itself, was destroyed by an earthquake in 1782, but the sketches of it are preserved in the Albani palace at Urbino.—Though Carlo Maratti painted some pictures of extraordinary magnitude, as his St. Carlo in the church of that Saint at the Corso, and the Baptism of Christ in the Certosa, yet his pictures for the most part are on a smaller scale. He had a predilection for cabinet pictures and altar-pieces, of Holy Families, Madonnas, and other sacred subjects, of which he executed a multitude, which are to be found not only in the churches and every private collection at Rome, but in the State, as well as at Florence, Genoa, and other places. He was a chaste and elegant designer, but his forms discover too little acquaintance with the antique. His compositions are rich and magnificent, but they bear the character of coldness and languor, and appear rather the productions of labor than the inspirations of genius. He prided himself on the copious castings of his draperies, but in this he displays a species of mannerism, and the multiplicity of his folds exhibits little of the beauty of the figures. His coloring is generally silvery and pleasing, but towards the latter end of his life it became somewhat cold and chalky. Yet it is admitted that some of his productions are exquisitely beautiful; the forms of his female saints lovely; his Madonnas dignified, and his angels angelic.—It were useless to specify his numerous works. Lanzi says his pictures approaching nearest to Sacchi are most prized at Rome, among which are the Baptism of Christ, in the Certosa, which is copied in mosaic in the Basilica of St. Peter's; the Death of St. Francis Xavier, in Il Gesu, engraved by J. Frey; the Visitation, in La Pace; and the Conception, in S. Isidore. Among his most charming compositions are St. Stanislaus Kostka at the altar where his ashes repose, and David's first view of Bathsheba, which last is a work inexpressibly beautiful. His master-piece is the Martyrdom of St. Biagio at Genoa, which Lanzi pronounces worthy of the ablest imitator of the school of Sacchi. He died in 1713.

Carlo Maratti executed a few free, spirited etchings, after his own designs and other Italian masters, though they are more highly finished than is usual with painters. The following are the principal:

A set of ten plates of the Life of the Virgin; from his own compositions. Several Holy Families, and subjects of the Virgin; do. Heliodorus driven from the Temple; in two sheets; after Raffuella. Christ with the Woman of Samaria; after Ann. Caracci. The Flagellation of St. Andrew; after Domenichino. Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren; after Mola. St. Charles Borromeo interceding for the persons afflicted with the Plague; after Cavaliere Perugino.

MARC. See MARCH.

MARC' ANTONIO. See RAIMONDI.

MARCA, DELLA, GIO. BATTISTA LOMBARDELLI, was born at Montenuovo, in 1532; hence he is sometimes called Il Montano di Montenuovo. According to Baglioni, he first studied under Marco Marchetti da Faenza, but afterwards went to Rome, and became the pupil of Raffaellino da Reggio, whose style he adopted, and whom he assisted in the execution of his frescos in the Vatican, for Pope Gregory XIII. Lanzi says he possessed great natural talents, which were rendered unavailing for want of application. He executed, at Rome, a series of pictures from the life of St. Francis, in the church of S. Pietro Montorio, and one of the Resurrection in S. Maria de' Monti. His best works are in his native city. There are also some of his frescos at Perugia. He died, according to Orlandi, about 1587. Zani says he was a native of Perugia, and that he was living in 1592.

MARCA, LATTANZIO. There is considerable dispute about the real name of this artist, which we cannot discuss, and which is of no importance, since he is known in the history of art by the name of Lattanzio Marca. He flourished at Perugia about 1550. Vasari says he studied in the school of Perugino, and others of Giovanni Bellini; and he is thought to be the same as Lattanzio da Rimini, who painted a picture at Venice in rivalry with Congliano. Mariotti has proved, by authentic documents, that he was the son of Vincenzo Pagani of Monte Rubbiano, a celebrated painter, and probably the instructor of Lattanzio.

On the death of Pietro Perugino, he succeeded to his fame and fortunes at Perugia, and received all the most important orders. He painted the great works in the churches of the Castle, in which he was assisted by Raffaele dalle Colle, Gherardi Doni, and Paparello. Of these works the most important, perhaps, was the S. Maria del Popolo, a large composition, with a multitude of figures in the act of prayer. Lanzi says that the figures are well disposed, with a fine expression in the countenances; the landscape beautiful; the coloring clear and strong; and the taste, on the whole, different from that of Perugino. He was a man much respected by his fellow-citizens, and when somewhat advanced in years, he was appointed to the then honorable office of Sheriff of his native city, in 1553, when he renounced the art. It is not stated of which of the cities claiming his birth he was appointed sheriff—Perugia, Rimini, or Monte Rubbiano, but doubtless of the former, where he flourished. See Vincenzo Pagani.

MARCEL N., a German painter of fruit, flowers, and still-life, was born at Frankfort in 1628, and died in 1683. He was a disciple of George Flegel or Vluhghels, whose manner he adopted, though he far surpassed him. His subjects are usually vases filled with different kinds of fruit or flowers, beautiful shells, books, and other table ornaments, which he always designed from nature. His pictures are highly finished and delicately colored, and are held in considerable estimation in his own country.

MARCELLIS, ORNO, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1613. It is not known under whom he studied, but he acquired great celebrity by his excellence in a singular branch of the art. He painted curious plants, insects, serpents and other reptiles to the life, and finished them with extraordinary care. He painted everything from nature, and is said to have kept a museum of serpents, vipers, rare insects, exotics, and other curiosities, which he copied with unexampled precision, and a wonderful beauty of penciling, so that his works were sought after not only in his own country, but wherever he went; and they are still found in the choicest collections. He resided some time at Paris, and was greatly patronized by the Queen Mother, who magnificently rewarded him.

He afterwards went to Italy, and passed several years at Florence, Rome, and Naples, in all which cities his works were equally admired, and he was patronized by princes and nobles. Füessli says his real name was Snuffelaer. He signed many of his pictures O. Masseus. He died at Amsterdam in 1673.

MARCENAY, ANTOINE DE GHUY, a French engraver, who flourished about 1760. He was one of the most successful imitators of the style of Rembrandt. He executed quite a number of portraits and other subjects, in which the dry point is used with remarkable dexterity. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Henry IV. of France; after Janet. The Duke of Sully; after Porbus. The Chevalier Bayard. The Maid of Orleans. Viscount Turenne; after Champagne. Prince Eugene; after Kupetzki. Marshal Villers; after Rigaud. General Paoli. Stanislaus Augustus, King of Poland; after Bacierelli. Marshal Saxe; after Liotard. The Portrait of Tintoretto; after a picture by himself. A half-length of Rembrandt, with a Palette.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Sun-set; after Vernet. A View of the Sea-cast, with Fishermen; do. A Land-storm; after Vanuden. A Skirmish of Cavalry; after Parrocel. The Testament of Eudamidas; after N. Poussin. Tobit recovering his Sight; after Rembrandt. The Lady with the Pearl; an oval, with the date 1768; after Rembrandt. The (lady) Gardener; after G. Douw, with the date 1766; and others, to the number of sixty-six.

MARCII, ESTÉBAN, a Spanish painter who, according to Palomino, was a scholar of Pedro Orrente. He painted history with reputation, but he was more celebrated for his battle-pieces, which are vigorously designed, and executed with a free pencil, and an effective style of coloring. His works are chiefly at Valencia and Madrid. In the former city is an altar-piece of the Last Supper, in the church of San Juan de Mercado, highly commended; and in the Bueno Retiro a large picture of the Marriage at Cana, and one of his most capital battle-pieces. He died at Valencia in 1660, at an advanced age.

MARCH, MIGUEL, the son and scholar of the preceding, was born at Valencia in 1633, and died there in 1670. He imitated the style and subjects of his father, though he was greatly inferior to him. He executed some works for the churches at Valencia, among which his Death of St. Francis, in the church of the Franciscans, is considered the best.

PM. or M. or M. MARCHAND, or MARCHANT, PIERRE, a French engraver who, according to Florent le Comte, flourished about 1577, and engraved both on wood and copper. Professor Christ also attributes to him some prints bearing the above monogram, dated 1577.

MARCHANT, J., an obscure English engraver, by whom there is a portrait of Mrs. Cibber, after Hudson, dated 1749.

MARCHANT, PIERRE, a French engraver, by whom there is a book of goldsmiths' ornaments, executed with the graver in a neat, free style, signed Petrus Marchant, fecit. 1623.

MARCHELLI, ROLANDO, a Genoese painter, was born in 1664, and died in 1751. He studied under Carlo Maratti, and, according to Ratti, he possessed fine abilities, and executed a few excellent works; but, having a very favorable opportunity to engage in merchandise, he abandoned painting.

MARCHESI, GIROLAMO DA COTIGNOLA, an Italian painter, born, according to Baruffaldi, in 1480, at Cotignola in the Bolognese state. He studied under Francis Francia, and, according to Vasari, was one of the most eminent portrait painters of the day. He also painted history, and there are a number of historical compositions by him at Bologna and elsewhere, which prove him worthy a high rank among the artists of his time. Lanzi mentions among his best works a picture in the possession of the Serviti at Pesaro, where the Virgin is seen on a throne, before which, in a kneeling posture, is the Marchesa Ginevra Sforza, with her son Constantinus II. The design of this work is somewhat dry, but the coloring is extremely agreeable, the draperies well disposed. He visited Rome and Naples in the pontificate of Paul III., but did not gain any reputation in those cities, being somewhat behind the times. Vasari says he died between the years 1534 and 1549.

MARCHESI, GIUSEPPE, called IL SANSONE, was born at Bologna in 1699. He first studied under Marc' Antonio Franceschini, and afterwards with Aureliano Milani. Lanzi says his style partakes of both his masters. To the vigorous coloring and bold foreshortening of his first instructor, whom he nearly approaches, he added the correct design of Milani, and distinguished himself by many excellent works in the churches at Bologna and Rimini, among which some of the most admired are the Birth of the Virgin, in the Madonna de Galleria; the Resurrection, in the church of S. Croce at Bologna, painted in the grand style of Franceschini. Another fine picture is in the church of S. Pietro, representing St. Ambrose refusing the Emperor Theodosius the entrance of the Temple. The Martyrdom of St. Prisca, in the Cathedral at Rimini, is highly commended. It "is an altar-piece," says Lanzi, "of many and fine figures, and good tints, for which the St. Agnes of Domenichino supplied him with some ideas. He painted much for the Galleries, and among other pieces, one representing the Four Seasons is reputed among the best works of the modern Bolognese school." He died in 1771.

MARCHESINI, ALESSANDRO, a Veronese painter, born in 1664, and died in 1738. He first studied under Biagio Falcieri, at Verona; and at the age of sixteen went to Bologna, and became the pupil of Carlo Cignani, whose style he adopted. On his return to Verona he executed a few works for the churches of S. Biagio and La Madonna della Scala. He afterwards went to Venice, where he employed himself in painting easel pictures of historical and mythological subjects for private collections, with considerable success; but Lanzi says he afterwards "addicted himself to those compositions as a trade, and despatched them with more facility than care."

MARCHETTI, MARCO, sometimes called MARCO DA FAENZA, from the place of his nativity. It is not known where he was born, or with whom he studied, but he flourished at Rome, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., and greatly distinguished himself. Vasari says "he was particularly experienced in regard to frescos; bold, decided, and terrible; and especially in the practice and manner of drawing grotesques, not having any rival there equal to him. He succeeded Sabbatini in the works of Gregory XIII. He decorated the loggia of the Vatican with small sculptured histories, decorated with beautiful grotesque and arabesque ornaments. Such is his Murder of the Innocents, "which," says Lanzi, "are full of spirit and elegance, and are his best works. His figures form a school for design. In the church of the Trinitá de' Monti, he painted a series of pictures of the Life of St. Francis di Paola. His masterpiece is the Feast of Christ in the house of the Pharisee, in the Communal Collection. He afterwards entered the service of Cosimo I. of Florence, for whom he decorated the Palazzo Vecchio. He died in 1588.

MARCHI, GIUSEPPE FILIPPO LIBERATI, a native of Rome, who studied with Reynolds in that city, and afterwards accompanied him to England. Failing to meet with any encouragement, he continued with that master until his death in 1792, and rendered him much assistance in painting draperies, and forwarding his numerous pictures. Marchi had little energy, and could never have risen above mediocrity. He engraved a few plates in mezzotint from portraits of Sir Joshua. He died in 1808.

MARCHIONE, an Italian sculptor and architect, was a native of Arezzo in Tuscany, and flourished in the 13th century. He was chosen by Pope Innocent III., to erect the church of S. Spirito in Sassia at Rome, afterwards rebuilt by Paul III.; the church of S. Sylvestro; the Tower of the Conti; and in S. Maria Maggiore the chapel of the Presepio, afterwards restored by Sextus V. At Arezzo he erected the parish church and bell-tower. The façade of this edifice had three orders of columns, and was redundant in fanciful ornament, devoid of taste.

MARCHIONE, CARLO, a talented Italian sculptor and architect, born at Rome in 1704. He attained a high reputation, and was employed to execute a number of works at Rome and Siena. His principal work in sculpture is the mausoleum of Benedict XIII., in the church della Minerva. As an architect he erected, among other works, the Albano palace at Rome, and the new sacristy of St. Peter's. He had a remarkable talent for designing with the pen, and his sketches of scenes from low life are in request among amateurs. He died at Rome, in 1780, greatly esteemed for his private character, as well as for his talents.

MARCHIONI, LA, a paintress of Rovigo, who flourished in that city about 1700. Lanzi says she possessed singular skill in flower painting, and is considered the Bernasconi of the Venetian school. Her works are found in the choicest collections of her native city.

MARCHIS, ALESSIO DE, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about 1710. He imitated the style of Salvator Rosa, and painted landscapes, sea-ports, and conflagrations. His principal works are at Perugia and Urbino. Lanzi says that, in order to imitate nature with greater exactness in his conflagrations, he set fire to a barn at night for the purpose of study. Being detected, he was sent to the galleys for some years, till he was released by Pope Clement XI. on account of his great abilities, who employed him in his palace at Urbino, which he adorned with some of his choicest works. One of his most celebrated pictures is the Destruction of Troy, in the Palazzo Semproni. He died in 1742.

MARCILLA, or MARSIGLIA, GUGLIELMO DA. This painter was born at Marseilles in 1475. Nothing is known of his real name. According to Vasari, he was engaged in a fatal duel when young, and fled to the Dominicans for protection, and became a monk. He afterwards went to Italy, became a secular priest, and finally a citizen of Arezzo, where he endeared himself to the people by his exemplary conduct and his talents as an artist, and was made prior of the convent. He excelled in painting on glass, and executed many works of this kind for the Cathedral and other churches of Arezzo, so beautifully designed and colored that Lanzi says that they might "excite the envy of much larger cities." To very good drawing and uncommon expression he joined tints that partake of the emerald, the ruby, and of the oriental sapphire, and when illuminated by the sun, exhibit all the brilliancy of the rainbow. They are so finely wrought with subjects from the New Testament and other scriptural histories, that they seem to have reached the perfection of the art." Vasari, speaking of his Vocation of St. Matthew, in the great window of the Cathedral, as he saw it, says, "it exhibits perspectives of temples and flights of steps, figures so finely composed, landscapes so well executed, that one can hardly imagine they are glass, but rather something sent down from heaven for the delight of mankind." The fame of these works induced Pope Julius II. to invite him to Rome, for whom he executed some considerable works on glass, as well as some works in fresco. While at Rome he entirely changed his style in fresco painting by studying the works of Michael Angelo, and on his return to Arezzo he painted the Four Evangelists in the dome of the Cathedral, and decorated the ceilings and arches of the same edifice with scriptural subjects in fresco, in the grand style of Angelo. Lanzi says, "his frescos at Rome seem the designs of the 14th century, while those at Arezzo appear the work of a modern. In design, he followed Angelo as near as he could, but his coloring is not so fine." There is great variation in authors as to the time of his birth and death, but Lanzi and Vasari both say that he died at Arezzo in 1537, aged 62; doubtless taken from authentic documents in his convent. (See the article Guillaume for the French account of this artist.)

MARCOLA, MARCO, a painter of Verona, was born in 1728, and died in 1790. Lanzi says he was a universal painter, of great fertility of invention and rapid in his execution. His style is not given, nor is it known with whom he studied.

MARCOLINI, FRANCESCO, an Italian wood engraver, born at Forli about 1500. There is a book entitled Il Giardino de Pensieri, illustrated with well executed wood cuts by him, after designs by Giuseppe Porta, published at Forli in 1540.

MARCONI, MARCO, a painter of Como, who flourished about 1500. He was a good painter, and executed some works for the churches, much in the style of Giorgione. It is not known under whom he studied, but it is supposed he was educated at Venice.

MARCONI, Rocco, a painter of Treviso, who flourished about 1505. Ridolfi classes him as a pupil of Palma, but Zanetti says he was one of the best disciples of Giovanni Bellini, which accords with Lanzi. The last named author says "he excelled in accuracy of design, taste of coloring and diligence of hand, though he is not sufficiently easy in his contours, and for the most part, exhibits a severity approaching to a plebeian coarseness of countenances." He executed many works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, the best of which is the Adulteress before Christ, in the Chapter of San Giorgio Maggiore, which is entirely in the style of Giorgione. There are several copies of this picture at San Pantaleo and other places, attributed to him. His easel pictures are quite numerous. Kugler in his Italy, mentions two fine pictures by him at Venice, viz., an altar-piece, of Christ between two Angels, in the church S. S. Giovanni e Paolo, and the Descent from the Cross, in the Academy. There is also a picture of The Supper at Emmaus, having his signature, and dated 1507, in the Museum at Berlin. There is a great difference in his works, and from the above it appears that he was not always mean in his expression, and Lanzi himself says that his Adulteress before Christ is entirely in the style of Giorgione.

MARCUARD, ROBERT SAMUEL, an English designer and engraver, born in 1751, and died in 1792. He studied with Bartolozzi, and was considered one of his best scholars. He died in the prime of life. He executed a few plates after the noted English painters of his time.

MARCUCCI, AGOSTINO, a native of Siena, born about 1570, who studied under the Caracci at Bologna, until a schism arose in that school, when he arrayed himself with the foremost adherents of Faccini, who had the boldness to set up a new Academy in opposition to the Caracci. He continued to reside at Bologna, and to teach till the time of his death. He executed some works for the churches, among which the Death of the Virgin in la Concezione, is highly commended. Malvasia reckons him among "the first men" of that age.

MARENI, GIO. ANTONIO, a Piedmontese painter, who studied under Baciccio, and flourished at Turin about 1680, where there are some of his works, which are highly commended in the Guida di Torino.

MARESCALCO, GIOVANNI. See BUONCONSIGLI.

MARESCALCO, PIETRO, a painter, whose birth place is uncertain, but who flourished at Feltre about the middle of the 16th century. He was surnamed Lo Spada (the sword), and Lanzi says that in the MS. history of Feltre, he is claimed as a native of that city. There is one of his altar-pieces in the nunnery of the Angeli at Feltre, signed Petrus Marescalcus P.; a work of such merit as to entitle him to an honorable rank in art.

MARESCOTTI, BARTOLOMEO, a Bolognese painter, brought up in the school of Guido Reni, whose style he endeavored to imitate. Lanzi says he was a corrupter of the Guido manner, rather than an imitator, and that he is scarcely worthy of notice; still, he executed some works for the churches and public edifices at Bologna, among which are the Martyrdom of St. Barbara, in S. Martino Maggiore; the Crowning of the Virgin, in S. Stefano; and the altar-piece of St. Sigismondo condemned to Death, in the church of that saint. He died in 1630.

MARGARITONE, D'AREZZO, an old Italian painter, sculptor and architect, born at Arezzo in 1198, and died in 1275, according to Vasari, though there is considerable discrepancy among authors on this point. Lanzi says he died after 1289, aged 77, and Zani places his birth in 1240, and death in 1317. It is agreed on all sides that he was born before Cimabue, who was born at Florence in 1240. He was a disciple and imitator of the Greeks. Vasari says he painted on canvass, and made the first discovery of a method to render his pictures more durable, and less liable to crack; for this purpose he extended his canvass on panel, secured with strong glue, and covered the whole with a ground of gypsum before he began to paint. He formed diadems and other ornaments of plaster, giving them relief by gilding and burnishing. Some of his Crucifixions on a gold ground are at Arezzo, and there is one in the church of the Holy Cross at Florence, near one by Cimabue. Lanzi says both are in the old manner, and not so different, but that Margaritone may be pronounced as well entitled to the name of a painter, as Cimabue.

Margaritone practised sculpture and architecture, and executed, among other works, a marble statue for the mausoleum of Gregory X., who had died at Arezzo, on his way from Avignon to Rome. He decorated the chapel of that pope with his portrait and other paintings. He is said to have invented the art of gilding with leaf-gold upon Armenian bole. As an architect, he erected the governor's palace and the church of St. Ciriaco, at Ancona; and was commissioned in his own city to execute a design of Lapo, for the cathedral; but, according to Milizia, the building was nearly stopped, in consequence of the great expenditure of money in the wars between the Florentines and Argentinians. During the latter part of his life, he had the mortification of finding his own credit diminishing in proportion as that of other professors increased. He died in 1289.

MARGHUCCI, GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, of an uncertain age, who executed some plates of antique statues and busts.

MARI, ALESSANDRO, a painter, born at Turin in 1650. He first studied under Domenico Piola, at Genoa, and afterwards went to Venice and became the pupil of Cav. Liberi. He then visited Bologna, and spent some time in the school of Lorenzo Pasinelli, and, on leaving this master, painted a few pictures for the churches, the most admired of which is the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church of S. Barbaziano. He ultimately became a celebrated copyist, and a successful designer of capricci and symbolical representations, by which he gained great reputation at Milan, where he chiefly resided. He went to Spain, and died at Madrid in 1707.

MARI, ANTONIO, a painter of Turin, some of whose works are mentioned in the Guida di Torino. Count Durando Villa, believes Alessandro and Antonio Mari to be the same.

MARIA, CAV. ERCOLE, a Bolognese painter, sometimes called ERCOLINO DI GUIDO, from his having been a favorite disciple of that master.

He imitated and copied the works of his instructor with such precision, that Malvasia says he deceived the master himself, by substituting his copy for the original. Lanzi says his master willingly employed him in multiplying his own designs, two of which copies, extremely beautiful, are still to be seen at Bologna, though they do not display the same freedom as others which he executed for individuals at a more advanced age. In those there appears a decision and flow of his pencil which imposed upon the best judges,—a talent that procured him admiration at Rome, and the patronage of Urban VIII., who conferred on him the honor of knighthood. He died at Rome about 1640, in the flower of his life.

MARIA, FRANCESCO DI, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1623, and died in 1690. He was a disciple of Domenichino, while that artist resided at Naples, and imitated his manner so closely that Dominici says his works command great prices, and are bought by the inexperienced as the works of Domenichino. Lanzi says that he resembled his master in every quality except grace, which nature denied him. Hence Giordano said that "his figures were like a man whom consumption had reduced; the muscles and bones, might be correct and beautiful, but still insipid." Maria retorted by declaring the school of Giordano "heretical, and that he could not endure works that owe all their merit to ostentatious coloring and vigorous design." His works are not numerous, but they are held in the highest estimation for their excellence, particularly his History of St. Lorenzo at the Conventuali at Naples. He excelled in portraits, and Lanzi says that one of the latter being exhibited at Rome, together with one by Rubens, and one by Vandyck, the preference was given by the judges, Niccolò Poussin, Pietro da Cortona, and Andrea Sacchi, to that of Maria.

MARIANI, CAMILLO, an Italian painter and sculptor, born at Vicenza in 1565. He devoted himself originally to painting, but subsequently turned his attention to sculpture. The grand theatre of Vicenza, which had been partially erected from the designs of Palladio, was completed about this time; and Mariani was commissioned to execute all the works of sculpture for its decoration. He afterwards traveled through Italy, and left in different cities proofs of his abilities in both arts. He finally settled at Rome, where his first productions were two figures in stucco for the church of St. John of Lateran; and he subsequently executed the colossal marble statues of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which were admired by the connoisseurs. Among his other works, were eight colossal statues in stucco, in S. Bernardo de' Termini, characterized by great elevation of design. It seems that he continued the practice of painting during his whole life, and, according to Baglioni, excelled in easel pictures. He died at Rome in 1611.

MARIANI, DOMENICO, a Milanese painter, who, according to Orlandi, flourished at Milan about the middle of the 17th century, where he practised with considerable reputation, and established a school for the instruction of young artists.

MARIANI, GIOSEFFO, was the son and scholar of Domenico M. Lanzi says, he went to Bologna, where he greatly improved his manner, and distinguished himself throughout Italy and Germany

MARIANI, GIO. MARIA. This painter was a native of Ascoli, and studied under Domenico Fiasella at the same time as Valerio Castelli, and in conjunction with the latter, distinguished himself by several works in oil and fresco for the churches in that city. Lanzi says he painted in the Oratory of S. Jacopo, the Baptism of that saint, in competition with the chief of his contemporaries, and eclipsed them all, with the exception, perhaps, of Castiglione. He went to Rome, and was admitted into the Academy of St. Luke in 1650. He acquired great celebrity, and his easel pictures were much sought after for the best collections at Rome, Genoa, and Florence. His Rape of the Sabines in the Florentine Gallery is highly esteemed. He repeated this picture on a more extended scale in the Palace Brignole. His works are rare, as he died young.

MARIE, RENE ELIZABETH. See LEPICIE.

MARIENHOF, A., a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1650. It is not known under whom he first studied, but Descamps says he passed the early part of his life in studying and copying the works of Rubens. He settled at Brussels, where he was much employed in copying the works of that master. He also painted small historical pictures, designed, touched, and colored in the manner of Rubens. The time of his death is uncertain, though Balkema places it in 1712.

MARIESCHI, MICHELE, a Venetian artist, who excelled in painting architectural views and perspective. He passed the greater part of his life in Germany, where he acquired great reputation. On his return to Venice, he painted the most remarkable views of that city, some of which he etched in a spirited and pleasing style. He died in 1743.

MARIESCHI, JACOPO OR GIACOMO, was the son of the preceding, born at Venice in 1711. After being instructed in design and perspective by his father, he became the scholar of Gasparo Diziani to improve himself in drawing the human figure. He painted architectural subjects and views in Venice, in which he imitated the style of Canaletto so closely that his works are frequently taken by the inexperienced for those of that master. Lanzi commends his pictures, and says that he was a good figurist. Some of his works are in the Algarotti collection at Venice, with those of Canaletto and Francesco Guardi, another imitator, who painted with more freedom of touch than either Canaletto or Marieschi. He died in 1794.

MARIETTE, JEAN, an eminent French engraver and printseller, born at Paris in 1654. He studied drawing and design with J. B. Corneille, his brother-in-law, with the intention of becoming a painter, but on application to Charles le Brun, by his advice, he devoted himself to engraving. He executed a great number of engravings, mostly vignettes and other book plates, some of them after his own designs; but he engraved some large plates after the best masters, which possess considerable merit, though his drawing is not very correct. He wrought with both the point and the graver. He died in 1742. The following are his best prints:

The Descent from the Cross; after le Brun. The Angels ministering to Christ in the Desert; do. St. Peter delivered from Prison; after Domenichino. Moses saved from the Nile; after N. Poussin. Joseph making himself known to his Brethren; after M. Corneille. Christ curing the Paralytic; do. St. Louis receiving the Communion, after J. B. Corneille. St. Louis received into Heaven; do.

MARIETTE, PIERRE JEAN, was the son of the preceding, and died at Paris in 1774. He was instructed in the art by his father, who left him an ample fortune, and an extensive collection of prints and drawings, which, by continual additions, he rendered the most numerous and select of any private collection in Europe. For his amusement, he etched a few places of landscapes after Guercino, and some heads and studies after Carracci and Pierino del Vaga. He also published a work in two vols. folio, illustrated with 250 engravings of antique gems, entitled Traité des Pierres Gravées.

MARIGNY, MICHEL, a French historical painter, born at Paris in 1797, and died there in 1829. He first studied under M. Lafont, afterwards under the Baron Gros. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed several large works for the churches and public edifices at Paris and Rouen; among which, his Moses as the Legislator, in the council-chamber at the Louvre, is highly commended. Also his Wounded Soldier, his last production, which was exhibited at the Luxembourg in 1830.

MARILLIER, CLEMENT PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, born at Dijon in 1740. He studied painting under an artist of his native place, after which he visited Paris, and entered the school of Hallé; but being in narrow circumstances, he was compelled to devote himself to designing and engraving book illustrations. Possessing an excellent acquaintance of his art, with great delicacy of taste, he soon attained eminence, and was much employed. He made designs for the Bible of Defer Maison Neuve; two hundred designs for the Fables of Dorat; also many for the works of Prévost, de Roucher, and other authors. He designed and engraved in a spirited style, the landscapes for Les Voyages en France, à Naples et en Grèce, and for various other works. He died in 1808.

MARIN, JOSEPH CHARLES, a French sculptor, born in 1773. In 1812, he drew the grand prize in sculpture, and visited Rome, from whence, about four years after, he sent a Sleeping Cupid, copied from the antique. On returning to France, Marin gained encouragement. Among his principal works was the colossal statue of Tourville, which decorated the Pont Louis XVI., now the Pont de la Concorde, and was subsequently transported to the court of the Chateau de Versailles. In 1819, he was commissioned to execute a statue of M. de Tourny, for the city of Bordeaux. During many years he discharged the duties of Professor of the School of Fine Arts at Lyons. He died at Paris in 1834.

MARINALI, HORATIO, an Italian sculptor, born in 1643, at Bassano, in the Venetian State. After acquiring considerable knowledge from his father, a reputable sculptor of Bassano, Marinali visited Venice, but finding the art in a comparatively low state in that city, he went to Rome, and studied under the best masters. In 1676, he returned to Venice, and executed for the church of the Augustini two statues of saints, and a bas-relief of Christ bearing the Cross. In 1681, he was commissioned to execute a statue of St. Bassano, to be elevated on a column in the public square of his native city, which he completed by the assistance of his two brothers, mentioned in the succeeding article. Marinali then settled at Bassano, and was much employed. He executed many works for the churches and palaces of Venice, Vicenza, Padua, Verona and other cities. The sculptures in the beautiful gardens of Cornaro, called "the Paradise," at Castelfranco, are by this artist. His works evince elevated genius and great facility of execution. They are mostly of life size, characterized by considerable expression, lively attitudes, and an agreeable cast of the draperies. While engaged in executing a number of statues and bas-reliefs for the church of Monte Berico, he was attacked by sickness, and died in 1720.

MARINALI, FRANCESCO and ANGELO, Italian sculptors, were brothers of the preceding, born at Bassano; the former in 1647; the latter in 1654. As they wrought almost entirely in concert with their brother Horatio, they attained but little distinction. There are however, several works of merit, to which their names are attached. For minute information of these artists, consult Verci's Notizie sopra i pittori, gli scultori e gl' intagliatori, delle città di Bassano, 8vo. Venice, 1775.

MARINARI, ONORIO, an Italian painter, born at Florence in 1627, and died there in 1715. He was the cousin and disciple of Carlo Dolci, and for a long time imitated the finished and labored manner of that master so closely, that his pictures readily passed for the genuine works of Dolci, and it is supposed that many works in the public and private galleries of Europe, now attributed to Dolci, were really executed by him. He afterwards formed a style of his own, more dignified, more ideal, and less constrained, executed with a firm pencil, and his coloring was life itself. He did not confine himself to saints and madonnas, but showed a high degree of merit in historical compositions, with an admirable chiaro-scuro. His principal works are in the churches of S. Maria Maggiore and S. Simone, at Florence. He also excelled in portraits. Two of his most charming pictures were the Judgment of Paris, and Diana and her Nymphs, now said to be in England. After the death of Carlo Dolci, he completed some of his unfinished pictures, not to their disadvantage. His known works are not numerous, though he was industrious, and lived to the great age of eighty-eight years.

MARINAS, HENRIQUE DE LAS, a Spanish marine painter, born at Cadiz in 1620. His real name is not known, nor that of his master; but he obtained great celebrity for his marines, storms at sea, sea views, sea-ports, &c., executed with great truth and beauty; whence his name. His embarkations in the bay of his native city are highly commended for their spirit and truth, for the transparency of the water, and the aerial perspective. He acquired an ample fortune, and traveled through Italy. He died at Rome in 1680.

MARINELLI, GIROLAMO, a native of Assisi, who painted in 1630. There are some of his works in the church of S. Francesco at Perugia, as mentioned in the description of that church.

MARINETTI, ANTONIO, called IL CHIOZZOTTO, from the place of his nativity. He studied at Venice, under Gio. Bat. Piazzetta, in whose style he painted, but with much more softness of manner. He was a good artist, and flourished in the first part of the 18th century.

MARINI, ANTONIO, a painter of Padua who flourished about 1700. He chiefly painted landscapes, which he executed in a grand and classical style. His works are to be found in the public and private collections of his native city, where they are highly esteemed.

MARINI, BENEDETTO, a painter who flourished at Urbino about 1625. According to Lanzi, he was one of the most distinguished scholars of Claudio Ridolfi, and on leaving that master, he went to Piacenza, where he distinguished himself by several altar-pieces and other subjects, for the churches, in which he united the style of Baroccio with the Lombard and Venetian. His most celebrated work is the Miracle of the Loaves in the Desert, painted in oil, in the refectory of the Conventuali, in 1625. This is an immense composition, well grouped and well contrasted, and displays uncommon powers. Lanzi does not hesitate to prefer him before his master, in grandeur of ideas and vigor of execution, though perhaps inferior to him in the fundamental principles of the art; he says, also, that the history of his life and his works scattered abroad, in the neighborhood of Pavia and elsewhere, are worthy of research and commemoration. In the Oretti correspondence, written in 1777, in a letter from Andrea Zannoni to Prince Ercolani, Marini is classed as a scholar of Ferrau da Faenza, and Lanzi says there are many works by him in the style of that master.

MARINI, GIO. ANTONIO, a Venetian artist who wrought in mosaic, after the designs of Salviati, Tintoretto, the younger Palma, and other eminent artists. He was a scholar of Bartolomeo Bozza, according to Zanetti, and flourished about 1600.

MARINI, N., a painter of San Severino, who flourished about 1700. He was a scholar of Cipriano Divini, whom he surpassed. He executed some works for the churches in his native place, and obtained considerable celebrity.

MARINUS, IGNATIUS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1630. Little is known of him, except some plates after the Flemish and Italian masters, engraved in a neat but singular style; they are executed entirely with the graver, with very delicate strokes crossing each other, with long dots in the intervening spaces. They are highly finished, but the drawing is not very correct, and the draperies are rather stiff. Fine impressions of his prints are nevertheless held in considerable estimation. The following are the principal:

The Flight into Egypt; a night-piece; after Rubens. St. Ignatius curing the Diseased; do. St. Francis Xavier resuscitating a Dead Person; do. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Jordaens. Christ before the High-priest Caiaphas; do. The Martyrdom of St. Apollonia; do. Village Children forming a Concert; after C. Sachtleven. 1633.

MARIO DA FIORI. See Nuzzi.

MARIOTTI, GIO. BATTISTA, a Venetian painter, who probably studied under Antonio Balestra, when that artist resided and taught in Venice. At all events, Lanzi says he was an excellent imitator of his style. There are some of his works at Venice and Padua. He also etched some plates after his own designs and others, in a spirited and painter-like manner. He died about 1765.

MARK, QUINTIN, or QUIRINUS, a German engraver, born at Littau in 1753, and died in 1811. He went to Vienna while young, and studied engraving under Schmutzer. He rose to distinction, and was elected a member of the Imperial Academy. He engraved quite a number of plates, in a neat and pleasing style, of which the following are among the best:

The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after L. Giordano. Susanna and the Elders; after Rubens. Alexander and Diogenes; do. Herodias with the Head of St. John; after T. van Thulden. Cleopatra showing Augustus the Bust of Julius Cæsar; after P. Balloni. Venus and Cupid asleep; after Franceschini. The Amorous Miser; after Braun. 1786.

MARLET, JEAN HENRI, a French painter, born at Autun in 1771. He first studied in the Academy at Dijon, and afterwards with the Baron Regnault. His works are numerous, embracing a great variety of subjects, as history, poetry, fancy, and portraits. He published some works in Lithography, among which are Les Tableaux de Paris. He was living in 1831.

MARLIANO, ANDREA, a native of Pavia, who, according to Lamo, studied painting under Bernardino Campi. He was a reputable artist, and executed some works for the church in his native city. He flourished in the latter part of the 16th century.

MARLOW, M., an obscure English engraver, who lived about 1674, and executed some indifferent plates for the booksellers.

MARLOW, WILLIAM, an English landscape painter and engraver, born in 1740. He studied with Samuel Scott, the marine painter. He painted English scenery, usually views on the banks of the Thames, and in the neighborhoods of Richmond and Twickenham, in a pleasing manner, and sometimes approaching the style of Wilson in his English subjects. He painted and etched some Italian views, which he marked Wm. Marlow, F. S. A. He died in 1800.

MARMION, EDMUND, an English designer and engraver of little note, by whom there are some slight etchings of domestic subjects of ladies and gentlemen, from his own designs. He also engraved a few portraits for the booksellers.

MARMITTA, FRANCESCO, a painter of Parma, of whom there are notices from 1494 to 1506. He was esteemed an excellent artist in his time, and was the supposed master of Parmiggiano.

MARMOCCINI, GIOVANNA CORTESI, a Florentine paintress, born in 1670. Her family name was Cortesi. She studied first under Livio Mehus, and afterwards Pietro Dandini. She showed so much talent that the Grand Duchess took her under her protection, and had her instructed in miniature painting by Ippolito Galantini, in which she became eminent, and found abundant patronage at the court. Her likenesses were striking and lifelike, her coloring pleasing and natural, and her pencilling very neat and delicate. She usually worked in oil, but she painted equally well with crayons, and gave to those pieces all the warmth and tenderness of life. She died in 1736.

MARMOLEJA, PEDRO DE VILLEGAS, a Spanish painter; born, according to Bermudez, at Seville, in 1520. It is not known under whom he studied in his own country ; but he went to Italy for improvement, where he made the works of Raffaele his especial study, and formed on them a grand style of design, which has led some authors to assert that he was a pupil of that great master, whereas Raffaele died the same year in which Marmoleja was born. On his return to Seville he acquired great distinction, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices, especially in the Cathedral and the Hospital of San Lazaro, which are said to be distinguished for grandeur of design, beauty and symmetry of the figures, and dignity of character. Bermudez ranks him among the greatest artists of his country. He died at Seville in 1599.

MARNE, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1673. Little is known of his personal history, but he attained sufficient distinction to be appointed engraver to the king. He is chiefly known by his work entitled Histoire sacrée de la Providence. Paris, 1728, 3 vols., 4to. in five hundred plates of subjects from the Old and New Testaments, after Raffaele and other masters. In the Cabinet of the Duke de Valliere was a collection of one hundred designs by de Marne, entitled Les Belles Statues de Rome, copied very correctly from the antique. The Biographie Universelle notices de Marne as an architect, but does not mention any of his works. He died in 1755.

MARNE, JEAN LOUIS. See DEMARNE.

MAROLI, DOMENICO, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina in 1612. He studied at Messina, under Antonio Ricci, called Il Barbalunga, and on leaving the school of that master went to Venice, where he resided several years and studied diligently the works of the best masters, and acquired considerable reputation for his pastoral and rural subjects. He was intimate with Boschini, who extols him as a new Bassano, and as a specimen of his talent, inserted in his "Carta del Nevega" an engraving after one of his designs. It represents a beautiful landscape, a shepherd with his flocks, several cows, and a dog, forcibly and beautifully drawn, and is one of the best designs in the work. On his return to Messina, he did not confine himself to these subjects, but devoted at least a part of his time to painting sacred subjects, in which he showed himself an accomplished artist in that branch. He painted some excellent works for the churches in that city, which are highly commended for beauty of design, freshness of color, delicacy of tints, and for the dignity of his heads, which are full of expression and character. Such are his pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Placido, in the church of S. Paolo; and the Nativity, in the Chiesa della Grotta. This eminent painter was killed during the revolution in Sicily, in 1674.

MARON, THERESA MENGES DA, a sister of the celebrated Antonio Raffaele Menges, was born at Auszig, in Bohemia, in 1726, and died at Rome in 1806. She showed great talents, even in her youth, and excelled in enamel, crayon, and miniature painting. She exercised her talents in full vigor till her death, at the great age of 80 years. She was the wife of the Cavaliere Maron, an eminent Italian artist. See Menges.

MARONE, JACOPO, an Italian painter, and a native of Alessandria, who flourished at Genoa about 1480. Little is known of him. Lanzi says there is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Jacopo at Savona, painted in distemper in several compartments, in the midst of which is a Nativity in a landscape, conducted with exquisite care in every part. In the church of S. Brigida at Genoa are two beautiful altar-pieces by the same artist, dated 1481 and 1484.

MAROT, JEAN, a French architect and engraver, born at Paris in 1620. He applied himself more particularly to the theory than to the practice of his art, but was employed to design several important works, among which were the façade of the church des Fenillantines, of the Faubourg St. Jacques; the Hotel de Mortemart; and the façade of the Hotel de Pussort. He was appointed architect to the king, and with many other artists presented a plan for the façade of the Louvre. In concert with his son, Daniel M., he published in 1691 a collection of two hundred plates of the plans of different edifices, ancient and modern. The same plates were afterwards reprinted by Mariette, under the title of L'Architecture Française. Marot also engraved several plates for the great cabinet of the King of France. He died about 1697. The following are his principal prints :

A set of thirteen plates of Churches and public edifices at Paris; designed and engraved after their measurement by J. Marot. A second set of twelve plates of the same. Twenty-one plates of Views of the Chateau de Richelieu. The Plans and Elevations of the Louvre; three plates. The Plans and Views of the Chateau de Vincennes; three plates. The Plan and Elevation of the Chateau de Madrid; two plates.

MAROT, DANIEL, a French architect and engraver, the son of the preceding, was born at Paris about 1660. He studied under his father, and assisted him in his works; but after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he quitted France for Holland, where he gained considerable distinction, and was appointed architect to William, Prince of Orange, whom he accompanied to England. After the death of William III., Marot returned to Holland, and in 1712 published his Recueil d'Architecture. A number of his plates, with some by his father, were published at Paris under the title of Recueil des planches des Sieurs Marot, pere et fils. The following are his principal prints :

The great Fair at the Hague, with the Burghers under arms, saluting the Prince and Princess of Orange; in two sheets. The great Fair at Amsterdam, with the Citizens under Arms. The Festival of the Birthday of the Prince of Orange. 1686. The Interior of the Audience-chamber at the Hague. A perspective View of Voorst.

MAROT, FRANÇOIS, a reputable French painter, born at Paris in 1667. He studied under Charles de la Fosse, and painted history in the style of that master. Among other excellent works by him, is a picture of Christ appearing to Mary, in the church of Notre Dame. He was chosen a Royal Academician in 1702, and died in 1719.

MARQUEZ, ESTEBAN, a Spanish historical painter, born at Estremadura, and, according to Bermudez, studied under his uncle, Joya Fernando Marquez, at Seville, who followed the school of Murillo. His instructor dying young, and being thrown upon his own resources, he engaged himself in an establishment where pictures were manufactured to export to America, but not having had sufficient practice and experience in that sort of work, he became the butt of his companions, so that he became disgusted, quitted Seville, and returned to his native place. He afterwards returned to Seville, where by close application in studying and copying the works of Murillo, he acquired a correctness of design and a knowledge of coloring that enabled him to imitate that master with considerable success. He executed some good works for the churches and public edifices in that city. He died in 1720.

MARRACCI, GIOVANNI, a painter born at Lucca in 1637. After acquiring the rudiments of design under Pietro Paolini, he went to Rome at the age of fourteen, and entered the school of Pietro da Cortona, and before the age of twenty-five he had acquired considerable distinction as a historical painter. He returned to Lucca, where he soon acquired distinction, and executed some works for the churches and convents. Lanzi says that "although little known beyond Lucca, he is reckoned one of the most eminent scholars and most successful imitators of Cortona, and merits this honor, either when he painted in fresco, as in the dome of S. Ignatius at San Giovanni, or when he wrought in oil, as in several pictures in the possession of the brotherhood of S. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Michele, and in other places." He died in 1704.

MARRACCI, IPPOLITO, was a younger brother of the preceding, and studied under Giuseppe Maria Metelli, at Bologna. Lanzi says he was a successful rival of his master, either when he painted by himself, as he did in the Rotunda at Lucca, or in conjunction with his brother. Time of his birth and death not recorded.

MARREBECK, J., an engraver, probably a native of Holland, who flourished about 1700, and engraved a few portraits in mezzotinto.

MARSHALL, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished in the first half of the 17th century, and is said to have practised the art upwards of forty years. He was wholly employed by the booksellers. He engraved a great number of plates, executed with the graver in a coarse, stiff, tasteless style, supposed to be after his own designs. His best prints are his portraits, and though indifferently executed, they are interesting on account of the personages they represent. The following are the principal :

Sir Thomas More, Chancellor. Desiderius Erasmus, William Cecil, Lord Burleigh. Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. Nicholas Ridley, Bishop of Rochester. Lady Jane Grey. James I. William Camden, Historian, &c. William Shakspeare. Benjamin Jonson. Charles I.; three prints. Francis, Lord Bacon. George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex; scarce. William Alexander, Earl of Stirling; do. William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. Nathaniel Bernard, Rector of Ramenham; scarce. Dr. Donne, when 18 years of age. 1635. The Reverend Dr. John Taylor. The Reverend John Sym. The Reverend Josiah Shute. James, the first Duke of Hamilton. John Milton. James Shirley, Poet. Sir Robert Stapleton, Poet. 1646. Sir John Suckling, Poet. The Frontispiece to the Arcadian Princess. 1635. The Frontispiece to the Evangelical Harmony. The Frontispiece to Virgil's Works, by Ogilby. 1649.

MARSIGLIA, GUGLIELMO. See MARCILLA.

MARSY, BALTHASAR and GASPAR, were brothers, and distinguished French sculptors, born at Cambray; the former in 1624, and the latter in 1628. They were instructed by their father, who was probably an artist of little note. In 1648, they visited Paris, and after remaining for some time in the employ of a wood carver, their talents were noticed by Sarrazin and Buyster, who engaged their assistance. Commissioned to execute the decorations of the Hotel de la Vrilliere (now the Bank of France,) they acquitted themselves with great honor. For the Abbey of Montmartre they executed a statue of St. Denis, in alabaster, of life-size. At Versailles, however, they produced their finest works, among which was a group of two Tritons watching the Steeds of Phoebus. Among their other productions was the mausoleum of the king of Pologne Casimir, in the church of S. Germain des Pres, at Paris. Balthasar died in 1674, leaving his brother Gaspar, who afterwards executed a number of works for the Park of Versailles, and the bas-relief of the Porte St. Martin, representing Mars bearing the French Crown and pursuing an Eagle. Gaspar Marsy died in 1681.

MARTEAU, GILES DE, THE ELDER, a Flemish engraver, born at Liege in 1722. He went to Paris while young, where he acquired considerable reputation as one of the most successful revivers of stipple engraving, which he brought to great perfection. He was elected a member of the Academy of Paris in 1764. He engraved quite a number of plates, mostly after eminent French masters, among which are the following :

The Portrait of C. Vanloo, painter. The Education of Cupid; after Boucher. Venus and Cupid; do. The Head of Heliodorus; from a design by Pierre; after Raffaello. The Bust of the Virgin; after Pierre. The Entombing of Christ; after Stellaert. Justice protecting the Arts; after Cochin. Lyeurgus wounded by a Plebeian; do.; his reception plate. An allegorical subject on the Death of the Dauphin; do. A set of six Landscapes; after J. Houcl.

MARTEAU, GILES DE, THE YOUNGER, was the nephew and pupil of the preceding, born at Liege about 1750. He engraved some plates in the style of his uncle, which possess considerable merit. Among others we have the following by him: Innocent Pleasure, after Huet; the favorite Lamb, do.; two Hunting-pieces, do.; Cupid crying, do.

MARTELLI, LORENZO. Lanzi says that the applause which Salvator Rosa received during his seven years' residence in Florence, induced many young men to copy and imitate him, and among the most successful were Lorenzo Martelli and Taddeo Baldini.

MARTENASIE, PETER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about 1730. He went to Paris, and studied under Jacques Philippe le Bas. He executed some prints, chiefly after the Flemish masters, among which are the Rape of the Sabines, after Rubens; the Watering-Place, after Bergheim; and the Father of a Family, after Greuze.

MARTIN, DAVID, an English portrait painter and mezzotinto engraver of little note, who flourished from about 1765 to about 1780. He engraved a few portraits, among which is one of L.

F. Roubillac, sculptor, after A. Carpentiers; 1765. Lady F. Manners, daughter of the Marquis of Granby. 1772. David Hume. J. J. Rousseau, after Ramsay. Dr. Franklin, from a half-length portrait by himself.

MARTIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter, born at Paris in 1659. His father was a contractor of buildings, and placed him under Lahire, where he remained several years, and was then engaged as a draughtsman by Marshal Vauban. After the latter became sensible of the talents of Martin, he warmly recommended him to Louis XIV., who placed him under Vandermeulen, the eminent painter of battles. At the death of the latter, he was appointed Director of the Gobelins, with a pension. He painted the battles in all the campaigns of the Grand Dauphin, and a part of those in which the King commanded in person. His numerous battle pieces in the chateau of Versailles gained him the title of Martin des Batailles. By order of Leopold, Duke of Lorraine, he executed twenty pictures of the principal events in the reign of Charles V., which were placed in the chateau of Luneville. He died at Paris in 1735.

MARTINELLI, GIOVANNI, a Florentine historical painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. Lanzi says historians do not allow him the praise to which his merits entitle him. There is a grand picture by this artist in the Florentine Gallery, representing Belshazzar's Feast, and in the church of S. Lucia de' Bardi, another fine picture of the Guardian Angel. His masterpiece is the Miracle of St. Anthony at the Conventuali di Pescia.

MARTINELLI, LUCA and GIULIO, two brothers, who studied under Jacopo Bassano, whose style they adopted, and were esteemed excellent artists. They were natives of Bassano, and flourished in the latter part of the 16th century.

MARTINELLI, DOMENICO, an Italian architect, born at Lucca in 1650. He visited Rome, where he gained great distinction; was appointed Keeper of the Academy of St. Luke, and public lecturer on perspective and architecture. He was invited to Vienna, where he designed a palace for the Prince of Lechstentein; and he erected a number of bridges, fortifications, and palaces in various parts of Germany. According to Milizia, his works are characterized by symmetry, and evince an excellent judgment in the combination of ancient solidity with modern elegance. His drawings in water-colors are much esteemed. He died in 1718.

MARTINET, a French lady who married the son of Nicholas Dupuis, and flourished about 1760. Her father-in-law instructed her in the art of engraving, and among others by her hand is a large print of Venus and Adonis, after Bianchi. She had a brother, who was also an engraver, and executed some plates of vignettes, views, and animals for the booksellers.

MARTINETTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian architect, born at Bironico in 1764. At the age of eleven years he visited Bologna, where he found a generous protector in the Marquis Zambecari. After the completion of his course he settled in that city, and soon received several important commissions, the execution of which gained him great reputation. Among them are the Collegio Montalto; the Villa Ravona, erected for the Marquis Zambecari; and the magnificent Villa Aldini, on the hill called Adel Monte, near Bologna. Martinetti was appointed architect to the city; and subsequently pontifical inspector of engineering. He was a member of many learned societies of Italy. He died in 1829.

MARTINEZ, AMBROSIO, a Spanish painter, born at Granada about 1630. He was educated in the school of Alonso Cano, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He executed some works for the churches and convents of his native city. His best works are in the church of the monastery of San Geronimo, and at the Carmelites. He died at Granada in 1674, in the prime of life.

MARTINEZ, SEBASTIAN, a Spanish historical painter, born at Jaen in 1602. According to Palomino, he passed the early part of his life at Cordova, where he painted several works for the churches, particularly three altar-pieces in the convent of Corpus Christi, representing the Conception of the Virgin, the Nativity, and St. Francisco di Assisi, which gained him much reputation. On the death of Velasquez he went to Madrid, and was appointed court painter by Philip IV. His best works are his cabinet pictures of historical and other subjects, which are to be found in the collections at Jaen, Cordova, Seville, and Madrid, where they are highly prized. He was also an excellent landscape painter. He died at Madrid in 1667.

MARTINEZ. See MAZO.

MARTINEZ, DOMINGO, a Spanish historical painter, born about the end of the 17th century. He studied under an unknown painter, named Juan Antonio, whom he soon surpassed, and attained considerable reputation. His works possess considerable merit, but are faulty in invention and composition; and he supplied his lack of ingenuity by having recourse to his large collection of prints. Notwithstanding these defects, his pictures were quite popular at Seville, and may be seen in many of the churches. When King Philip visited that city, he commissioned Martinez to execute a number of works, and he was promised the office of king's painter if he would go to Madrid, but he declined, preferring to reside at Seville. Martinez deserves honorable mention for establishing a School of Painters in his own house, and for devoting a portion of his fortune and talents to the education of young artists. He died in 1750.

MARTINEZ, GREGORIO, a Spanish painter, a native of Valladolid, flourished towards the close of the 16th century. He painted landscapes with success, but attained more reputation for his small historical subjects. There is mentioned a charming picture by him, on copper, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. Joseph and St. Francis of Assisi, remarkable for its delicacy of tints.

MARTINEZ, JOSÉ, a Spanish historical painter, born at Saragossa in 1612. He visited Italy, and after studying at Rome for several years, he returned to Spain, and attained such distinction as to be appointed painter to the King in 1642. He painted a number of considerable works for the churches and convents of Saragossa, among which, Palomino mentions a series of pictures of the Life our Saviour. His works are distinguished for beauty of coloring more than for the higher qualities of art. He engraved a portrait of Mathias Piedra, from a picture painted by himself in 1681. He died in 1682.

MARTINEZ, TOMMASO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville about the close of the 17th century. He studied under Juan Simone Guttierrez, a disciple of Murillo, and followed the admirable style of the latter. For the convent de la Merced at Seville, he painted a most beautiful picture of a Mourning Mother, entirely in the style of Murillo, which by reason of its rare merit, was afterwards transferred to the Alcazar.

MARTINEZ, DON JOSÉ LUXAN, or LUZAN, a Spanish painter of history and portraits, born at Saragossa in 1710. Patronized by the noble family Pignatelli, he was sent to Naples, and studied for five years, gaining improvement from the great works of the Italian masters. On returning to Spain, he executed several works for his patrons, among which were the portraits of the family. In 1741, he visited Madrid, having previously been appointed painter to the King. On returning to Saragossa, he was appointed Inspector of Paintings by the Inquisition. His pictures are characterized by facility of execution and harmony of coloring, as well as a good degree of excellence in invention, composition, and design. Many of them are in the churches of Saragossa, Huesca, Calahorra, and Catalunya. Martinez established a successful school of design, from whence issued Bayen, and many other artists who have gained distinction in the 18th century.

MARTINEZ, D., BERNARDO, DEL BARRANCO, a Spanish painter, born in 1738, in the village of Cuesta. After acquiring a knowledge of the art at Madrid, he visited Italy in 1765, and spent some time in Turin, Parma, Naples, and Rome, studying particularly the antique and the works of Correggio. After an absence of four years he returned to Spain, and in 1774 was chosen a member of the Academy of San Fernando. Antonio Mengs being at that time first painter to the King, and having the direction of all matters relating to the Fine Arts, confided to Martinez the execution of several important works. Among them were a portrait of King Charles III.; and the Decollation of St. John, for the Academy of Painting, of which Martinez was one of the most zealous professors. He designed some of the figures for an edition of Don Quixote, published by the Academy, in 1788. He died in 1791.

MARTINI, GIOVANNI, a painter of Udine, of whom there are notices from 1501 to 1515. According to Vasari, he studied at the same time with Pellegrino di San Daniello, under Giovanni Bellini. There are some of his works in the churches at Udine, the best of which is his St. Mark, in the cathedral, painted in competition with Pellegrino, which, in the opinion of Vasari, is little inferior to that master.

MARTINI, INNOCENZIO, a reputable painter, who according to Affo, flourished at Parma about the middle of the 16th century. He painted some frescos in the churches of S. Giovanni and the Steccata.

MARTINI, PIETRO ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Parma in 1739. He went to Paris while young, and there etched some plates after Teniers and other Flemish artists, which were finished with the graver by le Bas. He afterwards went to London, where he resided some time, and practised engraving. The following are the best:

Heliodorus driven from the Temple; after Solimene. Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple; do. Architectural Ruins; after Robert. The Pleasures of Summer; after Vernet. A View of Spoleto; do. A View of Porto Ercole; do. A View of Avignon; do. The Augurs; after Sal. Rosa; etched by Martini, finished by le Bas.

MARTINI, SIMONE. See MEMMI.

MARTINO, BARTOLOMEO DI, an old painter of Siena, by whom there are some paintings in the churches of Siena, particularly one in the cathedral, representing the Translation of the body of St. Crescentius, dated 1405; and another fine picture in S. Antonio Abate.

MARTINO, MARCO SAN, an Italian painter and engraver who flourished about 1680. There is some dispute whether he was a native of Venice or Naples. He is also variously called by writers Sanmartino, Sanmarchi; and Guarienti divides him into two artists, Sanmartino, a Venetian painter, and Marco Sanmarchi, a landscape and figure painter much extolled by Malvasia, who flourished at the same time as San Martino. Bartsch settles the question by giving a description of thirty-three of his prints, many of them bearing his name Marco San Martino. Lanzi says he resided at Rimini, where his pictures are frequently met with. He was more eminent for his landscapes, but he also painted subjects of a higher order, as his Baptism of Constantine, in the cathedral at Rimini, and St. John preaching in the Desert, in the College of S. Vincenzio, at Venice.

MARTINOTTI, EVANGELISTA, a Piedmontese painter, was born at Castel Monferrato in 1634, and died in 1694. According to Lanzi he studied under Salvator Rosa, and painted landscapes with small figures and animals in a style of great excellence, in a manner partaking that of his master. His works are found in the collections of Turin, where they are highly esteemed. Lanzi mentions him as an historical painter, and commends his Baptism of Christ in the Cathedral of Casale.

MARTINOTTI, FRANCESCO, was a brother of the preceding, and also a disciple of Salvator Rosa, whose style he adopted. He painted landscapes and history. He died in 1674.

MARTIRELLI. See MARTORIELLO.

MARTIS, or MARTINI, OTTAVIANO, a painter of Gubbio, who matriculated at Perugia in 1400, and was living in 1444. Lanzi says there is a fresco in the church of S. Maria Nuova, in his native city, dated 1403, which represents the Virgin surrounded by a choir of Angels, certainly too much resembling each other, but in their forms and attitudes, as graceful and pleasing as any cotemporary productions.

MARTORANA, GIOVACCHINO, a Sicilian painter, who flourished at Palermo about the middle of the 18th century. There are four large pictures by him, from the life of St. Benedict, in the chapel de' Crociferi, and S. Rosalia.

MARTORIELLO, (sometimes misspelled MARTORELLI, or MARTIRELLI.) GAETANO, a Neapolitan painter, born about 1670, and died in 1723. According to Dominici, he studied under Giacomo del Po. He first attempted historical painting, but not succeeding in this, he devoted his attention to landscape painting, as better suited to his powers, and became the pupil of Niccolò Massaro, a scholar of Salvator Rosa. He imitated Rosa in the romantic wildness of his scenery, as well as in the figures he introduced to embellish his pictures. Lanzi says he "was a landscape painter of a free style, but often sketchy, and his coloring not true to nature," which criticism might be applied to Rosa himself.

MARTOS, IVAN PETROVITCH, an eminent Russian sculptor, born in 1755, at Ichnia, in Little Russia. He was munificently patronized by the Empress Feodorowna, who sent him to Rome to study at the expense of government. His works are numerous, and among the most important are, the bronze colossal group of the patriots Minim and Pozharsky, at Moscow; the monument to the Emperor Alexander, at Taganrog; the statue of the Duke of Richelieu, at Odessa; Potemkin's monument, at Cherson; and that erected in honor of Lomonosov, at Archangel. They are characterized by nobleness of conception, truth of expression, and freedom of execution, devoid of negligence. In the draping of his figures he is esteemed superior to Canova, and he had a particular talent in bas-reliefs. One of the most admired of these is that which adorns the monument of the Grand Duchess Helena Paulovna, representing Hymen extinguishing a torch. In the church of Grusino, are several statues of saints, executed by Martos. He was Counsellor of State, and Director of the Academy of Fine Arts, at Petersburg. He died in 1835, aged eighty years.

MARTSS, or MARSSSEN, JAN, called DE JONGE, a painter and engraver, who flourished about 1632. Little is known of him, except a few rare prints by him, engraved in a peculiar manner, which consists of short strokes, a little bent, and rarely crossed with counter strokes; the marks of the graver are but little apparent. Bartsch describes six prints of battles by him, and others are mentioned by Brulliot and Nagler. Bartsch observes that he is learned in the ordonnance of his groups and skilful in his drawing; but his horses are not correctly designed, and their limbs are heavy, resembling those that are condemned in the prints of Peter de Laer. He marked his prints J. M. D. Jonge fecit, or J. M. D. J. fe.

MARUCELLI, or MARUSCELLI, GIOVANNI STEFANO, an Italian painter, born, according to Baldinucci, in the province of Umbria, in 1586, and died in 1646. Others say he was a Florentine; and, according to his epitaph, he died in 1656, aged seventy-two. He studied under Andrea Boscoli, at Florence, and soon distinguished himself, so that he was invited to Pisa to paint a grand altar-piece in the cathedral, which he executed in a manner that added to his reputation. Another admirable picture by him was one representing Abraham entertaining the Angels. It is said that he was more eminent as an architect and engineer, and that he invented many useful machines.

MARUCELLI, VALERIO, a reputable painter, who, according to Baldinucci, studied under Santo di Titi, and flourished about 1600.

MARULLO, GIUSEPPE, a Neapolitan painter, was born at Casale d'Orta about 1620, and died at Naples in 1685. According to Dominici, he studied under Cav. Massimo Stanzioni, and was one of his ablest scholars. His best works approach so near to his master in manner, that Lanzi says, artists themselves have sometimes ascribed them to Massimo. There are some of his best works in the churches at Naples, particularly in S. Severino. He afterwards changed his style of coloring for one of his own, so that he gradually lost public favor, and there is a great difference in his works. Lanzi says his example may serve as a warning to every one, not to estimate his own powers too highly, and not to affect genius when he does not possess it.

MARZI, or MAZZI, VENTURA, a native of Urbino, who, according to Lazzari, studied under Federigo Barocci, and flourished there in the first half of the 17th century. He painted in the style of his master, but there is a great difference in his works.

MARZIALE, MARCO, a Venetian painter, who, according to Lanzi, flourished from 1488 to 1506. He was a scholar, or at least an imitator of Giovanni Bellini. In the Conservatorio delle Penitenti, at Venice, is a picture of the Purification by him, signed Marcus Martialis Venetus, 1488, and another of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, in the Contarini collection, dated 1506.

MASACCIO, or MASO DI SAN GIOVANNI. This great artist is reckoned one of the Fathers of Painting. His real name is not certainly known, though Zani says it was Tommaso Guidi. In his youth he was called Maso di San Giovanni, from the place of his nativity in the Florentine territory; and afterwards the name of Masaccio was given to him from his total disregard of all the comforts and conveniences of life, while eagerly striving to improve himself, or deeply engrossed in the studies of his profession. There is also a great deal of discrepancy as to the time of his birth and death, but Lanzi says he was born in 1401, and died in 1443, which would seem to be near the truth. Vasari says he was born in 1402, but does not mention the precise time of his death; Baldinucci places his birth in 1417, and his death in 1443.—Landrino, the commentator on Dante, who was his cotemporary, says he died at the age of 26, and according to the inscription on his monument, he died in 1443, aged 26; others say he died very young. It is probable that his monument was erected long after his death; and it seems improbable that an artist could have gone through the difficulties he had to encounter, executed so much, and acquired such distinction at the early age of 26 years. He first studied under Masolino da Panicale at Florence, and on the death of that master he finished some works left incomplete by him in the chapel of S. Pietro al Carmine. He formed his principles by studying the works of Ghiberti and Donatella. He learned perspective from Filippo Brunelleschi, and went to Rome to improve himself in design by the study of the antique. He had a genius calculated to make an era in art, and he is regarded as the founder of a new style, characterized by the incipient grandeur of the Florentine school. Mengs assigns to him the highest place among those who explored the untrod paths of art; and Vasari says "what were executed before his time might be called paintings, but his pictures seem to live, they are so true and natural"; and in another place he adds, "no master of that age so nearly approached the moderns." He considered painting the art of representing nature truthfully, by the aid of design and coloring, and therefore made nature his constant study. He was the first who removed the difficulties that impeded the progress of art, by judicious observations, and by setting an example of their importance in his own works. He showed the beauty which arises from a proper and agreeable choice of attitudes and motions, and the grandeur which arises from a greater boldness and freedom of execution, and a better chiaro-scuro than had before been practised. He was also the first who studied to give his figures more dignity by draping them with broad, loose folds, instead of the multitude of small ones so commonly practised by preceding artists, and by adapting the color of his draperies to the tint of his carnations, so as to make them harmonize with each other. He was also skilled in perspective, as is seen in his picture of the Annunciation in the church of S. Niccolo at Florence, in which the eye is pleasingly deceived by the receding of different objects, in such a manner as to excite general admiration.

Masaccio's earlier performances retain much of the dryness and stiffness that prevailed before his time. Such are his St. Anna in the church of S. Ambrogio at Florence, and his series of pictures of the Passion of our Saviour in the chapel of S. Caterina in the church of S. Clemente at Rome. But his celebrated frescos of scriptural subjects, in the church of S. Pietro del Carmine at Florence, are distinguished by a beauty and grandeur of style before unknown. Speaking of those works, Lanzi expresses his admiration by quoting Pliny, "Jam perfecta sunt omnia." Mengs also says, "the compositions are studied and judicious, the design daring but correct, the foreshortenings of his figures diversified and complete beyond those practised by Paolo Uccello. The air of the heads is in the style of Raffaello (should be, the air of Raffaello's heads is in the style of Masaccio, for he copied him); the expression is so managed that the mind seems no less forcibly depicted than the body. The anatomy of the figure is marked with truth and judgment. The figure so highly extolled in the Baptism of St. Peter, which appears shivering with the cold, marks, as it were, a new era in art. The garments divested of minuteness present a few easy folds. The coloring is true, properly varied, delicate, and surprisingly harmonious, and the relief is in the grandest style."—His most celebrated work was Christ curing the Demoniacs. Vasari gives a long catalogue of painters and sculptors who formed their tastes and improved their arts by studying the works of this great master; among them he enumerates Michael Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, Pietro Perugino, Andrea del Sacchi, Il Rosso, Pierino del Vaga, and Raffaello. The last named artist was not ashamed to adopt largely from Masaccio's designs, and from them he took the figure of St. Paul preaching at Athens; the figure of the same Saint chastising the sorcerer Elymas; as well as that of Sergius Paulus, and of another figure among the listeners, whose head is sunk on his breast, and his eyes shut, as though deeply wrapt in thought; and for the Sacrifice of Lystra, he took the whole ceremony.

Such was Masaccio—well, indeed, entitled to the appellation of a Father of Painting. His early life, at least, was one of privation, and he was remarkable for enthusiasm for his art, and untiring industry. He cared nothing for food, raiment, or luxuries, beyond the simplest wants of nature. His name, instead of being a reproach, is his glory. His works procured him universal admiration; but the same merit which promoted his fame, excited envy, and he died deeply lamented by every lover of art, not without strong suspicion that some malignant demon had cut him off by poison.

MASCAGNI, DONATO, called FRA ARSENIO, a Florentine painter, born in 1579, and one of the ablest scholars of Jacopo Ligozzi. Soon after leaving that master, he became a monk of the Order of the Servi, taking the name of Fra Arsenio, by which he is commonly known. He painted some pictures for the churches of Florence, particularly for that of his Order. His manner is rather distinguished for minuteness and precision than for grandeur of design or softness of coloring. Lanzi commends his pictures of the Miracles in the Nunziata, but more especially one in the library of the monastery of his Order at Valombrosa, which he says "is a picture full of subject, and the chief glory of this master." It represents, as some suppose, the donation of the state of Ferrara to the Holy See by the Countess Matilda. He executed some easel pictures before he became a monk, which are found in the private collections at Florence. He died in 1636.

MASCALL, EDWARD, an English portrait painter who flourished about 1650. He painted a portrait of Oliver Cromwell, which was in the possession of the Duke of Chandos.

MASCHERINO, OTTAVIANO, a Bolognese painter and architect, who visited Rome about 1572, in the time of Gregory XIII. He executed several pictures in the Vatican, among which was the Marriage at Cana; but soon devoted himself entirely to architecture, and attained such eminence as to be appointed pontifical architect. To the palace at Monte Cavallo he added the portico at the extremity of the court, with the loggia, the small façade of double pilasters, and the elliptical winding staircase. Among his other works were the palace now called the Monte della Pietà; the church of S. Salvatore in Lauro; and the façades of La Scala and Santo Spirito. The latter work is particularly characterized by simplicity. Mascherino died at the age of 82, in the pontificate of Paul V. He was often honored by the Academy of St. Luke, to which he bequeathed all his designs and his wealth.

MASÉ, F. DE LA, a French engraver of whom little is known. Mr. Strutt mentions a print by him, representing St. Jerome in a Cavern, after L. de la Hire, which he says proves him to have been an artist of ability.

MASINI, GIUSEPPE, a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1658. He studied under Giacomo Chiavistelli, and assisted him in his works in the Ducal Gallery. He was chiefly employed in painting for the cabinets.

MASO, DI S. FRIANO. See MANZUOLI.

MASOLINO, DA PANICALE. See PANICALE.

MASON, JAMES, an eminent English engraver, born in 1710, and died in 1780. He engraved a large number of plates after Claude Lorraine, Gaspar Poussin, Swanevelt, Hobbema, Wilson, Lambert, Scott, and Zuccarelli, which are held in considerable esteem. Two of his best plates are the Landing of Æneas in Italy after Claude; and Venus at the Bath, after Andrea Sacchi. He was much employed by Boydell.

MASQUELIER, LOUIS JOSEPH, a French engraver, born at Cisoing in 1741, and died in 1811. He went to Paris, and studied under J. P. le Bas, and executed many plates in the neat, spirited style of his instructor. He engraved several plates of French victories, after Vernet and Monnet; some of the plates for the Voyage of La Peyrouse; many plates illustrative of the Metamorphoses of Ovid and the Fables and the Kisses of Dorat; and, in conjunction with M. Née, the work entitled Tableaux de la Suisse, consisting of two hundred and sixteen folio prints. He was also the director of the work entitled La Galerie de Florence, and engraved some of the plates. His works possess much merit, and the following are among the best:

The Arrival of Voltaire in the Elysian Fields; after le Barbier. An old Man kneeling near a Skull, called Dio-genes; after G. Douw. A View in Flanders; after Ten-niers; etched by Masquelier, and finished by Le Bas. A Landscape, with Cattle; after P. Potter. A pair of Landscapes; after Ruysdael; by Masquelier and Le Bas. A View in Italy; after Vernet. A Shipwreck; do. Two Views of Ostend; after le May. A Landscape, with a Waterfall; after Dietricy.

MASQUELIER, NICOLAS FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, called the Younger, was a relative and scholar of the preceding. He was born at Lisle in 1760, and died in 1809. He wrought in the style of his instructor, and his prints possess considerable merit. He engraved a number of plates for the Musée Robillard, among which are a Corps-du Garde, after Leduc; Cæsar at the Tomb of Alexander, after S. Bourdon; Extreme Unction, after Jou-venet; and Christ at the Column, after Vouet. He also engraved some of the cameos and bas-reliefs for the Galerie de Florence.

MASSA, D. GIOVANNI, a priest who flourished at Carpi about 1700. Lanzi says he excelled all other artists in works in scagliola, and produced some wonderful specimens of the art in his native city, and the adjunct places of Guastalla, Novel-lara, and elsewhere. He represented distant views, gardens, architectural designs, monuments, and altars, so as to reach the perfection of the art. The most dignified objects in Rome were the subjects he most delighted to introduce into his views, such as the facade of the temple of the Vatican, its colonnade, and its piazza. The Duke of Guastalla took singular pleasure in similar works, and at his desire Massa prepared those two little tables, so much praised by Tiraboschi. Lanzi says "no objects appeared to him more remarkable than such works, abounding in almost every church throughout those parts, and it were to be desired that this plan of representing architectural views should become more frequent." See Del Conte.

MASSARD, JEAN, an eminent French engraver, born at Belesme in 1740. He studied under J. G. Wille, and attained a high reputation. His plates are executed in the neat, finished style of his instructor, and are greatly admired, particularly his plates of the Family of Charles I., and the Beautiful Mother, after Vandyck; the Death of Socrates, after David; also a number of plates after Raffaelle, Domenichino, Cignani, and Rembrandt. Several prints in the Galerie de Florence and the Musée of Filhol are also by him. Mas-sard was chosen a member of the Academy of Painting in the time of Louis XVI., and on the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814 he was appointed engraver to the king. He died in 1822. Nagler mentions a number of his plates, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Family of Charles I.; after Vandyck. Louis XVI. of France, when Dauphin. Marie-Antoinette, his consort. Nicholas de Livri, Bishop of Callinique; after L. Toqué.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Infant; after Vandyck. Abraham and Hagar; do. Eve presenting the forbidden Fruit to Adam; after Cignani. The broken Pitcher; after Greuze. The Benevolent Lady; do.

MASSARD, JEAN BAPTISTE RAPHAEL UR-BAIN, the son and scholar of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1775. He studied design in the school of David. He was an excellent artist, and engraved many plates for the beautiful editions of Virgil and Racine, published by Didot, and some of the plates for the Musée Robillard and Musée Français. Among his most esteemed works are St. Cecilia, after Raffaelle; Apollo and the Muses, after Giulio Romano; Hippocrates refusing the presents of Artaxerxes. He engraved many excellent works, which entitle him to a high rank as an engraver.

MASSARI, LUCIO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1569. He first studied under Bartolomeo Passero-rotti, and afterwards in the great school of the Caracci, at the same time as did Guido and Albano; and with the last named artist he formed a strict and lasting friendship. After leaving the Caracci, he went to Rome to complete his education by the study of the antique, after which he returned to Bologna, where he settled, soon gained an established reputation, and executed some excellent works for the churches and public edifices. His style nearest resembled that of Annibale Caracci, and he copied some of his works to admiration. Lanzi says there also shines in his countenances the spirit of his first master, Passerotti, and frequently the gracefulness of his dear friend Albano, whose society he enjoyed, both in his studio and at his villa, and in works undertaken in conjunction with him. His S. Gaetano at the Tea-tini is crowned with a glory of exquisitely graceful cherubs, that seem from the hand of Albano. In point of beauty, the Noli me Tangere at the Celestini, and the Nuptials of St. Catherine in S. Benedetto, are among his most esteemed pieces, to say nothing of his New Testament Histories at the Cortile of S. Michele in Bosco, where he left many very elegant specimens. Malvasia says his Marriage of St. Catherine in the church of S. Benedetto, Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene in the Celestini, and two altar-pieces in S. Michele in Bosco, are so much in the manner of Annibale Caracci that they might readily be taken for the works of that master. In treating tragic subjects, he was less successful. Lanzi says, "although he had a real knowledge of art, he conducted them without that extreme study of foreshortenings and naked parts of which others make such lavish display. Yet he showed noble clearness and decision, fine coloring, a grand spirit, enlivening them with light and graceful figures. Such is the Slaughter of the Innocents at the Bonfigliuoli palace, and Christ bearing the Cross at the Certosini—a most imposing production, from the number, variety, and expression of the figures, whose pictoric fire surpasses all we could mention from the hand of Albano." Massari also painted cabinet pictures of historical subjects in a style of excellence. He died in 1633.

MASSARO, NICCOLO, a Neapolitan painter, and scholar of Salvator Rosa. According to Domiuici, he painted landscapes in the style of that master, adopting his forms, and the sublime picturesque, more than his coloring, which was tame and insipid. He could not design the human figure well, so he employed Antonio de Simone, a painter of battle-pieces, to insert his figures. Lanzi says he was a good landscape painter. He died in 1704.

MASSAROTTI, ANGELO, a painter of Cremona, born in 1655. He first studied under Agostino Bonisoli, in his native city, and afterwards went to Rome, where he became the scholar of Carlo Cesi. Though he resided many years at Rome, his works partake more of the Cremonese than the Roman school. He had little imagination, and therefore introduced portraits, rather than ideal forms, into his pictures, and by this servile habit, fell somewhat into the faults of a mannerist. His draperies too, are sometimes heavy. Lanzi says "he boasts a more rich and oily coloring than was then prevalent at Rome, which gives his pictures an appearance of freshness and roundness, while it adds to their preservation." He executed some works for the churches, the chief of which is a vast picture in the church of S. Agostino, representing that saint distributing his regulations to his different orders. He died in 1723.

MASSCEUS, or MASSEUS, OTHO. See MARCELLIS.

MASSÉ, CHARLES. See MACÉ.

MASSÉ, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver and miniature painter, born at Paris, according to the Abbé Fontenai, on the 29th Dec., in 1687, and died 26th Sept., 1767; others says 1681, and 1752. Doubtless the first dates are correct. He distinguished himself as an engraver, which procured his admission to the Academy at Paris. He also painted portraits in miniature, with so much success that he made it his principal business. He was a correct designer, and undertook the direction of that great work entitled La grande galerie de Versailles et les deux salons qui l'accompaignent, dessinée par J. B. Massé et gravée par les meilleurs maîtres du tems, Paris, 1752. This work consists of fifty-two immense plates, after the great works of le Brun, in the Royal Gallery at Versailles. Among others, he engraved the following plates:

Mary de Medieis, Queen of Henry IV.; a frontispiece to the Luxembourg gallery; after Rubens. The portrait of Anthony Coypel, Painter; after a picture by himself; engraved by Massé for his reception at the Academy. Mercury sent by Venus to dispose Dido in favor of Æneas; after J. Cotellet. Minerva showing the Portrait of Louis XIV.; after Rigaud and Coypel.

MASSÉ, SAMUEL, a French painter, born at Tours in 1671; he went to Paris, where he acquired distinction as a miniature painter, and died in 1753.

MASSEI, GIROLAMO, a painter of Lucca, who, according to Bagliani, flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., where he executed many works for the churches and public edifices, among which the most noted are an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church of S. Luigi de Francesi, and several pictures representing the life and miracles of St. Francis in the Trinità de Monti. He was a correct designer, and an excellent colorist. Lanzi says he was one of the artists who reflected a ray of honor on the age when the art had much declined from its former glory at Rome. No better proof can be required, than the fact that the Padre Ignazio Danti, an eminent designer and connoisseur, who had been selected by the pope as a fit person to conduct the works then going on at the Vatican, that the best talent should be secured without favoritism, chose him as one of the artists to execute the works; and he was employed several years in decorating the chambers and loggie of the Vatican. He returned to his native place in his old age, to die in tranquillity among his friends, and his death happened in the pontificate of Paul V., at the age of eighty.

MASSI, D. ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter and priest, who, according to Colucci, flourished at Bologna about 1580, and executed some works for the churches. None of his works are specified, but he was a reputable artist.

MASSI, G., an Italian engraver, of whom little is known. Mr. Stuart mentions a portrait of Cardinal Alaman Salviati, after P. Nelli, by him, dated 1730.

MASSINI, C., an engraver, and probably painter, by whom there are some slight etchings executed in a free, painter-like style, without date.

MASSON, FRANÇOIS, a French sculptor, born at Vieille Lyre, in Normandy, in 1745. He learned the elements of design from a priest, and manifested such fine talents, that his elder brother placed him under Cousin, a sculptor of Pont Audemer, who had studied under Nicolas Conston. Masson made rapid progress, and executed two excellent medallion portraits of Marshal Broglie, and his brother, the Bishop of Noyon, which gained him the patronage of this family, who sent him to Paris to study under Guillaume Conston. At the termination of four years, Masson was commissioned by the Bishop of Noyon to execute a fountain for the Palace de l'Évêché. In two years it was completed, and pleased the prelate so highly, that he sent Masson to Italy, and maintained him at Rome for five years. By studying the noble remains of antiquity, he greatly improved his style, and on returning to France, was commissioned by Marshal Broglie to decorate the government palace at Metz, where he executed among other works, an immense bas-relief, forty-two feet in length, with figures of colossal size. When the revolution broke out, public works being suspended, Masson devoted his energies to executing portraits in plaster and in marble, characterized by truth of resemblance, admirable expression, and careful execution. He executed the bust of Dufresne, from memory, after death, and produced an excellent likeness. Among his other works, was a group of Hector tied to the Car of Achilles, exhibited in 1792; a monument to Jean Jacques Rousseau, formerly in the garden of the Tuileries, but subsequently removed to the Luxembourg; the statue of General Caffarelli, executed in 1805; and a very beautiful statue representing Flora, or Youth, which was greatly admired, and after his death, was purchased by the government. Masson died in 1807.

MASSON, ANTOINE, an eminent French engraver, born near Orleans in 1636; died at Paris in 1700. He was bred to the business of an armorer, and first exercised the burin by engraving ornaments on steel. He visited Paris while young, and settled in that city, where he assiduously devoted his energies to drawing, and gained considerable distinction in designing and painting portraits. As an engraver, however, he gained much greater eminence, and some of his portraits have scarcely been surpassed. His plates are executed almost entirely with the graver, which he handled with surprising firmness and facility, and at the same time with the greatest delicacy. Among his historical plates, that of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, after Titian, usually called The Table Cloth, may be considered a master-piece in that style. His portrait of Brisacier, termed the Gray-headed Man, is a most admirable work. The following is a list of his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Anne of Austria, Queen of France; after P. Mignard. Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France; after N. Mignard. Maria Anne Victoria of Bavaria, Dauphiness. Louis Augustus, Duke du Maine, ad virum, sc. John James de Mesmes, Count d'Avaux. 1683. Francis de Beauvilliers, Duke de St. Aignan. Francis Rouxel de Medavi, Archbishop of Rouen. 1677. Maria de Lorraine, Duchess de Guise; after N. Mignard. The Count D'Harcourt, called the Cadet de la perle; after N. Mignard; extremely fine. Nicholas de Lamoignon, Count de Courson. 1676. Jerome Bignon, Librarian to the King. 1686. Denis Marin, Secretary to the King. 1672. Louis Verjus, Count de Creey. 1679. Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg. 1683; scarce. Guido Patin, Med. Doct.; engraved in a singular style; rare. Charles Patin, his son, M. D. Francis Maria, Doge of Genoa. 1685. Haradouin de Beaumont, Archbishop of Paris; after N. Mignard. Emanuel Theodore, Duke d'Albert; do. Gaspar Charrier, Secretary to the King; after Blanchet. Alexander du Puy, Marquis of St. André; after de Seve. Louis, Duke de Vendome; after P. Mignard. G. de Brisacier, Secretary to the Queen, called the Grey-headed Man; very fine. Olivier le Fevre d'Ormesson, President of the Parliament. 1668; very fine. Peter Dupuis, Painter to the King; after N. Mignard. Anthony Masson, engraver to the King; se ipse fecit.

The following heads, as large as life, though finely engraved, are less happy in the execution than the preceding portraits:

Louis XIV. with a Hat; ad virum fecit. 1687. Louis XIV.; a large oval; after C. le Brun. Louis the Dauphin, his son, with a Hat. Philip, Duke of Orleans. John Baptist Colbert, Prime Minister. 1677. Francis de Harley, Archbishop of Paris. 1684. Claude du Housset. 1681. Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de Turenne.—Nicholas Potier de Novion, President of the Parliament. 1679. William de Lamoignon, President of the Parliament. 1675. Charles Colbert, Marquis de Croissi; after H. Gascar.

SUBJECTS.

St. Jerome in Meditation; Masson, sc. The Holy Family; after N. Mignard. Christ with the Pilgrims at Emmaus; after Titian. This print is celebrated by the name of the Table-cloth; very fine. The Assumption of the Virgin; after Rubens; fine and scarce. The Brazen Serpent; do.; in two sheets; fine.

MASSON, MAGDALENE, a French lady, the daughter of Antoine Masson, was born at Paris about 1660. She studied under her father, and engraved several fine portraits, of life size, in the style of that master. Among them are the following:

Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans; Mad. Masson, sc. Elizabeth of Orleans, Duchess of Alençon; after P. Mignard. Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France; after Habert. Elizabeth Maria Josephine, Infanta of Spain. Victor Amedeus II., Duke of Savoy. Louis Henry de Gondrin de Montespan; after a picture by A. Masson.

MASSONE, GIOVANNI, a native of Alessandria, who painted in the church erected by pope Sextus IV., at Savona, about 1490, for the sepulture of his family. Little is known of him. Lanzi says that, although not mentioned in history, he must have been a distinguished artist to have received such a commission. The picture referred to is a small altar-piece, representing the Virgin, with pope Sextus, and Cardinal Giuliano his nephew, afterwards pope Julius II., kneeling at her feet. It is exquisitely executed, and the artist received 192 gold ducats for his labor.

MASTELLETTA, IL. See DONDUCCI.

MASTROLEO, GIUSEPPE, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, was born about 1744, and studied under Paolo de' Matteis, and was his ablest scholar. He painted some works for the churches, and his master-piece is a picture of St. Erasmus, in the church of S. Maria Nuova, which is highly commended. Time of his death not recorded.

MASTURZO, MARZIO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, first studied under Falcone; and afterwards, Salvator Rosa at Rome, and was one of his ablest scholars. He painted battle-pieces and landscapes in the style of Rosa. Lanzi says he is sometimes rather crude in his figures, rocks, and trunks of trees. His flesh tints are not painted like those of Rosa, as in those he followed Giuseppe Ribera.

MASUCCI, AGOSTINO, a painter, born at Rome in 1691. He studied under Carlo Maratti, and was the last pupil instructed by him. He painted Holy Families, pictures of the Virgin, Madonnas, &c., in the serene and dignified style of his master, rather than one of affability and loveliness, though he sometimes adopted the latter, through intercession. Lanzi says he was a good fresco painter, and decorated an apartment in a summer house erected in the garden of the Quirinal by pope Benedict XIV. He painted many altar-pieces for the churches, and his angels and children are designed with great elegance and taste. His most celebrated works at Rome are a picture of St. Anna, in the church of Il Nome S. S. di Maria, and the Holy Family, in S. Maria Maggiore. There is also an admirable picture of St. Francis in the church of the Osservanti, at Macerata, and one of the Conception in S. Benedetto, at Urbino, which he pronounced "a noble composition, full of fine portraits, (in which he was long considered the most celebrated painter in Rome) and finished with exquisite care. He died in 1758.

MASUCCI, LORENZO, was the son and scholar of the preceding. He painted in the style of his father, but did not possess his merits, nor acquire much distinction.

MASUCCIO, an old Neapolitan architect and sculptor, born in 1230. According to Milizia, he completed the Castel Nuova, and S. Maria della Nuova, commenced by Giovanni da Pisa. He erected the archiepiscopal palace in the Gothic style; but evinced an improved taste in the church of S. Domenico Maggiore; and a still better style in S. Giovanni Maggiore. Among the palaces erected by Masuccio, is that now in the possession of the Princess of Colombrano.

MASUCCIO, STEFANO, called IL SECONDO, an Italian sculptor and architect, the scholar of the preceding, born at Naples in 1291. He visited Rome, and studied the monuments of antiquity, attaining a purity of style greatly surpassing his instructor. King Robert, of Naples, recalled him to that city, to erect the church of Santa Chiara; but being prevented from immediately complying, the edifice was commenced in the Gothic style, which is greatly to be regretted. One of his pupils, Giacomo de' Sanctis, commenced the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, in the same manner, but Masuccio corrected its defects, as far as possible. He erected the church and monastery della Croce de' Palazzo; the magnificent Carthusian monastery of San Martino; and the Castle of San Elmo. Masuccio completed the church of S. Lorenzo, which had been commenced by his instructor; erected the church of S. Giovanni at Carbonaro, and sculptured a number of tombs for that edifice. The bell-tower of Santa Chiara, is his work, and was intended as a specimen of the five orders of architecture, with five stories; the first, Tuscan; the second, Doric; the third, Ionic; the fourth, Corinthian; the fifth Composite. Unfortunately, this grand tower was only erected to the third story. Masuccio died in 1388.

M excud. or M. MATHAM, JAMES, or JACOB, an eminent Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem in 1571. He studied under Henry Goltzius, married his daughter, and by his advice, went to Italy for improvement, where he resided some time, and executed some plates after the best masters. On his return to Holland, he executed a great variety and number of plates under the eye of Goltzius. He worked entirely with the graver, which he handled with great freedom and facility, though his design is somewhat incorrect. He sometimes marked his plates with the above monogram, of his initials, I. M. A., and at others, with his name. He died in 1631. The following is a list of his best plates, some of which are scarce and valuable:

PORTRAITS.

Philip William, Prince of Orange; after M. Mirevelt. Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange. 1610. Bust of Philip Winghius, inscribed Henricus Goltzius Amicitia ergo delineabat Romæ. Michel Angelus, Buonarotus. Abraham Bloemaert; after Paul Moreelze.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Bloemaert.* The Annunciation; do. The Adoration of the Shepherds; do. Jupiter and Danaë; do. Cupid and Psyche; do. Samson and Dalilah; after Rubens. The dead Christ, with the Marys; after Jer. Franck. The Crucifixion; after Albert Durer; scarce. Venus asleep, surprised by Satyrs; after Rottenhamer. A set of five prints of Fruit-pieces, and the Interiors of Kitchens; after Peter van Aertsen, called Long Peter; scarce.

MATHAM, THEODORE, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Haerlem, according to Nagler, in 1589, others say about 1600. After engraving a few plates at home, he went to Italy, and entered the school of Cornelius Bloemaert; and afterwards, in conjunction with Michael Natalis, Renier de Persyn, and others, he engraved the marbles in the Palazzo Giustiniani. On his return to his native city, he engraved a considerable number of plates, executed with the graver, occasionally assisted with the point, in a clear, free style. He usually marked his plates T. M. fecit, or sculpsit. The following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

Michael le Blon, Agent to the Crown of Sweden; after Vanduyck. Joost van de Vondel, Dutch Poet; after Sandrart. Vopiscus Fortunatus Plempius, Med. Doct.; after Backer. D. The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after Bassano. The Holy Family; after J. Sandrart. Diana and Acteon; Th. Matham, fec. The Descent from the Cross, with the Marys, St. John, and Joseph of Arimathea; after Gerardus Leydanus; fine.

MATHAM, ADRIAN, is supposed to have been the second son of James M., born at Haerlem about 1600. He studied with his father, and engraved part of the plates for the Academie de l'Espée, published at Antwerp in 1628. He also engraved some portraits, and a few plates of grotesque subjects. He worked entirely with the graver, in a style resembling that of J. de Gheyn the Elder, though much inferior to that artist. There is a good deal of discrepancy among Italian authors about these artists. Zani says that James M. had three sons; Jan, the eldest, a portrait painter; Adrian, the second, and Theodore, the third, both engravers. Lanzi says that Theodore Matham, a native of Haerlem, was a portrait painter, and that he was employed at the court of Turin towards the close of the 16th century. The following are Adrian's best prints:

PORTRAITS.

James Graham, Marquis of Montrose. Peter Bor

Christiaensz, Historian; after F. Hals. D. Sibrandus Sixtius Oistervirius; after N. Moyaert.

SUBJECTS.

The Golden Age; after H. Goltzius. 1620. An old Man caressing a Woman, to whom he presents his Purse; do. Two Beggars, the Man playing on a Viol, the Woman singing; after A. vander Venne. A Combat of six grotesque Figures; do.

MATHEUS, a French designer and engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1620. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and engraved some frontispieces and other book ornaments, in a neat, finished style, which possess considerable merit. They are mostly after his own designs. Among others, are the following by him :

The Adoration of the Magi; from his own designs. The Frontispiece to a General History of France: published at Paris in 1619. A Frontispiece to the Works of Thomas Aquinas. 1622. Another Frontispiece to Amours d'Endimion et de la Lune. 1624.

MATHEY, C., an English engraver of no note, by whom there is a portrait of Arcangelo Corelli, the Musician, after Howard.

MATHIEU, or MATTHIEU, PIERRE, a French painter, born at Dijon in 1657. He went to Paris, where he acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, but his works are now little known or valued. He died at Paris in 1719.

MATHYSSENS, ABRAHAM, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1570. According to Descamps, he painted landscapes and history with reputation, and executed some works for the churches. In the cathedral at Antwerp, is a picture of the Death of the Virgin by him, and an altar-piece, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. Francis, in the church of the Recollets. He died at Antwerp in 1619.

MATHIAS, GABRIEL, an English painter, born about 1725. He went to Rome to complete his studies, and on his return to London practised the profession for some time, and for several years contributed to the Exhibition in the Strand. One of his pictures exhibited in 1761, representing a Sailor splicing a Rope, was engraved by Mac Ardell. Through the influence of his brother, Vincent M., a gentleman of distinction at court, he got an office in the royal household, when he abandoned painting. He was afterwards appointed deputy paymaster in the Board of Works, and died at Acton in 1804.

MATON, B., a Dutch painter of whom little is known, except that he was a copyist and imitator of Gerard Douw and William Mieris. He was very successful in copying the candle-light pieces of Douw, giving them great force and brilliancy, but less finish than the originals. His pictures are of small size, and painted on panel. They are found in the best collections in Holland, sometimes with his name, but generally where his pictures have changed hands, his name has been erased, and that of the painter imitated often substituted.

MATSYS, METSYS, or MESSIS, QUINTIN, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1450, and died there in 1529. Authors vary as to the minutiae of this artist's life, the truth of which is mixed up with a good deal of fiction and romance. Suffice it to say, here, that he was bred up to the trade of a blacksmith, or farrier, which business he followed till he was in his twentieth year. It is not known with certainty what caused him to abandon his devotion to Vulcan, and become a humble worshipper at the shrine of the Muses. Some say that the sight of some prints, others that his copying some prints for his amusement while confined by sickness, lit up the latent fire; and others that the ardent passion he bore for a blue-eyed lass whose cruel father, an artist, refused her hand to any one but a painter, inspired him. This last supposition is probably nearest the truth, as it is known that he married the daughter of an artist. This account of his conversion to art seems to be confirmed by the verses of Lampsonius, affixed to Matsys' portrait engraved by Jerome Cock; and by the inscription on his monument in the Cathedral at Antwerp, Connubialis amor de Mulcibre fecit Apellem. It is not known under whom he studied, or whether he had any instructor, but it is highly probable, from the above account, that his intimacy with an artist's family first directed his attention to art, and that he received instruction from the artist whose daughter he married. At all events he possessed uncommon talents and genius, and became one of the most eminent artists of his time, in the dry, minute style prevalent at that period in his country; and it is believed that, had he enjoyed the advantages of travel in Italy, to study the antique and the works of the great masters, he would have become one of the most distinguished painters of the Flemish school. His manner was peculiar, and unlike that of any other master; and his pictures are strongly colored and highly finished, though somewhat hard and dry. One of his most considerable works is an altar-piece with two folding doors, in the chapel of the Circumcision in the Cathedral at Antwerp. The centre picture represents the Dead Christ on the knees of the Virgin, with Mary Magdalene and other saints. On one of the doors is the Daughter of Herodias with the Head of the Baptist, and on the other St. John in the cauldron of boiling oil. Sir Joshua Reynolds thus describes this curious performance: "In the Pieta the Christ appears starved to death, in which manner it was the custom of the painters of that age always to represent a dead Christ; but there are heads in this picture not exceeded by Raffaele, and indeed not unlike his manner of painting portraits, hard and minutely finished. The head of Herod, and that of a fat man near the Christ, are excellent. The painter's own portrait is here introduced. In the Banquet, the daughter is rather beautiful, but too skinny and lean." One of his most remarkable pictures, the Two Misers, is in the royal collection at Windsor, but there are others of the same subject, in other collections. Matsys was also a medalist; his most celebrated work of the kind is a medallion bust of Erasmus. There are some curious iron vessels at Antwerp, Arschot, and in England, attributed to him; probably they were executed by some other person from his designs. His works, about seventy in number, are widely scattered in the different collections in Europe, highly prized and much sought after for their unique character.

MATSYS, JOHN, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Antwerp about 1480. He painted in the manner of his father, though he is said to be greatly inferior to him. Some of his best works are in the collections at Antwerp and Amsterdam. Van Mander mentions one of two Old Men counting Money, which favorably compares with his father's works. Some of his pictures are certainly wrongly attributed to his father, so that it is evident that historians and connoisseurs differ as to his real merits.

MATSYS, or METENSIS, CORNELIUS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about the middle of the 16th century. He executed a large number of plates, generally after his own designs, executed in a style somewhat resembling that of Francis de Babylone. Nagler gives a list of eighty-three prints by him. It is supposed he visited Italy, from the manner of his design and some of the subjects he engraved. It was a long time supposed that prints with this monogram were by two different engravers, the first by Matsys and the second by Metensis, but connoisseurs now consider them to be by one and the same artist. His prints are sometimes marked with one of his monograms, and at others with his name in full or its contractions, as Cornelius Matsys or Metensis fecit, or Corn. or Cornel. Met. fec. Among others, the following are attributed to him:

AD or MA or ME or MA

The Portrait of Ernest, Count de Mansfield, and his wife Dorothea. The Cardinal Virtues. Portrait of Henry, King of England, with the date 1544. The Death of Cleopatra. 1550. An old Man, with two old Women, one of whom holds a Basket of Eggs. 1549. Judith with the Head of Holofernes. 1539. A Battle; after G. Penz. The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth; after Raffaele, Corn. Met. The Miraculous Draught of Fishes; do.; Cornel. Met. fec. The Entombing of Christ; after an etching by Parmiggiano. A set of Prints from the Old Testament; on some of these he has put one of the above monograms, and also signed his name at length, Cornelius Matsys, fecit. They are dated 1549 and 1550.

MATTEIS, PAOLO DE. a Neapolitan painter, born in 1662, and died in 1728. According to Dominici, he studied under Luca Giordano, and was his most celebrated scholar. But Pascoli reckons him among the best scholars of Morandi, an artist who might vie with the first of his age. He probably studied first under Morandi, but his works partake more of the manner of Giordano. He acquired distinction; was invited to Paris, where he resided three years, and obtained considerable celebrity at the French court. He was next engaged by Pope Benedict XIII. to come to Rome, where he painted at the Minerva and the Ara Cœli. He was also employed in various other cities, particularly at Genoa, where there are two fine pictures by him in the church of S. Girolamo, one of which represents that Saint appearing to St. Saverio in a dream, and the other the Immaculate Conception, with a Choir of Angels, which Lanzi characterizes as an admirable production, "with figures as graceful as ever were painted." His principal residence was at Naples, where he distinguished himself by numerous works in the churches and public edifices. Lanzi says "he there decorated with his frescos the churches, galleries, halls, and ceilings in great numbers, after reaching the celebrity without attaining the merit of his master (Giordano). It was his boast to have painted in sixty-six days the immense cupola of the Gesu Nuovo, (a few years since taken down in consequence of its dangerous state); a boast which, when Solimena heard, he sarcastically replied that the work declared the fact itself without his mentioning it. Nevertheless, there were so many beauties in it, in the style of Lanfranco, that its rapid execution excited universal admiration.—When he worked with care, as in the Pii Operai, and in the Matalona Gallery, and in many pictures for individuals, he left nothing to desire in his compositions, in the grace of his contours, and in the beauty of his countenances, though there is little variety in the latter, or in any of the other estimable qualities of a painter. His coloring was at first Giordanesque; afterwards he painted with more force of chiaro-scuro, but with a softness and delicacy of tint, particularly in his Madonnas and Children, in which he sometimes displays the sweetness of Albano, and a trace of the Roman school, in which he had also studied."

MATTEUS, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about 1637. Little is known of him. He painted landscapes and animals, and there are a few spirited etchings of landscapes by him, executed in a style resembling that of Herman Swanevelt.

MATTHIEU. See MATHIEU.

MATTHIEU, BALDASSARE, a native of Antwerp, who painted at Turin in 1656, and by whom, according to Lanzi, there is a highly prized Supper of our Lord, in the refectory of the Eremites at Turin.

MATTIOLI, LODOVICO, a Bolognese engraver, born in 1662. He first learned design in the school of Carlo Cignani, with the intention of becoming a painter; but having made some essays at etching, he showed so much talent that, by the advice of his master and others, he directed his attention to engraving. He executed a large number of spirited etchings, after the best Bolognese masters, as well as some from his own designs. Bartsch and others mention upwards of one hundred and sixty prints by him. Among others are the following:

The Annunciation; after Lod. Caracci; scarce. The Circumcision; do. The Nativity; after Agos. Caracci. Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after An. Caracci. The Death of St. Joseph; after Franceschini. The Presentation in the Temple; after G. M. Crespi. The Martyrdom of St. Peter; do.

MATTIOLI, GIROLAMO, a Bolognese painter of the school of the Caracci, who flourished about 1577. He executed some works for private houses of Bologna, particularly for the noble family of Zani. He is highly commended by Malvasia as an artist, enthusiastic in his profession, and of good abilities, but he died young.

MATURINO, an eminent Florentine painter, born in 1490. He was one of the favorite scholars of Raffaele, and assisted him in decorating the Loggie of the Vatican. He was the intimate friend and partner of Polidoro da Caravaggio, with whom he applied himself diligently in studying the antique bassi-relievi, and other relics of Grecian sculpture, and became one of the most correct and graceful designers of his time. Lanzi says that he, in conjunction with Polidoro, "filled Rome with the richest friezes, façades, and ornaments over doors," most of which have perished from exposure. One of the most celebrated of their united works is the fable of Niobe and her Children, in the Maschera d'Oro at Rome, which Lanzi says "has suffered less than any other of their works from the ravages of time and the hand of the barbarian." Fortunately some of their most beautiful designs have been preserved by the prints of Cherubino Alberti and Santi Bartoli, who engraved them before they perished. Maturino and Polidoro lived together, as inseparable in their affections as their labors; they had the same taste of design, composition, and choice of subjects; and the ideas as well as the handling had so close a resemblance that it seemed impossible to determine the pencil of one from the other in their united performances. No painters could design the ancient manners, customs, arms, vases, statues, &c., better than these artists; and though they borrowed their hints from the most celebrated Grecian sculptors, yet they adopted them with so much taste that the antique style appeared wonderfully original in their compositions. The sacking of Rome in 1527 separated the two friends, and Maturino died soon after of the plague, as it is said, aged 37 years; which makes his death to happen in the same year.

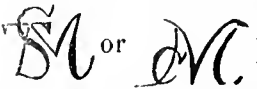

MAUBERT, JAMES, supposed to be a French painter, who, according to Lord Orford, went over to England in the reign of George I. He distinguished himself not only by taking the portraits of the living English poets, as Dryden, but by copying those of all the dead ones he could find. He died in 1746.

MAUCOURT, CHARLES, a French mezzotint engraver, born at Paris about 1743. He went to London and executed some prints, among which is one of the Expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain, after his own design, and signed with his name. He died at London in 1768.

MAUPERCHE, HENRI, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1606. He acquired considerable reputation as a painter, decorated several apartments in the palace at Fontainebleau with frescos, and was admitted into the Academy at Paris in 1655. He also painted landscapes, and etched a considerable number of plates after his own designs, and Swanvelt. Dumesnil enumerates fifty-one prints by him, many of which he says have become scarce, on account of the extreme lightness of his point, which he did not strengthen by the aid of the graver. The following are the principal. He died in 1686.

A set of six plates of the History of Tobit. A set of six plates of the History of the Virgin, from the Annunciation till the Flight into Egypt. Twelve Landscapes; after Hermann Swanvelt. Two plates of the Prodigal Son. Four Landscapes, with Figures and Ruins.

MAURER, JOSHUA, a Swiss painter in distemper, and more especially on glass, who flourished at Zurich in the middle of the 16th century. Little is known of him, though he is said to have been an artist of considerable genius.

 MAURER, CHRISTOPHER, was the son of the preceding, born at Zurich, in 1558. He was instructed in design by his father, and he afterwards went to Strasburg, and studied under Tobias Stimmer, a fresco painter and wood engraver of distinction. He painted in distemper and on glass with reputation, but he distinguished himself more as an engraver on wood and copper. In conjunction with Stimmer, he published a set of animals of the chase. He executed a set of wooden cuts for the Bible, which are admired for their neatness. He also etched a set of forty plates of emblems, which were published after his death, entitled Emblemata miscel. nova, &c. Zurich, 1622. He sometimes marked his prints with the above monogram. He died at Zurich in 1614.

MAURER, J., a Swiss engraver, who went to England about 1745. He engraved some views of buildings in London, which are neatly executed with the graver.

MAYER, M<sup>lle</sup>. CONSTANCE, a French painter, who acquired considerable distinction by her portraits and fancy subjects, some of which appeared in the annual exhibitions at the Louvre, from 1800 to 1821. She is said to have had the advantage of instruction from Suvée, Greuze, and Prud'hon. Among her most popular works were, Venus and Cupid asleep, caressed by the Zephyrs; the Torch of Venus; Innocence between Love and Riches; the Happy Mother; a young Naiad repelling a troop of Lovers; a Dream of Happiness, &c.

MAYNO, GIULIO, a Piedmontese painter, who, according to Lanzi, was a native of Asti, and flourished at Turin from 1608 to 1627. He was a reputable artist.

MAYNO, JUAN BAPTISTA, a Spanish painter, born at Toledo in 1594. He studied under Domenico dalle Greche Teoscopoli, under whose able instruction he became an eminent artist. He joined the Monks of the order of Predicadores, or as others say, of St. Dominici, at a very youthful period, but this did not preclude the exercise of his genius, and he was reputed one of the ablest artists of his time and country. In the convent of San Pedro, at Toledo, there are four of his most esteemed works, viz., the Nativity, the Resurrection, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Mystery of the Trinity, and in the church of the same Order a fine picture, representing the Repentance of St. Peter. He had the honor of being drawing master to Philip IV., and also instructed him in painting, of which that monarch was a true lover and quite a proficient in the art. Philip also employed Mayno to paint a battle-piece in his palace, the Bueno Retiro, a grand composition, in which he introduced the Duke d' Olivarez animating his troops to victory by showing them a portrait of their king. He died at Toledo in 1654. Stanley says he was born in 1569, and died in 1649, at the age of 80, but he does not cite his authority.

MAZO. See VERMEYEN.

MAZO, DON JUAN BAPTISTA, OR DEL MAZO MARTINEZ, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1620. He studied in the school of Velasquez, whose daughter he married. According to Palomino, he was a general artist, and excelled equally in history, landscape, and portraits. He possessed an extraordinary talent for copying the works of the most eminent masters. Philip IV. employed him to copy the best works of the Venetian masters, particularly of Titian, Veronese, and Tintoretto, in the royal collection, which he performed with such surprising correctness in every particular that it was impossible to distinguish them from the originals. His landscapes are usually of a large size, and are considered by his countrymen as works of the highest merit. He died Feb. 10, 1687, according to the inscription on his monument, and not as Palomino says, in 1670.

MAZOT, an obscure engraver of little note, by whom there are some indifferent portraits, and among them one of Christian IV., King of Denmark.

MAZZA, DAMIANO, a painter of Padua, who studied under Titian, whose style he imitated with great precision. Lanzi says he painted a few pictures for the churches in Venice, executed in the manner of Titian, with striking power and relief, if not with much delicacy of hand. He died soon after his return to Padua, in the flower of life, and the only work he left there was a picture of Gany-mede borne away by the Eagle, in the Casa Sonica, a work of such exquisite beauty that it was attributed to Titian, and removed from the place.

MAZZANTI, CAV. LODOVICO, an Italian painter, born at Orvieto in 1674. He studied under Gio. Battista Gaulli, called Bacciccio, and followed the style of that master. His reputation gained him an invitation to Naples, where he is said to have painted a number of pictures in concert with Solimena. According to Ratti, he attained sufficient distinction to be honored with the order of knighthood. He visited Rome, and painted many pictures, both in oil and in fresco, particularly in the church of S. Ignazio. Lanzi says that his talents were not commanding, and that his abilities were inferior to his ambition. He died at Viterbo in 1766.

MAZZAFORTE, M. PIETRO DA, an old painter who flourished at Foligno about 1460. Lanzi says that in the church of S. Francesco di Cagli, there exists a most beautiful composition, painted by Pietro da Mazzaforte and Niccolo Deliberatore in 1461, for which they received one hundred and fifteen gold ducats.

MAZZAROPPI, MARCO, a Neapolitan painter commended by Dominici, who was a native of S. Germano, and flourished at Naples from 1590 to the time of his death, in 1620. He painted landscapes and figures in an animated and natural style, with a pleasing tone of coloring, almost in the Flemish manner.

MAZZELLI, GIOVANNI MARCO, a celebrated worker in scagliola, who flourished at Carpi about 1709. See Guido Fassi.

MAZZI. See MARZI.

MAZZIERI, ANTONIO DI DONNINO, a Florentine painter who flourished about 1520, and was the scholar of Francia Bigio. According to Vasari, he distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes and battle-pieces. He was a man of fruitful invention, a bold designer, and particularly excellent in his horses. His works also possess great vigor and strength of coloring.

MAZZOCCHI, PAOLO. See UCCELLO.

MAZZOLINI, LODOVICO, called MAZZOLINI DI FERRARA, a painter born at Ferrara about 1481, and a student of Lorenzo Costa. There is a great confusion of names among Italian authors as applied to this artist. Lanzi says he must not be confounded with Mazzolino (nosegay), an epithet applied by Lomazzo in his Idea del Tempio della Pittura, to Francesco Mazzuoli, as if in sport. Vasari calls him Malini; another Marzolini; and a third divides him into two painters, Malini and Mazzolini. There is also much discrepancy as to his real merits. Lanzi thus describes his manner, after a careful examination of his best works: "It displays an incredible degree of finish, sometimes appearing in his smallest pictures like miniature; while not only the landscape, but the architecture and the bassi-relievi are most carefully executed. There is a spirit and clearness in his heads to which few of his cotemporaries could attain, though they are wholly taken from life, and not remarkably select; in particular, those of his old men, which in the wrinkles and the nose sometimes border on caricature. The color is of a deep tone, not so soft as that of Ercole da Ferrara, with some gilding, even in the drapery, but sparingly applied." His works are scarce, and highly prized. In the church of S. Francesco at Bologna is one of his altar-pieces, representing Christ disputing with the Doctors; in the Florentine Gallery a small picture of the Virgin and Child, with other saints; some small Histories in the Aldobrandini Gallery at Rome, and others in the Campidoglio. There are two of his pictures in the English National Gallery. He died about 1531.

MAZZONI, CAV. GUIDO, called also PAGANINI, and IL MODANINO, a celebrated painter, sculptor, and architect, highly commended by Vasari, was a native of Modena. Little is said of his works, but he was twenty years in the employment of Charles VIII. of Spain, and returned to his own country with riches and honor, to spend his remaining days.

MAZZONI, CESARE, a Bolognese painter, born in 1678. He studied successively under Lorenzo Pasinelli, and Gio. Giuseppe dal Sole. According to Crespi, he was a commendable artist, and was much employed in painting for the churches, not only at Bologna, but at Faenza, Turin, and Rome. Among his principal works at Bologna, is an altar-piece, in the church of S. Colombano, representing that saint kneeling before the Virgin and Infant; in S. Tommaso di Strada Maggiore, the Crucifixion; and in S. Giovanni, St. Peter delivered from Prison. He died in 1763.

MAZZONI, GIULIO, a painter of Piacenza, who studied at Rome under Daniello di Volterra. Vasari speaks of him in terms of high commendation. His chief work is the Four Evangelists, in the cathedral at Piacenza. Lanzi says he failed to acquire a knowledge of foreshortening, as seen from below, in the school of Daniello, though respectable in every other part. He was living in 1568.

MAZZONI, SEBASTIANO, a Florentine painter and architect, who flourished at Venice about 1685. As a painter, Lanzi says he belonged to the class of naturalists, though he possessed a certain delicacy, and roundness of style, and ease of handling. He was more eminent as an architect, and among other fine buildings, he erected the Palace for the Cavaliere Liberi, which, in magnificence appears to exceed the fortunes of a painter.

MAZZUCHELLI, sometimes miscalled MAZZONI, and MORZONI. See MORAZZONE.

MAZZUOLI, ANNIBALE, a fresco painter, born at Siena, who, according to Della Valle, acquired considerable reputation in his native city, and afterwards in Rome, so that his name was inserted in the Eulogies of Pio. Lanzi says he was rapid in his execution, and possessed but little merit. Most of his works are at Siena. He died in 1743, at an advanced age.

MAZZUOLI, MAZZUOLA, or MAZZOLA,

PIER ILARIO, an old painter of little note, who flourished at Parma about 1533. There are a few of his pictures in the churches at Parma. Lanzi says his real name was Mazzola, and he was the father of Parmiggiano. He had two brothers, Michele, and Filippo, also painters of little note, some of whose works are still to be found at Parma.

MAZZUOLI, FRANCESCO, called IL PARMIGGIANO, from the place of his nativity, was the son of Pier Ilario M., born at Parma in 1503, according to the Padre Affò, who wrote his life. His real name was Mazzola. His father dying while he was very young, his uncles, Filippo and Michele, brought him up, and gave him what instruction they possessed in the art; but to his own genius and his assiduity, he owed his success, without the advantage of superior instruction. At the early age of fourteen, he painted his Baptism of Christ, in the church of the Annunziata, which was the astonishment of artists. Surrounded by the admirable works of Correggio, he made them his model, and at the age of nineteen, he had executed several works for the churches, both in oil and fresco, which raised his reputation to a high rank, and excited the highest expectations of his future career. His earlier works are entirely in the manner of Correggio; but he had too much confidence in his own powers, to servilely imitate the works of any master; therefore he was ambitious to travel to study the works of the best masters, and having painted three small pictures as a sort of introduction abroad, one of which was an exquisite portrait of himself, he set out for Rome, at twenty years of age. He diligently studied the works of the best masters, particularly of Raffaele and Giulio Romano, and formed a style that was pronounced original, and which Lanzi says "is at once great, noble and dignified; not abounding in figures, but rendering a few capable of filling a large canvass; the prevailing character, however, in which he so greatly shone, was grace of manner, a grace which won for him at Rome the most flattering of eulogies, that "the spirit of Raffaele had passed into Parmiggiano." His talents recommended him to the patronage of Clement VII., for whom he painted a picture of the Circumcision, for the palace of the Vatican, which was considered a wonderful performance. It was not only admirable for the composition, coloring, and execution, but remarkable for the introduction of three different lights without destroying the harmony of the whole. The light diffused on the principal figures was from the irradiation of the Infant Jesus; others were illuminated by a torch carried by one who attended the sacrifice; and others again in the open air, were enlightened by the early dawn, which showed a lovely landscape with villas. When Rome was sacked in 1527, by the Emperor Charles V., the story of Protogenes of Rhodes, in similar circumstances, is repeated as having happened to this artist; at all events, he soon fled for safety to Bologna, where he executed some altar-pieces for the churches, among which was his celebrated picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. John, St. Margaret, and St. Jerome, in S. Margherita, that was the study and admiration of the Caracci, and was preferred by Guido to the St. Cecilia of Raffaele. The French connoisseurs also selected this picture as one of the gems of Bologna, to grace the gallery of the Louvre. In the church of S. Petronio, is another grand picture of St. Rocco, a noble and dignified performance. At Bologna also, he executed many of his choicest easel pictures. On his return to his native city, he was engaged to decorate the vaulted ceilings of la Madonna della Steccata, where he represented Adam and Eve, some of the Virtues, and his famed chiaro-scuro of Moses breaking the Tables of the Law, in which work the sublimity of the ideas, and the great style of the design, render it one of the grandest productions of the Lombard school. Unfortunately for his reputation, this great artist was addicted to that fatal delusion of the times, alchymy; he wasted his substance and his health, in the absurd pursuit of the philosopher's stone. This infatuation occasioned him to neglect, and finally to abandon the important works he was engaged to perform in the Steccata; and as he had been paid in advance, he was prosecuted and imprisoned by the confraternity. He was released on condition of his proceeding with the work, but offended or disgusted with the treatment he had received, he fled to Casale Maggiore, where he died of a fever, brought on by disappointment and chagrin, in 1540, at the age of thirty-seven years. There is a great contrariety of opinion as to the merits of Parmiggiano, much of which had its origin in enmity, and by taking a single picture, instead of several works as a standard of just criticism. It is, however, conceded by connoisseurs, that he had a truly fine and admirable genius, that his invention was ready, his design learned, though at times somewhat mannered, and that he had a peculiar talent in giving beauty, elegance, sweetness, and grace, to his figures. His coloring was excellent; some have called it enchanting; Lanzi says "it was moderate, discreet, and as well tempered as if the artist feared that too much brilliancy would offend the eye and diminish grace." He was a perfect master of chiaro-scuro. His carnations receive a remarkable lustre from the yellow and green draperies which he frequently used; his cherubs and angels are so exquisitely designed and executed, as to appear truly celestial. His attitudes are always chosen so as to show the most beautiful parts, and they are so judicious as to give life and motion to his figures. His outline is true and firm, and the light, easy flow of his draperies, gives an inexpressible beauty to his pictures. Lanzi says "he was accustomed to form the whole piece in idea before he once handled the pencil; though he was rapid in his execution. Strokes of his pencil may sometimes be traced so very daring and decided, that Albano pronounces them divine, and declares that to his experience in design, he was indebted for that unequalled skill which he always united to great diligence and high finish." Lanzi says too, that, if we admit Albano as a good judge, Parmiggiano was not very studious of expression, unless, indeed, we consider the grace which animates his characters and other delicate figures as meriting the name of expression; yet in another place he says that several of his works are conducted with so much feeling and enthusiasm as to have been ascribed to Correggio himself; such were his pictures of Cupid fabricating his bow, with two cherubs at his feet, one weeping, and the other laughing; and Ganymede and Leda, which were positively assigned by Boschini to Correggio, and still countenanced by many persons. Mengs and Algarotti accused him of being sometimes guilty of affectation, and of carrying his grace so far as to make his heads border upon effeminacy. Agostino Caracci too, said that "a painter should have a little of Parmiggiano's grace", not all, because he conceived he had too much. According to the opinion of others, his excessive study of what was graceful, led him sometimes to select proportions somewhat too long, in stature, in the fingers, and the neck. This is the case with his celebrated picture in the Pitti Palace, called la Madonna collo lungo, or long neck; but he might have pleaded the example of the ancients, who, in their draped statues, observed similar proportions, to avoid falling into vulgarity. The length of the figures was also a subject of praise among the ancients, as noticed in the commentators of Catullus. A long neck in virgins is also inculcated by some modern writers; Malvasia lays it down as a precept of art; and Cav. Lazzarini drew his Madonnas according to this rule. Parmiggiano, notwithstanding the shortness of his life, executed many works, which are to be found in the royal and noble collections of Europe. Some of his more favorite subjects he repeated several times, as his Cupid fabricating his Bow; his Holy Families and Madonnas, frequently somewhat varied. He also excelled in portraits.

Parmiggiano also distinguished himself as an engraver. It was claimed by his countrymen that he was the inventor of etching, but this art was practised in Germany by Durer and others long before his time; yet he has the merit to be considered the first artist who employed the point in Italy. This is rendered very probable from the appearance of his earliest prints, which show that he did not thoroughly understand the mechanical part of the process, such as laying the ground, and the use of acids; for those plates not being well corroded, are retouched with the graver without much delicacy of execution, while his later ones are clear and perfect, and every way superior. It was also said that he engraved on wood, but it is now well known that the wooden cuts formerly attributed to him, were executed after his designs, by Ugo da Carpi, Andrea Andreani, Antonio da Trento, and others. Some of the etchings marked F. P., attributed to him, are supposed to have been executed by cotemporary artists.—(See Meldolla.) Bartsch gives a description of only fifteen prints, which he considers genuine, and of twenty-six more, marked F. P., which, with others, given to this artist, he considers to have been executed by others, after his designs:

List of prints by Parmiggiano, as given by Bartsch.

1. Judith holding the Head of Holofernes and the Sword, &c.
2. The Annunciation, with the Holy Spirit descending, &c.
3. The Nativity. The Virgin seated and covering the Infant.
4. The Holy Virgin holding the Infant in her Arms.
5. The Entombment of Jesus Christ.
6. The Resurrection of Christ.
7. St. Peter and St. John curing the Lame Man at the Temple Gate.
8. St. James the Great.
9. St. Philip.
10. St. Thais, or some other holy recluse.
11. Love Asleep.
12. A Shepherd standing, supporting himself with a Stiek.
13. A young Man and two old Men.
14. The two Lovers.

15. The Astrologer.

Of these, No. 9, St. Philip, is not by Parmiggiano; Bartsch himself describes it among the prints of Guido; neither is the print of the Astrologer, No. 15, by this master. There are two other prints by Parmiggiano which were unknown to Bartsch; a Judith, and the Study of an Arm.

MAZZUOLI, GIROLAMO, was the son of Michele M., and the cousin and scholar of Parmiggiano, whose graceful style he followed. He did not accompany Francesco to Rome, but continued to reside at Parma, where he made the works of Correggio his model, and executed many excellent works for the churches and convents, both in oil and fresco. Lanzi says "he was more attached to the school of Correggio than Francesco was, and in his style composed his picture of the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of the Carmine; a piece full of the characteristics of that great master. He was also excellent in perspective, and in his picture of the Supper of our Lord, painted for the Refectory of S. Giovanni, he represented a colonnade so beautifully and so well adapted to produce illusion, as to compete with the best specimens from the hand of Pozzo. He could, moreover, boast ease and harmony, with a fine chiaro-scuro, while in his larger compositions in fresco, he was inventive, varied, and animated." Girolamo also executed some works for the churches at Mantua and Pavia, though he wrought mostly in his native city, where he executed more works for the churches than any other native artist. He also painted many easel pictures; and it is believed that some of the works attributed to Parmiggiano, were executed by him, especially those displaying warmer and stronger tints, than those usually employed by that master, for Girolamo was remarkable for his strong impasto, and few equalled him in his knowledge of coloring. This is rendered still farther probable by the early death of Parmiggiano, the numerous works attributed to him, and the great age attained by Girolamo, (he was living in 1580) his industrious life, and the few oil paintings now given to him. He also finished some of the works left incomplete by Francesco, especially his frescos in the Steccata. Among his other great fresco works, are a part of the Ten Colossal figures of children, in the arches of the cupola of the cathedral at Parma, six of which are by Correggio, and four by Girolamo; and the Multiplication of the Loaves in the church of S. Benedetto, at Mantua. Amidst all his beauties, Lanzi says this artist had not a few defects; he was sometimes careless in designing his naked figures, carried his grace to a degree bordering on affectation, and his more spirited attitudes are violent. These defects he attributes to his rage for accomplishing too much, and his often painting in competition with other artists. He is supposed to have died about 1590.

MAZZUOLI, ALESSANDRO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist. He was a weak imitator of the family style, and executed some works for the churches. In 1571 he was employed in some fresco works in the Cathedral at Parma, which was a great honor, in an edifice abounding in the works of Correggio and other great artists.

MAZZUOLI, GIUSEPPE called IL BASTARUOLO, or Vender of Grain—his father's occupation, not his own. He was born at Ferrara about 1525, and studied in the school of Dosso Dossi, where Gio.

Francesco Surchi was his fellow pupil. He had two manners; in the first he designed his figures too large, and was defective in his perspective, which injured his rising reputation, and his rivals considered him an artist of mediocrity; but by study and industry he formed a second manner, more elevated in design, with a softness of coloring, especially in his flesh tints and extremities, that approached Titian, with a breadth and intelligence of chiaro-scuro worthy of the school of Correggio. He rose to great distinction, and his works were held in such estimation that there is scarcely a public edifice in his native city which does not possess some of his works; and at this day he ranks as one of the most eminent painters of the Ferrarese school. Among his most celebrated works at Ferrara are, the Virgin and Infant crowned by Angels, in the Cathedral; the Ascension, in the church of S. Maurelio; the Annunciation, a Holy Family, and a Crucifixion, in Il Gesù; and in the Conservatorio of St. Barbara, an altar-piece representing that Saint and St. Ursula, and a number of female figures, designed and executed with such unequalled elegance and chastity that Lanzi says the figures seem to live and breathe. He also painted easel pictures for the collections. This great artist was drowned while bathing for his health, in 1589.

MECHAU, JACOB WILHELM, a German painter and engraver, born at Leipsic in 1745. He studied under Bernard Rode, at Berlin, and afterwards improved himself by frequenting the Academy in his native city. He painted landscapes and history with considerable reputation in his own country, but he is better known as an engraver. He executed quite a large number of plates, many of them after his own designs, and engraved some plates of Views in Italy in aqua-tinta. He died in 1808. The following are among his prints:

St. Michael vanquishing the Demon; Mechau, fec. aqua forti. The Resurrection of Lazarus. Mechau, fec. 1761. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Schut. A Dance of Nymphs and Fauns; after Giulio Carpioni. A set of six Italian Landscapes; in the style of Swanevelt. 1792. A set of six Views in and near Rome. 1792, 1793

MECHEL, CHRISTIAN VON, an eminent Swiss engraver, born at Basle in 1737. He went to Paris, and studied under J. G. Wille, and afterwards returned to his native city, where he engraved a great variety of plates, and carried on a considerable commerce in prints. He engraved and published the Dusseldorf Gallery, with a catalogue raisonné; the Medals of Hedlinger; the Works of Hans Holbein, with explanatory and critical remarks; and many pictures of cotemporary painters. His prints are numerous, and remarkably well executed. He died in 1818.

MECHELN, or MECKENEN, ISRAEL VON, father and son, two old German artists, about whom and whose works there has been a great deal of disquisition, nor is the matter yet settled. Our limits will not allow us to enter into a dissertation on the subject, farther than to give facts, and refer the curious in such matters to Bartsch's P. G. tom. vi., and Zani's Enciclopedia delle belle Arti, parte i. vol. xiii., in which works all the points are fully discussed. According to M. Heineken, there are about two hundred and fifty prints, all bearing the same characteristics, and usually marked I. M., or I. V. M., or Israhel V. M., or sometimes

Israhel von Meckenen, Goldschmit, or Israhel tzu Bockholt, the letters being in the Gothic character. All these prints were, until recently, attributed to one and the same artist; but on account of a great difference observable in the style of the different prints, as well as the dates found on them, Heineken and other critics conclude that there were two Meckenens who practised engraving, father and son. Israhel von Meckenen the Elder is stated by M. Huber to have been born at Mecheln, a village near Bockholt, a small town in the bishopric of Munster, in Westphalia, about 1424. He was regarded as one of the earliest engravers of whom we have any account, and immediately succeeded or was rather a cotemporary of Martin Schoen. That he was not a disciple of Schoen, is evident from the total difference in their styles. It has not been found practicable to distinguish precisely the prints of the elder Meckenen from those of the son, but it is reasonable to conclude that the ruder part of them in point of design and execution, and those having the earliest date, should be ascribed to the father. If any further proof were wanting of the existence of the two Meckenens, the two first prints in the list below—the portraits of the father and son—fully establish the point. It is also ascertained that the younger Meckenen died in 1523. There are quite a number of curious antique pictures at Cologne, Berlin, Munich, and other places, painted in oil, which have been long attributed to Israel von Meckenen, from similarity in design to his engraved subjects; but that able connoisseur, Dr. Franz Kugler, is clearly of opinion that these works must be given to some unknown artist. We copy from Kugler's Hand-Book of the History of Painting, part the second; London edition, 1846: "First in the school of Cologne, about the latter half of the 15th century, we meet with an excellent artist, who, with many traces of the elder Cologne school, unites a conscious familiarity with the models afforded by that of van Eyck. The name of this artist is unknown; formerly, though, without sufficient ground, that of a cotemporary goldsmith and engraver, Israhel von Mecheln or Meckenen was given to him. His chief work, a representation of the Passion, on eight panels, is in the possession of Herr Lyversburg, at Cologne, and it is now usual to designate him as the Master of the Passion. His pictures have still, indeed, a gold ground, and resemble the older school in this circumstance, as well as in the style of coloring, which is lively, powerful, and clear; but they are painted in oil, and moreover, the manner of treatment, the attitudes, and the arrangement, are generally borrowed from the school of van Eyck. He appears to have been an able, intelligent, and highly gifted artist, earnest in seeking an insight into life, zealous and careful, but for the most part, it must be confessed, devoid of original inspiration. The general character of his drawing is precise and hard; his efforts to mark character in the lower classes of persons, such as the persecutors of Christ, degenerates into exaggeration. Besides this excellent work of the Passion, there are several paintings evidently by the same hand. The most important of those in Cologne are, a Descent from the Cross, of the year 1488, in the City Museum, less powerful than the Passion, and probably of the latest time of the artist; the wings, added later, are probably by a scholar or imitator;

—two very good pictures in the possession of Herr Zanoli;—the paintings in the windows and on the walls of the Hardenrath chapel in Sta. Maria, in Capitolio, of the year 1466; the first of which, however, are injured, and the last considerably retouched. The Crucifixion, on the walls of the same place, belongs to a later period. There are, besides, excellent altar-pieces by him in the churches of Linz and Sinzig; and a considerable number at Munich, in the former Boisserée collection, particularly an altar-piece with very dignified figures of the apostles (John the Baptist in the place of Judas). Several are in the chapel of St. Maurice at Nuremberg; and a beautiful picture, with female Saints, is in the Berlin Museum. The influence of this artist on his cotemporaries was very important, as is proved by the various works of his scholars or imitators, extant at Cologne, and in the neighborhood, or in the Boisserée collection and Berlin Museum. Of those in the Berlin Museum, two panels with male and female Saints are particularly remarkable, being distinguished as much by the dignity of the figures and their noble drapery, as by the powerful painting and expression of their heads." Now, with all due deference to the eminent critic quoted above, is it not far more reasonable to give these works, as heretofore by many excellent critics, to Israel von Mecheln, but to the younger, rather than to a supposed unknown "Master of the Passion"? because it is certain that there were two artists of this name, the elder a goldsmith and an engraver, two professions often combined in those days; the younger an engraver, certainly instructed in engraving by his father, and who might, and probably did, learn painting of the van Eycks, and the period of whose life agrees with the dates found on these pictures. The following is a list of their most remarkable prints:

The Portrait of Israel von Mecheln the elder, with a beard, and a kind of turban; signed Israel von Meckenen, Goldschmit. The Portraits of Israel von Mecheln the younger and his Wife; inscribed Figuracio facierum Israelis et Ide Uxoris, I. V. M. A set of Prints of the Life of Christ; these, as well as two following prints, are supposed to be some of the earliest works of the elder Mecheln. The Descent of the Holy Ghost. St. Luke painting the Virgin. Judith with the Head of Holofernes; in the back-ground is a battle, with cannon, and other warlike instruments. The Death of the Virgin; M. Schoen and others have engraved this subject. The Virgin standing upon a Crescent, crowned by Angels. The Annunciation; the Angel holds a Scroll, on which is inscribed A VE. GRA. The Virgin seated, in a landscape, embracing the Infant, and St. Joseph reposing; on the right of the print is a Grasshopper, on which account it is called the Virgin with the Grasshopper. The same subject has been engraved by Albert Durer, and copied from him by Marc' Antonio. The Virgin and Infant surrounded by four Angels. 1480. The Virgin seated, holding the Infant, with a garden-wall in the back-ground, inscribed in Gothic letters, Are polissima Maria. The same is engraved by M. Schoen. The Feast of Herod; Herodias with the Head of St. John.—Herod's Cruelty. Christ bearing his Cross. The Scourging of Christ. The Crucifixion; Israel, M.; with a light ground. The Crucifixion; Israel, V. M.; with a dark ground. St. George and the Dragon; I. V. M. St. Jerome seated in a Room, pointing to a Skull which lies on the table. This is considered one of their best prints. It has been copied by Lucas van Leyden. St. Anthony tormented by Devils. The same subject is engraved by Martin Schoen. The Death of Lucretia. A Man and a Woman walking, with Death behind a tree, shaking an hour-glass. This print has been copied by Albert Durer and others. Several single Figures of male and female Saints. A Woman singing, and a Man playing on the Lute. A Man playing on the Organ. Three naked Women, with a Globe hanging above them. Albert Durer and others have copied this print. A Man holding a Skull, inscribed Respice finem. A Cup, richly ornamented. The same has been engraved by M. Schoen. A variety of goldsmith's ornaments, and a great number of other subjects.

MECHELN, a painter, doubtless a German, whose name is affixed to a portrait of Pope Urban VIII., dated 1623.

MECHERINO. See BECCAFUMI.

MECHOPHANES, a Greek painter, who, according to Pliny, was a disciple of Pausias. His manner was rather dry and hard, but this defect was in a measure compensated by his rigid correctness of design, which was appreciated by his cotemporary artists.

MEDA, GIUSEPPE, a reputable painter, who, according to Morigi, flourished at Milan about 1590, where he was employed in the churches. He was also an architect. He represented upon an organ in the Metropolitan church, the figure of David playing before the Ark, a work highly commended.

MEDA, CARLO, a Milanese painter, perhaps a brother of the preceding, who painted for the churches at Milan in 1595. He does not seem to have gained much distinction.

MEDICI, PIETRO, a member of the illustrious house of the Medici, was born at Florence in 1586, and died in 1648. Having a passion for the fine arts, he studied under Lodovico Cardi, and became a reputable painter of history. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches, which are commended for correctness of design, a strong and pleasing tone of coloring, and a very truthful expression.

MEDINA, JUAN BAPTISTA, called in England SIR JOHN BAPTIST M., was the son of Medina de l'Asturias, an officer in the Spanish service, born at Brussels in 1660. He studied under Francis du Chatel, and afterwards greatly improved himself by studying the works of Rubens. He painted history and landscapes with reputation, but he devoted himself mostly to portraits; and, after acquiring considerable reputation in his native city, he went to London, where he met with considerable employment. He went to Scotland under the patronage of the Earl of Leven, who procured him many commissions; and he painted the portraits of most of the Scotch nobility, and acquired great reputation in his day. He was knighted by the Duke of Queensberry, then Lord High Commissioner of Scotland. At Wentworth Castle is a large picture by him, of the Duke of Argyle and his two sons, painted in the Italian style, and according to Lord Orford superior to the works of most of his cotemporaries. His portraits, however, are generally in the style of Kneller, never equaling his best, nor sinking so low as his worst. He painted with great freedom of touch, and produced striking likenesses. His portrait, painted by himself, was sent by the Duke of Gordon to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and was placed in the Florentine Gallery. He died at Edinburgh in 1711.

MEELE. See MIEL.

MEELE, MATTHEW, a Dutch painter born at the Hague in 1661. He was and practised for some time under

He afterwards returned to the Hague, where he acquired considerable distinction, was appointed one of the Directors of the Academy, and died there in 1724.

MEER, GERARD VANDER, a Dutch painter of low life and landscapes in the old Gothic style, born in 1450, and died in 1512. His works do not possess sufficient merit to deserve attention.

MEER, or MEEREN, JOHN VANDER, THE ELDER, a Dutch painter, said to have been born at Schoonhoven, but with more probability at Haerlem, in 1627. It is not known under whom he first studied, but when young he went to Italy. On his return to Holland he gained great reputation, and his works were much sought after for the best collections. His subjects were landscapes and figures, sea-pieces, and views on the sea-shore, which he painted with great truth and spirit, as he was accustomed to sketch every scene from nature. His sea-pieces are particularly admired, in which the vessels are designed with great correctness and neatness, the skies bright with light, fleecy clouds, and the water clear and transparent. His tints are warm and tender, and there is a sunny brilliancy in his coloring that reminds one of the sea-ports of Claude Lorraine. His landscapes are very pleasing, the scenes well chosen, the forms of his trees easy and natural, his distances well observed, and the whole scenery has a striking effect by a happy opposition of lights and shadows. He also painted battle-pieces with considerable success; his figures and horses in particular were designed with great fire and animation, and executed with a spirited pencil. He has been reproached for too great a predominance of blue in his backgrounds, a peculiarity not uncommon to those who have studied in Italy, where nature frequently assumes a brightness of atmosphere unknown in more northern climates. He died at Haerlem in 1691.

MEER, JOHN VANDER, DE JONGE (the Younger), was the son of the preceding, born at Haerlem in 1655. After studying with his father, he placed himself under Nicholas Berghem, and became one of his most celebrated scholars. He made the works of Berghem his model, took great pains to imitate his delicate style, and tried to improve himself by a diligent study of nature. He painted landscapes in the manner of Berghem, with cottages and peasants at their rural occupations and diversions. His works are well designed, correctly drawn, and delicately finished. His skies, trees, and figures are in good taste, and there is a freshness in the verdure of his plants and the foliage of his trees, that render his pictures very agreeable. He seldom introduced horses or cows, but he was so successful in painting sheep and goats, that in those he equaled, and some say, surpassed his master; his sheep, in particular, are so exquisitely and naturally depicted that it has been said one could imagine he heard the bleat. His works are highly finished, and though they are much inferior to those of Berghem, they command very high prices, and are admitted into the choicest collections. He died in 1688, in the flower of his life, greatly lamented, as he was considered one of the most promising artists of his country. His genuine works are seldom seen out of Holland, but they have been much imitated and passed on the undiscerning for originals. He executed a few charming etchings after his own designs, which are now extremely scarce. Among them is a set of four landscapes, and a Ewe suckling a Lamb, signed I. v. der Meer, de Jonge fecit. 1683.

MEER, JOHN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Schoonhoven in 1650. He was taught design and coloring at Utrecht, but went early to Rome, accompanied by Lieven Verschuur, where he first studied under his countryman, N. Drost, and afterwards with Carlo Lotti, and is said to have become an excellent historical painter. He designed his subjects on a grand scale, with figures as large as life, executed in a bold style, with a firm, broad pencil, and excellent coloring. On his return to his own country, he settled at Utrecht, where, falling into the possession of an ample fortune, he practised his profession more with a view of acquiring a lasting reputation, than augmenting his riches. He was also a good portrait painter. He died at Utrecht in 1711.

MEER, JOHN VANDER, a son of the preceding, was born at Utrecht in 1665, and died at Haerlem in 1722. He is called de Jonge (the Younger); is said to have first studied under his father, and afterwards with Berghem; and the whole history of the other John vander Meer the younger (if this was another) is applied to him. In short, the lives of these artists are mixed up in such admirable confusion, even by writers of their own country, that it is impossible to say with certainty whether there were two or four John vander Meers. Nevertheless, it seems evident from the difference of dates, and total difference of style and history, that there were two families of this name—the one landscape painters, residing at Haerlem; the other historical painters, of Utrecht.

MEER, N. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Paris about 1760, and engraved some of the plates for le Brun's Gallery, consisting of interiors of churches, flowers, &c., which are neatly executed.

MEER, VANDER, of Delft. See VERMEER.

MEERT, PETER, a Flemish portrait painter and engraver, born at Brussels, according to Descamps, in 1618. In portraits, he imitated the style of Vandyck, and acquired considerable reputation. In the Museum at Brussels are some of his portraits of the magistrates of that city. It is said there are prints by him dated as early as 1621, which would make Descamps in error as to the time of his birth.

MEGLIO, DI, a Florentine painter, supposed to be the same as Coppi, which see.

MEHEUX, JAMES, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1680. He engraved some plates in mezzotinto, among which is a copy of the Rat Catcher, by Cornelius Visscher.

MEHUS, or MEUS, LIVIO, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Oudenarde, in 1630. The war which took place in Flanders soon afterwards compelled his family to flee the country, and they settled at Milan, where young Livio, discovering a genius for painting, received some instruction from a Flemish artist then resident in that city. At an early age he went to Florence, where he had the good fortune to obtain the protection of Prince Mattias, who placed him under the instruction of Pietro da Cortona, at that time employed by the Grand Duke Ferdinand II. in decorating the Pitti palace. He accompanied his master to Rome, where he diligently studied the antique and the works of the best masters, and became a correct and skillful designer. He afterwards went to Venice and Lombardy, and improved his coloring by contemplating the works of the best masters of the Venetian school. By these means he formed a style of his own. He possessed a fertile and inventive genius; retained little of the manner of Cortona; and imitated the Venetians less in coloring than in the light but firm touches of his pencil. His coloring was chaste and harmonious, his attitudes lively, and his shadows most beautiful. On his return to Florence, he immediately acquired distinction and abundant patronage, for though he executed few works for the churches, he painted a great many cabinet pictures, was pensioned by the prince and employed by the nobility, in whose palaces his works are often to be met with. His most celebrated works are the Repose of Bacchus and Ariadne, painted for the Marquis Gerini in emulation with Cirò Ferri; the Sacrifice of Abraham, painted for the Grand Duke in the Pitti palace; the History of Hagar and Ishmael; the Engagement of Achilles with the Trojans; the Triumph of Ignorance, &c. His most capital work is in the dome of the church of La Pace, in which he appears to have outdone himself; and Lanzi says, "in this he surpassed Cortona, and approached the Lombard school." His portrait, painted by himself, was placed in the Florentine Gallery by the order of the Grand Duke. He died in 1691.

MEI. BERNARDINO, a Sieneſe painter, whose works bear date from 1636 to 1653. It is not known under whom he studied, but Lanzi ſays he was cotemporary with Cav. Raffaello Vanni, and aſſiſted that maſter in his works at S. Maria della Pace at Rome. His works are moſtly at Siena. The Padre della Valle highly commends his genius, and compares his works ſometimes to the Caracci, at others to Paul Veroneſe, and to Guercino; very much as the eclectic philoſophers adopt or change the maxims of the different ſchools. One of his beſt works was a freſco in the Caſa Bandinelli, with an Aurora in a ceiling, ſurrounded with ſeveral elegant figures and deſigns.

MEIGEL, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, who reſided at Nuremberg, where he publiſhed a folio volume of prints, deſigned and engraved by himſelf, repreſenting the follies of different people, and of all profeſſions. They are indifferently executed.

MEIGHAN, R., an English engraver of little note, who carried on the buſineſs of bookseller and publiſher in St. Dunſtan's churchyard, about 1628.

MEIL, JOHN HENRY, a German engraver, who flouriſhed in the latter half of the 18th century. He ſettled at Leiſic, and wrought for the bookſellers. Among other plates, he engraved one hundred and twelve ſubjects from the Fables of Gellert.

MEIL, JOHN WILLIAM, a German engraver, the younger brother of the preceding, born at Altenbourg in 1732; died in 1805. He went to Berlin, where he was much employed in engraving vignettes and other book ornaments, from his own deſigns, for the publiſhers. He engraved a great number and variety of plates in a neat, ſpirited ſtyle, ſomewhat reſembling that of Deila Bella. He was Vice-Director of the Academy of Fine Arts at Berlin. Among others, the following are by him:

A ſet of eight ſmall plates of Heads and Caricatures; ſcarce. Four of Quack-doctors and Ballad-ſingers; in the manner of Dietricy. A ſet of ten vignettes for the Poem of Joſeph and his Brethren; by Bilaubé. Twelve Allegorical Vignettes. Hercules playing on the Lyre. A ſet of four Landſcapes, with figures. Fifty-two ſubjects, entitled, Spectaculum Naturæ et Artium; publiſhed at Berlin in 1765.

MEIRE, GERARD VANDER, an old Flemish painter, a native of Ghent, who flouriſhed about 1450. Little is known of him with any certainty. He is ſaid to have been one of the earlieſt painters in oil, after the van Eycks, in whoſe ſtyle he painted, and of whom he probably learned the art. Van Mander highly commends a picture by him, repreſenting the Death of Lucretia, which he ſays was well deſigned, beautifully colored, and admirably finiſhed.

MEIRE, JAN VANDER, was a brother of the preceding, and is ſaid to have ſtudied with the van Eycks. He is alſo ſaid to have painted a picture of the Inſtitution of the Order of the Golden Fleece, for Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, whom he followed in all his campaigns, and that he died at Nevers in 1471. If this be true, Hans Hemling and Jan vander Meire were fellow ſoldiers.

MEIRERPECK, M. WOLFGANG, a German deſigner and engraver on wood, who flouriſhed about 1550. He went to Italy, where, in conjunction with Giorgio Liberali, he deſigned and executed the wooden cuts illuſtrating the Commentaries of Matthiolus on Dioscorides, in Latin, publiſhed at Venice in 1548, and in Germany in the Bohemian language, in 1560.

MEIS, B., an engraver, by whom there are ſome etchings, ſomewhat in the ſtyle of Benedetto Caſtiglione, marked B. Meis fecit.

MEISSONIER, JUSTUS AURELIUS. This artiſt was born at Turin in 1695. He was a goldſmith, painter, ſculptor, and architect. He viſited France, and obtained the patronage of Louis XV., who appointed him his deſigner and goldſmith, in which employment he exhibited the moſt beautiful ſpecimens of ingenuity and ſkill. Had he confined his energies to that branch, it would have been far better for the other departments of art in which his verſatile talents were employed. As a painter, he executed among others, the portraits of Vicomte Turenne, and Baron J. V. de Beſenval, a colonel in the Swiss Guards. The firſt has been engraved by Larmeſſin, and the ſecond by Claude Drevet. His deſign for the façade of St. Sulpice, at Paris, is characterized by Milizia as ridiculous in the extreme. He died in 1750.

MELAN. See MELLAN.

MELANI, GIUSEPPE and FRANCESCO, two brothers, eminent freſco-painters, and natives of Piſa. Giuſeppe was a pupil of Camillo Gabrielli, but painted hiſtory in the ſtyle of Pietro da Cortona. Francesco excelled in perſpective and architecture, and was one of the ableſt artiſts of his time in that branch. They uſually painted in conjunction, and executed many beautiful works for the churches and public edifices of Pisa, Siena, and other places, in the splendid style of Cortona. They were both learned in design, and each excelled in his particular branch. One of their most capital works is the ceiling of the church of S. Matteo, at Pisa, executed entirely in the style of Cortona, a work greatly admired for the richness of the composition, the gracefulness of the figures, the harmony of the coloring, the magical effect of chiaro-scuro, and the inimitable perspective. Giuseppe was made a knight of the Golden Spur; he was also a good figurist in oil. His best work of this kind is a large picture in the cathedral at Pisa, representing the Death of St. Ranieri, a work that Lanzi says does honor to its author, who was worthy of painting in that sanctuary, so full of the gems of art. Giuseppe died in 1747, and Francesco in 1742.

MELANTHUS, an eminent Greek painter of the school of Pamphilus at Sicyon, was a fellow disciple of Apelles, and like that master, paid a talent of gold for ten years instruction in the art. According to Quintilian, Pliny, and Plutarch, Melanthus attained the highest rank among the painters of his time, deserving a place with Apelles, Protogenes, Nicomachus, Antiphilus, and Euphranor. Like his instructor, he excelled in the chaste propriety of his compositions, and even Apelles conceded to him the palm in the judicious grouping of his figures. Quintilian particularly mentions his skill in the designs of his pictures; and Pliny observes that he was one of those painters, who, with only four colors, produced pieces worthy of immortality. His works commanded very high prices in the cities of Greece and Asia Minor; and their estimation is also evinced by the act of Aratus, a good judge of art, who collected from every quarter, the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, and presented them to Ptolemy III., King of Egypt. He left a Treatise on Painting, a fragment of which has been preserved by Diogenes Laertius; and of which Pliny availed himself in writing the 30th book of his Natural History.

MELAR, ADRIAN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1650. He executed some plates of portraits and other subjects, in which he attempted to imitate Paul Pontius.

MELCHIORI, GIOVANNI PAOLO, a Roman painter, born in 1664. He was brought up in the school of Carlo Maratti, to which he proved an ornament. According to Orlandi, he had a lively and fertile invention, and possessed much of the grandeur and sweetness of his master's style, to which he added a remarkable correctness of design, with an expression full of propriety and spirit. He painted easel pictures in the style of his master, and executed some works for the churches and public edifices of Rome, the most esteemed of which is a picture of the prophet Ezekiel, in the Basilica of St. John of Lateran. He died in 1721.

MELCHIORI, DI CASTELFRANCO, was the father of Matteo Melchiori, who wrote the Lives of the Venetian Painters. He painted history with reputation at Castelfranco, and especially at Venice, where he wrought in competition with Cavalier Liberi, in the Casa Morosini, which alone shews that he must have been an artist of distinction. He died in 1686.

Amsterdam in 1693. He showed an early inclination for art, and when a boy, preferred drawing, and copying from prints and books, to play. He was a self-taught artist, and after painting many pictures in oil, he devoted himself to miniature painting, as best suited to his taste, and as most likely to afford him more employment and fewer competitors. He became possessed of some miniatures of Rosalba, and by copying them he acquired great proficiency in that branch of the art, and could imitate her style to perfection. He also imitated the works of Rottenhamer and vander Werf with equal success. He painted historical and allegorical subjects, designed in such good taste, and so beautifully executed that they were much sought after, and commanded high prices. He received many commissions from the King of Poland. He also painted small landscapes, composed in an agreeable style, and enriched with figures exquisitely designed and executed. He painted the portraits of many distinguished personages of his time. He also painted in enamel, and was much employed in copying the works of Mieris, vander Werf, and others, in water colors, which he finished with surprising delicacy; but he abandoned this branch of the art, as he found it prejudicial to his sight. He however acquired most distinction for his miniatures, and is accounted one of the ablest artists of his time in that branch. He died at Utrecht, according to Sandrart and others, in 1740, but Balkema says in 1746, and Immerzeel in 1754.

MELDOLLA, ANDREA, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished, according to dates on his prints, from 1540 to 1550. Nothing is known of his history. About one hundred and twenty prints are now ascribed to him by connoisseurs, many of which were formerly attributed to Andrea Schiavone, called Medula; or to Francesco Mazzuoli, better known as Parmiggiano, because many of them are from pictures or drawings by that celebrated master. Zani has the honor of making the discovery that Meldolla (or Meldola, for it is written both ways) was a different artist from Schiavone, or Parmiggiano; and the subject has been ably investigated by other eminent critics, and Zani's opinions confirmed. Zani says he was acquainted with one hundred prints by Meldolla, Bartsch enumerates and describes eighty-seven, Nagler mentions one more, and the Messrs. Smith, Brothers, the eminent dealers in ancient prints, London, possess one hundred and ten, and have a descriptive account of nine others in foreign cabinets. It is generally believed that the plates on which Meldolla etched were made of peuter, which will account for the scratches and corrosions that appear in the later impressions, and for the frequent alterations made in the treatment of the subject, and in the accessories. Good impressions of these prints are now exceedingly rare and valuable. They are sometimes marked with his name, but more frequently with one of the following monograms, often very slightly scratched in, and of unequal size, sometimes being very small. There are variations in many of the prints, owing to alterations in the plates, and repairs, when they had sustained injury. The following is a list of his prints as given by Bartsch and the Messrs. Smith, omitting the descriptions, which would occupy several pages

MELEUN, COUNT DE, a French nobleman, who, according to Basan, for his amusement, etched some plates from Berghem, Callot, and other masters. He flourished about 1760.

MELINI, CARLO DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, born at Turin about 1745. He went to Paris, and studied under Beauvarlet. He executed some plates in a neat, finished style, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The King of Sardinia. The Children of the Prince of Turenne.

SUBJECTS.

La belle Source; after Nattier. The Education of Cupid; after Lagrenée. Morning, a landscape; after Loutherbourg.

MELISSI, AGOSTINO, a Florentine painter, born at Florence in 1658, and died there in 1738. According to Baldinucci, he acquired distinction for the beauty of his designs for tapestry, and was much employed by the Grand Duke to paint cartoons in the manner of Andrea del Sarto, for this purpose. He also painted in oil, and the author above mentioned highly commends his picture of Peter denying Christ, in the Palazzo Gaburri.

MELLAN, CLAUDE, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Abbeville, according to the Biographie Universelle, in 1598. Bryan says that he was sent to Paris, where he acquired the elements of design in the school of Simon Vouet, and subsequently visited Rome for improvement, at the age of sixteen. But Vouet did not return from his first foreign tour until 1627, consequently Bryan is in error; and the authority above cited, says that Mellan studied the art at Paris, under Thomas de Leu and Leon Gaultier; after which he visited Rome, in 1624, at the age of twenty-six, where he gained great improvement under the direction of F. Villamena, assisted by the advice of Simon Vouet. He executed several plates which were highly esteemed, and was commissioned to engrave part of the plates of the antique statues in the Giustiniani collection, the whole of which consists of three hundred and twenty-two prints, published in two vols. folio, Romæ, 1640. The principal part of the plates he engraved at Rome, are executed in the usual manner, with the strokes crossed a second and third time, as the strength of the shadows require. He subsequently adopted a novel mode of operating, with single parallel lines, without any cross strokes over them, the shadows being expressed by the same lines being made stronger, and consequently nearer together. In this new mode of engraving, Mellan acquired considerable celebrity, and many of his plates are characterized by a clear, soft, and agreeable effect. His success in this style appears to have been the result of his singular dexterity in handling the graver, rather than of the peculiarity of the process. The perfect master, which he attained over his instrument, is admirably evinced in his plate of the Face of Christ, called the Sudarium of St. Veronica, executed entirely with a single line, commencing at the extremity of the nose, and continued, without quitting, over the whole face and background. His print of Rebecca, after Tintoretto, is evidently from the work of a great colorist; and the artist appears to have seized the very tones of the painter, but without introducing any cross strokes, except in the accessories. Mellan died at Paris in 1688, aged ninety. He executed quite a large number of prints, among which are many admirable portraits, several of them from his own designs, as well as the greater part of his historical subjects. His prints are generally signed with his name in full, although he sometimes used the initials C. M.; or the abbreviation C. Mel. or Cl. Mell. He executed a part of the plates after the antique marbles in the royal palaces of France, which were completed by S. Baudet. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Urban VIII.; after Bernini. 1631. Cardinal Bentivoglio. The Marquis Justiniani. Anne of Austria, Queen of France. Henry, Duke of Montmorency. The Cardinal Duke de Richelieu. The Cardinal de Mazarin. Francis de Villemontée, Bishop of St. Malo. 1661. Peter Seguier, Chancellor of France. Nicholas Cœffeteau, Bishop of Marseilles; after Du Moustier. The Cardinal du Peron; after Herbin. Victor le Bouthillier, Archbishop of Tours. 1658. Nicholas Claude Fabri de Peirese; one of his finest portraits. Charles de Crequis Lesdigueres, Marshal of France. 1633. Peter Gassendi, Professor of Mathematics. Louisa Maria de Gonzaga, Queen of Poland. 1645. Claude Mellan, painter and engraver. 1635.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Lot and his Daughters. Rome, 1629. Samson and Dalilah. Moses and the Burning Bush. 1663. The Miracle of the Manna. The Annunciation; inscribed Ecce Virgo concipiet. 1666. The Virgin with the infant Jesus on her knee. 1659. The Holy Family. Rome, 1635. Christ praying in the Garden; a night-piece; fine. Christ seized by the Soldiers, inscribed Pater ignosce illis, &c. St. John, with Magdalene embracing the Cross. Rome. The Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Magdalene and St. John. The Entombing of Christ, with an inscription, Terra mota est. The Resurrection; inscribed Per se resurgens. 1633. The Face of Christ, called the Sudarium of St. Veronica; executed entirely by a single spiral line, begun at the extremity of the nose, and continued, without quitting, over the whole face and back-ground. St. Peter Nolasque, supported by two Angels; one of the finest and the rarest prints of the artist. Four large plates of the Life of St. Bruno. St. Bruno praying in the Desert. St. Francis praying. 1638; very fine. Several other Saints in acts of Devotion. Mary Magdalene expiring, supported by Angels.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Herodias with the Head of St. John; after S. Vouet. The Roman Charity; do. The Death of Lucretia; do. St. Catherine kneeling, to whom an Angel is presenting the palm of martyrdom; do. Rebecca meeting the Servant of Abraham; after Tintoretto; esteemed the finest of his prints.

MELLING, ANTHONY IGNATIUS, a German painter and architect, born at Carlsruhe in 1763. He was the nephew of Joseph Melling, a painter of the Academy of Strasburg. After acquiring a knowledge of painting under that master, and having studied architecture under his brother, he went to Italy for improvement, at the age of nineteen. After visiting the different cities of that country, he travelled to Egypt, Smyrna, and then to Constantinople, where he settled. In 1795, he was appointed architect to the Sultana Hadidgé, the sister of Selim III., which office he held for five years. His leisure hours were mostly employed in making drawings of the principal views in Constantinople. In 1800, he went to Paris, and commenced the publication of his work entitled Voyage pittoresque de Constantinople, et des rives du Bosphore, which had excellent success, and gained him the honor of being appointed landscape painter to the Empress Josephine. Several pictures exhibited at the Louvre gained him a gold medal. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, appointed him his designer and painter; and after the Restoration, he was appointed landscape painter to the King's Cabinet. After the publication of his pictorial work entitled Voyage pittoresque dans les Pyrenées Francaises, he was honored with a membership in the Legion of Honor. He painted a few subjects of history, among which were the Entry of Louis XVIII. into Paris; and the Distribution of the Standards of the National Guard. He died in 1831.

MELONE, ALTOBELLO, a painter of Cremona, whose works date from 1497 to 1520. He painted both in oil and fresco. In 1497, he was employed in completing the frieze of the cathedral. According to Vasari, he painted a series of pictures of the Passion, in fresco, in one of the churches, truly beautiful, and deserving of commendation; but Lanzi says he was not consistent in point of style, introducing figures of large and small proportions in the same piece, and coloring them in a manner that now gives them the appearance of tapestry; but time has doubtless wrought a great change in this respect. Lanzi himself, says he excelled in oil painting. Speaking of Christ descending into Limbo, in the sacristy del Sacramento, he says, "the figures are numerous, of somewhat long proportions, but colored with great softness and strength. His knowledge of the naked is beyond that of his age, combined with a grace of features and of attitudes, that conveys the idea of a great master." He also painted easel pictures. Morelli, in his Notizia, mentions a Lucretia by him, painted in the Flemish style, and he says he was a pupil of Armanino, perhaps a Fleming.

MELONI, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1676. He first studied painting under Marc' Antonio Franceschini; but not succeeding to his wishes, he etched some plates after his master, in which he showed so much taste, that by his advice, he afterwards devoted himself entirely to engraving. He was a correct and pure designer, and his plates are executed with neatness and spirit, and carefully finished with the graver. His works are not numerous, though Bartsch, Nagler, and others, mention about thirty prints by him. He died young in 1713.

MELONI, MARCO, a native of Carpi, who flourished in that city about 1537. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Andrea Costa. He painted in the manner of the Caracci, and was exceedingly accurate and studied in his design. There are some of his works in the churches at Carpi, especially in S. Bernardino, which are highly commended by Tiraboschi.

MELOZZO, DA FORLI, a native of Forli, and one of the Fathers of the Italian school of painting. There is much discrepancy about the minutiae of his life. Zani states that he was born in 1436; Oretti that he died in 1492, aged fifty-six; Vasari that he was best known at Forli about 1472, and Luca Paccioli, in a work on geometry, &c., published in 1494, mentions him as one of the most excellent painters. men famous and supreme, then living. He is said by some to have studied under Ansovino da Forli, and others, Piero della Francesca. Lanzi doubts whether he could have been a scholar of Ansovino, and thinks it at least possible that he was acquainted with Francesca, and Agostino Bramantino, when these artists were employed at Rome by Nicholas V., about 1455. At all events, his name is revered among his countrymen, as the first who applied the art of foreshortening, the most difficult and the most severe, to the painting of vaulted ceilings. Considerable progress had been made in perspective, from the time of Paolo Uccello, with the aid of Piero della Francesca, a painter, and celebrated geometrician, and of a few Lombards. But the ornamenting of ceilings with that pleasing art and illusion which was afterwards brought to such perfection, was reserved for Melozzo. About the year 1472, he painted his famous work of the Ascension in the great chapel at the Santi Apostoli at Rome, for the Cardinal Riario, nephew to pope Sixtus IV. Vasari says of this work, "the figure of Christ is so admirably foreshortened, as to appear to pierce the vault; and in the same manner, the angels are seen sweeping through the fields of air in two opposite directions." In 1711, when the chapel was rebuilt, this painting was cut out of the ceiling with the greatest care, and placed in the Quirinal Palace, where it still remains with this inscription. Opus Melotii Forliviensis qui summos fornices pingendi artem vel primus invenit vel illustravit. Several heads of the Apostles which surrounded it were also cut out and deposited in the Vatican. The style of Melozzo resembles, in point of taste, that of Andrea Mantegna and the Paduan school, nearer than any other. His heads were finely formed, his coloring good, his attitudes well chosen, and his foreshortening admirable; the lights are well disposed and graduated, and the shadows judicious, so that his figures seem to stand out and act in space. He painted his works also with delicacy of hand, diligence and grace, in every part. There are few of his works now in existence. There is an apothecary's shop painted in arabesque, and a figure compounding drugs over the door, at Forli, venerated as the work of Melozzo. Vasari states that Francesco di Mirozzo of Forli, was employed in the villa of the Dukes of Urbino, called the Imperial, about the time Melozzo flourished; and Lanzi is clearly of opinion that "we are here to substitute the name of Melozzo, to correct one of those errors which we have so frequently before remarked in Vasari." Lanzi also calls him in his index, F. Francesco M., perhaps from the above circumstance. Lanzi, speaking of his great work of the Ascension, before mentioned, with the feelings of a true connoisseur, exclaims, "what a pity that so rare a genius, pronounced by his cotemporaries 'an incomparable painter, and the splendor of all Italy,' should not have had a correct historian, to have described his travels and pursuits, which must have been both arduous and interesting, before they raised him to the eminence he attained, in being commissioned by Cardinal Riario, to execute so great a work."

MELZI, FRANCESCO, IL CONTE, a Milanese painter of noble birth, the friend and scholar of Leonardo da Vinci. He practised the art of painting as a delightful employment, for he was rich, and he approached nearer to the manner of da Vinci than any other of his scholars or imitators; and so near indeed, that most of his works are now attributed to his master. Nagler says that the picture of Vertumnus and Pomona, in the Berlin Museum, formerly attributed to da Vinci, bears the signature of Francesco Melzi, and another now in England, called "The Flora of Leonardo da Vinci," is supposed to be by Melzi, as Lomazzo mentions his having painted an exquisite picture of that subject, in the style of da Vinci. He was a man of the most amiable disposition, and loved da Vinci as his father, and accompanied him in his last visit to France. His master rewarded his affection by giving him all his designs, instruments, books and manuscripts, which he nobly used by furnishing both Vasari and Lomazzo with notices of his life, and depositing the numerous volumes of his manuscripts in the Ambrosian Library for the benefit of posterity, which conclusively show the profound acquirements of that great artist, not only in painting, but in statics, hydrostatics, optics, and anatomy. Melzi was living, according to Vasari, in 1568, at an advanced age.

MEMMI, SIMONE, an eminent Sieneſe painter, and one of the earliest who distinguished themselves after the revival of the art, was born in 1285. He is sometimes called Simone di Martini, and Lanzi says his father's name was Martino, and that of his father-in-law, Memmo, a corruption of Guglielmo, and that he sometimes assumed the one name, and sometimes the other. He signed several of his works Simon de Senis, the last in 1344. He died in 1345, and this inscription is on his tomb, Simoni Memmio, pictorum omnium, omnis ætatis celeberrimo. Vixit ann. 60. mensibus duobus, diebus tribus. These facts are given because of disputes as to his name and time of birth. Vasari says he was a pupil of Giotto, but this is also disputed, and the writers of Siena claim that he was a disciple of their own venerable artist, Maestro Mino. Lanzi thinks the claims of the Sieneſe good, and that he derived much advantage from the study of the large frescos of that master, though he thinks that, when he assisted Giotto in some of his works at Rome, he studied him closely, as many eminent painters have done with the most eminent masters. At all events, he imitated Giotto so admirably in his works in the church of St. Peter, that the pope invited him to his court at Avignon, where it seems he painted several portraits of the pope, and many portraits of Cardinals and other distinguished personages, among whom were Petrarch and his far-famed Laura, and Petrarch introduced his name in two of his sonnets, and eulogized him in his letters. He also decorated a manuscript copy of Virgil for his friend Petrarch, which is now in the Ambrosian Library, a gem of attraction. His great picture in St. Peter's has perished, but there are several of his works in the churches at Florence and Pisa, as well as at Siena. In the Campo Santo of Pisa, are several frescos of the history of St. Ranieri, and the far-famed Assumption of the Virgin amid a choir of angels, so beautifully executed that Lanzi says, they "seem actually floating in the air, and celebrating the triumph." Some of his larger works may be seen in the chapter-house of the Spanish friars at Florence, among which are several histories of Christ, of St. Peter the Martyr, and St. Domenico, with others representing the Order of the Preaching Friars, engaged in the service of the church. There are more of this class of pictures, in which he excelled, in the churches of Siena. Vasari says "his works do not appear those of a master of that age, but of a most excellent modern artist." Lanzi says, "his coloring is more vivid than that of Giotto, and in floridness, seems a prelude to that of Baroccio."

MEMMI, LIPPO. This artist was a native of Siena, the brother-in-law and scholar of the preceding. Although he was not equal in genius to Simone, he succeeded admirably in imitating his manner, and probably assisted him in many works; and, aided by his designs, he produced pictures that might have passed for the works of the former, had he not inscribed them with his own name. When he wrought from his own designs, there is a manifest mediocrity in his invention and design, but he is still a good colorist. He sometimes painted in conjunction with Simone, as appears from a picture formerly in the church of S. Ansano de Castel Vecchio at Siena, now in the Florentine Gallery, inscribed, Simon Martini et Lippus Memmi de Senis, me pinxerunt, A. D. 1333. He finished several works begun by Simone, at Ancona, Assisi, and other places. He also painted some from his own designs, at Siena and Pisa. He was living in 1361.

MENA, FELIPE GIL DE, a Spanish painter, born at Valladolid in 1600. He is said to have studied under vander Hamen, a Flemish painter settled at Madrid, where he made rapid progress, and soon surpassed all his fellow scholars. His instructor confided to him the execution of a number of important works, and his reputation increased to such a degree that he could hardly execute his commissions. He excelled particularly in portraits, characterized by natural and animated expression. Invited to his native city, he was commissioned to execute a large number of works, among which are several in the community of the Orphelins, and the convent of St. Francisco, at Valladolid. Mena deserves great credit for establishing a free school of design in his own house, and provided for its use a large number of designs and models, subsequently sold for a thousand ducats. He died in 1674.

MENA, DON PEDRO DE, a Spanish sculptor, born at Adra, in Alpujorra, about 1620. He studied the art under his father, and subsequently visited Granada, to complete his artistical education under Alonso Cano. His first work of any importance was a group representing the Conception, executed for the church of Algendin, near Granada, which gained him considerable reputation, and he received many commissions from the cities of Granada, Malaga, Madrid, Cordova, and Toledo. Among them are St. Antonio holding in his arms the infant Jesus, at Granada; and a Magdalene penitent, at Madrid, admired for its truthfulness of expression. For the Prince Doria of Genoa, he executed a statue of Christ agonizing, regarded as his master-piece. He died at Malaga in 1693, leaving a number of distinguished scholars, among whom was Miguel de Zayas.

MENABUOL. See GIUSTO PADOVANO.

MENAGEOT, FRANÇOIS GUILLAUME, an eminent historical painter, born at London, of French parents, in 1744. At the age of six years his father took him to France, and afterwards placed him in the school of Augustin. He subsequently studied under Deshayes, Boucher, and Vien. In 1766, he carried off the grand prize of painting, and visited Rome with the royal pension, where he remained five years, studying the antique, and the works of the great masters. On returning to Paris, he gained the favorable notice of the Academy by his grand picture of the Parting of Polyxenus and Hecuba; and in 1780 was chosen an Academician, for his painting of Study detaining Time. He was afterwards appointed Assistant Professor, and in 1787 Professor of the Academy. Appointed by the King to the Directorship of the French Academy at Rome, he discharged the duties of that important office during the stormy times which led to the dissolution of the institution, in 1793, when he went to Vicenza, and resided there eight years. Although receiving several invitations to visit foreign courts, he declined them all, and about 1800 returned to Paris. He was honored with a membership in the Institute, and the Legion of Honor, and was appointed Professor of the Academy of Painting. Menageot employed his talents in painting easel pictures, but is chiefly known by his grand historical works. They evince an ardent love of nature, and are full of sweetness and grace. His compositions are characterized by excellent judgment; his design is elevated and pure; draperies skillfully cast; and coloring very harmonious. Among his principal works are Astyanax torn from the Arms of his Mother; Cleopatra at the Tomb of Antony; Diana searching for the young Adonis, and fearing to decide between the two children placed before her by Venus, lest she should choose Cupid; the Death of Leonardo da Vinci; and King Dagobert I. giving orders for the erection of the church of St. Denis. The latter picture is placed in the sacristy of that church. Menageot died in 1816.

MENAGEOT, ROBERT, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1748. He at first studied painting under Boucher, and practised that art for some time; but afterwards devoted himself entirely to engraving. He visited England, and executed several plates for Boydell. Among others, there are the following by him: Friendship, a circular print, after Correggio; Innocence, the companion, Menageot fecit; the Virgin and Infant, with St. Elisabeth, after Guido; an African Woman, after Loutherbourg.

MENANT, P., a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1715. In conjunction with Fontbonne, Scotin, Regnard, and others, he engraved part of the plates for the Views of the Palaces and Gardens at Versailles. They are neatly executed, but in a formal style, without much effect.

MENAROLA, CRISTOFORO, a painter of Vicenza, who flourished about 1727. According to Melchiori he first studied under Volpato, and afterwards Carpioni, whose manner he chiefly followed. He was esteemed an excellent artist, and his works were in much request.

MENENDEZ, MICHAEL HYACINTH, a Spanish painter, born at Oviedo in 1679. He studied painting at Madrid, and is said to have attained equal skill in invention, design, and coloring. In 1712 he was appointed by Philip IV. painter to the King. There are many of his paintings at Madrid, among which are two subjects from the life of Elijah, in the Carmelite monastery; a Magdalen at the Recoletos; and the Apostles, in the church of St. Giles. He made designs of all the paintings in the church of S. Felipe le Royal, which were painted after his death, by his scholar, Andrea de Colleja. There is a print by John Barnabas Palomino, representing St. Isidore on horseback, clothed in the pontifical robes, and exterminating the Moors.

MENENDEZ, FRANCISCO ANTONIO, was a Spanish painter, the son of Michael Hyacinth M., born at Oviedo in 1682. He acquired the elements of the art at Madrid, and afterwards visited Genoa, Milan, Venice, Rome and Naples. Possessed of no fortune, and without a protector, he became involved in difficulties, and was obliged to enter the Spanish infantry. During his leisure hours, however, he devoted his attention to art, and acquired much important knowledge. After a few years, in consequence of a change in the affairs of Naples, he was released from the army, and immediately went to Rome for improvement. In 1717 he returned to Spain, and commenced painting portraits in miniature, with considerable success. In 1726, he addressed a memorial to the Spanish king, praying him to establish an Academy of Design, Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture; but it was not until 1744 that he attained any success. In that year a School of Design was organized, and Menendez appointed Director.—This small beginning at length resulted in the foundation of the Academy of St. Ferdinando, which was not firmly established until after the death of Menendez. He deserves high credit, and the grateful remembrance of every lover of art, for his endeavors in this work. The masterpiece of Menendez is a Marine View, representing a tempest through which he passed while returning from Italy, characterized by great vigor and striking resemblance to nature. This beautiful picture was in the church of Our Lady d'Atocha, but is now in the church of the Rosary at Madrid. Menendez had three sons, whom he instructed in the art. The time of his death is not recorded.

MENESES. See OSORIO.

MENGAZZINO, IL. See DOMENICO SANTI.

MENGOZZI, GIROLAMO COLONNA, OF COLONNA MENGOZZI, a painter of the Ferrarese school, and a native of Tivoli, was born in 1688, and died about 1766. He was a very eminent ornamental and architectural painter. He resided at Venice many years, and was much employed in painting for the churches and public edifices. In the church of the Tolentini, and in the Tiepolo at the Scalzi, he painted the architectural and ornamental parts, while Zompini painted the figures. He conducted the architecture in the Ducal palace, and in other edifices. Guarienti extols him as the first architectural and ornamental painter of the age, which praise he evidently merited.

MENGS, CAR. ANTONIO RAFFAELLE, one of the most distinguished painters of the 18th century, was born at Auszig, in Bohemia, in 1728. His father, Ishmael Mengs, a Dane by birth, and an indifferent miniature painter, settled about this time at Dresden. He early instructed his son in the rudiments of art, and perceiving in him superior talents, he compelled him to exercise himself constantly in drawing, made him forego all recreation, and set him tasks which he was required to perform in a given time, and severely punished him if he failed. As he advanced, he instructed him in oil, miniature, and enamel painting. In 1741, when he was thirteen years of age, he took him to Rome, where he was employed in copying some of the works of Raffaele in miniature for Augustus III., Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, which were sent to Dresden, where they were greatly admired. While engaged in executing these works, his father exercised the greatest tyranny over him. He was left in the Vatican, to pass the day at his work, with no other food than bread and water, and at evening his studies were examined with great severity. In 1744, his father returned with him to Dresden, when he was appointed court painter by Augustus, with a salary. His royal patron permitted him, soon after, to make a second visit to Rome, to pursue his studies. His first great work was an original composition, representing the Holy Family, on a large scale, which was exhibited at Rome, and gained him great reputation. Here he committed an act of indiscretion, by marrying the pretty servant girl who had served him for a model. He was desirous of fixing his residence at Rome, but his father compelled him to return to Saxony in 1749, after an absence of four years. He remained three years at Dresden, when the tyranny of his father rendered his situation so distressing that his health became impaired, and he asked and received permission of his royal patron to return to Rome, and execute a commission he had received from him for an altar-piece for the Royal chapel. Soon afterwards he was deprived of his pension, from the low state of the king's finances, occasioned by the seven years' war, and being thrown upon his own resources, he wrought at low prices for the support of his family. He copied Raffaele's School of Athens for the Duke of Northumberland, and executed some easel pictures; but his reputation continued to increase, and he soon found abundant patronage. In 1754, he received the direction of the new Academy at Rome, and in 1757 was employed by the Celestines to paint the ceilings of the church of S. Eusebius, which were his first works in fresco. He soon afterwards executed his admired fresco of Mount Parnassus, in the Villa Albani, which has been finely engraved by Raphael Morghen. He also painted some easel pictures for Englishmen and other foreigners at Rome. About this time, also, he made an excursion to Naples, to execute a commission for the Elector of Saxony, where his merits were made known to the king of Naples, who soon afterwards succeeded to the throne of Spain as Charles III., and in 1761 invited Mengs to his court at Madrid, and granted him a liberal pension. His first undertaking was the ceiling of the King's ante-chamber, which he decorated with the Graces; and afterwards the Queen's apartment, where he painted one of his most celebrated works, the Aurora, a grand and beautiful composition. He also executed other works, among which were a Descent from the Cross, and the Council of the Gods. The air of Spain proving inimical to his health, he obtained permission to return to Rome for its re-establishment, where, immediately on his arrival, he was engaged by Clement XIV. to paint in the Vatican a picture of Janus dictating to History, and a Holy Family, which have been engraved by Cunego. After an absence of three years, he returned to Madrid, where he was received with every demonstration of respect by his royal patron, who loaded him with favors. He now commenced his celebrated work in the dome of the grand saloon of the royal palace at Madrid, where he represented the Apotheosis of the Emperor Trajan, a composition of extraordinary ingenuity and beauty. Throughout his whole life, Mengs devoted himself with the most untiring industry to the study and practice of his art, without taking necessary relaxation of exercise or society. Being naturally of a feeble constitution, his strength again failed him, and perceiving that the climate of Spain disagreed with him, he obtained permission from the king to return to Italy, with an increased pension. On his way, he stopped at Manaco to recruit, and while there painted his picture of the Nativity, in the Royal Collection of the King of Spain, in the style of the famous Notte by Correggio, in which the light emanates from the infant Saviour—one of his finest productions. It was so highly valued by his royal patron, that he ordered it to be covered with glass for its protection. It measures nine feet ten inches by seven. His feeble frame began to invigorate, and, as he approached Rome, his spirits brightened at the thought of passing the rest of his days in tranquillity with his family, in that world of art and taste. But his visions of happy years were not realized, for the death of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, happened soon after his arrival, and threw him into a most melancholy state of despondency, and he sunk into his grave in 1779, in the fifty-first year of his age, leaving a family of seven children. He left little property, besides his splendid collection of works on art, drawings of great masters, engravings, vases, and other articles of virtú, though he had received 180,000 scudi during the last eighteen years of his life. A splendid monument was erected to his memory by his friend Count d'Azara, by the side of Raffaëlle's; and another by the Empress of Russia, in St. Peter's.

The talents of men of genius are seldom properly appreciated during their life-time, and when they are, they are sure to gain rancorous and bitter enemies, as well as warm friends. Hence there is great dispute as to the merits of Mengs. The indiscreet zeal of his friends has not hesitated to rank his powers on a level with those of Raffaëlle, and the Abbe Winkelmann places him in a still more elevated rank. They call him the great luminary of modern times, and attribute to him the purity of the antique, the composition and expression of Raffaëlle, the grace and chiaro-scuro of Correggio, and the coloring of Titian. On the other hand, his enemies call him a plagiarist in his writings; an artist who had seen much and invented little; that he dispenses neither life nor death to his figures; excites no terror, rouses no passions, and risks no flights; that by studying to avoid particular faults he fell into general ones, and his execution bears the stamp of tameness and servility; that the contracted scale and ideas of a miniature painter are observable in most of his compositions, in which the delicate finishing shows the hand of an artist, but manifests no emanations of soul in the master. If it be beauty, it does not warm; if sorrow, it excites no pity. Pompeo Battoni called his pictures "looking glasses," i.e. that he was an enamel painter. But we are not to judge Mengs by his oil paintings, or his earlier works. There can be no doubt that posterity will award him a distinguished position; and Lanzi thinks that he even made an era in art. To form a just estimate of his ability, it is necessary to contemplate his best works which are undoubtedly his frescos in Spain. His composition is simple, noble, and studied; his drawing is correct and ideal; his expression founded on the dignified model of Raffaëlle; and his coloring in every respect excellent. He finished his pictures with the greatest care. If his works do not surprise us by the fiery soarings of a lofty imagination, or by the display of a novel and inventive genius, they satisfy the most scrupulous by the chaste arrangement of his ideas, and his careful and learned attention to propriety of costume. His acquaintance with the antique is profound, and his characters are distinguished by a quiet correctness, and a placid expression of tranquil beauty.

As a theorist, and a writer on art, Mengs is entitled to a distinguished reputation. His writings were published at Rome, by his friend, the Cav. d'Azara, in 1783, and are highly instructive to the artist, especially his remarks on the antique and his criticisms on Raffaëlle, Correggio, Titian, and other great masters. The libels in regard to his being a plagiarist, have been completely demolished by Winkelmann, Lanzi, and others. They have different titles, but all the same aim—the discrimination of real perfection in art. "The artist," says Lanzi, "as characterized by Mengs, may be compared to the orator of Cicero; both are endued by the authors with an ideal perfection which the world has never seen and probably never will see. It is the duty of an instructor to recommend excellence, that, in striving to attain it, we may at least acquire a commendable portion of it; therefore I should defend his writings when, in the opinions of others, he seems to assume a dictatorial tone in the judgment he passes upon Guido, Domenichino, and the Caracci, the very triumvirate he proposes as models in art. Mengs was assuredly not so infatuated as to hope to surpass these great men; but because he knew that no one does anything so well that it cannot be done still better, he shows where they attained the summit of art, and where they failed. The artist, therefore, as described by Mengs, to whose qualifications he aspired, and was anxious that all should do the same, ought to unite in himself the design and beauty of the Greeks, the expression and composition of Raffaëlle, the chiaro-scuro and grace of Correggio, and to complete all, the coloring of Titian. This union of qualities Mengs has analyzed with equal elegance and perspicuity, teaching the artist how to form himself on that ideal beauty which is itself never realized." Lanzi thus concludes his notice of Mengs, which is full of instruction to the artist: "As far as regards myself, I cannot but extol that inextinguishable ardor of improving himself by which he was so particularly distinguished, and which prompted him, even when he enjoyed the reputation of a first-rate master, to proceed in every work as if he was only commencing his career. Truth was his aim, and he diligently studied the works of the best luminaries of the art, analyzing their colors, and examining them in detail, till he entered fully into the design and spirit of those great models. While employed in the Ducal Gallery at Florence, he did not touch the pencil until he had attentively studied the best pieces there, and especially the Venus of Titian in the tribune. In his hours of leisure, he employed himself in carefully studying the frescos of the best masters of that school which is so distinguished in this art. He was accustomed to do the same by every work of celebrity which fell in his way, whether ancient or modern; all contributed to his improvement, and to carry him nearer to perfection. He was, in short, a man of most aspiring mind, and may be compared to the ancient who declared he wished 'to die learning.' If maxims like these were enforced, what rapid strides in the art might we expect! But the greater part of artists form for themselves a manner which may attract popularity, and then relax their efforts, satisfied with the applause of the crowd; and if they feel the necessity of improving, it is not with the design of acquiring a just reputation, but of adding to the price of their works."

MENGUCCI, DOMENICO, a painter of Pesaro, who studied under Gio. Andrea Donducci, at Bologna, and painted landscapes much in the style of his master. He flourished at Bologna about 1660, where his works were held in considerable estimation, and according to Malvasia, are found in the best collections.

MENGUCCI, GIO. FRANCESCO, a native of Pesaro, who studied at Rome under Cav. Lanfranco. According to Malvasia, he was an able artist, assisted his master in the execution of some of his grand cupolas, and afterwards painted much in oil for the collections. His works were highly esteemed.

MENHEERE, CORNELIUS LAURENS, a Dutch marine painter, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He went to England, and resided a long time at Flushing, where he painted many pictures, representing views of the city and sea-coast.

MENICHIINO, DEL BRIZZIO. See AMBROGI.

MENINI, LORENZO, a Bolognese painter, the scholar and assistant of Francesco Gessi. According to Dominici and others, Guido Reni had received a commission to paint the chapel of S. Gennaro at Naples. Belisario, leagued with Spagnoletto and others, threatened his life if he did not instantly quit Naples, which Guido immediately complied with. The commission was then offered to Gessi, the scholar of Guido, who, regardless of the threats of the intriguers, set himself about his work, when they inveigled his two assistants, Lorenzo Menini and Gio. Battista Ruggieri, on board a galley, which instantly set sail. They were never heard of afterwards, and are supposed to have been murdered. Gessi was then compelled to take his departure. It was this infernal band that drove all foreign artists of talents from Naples, and compelled Domenichino to fly to Rome, in spite of the protection of the government; and on his second return they are said to have caused his death by the constant excitement of their intrigues, or by poison.

MENISECLES. See MNESICLES.

MENJAUD, a French painter, the son of a Parisian notary, born about 1772. He gained the grand prize of the Academy, and visited Rome with the royal pension. In 1822 he exhibited at the Louvre a picture of the Death of the Duke de Berri, and another of the portraits of Raffaele, Tintoretto, and Aretino. In 1827 he also exhibited two pictures, Francis I. holding a wild boar, and Girodet bidding farewell to his Atelier. His masterpieces are said to be the Crowning of Tasso, and the Communion. He died in 1831.

MENODORUS, or MONODORUS, an Athenian sculptor, who lived in the time of Nero, about A. D. 60. He was principally distinguished for his statues of warriors, hunters, wrestlers, and priests. His masterpiece, however, was the marble figure of Cupid, executed for the Thespians, in imitation of the famous Cupid of pentelic marble, sculptured for that city by Praxiteles. The latter was first carried to Rome by Tiberius, and subsequently restored by Claudius; but being retaken to Rome by Nero, it was shortly after destroyed in a conflagration. This Cupid has been frequently copied.

MENTON, FRANCIS, a Dutch painter, born at Alkmaer in 1550. According to van Mander, he studied under Francis Floris, and painted history and portraits with reputation. The encouragement he met with as a portrait painter, induced him to devote himself almost exclusively to that branch. The few historical pictures by him are well designed, colored, and finished. He died in 1605. He established a successful school, and instructed many young artists. He is also said to have engraved a number of plates in a tasteful and delicate style.

MENTOR, an eminent Greek sculptor of the age of Pericles, who wrought principally in gold and silver, which he chased with unrivalled skill. Cicero and Pliny allude to his works; and the vases and goblets carved or chased by him are mentioned with high commendation by Propertius, Juvenal, and Martial. Some of the finest productions of his chisel adorned the temple of Diana at Ephesus. Crassus is said to have paid for two goblets of his workmanship the enormous sum of 100,000 sesterces.

MENZANI, FILIPPO, a Bolognese painter, who flourished in 1660. According to Malvasia, he studied under Albano, and was his attached disciple and faithful copyist, whose works might readily pass among strangers for those of his master.

MERA, PIETRO, a Flemish artist who, according to Ridolfi, flourished at Venice about 1600, and received many commissions for the churches, particularly for Sts. Giovanni and Paolo, and La Madonna dell' Orto. He was an able artist, and appears to have been educated in Venice, as his style is purely Venetian.

MERANO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Genoa, in 1632. He studied under Valerio Castelli, by whose recommendation he went to Parma, to study the works of Correggio and other great masters in that city, where he was employed by the Duke, and painted much for the nobility. On his return to Genoa, he painted some works for the churches, among which his Murder of the Innocents, in the church of Il Gesu, is one of his best performances. Lanzi commends it as a copious and careful composition, extremely well arranged and colored. He died, according to Zani, in 1698.

MERANO, FRANCESCO, called IL PAGGIO, a painter of Genoa, was born, according to Soprani, in 1619, and died in 1657. He studied under Domenico Fiasella, and was a reputable follower of his style.

MERCATI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Florentine painter and engraver, born at Citta San Sepolero, in the latter part of the 16th century. Some of his earlier prints are dated 1616, and his latest 1637. He was an imitator, if not a scholar, of Pietro da Cortona, and painted history in the style of that master, though he sometimes resembles the Caracci. He gained great reputation in his native city, where he painted several works for the churches, among which, his two frescos of the history of the Virgin, in the church of S. Chiara, and an altar-piece in S. Lorenzo, are highly commended by Lanzi. They resemble the Caracci in composition and design, in the variety and expression of the heads, and especially in the draperies, which are well cast in ample folds, and skilfully varied. There are some of his works at Venice, Rome, and Leghorn. In the cathedral in the latter city, is a picture by him of the Five Saints, executed with great care.

He also etched quite a number of plates in a free and spirited style, finished with the graver in a bold manner, which gives them a vigorous and brilliant effect. The following are by him :

A set of fifty-two plates of Ruins and Views in Italy; engraved in the manner of Sylvestre; Gio. Bat. Mercati, fec. Four Antique Figures, from the arch of Constantine; engraved in the style of Gallestruzzi; circular; Gio. Bat. Mercati. The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Correggio. St. Bibiana refusing to sacrifice to false Gods; after P. da Cortona.

MERCIER, PHILIP, a painter of French extraction, was born at Berlin in 1689, and was brought up in the Academy of that city. After visiting France and Italy for improvement, he went to Hanover, where he painted the portrait of Prince Frederick, and some of the nobility. He afterwards went to England, and when his Royal Highness came over, Mercier was appointed his painter, was taken into his household, and painted the portraits of several of the royal family. After nine years, he fell into disgrace and was dismissed from his service. He afterwards lived in Covent Garden, and painted portraits and domestic subjects, in the style of Watteau. He was a good portrait painter, and blended the manners of Rigaud and Kneller. He died in 1760.

MERCIER, JACQUES LE, an eminent French architect, born at Pontoise about 1590. After acquiring the elements of the art in his native country, he visited Italy, and remained there several years, studying with great assiduity the noble remains of antiquity, and the creations of modern genius. On returning to France, in 1629, he was commissioned by Cardinal Richelieu to erect the college de la Sorbonne, and six months after, the church of that name, which is considered one of the finest architectural works of the age. He was appointed architect to the king, and erected many important works, among which is the Palais Royal; the church de l'Oratoire, in the Rue St. Honoré; the church of the Annunciation, at Paris, &c. He commenced the church of St. Roch at Paris, but died before its completion in 1660. Dumesnil mentions three very rare prints engraved by this architect.

They are a design of the statue of Henry IV., erected at S. Giovanni de Laterano, in 1608; the design of a model (not executed) by Michael Angelo, of the church of S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, 1607; and the Catafalco at Rome, for the obsequies of Henry IV., July 1, 1610.

MERCIER, ANTOINE LE, a French engraver of little note, who flourished about 1633, and engraved among other prints, several slight but spirited etchings of architectural ornaments, &c., after the designs of P. Collo.

MERIAN, MATTHEW, the ELDER, an eminent Swiss designer and engraver, was born at Basle in 1593. Discovering an early inclination for art, he was sent to Zurich, and placed under the instruction of Dietrich Meyer, an engraver and glass painter, with whom he remained four years. On leaving that master he went to Frankfort, where he formed an intimacy with Theodore de Bry, whose daughter he married, and by whose instruction and advice he greatly improved himself. He executed a great number of plates of views in Germany, France, and Switzerland. His best works are a set of topographical plates of views in the environs of Heidelberg, Stuttgart, Schwalbach, and other places, which he afterwards published at Frankfort. They are all from his own designs, etched in a slight, free style, and finished with the graver. They give a perfect idea of the places they represent, though without much taste in the execution. He was the instructor of the celebrated Hollar. He died at Frankfort in 1651. His plates are usually marked with one of his monograms. For a full list of his works the reader is referred to Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon. The following are his best prints :

PORTRAITS.

David Pareus; Prof. Academiae Heidelberg. Daniel Sennertus; oval. Arnold Weickerdus, Med. Doc. 1626.

SUBJECTS.

A set of plates from Sacred History. The Last Supper, inscribed, Accipit Jesus panem; a large plate; very scarce. A large plate of the Picture of Human Life; inscribed, Tabula Cebetis, continens totius vitæ humanæ descriptionem; scarce. A set of seven Views in France. Six Views in Germany. Sixteen Views in Germany and Switzerland. Twelve Views of Gardens, &c. Twenty-four Picturesque Landscapes, with figures.

MERIAN, MATTHEW, the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding, born at Basle in 1621. He is said to have studied painting successively under Sandrart, Rubens, and Vandyck. Fuessli, his countryman, commends him as a good painter of history, and excellent in portraits, to which latter branch he devoted most of his attention, and was employed by many of the most distinguished personages in Germany. He was famous for his equestrian portraits, among the best of which is one of Count Serini, in an Hungarian uniform, with his right arm bared, and a sabre in his right hand, ready for the bloody strife; a picture admirably designed, and executed full of fire, with a coloring said to unite the depth of Rembrandt, with the tone of Rubens. His best historical pictures are the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, in the cathedral of Bamberg, and Artemisia mixing the ashes of Mausolus in her Cup. In dignity of conception, he has seldom been surpassed; his design was correct; and his coloring partook of the vigor of the Flemish school. He also etched a few plates. Time of his death not recorded.

MERIAN, MARIA SYBILLA. This celebrated paintress was the daughter of Matthew M., the Elder, born at Frankfort in 1647. Her father dying when she was four years old, her mother married Jacob Murel, a reputable painter of fruit and flowers, who, discovering in the child a taste for painting, took great pains to instruct her. She made surprising progress, and became skilful in painting fruit, flowers, insects, and still life in miniature. She afterwards studied with Abraham Mignon, and acquired great neatness of handling and delicacy of coloring. Her genius led her particularly to the study of natural history, and she designed every thing from nature. She usually painted in water-colors on vellum, and she soon made an extensive collection of drawings of butterflies, caterpillars, and other insects, in the various changes they undergo, with remarkable beauty and fidelity. She also drew frogs, toads, serpents, and other reptiles. In 1665, she married John Andrew Graff, an ingenious artist of Nuremberg, who had studied with Murel, and settled in that city. Not satisfied with the description of insects, and the metamorphoses, which she found in the works of the naturalists of the time, she formed the design of giving to the world her own observations and researches, illustrated with plates from her own designs, and partly etched by herself. In 1679, she published the first volume of her interesting work at Nuremberg, in German, under the title of The History of the Insects of Europe drawn from nature, and explained, by Maria Sybilla Merian, with their Generation and Changes, with the Plants on which they feed. The second volume appeared in 1683. Her zeal in pursuit of her favorite study induced her to make a voyage to Surinam, in 1698, for the express purpose of designing from nature the insects and plants peculiar to that climate. Soon after her return to Holland, she published at Amsterdam, in 1705, the fruits of her researches in a work in Latin, entitled Dissertatio de Generatione et Metamorphosibus Insectorum Surinamensium, illustrated with sixty plates. This work was augmented in a later edition by her daughter, Dorothea Graff, with twelve additional plates. Her drawings are executed with a truthfulness, delicacy, and beauty of coloring, that have seldom been surpassed. There are two large volumes of her drawings in the British Museum, one of the Insects of Europe, and the other of those of Surinam, which were purchased by Sir Hans Sloane, at the enormous price of five guineas for each drawing. Her pictures commanded high prices in her life time, and were much sought after. She died at Amsterdam in 1717.

MERIAN, GASPAR, a German engraver, probably a relative of the preceding family, who flourished about 1660, and published in that year a set of plates representing the Ceremonies of the Election of the Emperor Leopold.

MERIMÉE, J. F. L., a French historical painter, who flourished during the present century.

His principal merit consisted in the gradations of light and shadow, which he represented with the greatest delicacy imaginable. This excellence is well evinced in his picture of Travelers discovering the bones of Milo of Crotona, and endeavoring to ascertain, from the position of the arms, the manner of his death. His picture of Innocence, is well known at Paris, and has been finely engraved by Bervic. Merimée gained considerable distinction by his treatise on oil painting, which evinces an excellent knowledge of chemistry, and great research. It is entitled De la peinture à l'huile, ou des procédés matériels employés dans ce genre de peinture, depuis Hubert et Jean van Eyck jusqu' à nos jours. Paris, 1830, 8vo.—Merimée was appointed perpetual secretary of the Academy des Beaux Arts. He died at Paris in 1836.

MERLI, GIO. ANTONIO, an old painter of the Milanese school, who flourished at Novara in 1488. He was an excellent portrait painter, for his age, and painted many distinguished personages.

MERLIANO, GIOVANNI, an Italian sculptor and architect, born at Nola in 1478. He studied at Naples, under Agnello Fiore, and subsequently visited Rome for improvement. On his return to Naples, he wrought with great assiduity, and produced so many excellent works in sculpture, that his reputation exceeded that of any cotemporary Neapolitan sculptor. This is the judgment of Milizia, who says that the principal chambers of that city are decorated with the works of Merliano, among which are the Tomb of Andrea Bonifazio, in S. Severino; and the mausoleum of the Viceroy, Don Pedro di Toledo, in the choir of S. Giacomo. He also adorned La Punta del Molo with a fountain, in which were represented the four principal rivers of the world.

As an architect, Merliano erected, among other works, the church of S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli; and the church of S. Giorgio degli Genovesi. He reduced the Castel Capuano to a hall of justice; and designed the palace of the Prince S. Severo; which Milizia characterizes as "magnificent and well arranged." He also erected a triumphal arch in honor of the return of Charles V. from Tunis. At the invitation of the Viceroy, Don Pedro Antonio, he visited Spain, in company with other Italian architects, to embellish the gardens of that nobleman. Merliano was universally esteemed for his modesty and mildness of character. He passed a very tranquil life until his eighty-first year, and died in 1559.

MERLIN, JAMES and THEODORE VAN, two engravers, probably brothers, who, according to Florent le Comte, flourished about 1600, and engraved conjointly, some plates after Martin de Vos and other masters.

MERSION, MADELEINE LE, a French lady, who engraved some plates of landscapes and cattle, somewhat in the style of Dankerts, when he engraved after Berghem.

MERZ, JAMES, a Swiss painter, born at Besch, in the canton of Zurich, in 1783. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and studied the elements of design under Lips, an engraver of Zurich. After progressing under that master with great rapidity for some time, he visited Vienna for improvement, and was greatly assisted by the counsels of Fugger and Rod. Fuessli. He executed a number of portraits and historical subjects, characterized by correctness of design and delicacy of expression. His engravings of Canova, Lavater, and others, are fine specimens of the art. Merz would doubtless have attained great eminence, had he not died in 1807, at the early age of twenty-four. His premature decease was deeply regretted by the friends of art. The engraving of the monument erected at Vienna, in 1806, in memory of the Emperor Joseph II., was his last work.

MESA, ALONSO DE, a Spanish painter, who, according to Palomino, was born at Madrid in 1628, and studied under Alonso Cano. He painted history with reputation, and executed several works for the churches, convents, and public edifices in Madrid, of which, the most admired are a series of pictures of the life of St. Francis, in the monastery of the Franciscans. He died at Madrid in 1668.

MESA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Madrid about 1605. He painted for the college of the Jesuits de Alcala de Henares, a series of pictures illustrating the life of St. Ignatius Loyola, which were engraved in Flanders.

MESNIL, E., a French engraver, mentioned by Basan, who flourished about 1760, and engraved some plates after Mieris, Karel de Moor, and other Dutch masters.

MESSINA, ANTONELLO DA, an Italian painter, born at Messina, about whose history no two authors agree. He was the first to practise oil painting in Italy, and for this reason, some of the old Italian authors claim for him the invention of the art. According to Vasari, he was born at Messina in 1426, which most probably is not far from correctness; though others place it in 1414, and others again as late as 1447. The fame of Masaccio drew him to Rome, where he studied some time. He afterwards went to Naples, where he saw some oil paintings by John van Eyck, or John of Bruges, which had been brought to Naples from Flanders by some Neapolitan merchants, and presented or sold to Alphonso I., King of Naples. The novelty of the invention, and the beauty of the coloring, inspired Antonello with so strong a desire to become possessed of the secret, that he went to Bruges, and so far initiated himself into the graces of van Eyck, then advanced in life, that he instructed him in the art, with which he returned to Italy, and was the first who painted in oil in that country. From him the secret was communicated to Domenico Veneziano. Such is the account given by Vasari, and Lanzi, who had carefully investigated the subject, saw no reason to doubt its correctness in the main, though others give very different accounts. Lanzi and others have clearly demolished the claims of the Italians to the discovery of oil painting, and give it to the van Eycks. Those old paintings at Milan, Naples, Pisa, and other places, painted in oil, as was claimed, before the time of the van Eycks, have been carefully examined; and some of them being analyzed, were found to have been painted in distemper. Those at Pisa, were analyzed by the able chemist Bianchi, and though apparently colored in oil, the most lucid parts gave out only wax, clearly proving that they had been painted in the Greek encaustic manner. Lanzi says this method fell into disuse after 1360, and was succeeded by a vehicle that carried no gloss. Others were examined at Venice and Vienna, and no traces of oil were found; but the vehicle seemed to have been certain gums and yolks of eggs, which might easily deceive the eye of the less skillful. Lanzi says that after Antonello returned to Venice from Flanders, he concealed the discovery from every one, except Domenico Veneziano, who is known to have availed himself of it for many years, both at Venice and elsewhere. During this period, Antonello visited other places, and more especially Milan, whence he returned to Venice for the second time, and, as it is said, "received a public pension," and then he divulged the method of painting in oil to the Venetian professors, which, according to the inscriptions on his pictures, appears to have taken place about 1474. Other signatures are met with as late as 1490. So that he must have run a longer career than Vasari and Ridolfi assign to him. Two altar-pieces by his hand, are recorded, which were painted for the two churches of the Dominante; besides several Madonnas, and other sacred subjects, for individuals, and about four productions in fresco.—There is no doubt that he produced many others, both for natives and foreigners, relieving himself from the multiplicity of his commissions by the aid of Pino da Messina. His works are still preserved in many Venetian collections, and they display a very correct taste, united to a most delicate command of the pencil. Among others, is a portrait in the possession of the family Martinengo, inscribed Antonellus Messaneus me fecit, 1474. In the Council Hall of the Ten, is also a Pietà half-length, subscribed Antonius Messinensis.

MESSINA, PINO DA, was a scholar, and probably a relative of Antonello da M., whom he accompanied to Venice, and was an able assistant in the execution of his numerous commissions. He also painted some works of his own in the style of his master.

MESSINA, SALVO DA. This painter, according to Hakert, was a nephew of Antonello da M., and flourished about 1511. He was a successful follower of Raffaele, and, according to the above author, his Death of the Virgin in the sacristy of the cathedral at Messina, is in the pure Raffaelesque style. Lanzi says he was liberally educated, and bred to the law, which he abandoned, went to Venice, studied with Antonello, became the friend of Giorgione, and improved himself by the study of the works of the best masters. After many years' residence at Venice, he went to Milan to study the works of Leonardo da Vinci, where he corrected his former dryness of style; but the story of his having visited, or studied with da Vinci, Raffaele, and Correggio, cannot be true, as the first left Milan in 1499, the second was then a youth in Urbino, and the third in his infancy; but farther on he says that Salvo arrived at Messina in 1514, so that he might have seen Raffaele, who was invited to Rome by Julius II., in 1508. At all events, he was an excellent artist, and executed some works for the churches of Messina in the style of Raffaele, and was the first to introduce the style of that master into Sicily. The history of art is so full of contradictions, that we must often be satisfied with an approximation to truth.

MESSINA, PADRE FELICIANO DA, a Capuchin monk, was born in 1610. He first studied painting under Abraham Casembroodt, while that artist resided at Messina. He afterwards studied under Guido, in the convent of Bologna, and imbibed himself with his style. He painted some works in S. Francesco, the church of his order, at Messina, which are highly commended by Hakert, who assigns the palm to him "among the painters of his order, which boasted not a few."

METENSIS. See CORNELIUS MATSYS.

METGER, J. J., an obscure engraver, who flourished about 1672. There is a portrait of Cardinal Giovanni Nitardo by him, in Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold, indifferently executed.

METEZEAU, CLEMENT, a French architect, was a native of Dreux, and flourished in the 16th century. He settled at Paris, and was employed by Louis XIII. He acquired high fame by carrying into execution, conjointly with Jean Tiriot, a Parisian mason, the bold plan which Richelieu had formed for reducing Rochelle, by means of an immense dyke, in imitation of what Cæsar had done at Durazzo, and Alexander the Great at Tyre. This amazing work was completed in less than six months, and proved the principal means of compelling the surrender of the city. In honor of Metezeau's successful exertions in this grand undertaking, an engraved portrait of him was circulated in France, underneath which were the following lines:

"Dicitur Archimedes Terram potuisse movere, Æquora qui potuit sistere, non minor est."

METHODIUS. This painter was a native of Thessalonica, in Macedonia, and flourished in the latter part of the 9th century. In the year A. D. 853, while residing at Constantinople, he was invited to Nicopolis by Bogoris, the King of the Bulgarians, to decorate a banqueting hall in his palace. That prince left the choice of the subject to the artist, limiting him to those of a tragic and terrible character. The sister of Bogoris, during a long captivity at Constantinople, had become a convert to the Greek church, and greatly desired that her brother should renounce paganism; therefore it was probably at her instance in this case, that Methodius painted the Last Judgment. The terror excited by the representation of this awful subject, had the effect of inducing Bogoris, and subsequently the whole Bulgarian nation, to unite with the Greek church. From this time, Methodius appears to have laid aside the pencil. In concert with St. Cyrillus, he preached the doctrines of his religion to the Moravians and other Slavonian nations. He became archbishop of the Moravians and Pannonians, and died at an advanced age. The Greeks and Russians celebrate his holy-day on the 11th of May.

METRANA, ANNA, an Italian paintress, who, according to Orlandi, flourished at Turin about 1718, and acquired great reputation from her portraits. Her mother also was a paintress.

METRODORUS, an Athenian painter and philosopher, who flourished about B. C. 168. None of his works are mentioned, but Pliny says that, when Paulus Æmilius, the Roman Consul, vanquished Perseus, King of Macedonia, he demanded of the Athenians two men, one to educate his children, the other to paint his triumph. In acceding to this demand, they sent him Metrodorus, with the message that he greatly excelled in both philosophy and painting, which judgment was subsequently approved and confirmed by the Consul. Doubtless his merits were very great.

METTIDORO, MARIOTTO and RAFFAELLO, two Florentine painters, were brothers, and flourished about 1568. They were eminent ornamental painters, particularly in grotesque, and were the associates of Andrea Feltrini, which see.

METZ, CONRAD MARTIN, an eminent Swiss engraver, born at Bonn, in 1755. He went to London, and studied under Bartolozzi, and distinguished himself by the execution of a multitude of engravings in the chalk manner, and in aquatint, in imitation of the drawings of the old Italian masters. His principal plates are a set of fac similes of the drawings of Parmiggiano, in the Royal collection; another of those of Polidoro da Caravaggio, in the possession of Sir Abraham Hume, and numerous detached pieces, from authentic drawings in various cabinets. In 1801 he went to Rome, where he continued to exercise his ready talent at imitation, and otherwise engraving from works of the highest order, till his death in 1827. Nagler enumerates upwards of two hundred prints by him; nor is his list complete. His works are valuable, as they are correctly drawn, and convey a good idea of the originals.

METZU, or METSU, GABRIEL, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1615. It is not known under whom he studied, though he made the works of Gerard Terburg his model, whom he equals in the silky softness of his pencil, and surpasses in elegance and correctness of design. At an early period he settled at Amsterdam, where he soon rose to distinction, and his works were eagerly sought after. His pictures represent domestic scenes; conversations; ladies at the toilet, or playing on musical instruments; sick persons attended by the doctor; chemists in their laboratories; painters' shops and drawing schools, hung with pictures and drawings; still life and market-scenes, as women selling fish, game, fowls, fruit, vegetables, &c. These subjects have been frequently treated by Dutch and Flemish painters, but by few more successfully than by Metz. He carefully studied the works of Douw and Mieris, and avoided their defects; he is less minute in detail, and less labored in his finishing than those masters, and at the same time he excels them in lightness and spirit of touch, and in the chasteness and harmony of his coloring. Though his works are of small dimensions, he has been compared to Vandyck in the correct drawing of his heads and hands, the delicacy of his carnations, and the breadth and facility of his pencil. His works are rarely seen out of Holland, where they are held in the highest esteem, and command very high prices; but, for these reasons, they have been much imitated, to satisfy the foreign demand. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné and supplement, gives a descriptive catalogue of one hundred and sixty pictures by Metz. On the few pictures that bear his name, it is written Metsu, not Metzu. He was sadly affected with the stone—brought on, as is said, by his great assiduity and sedentary habits—which made necessary an operation that terminated fatally, in 1658, in the prime of his life. Balmema says this happened in 1669, and there is a picture in the Dresden gallery, bearing his signature, and dated 1667, which if genuine would corroborate this statement.

MEUCCI, VINCENTIO, a Florentine painter, was born in 1694, and died in 1766. He studied under Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole, and according to Lanzi, was one of the ablest fresco painters of his time. He was much employed in the churches at Florence and other places in Tuscany, and also at Bologna. In oil painting he did not succeed as well, for he wrought in too hasty a manner—an error into which all fresco painters, accustomed to rapid execution, are apt to fall.

MEULEN, ANTHONY FRANCIS VANDER, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1634.—His parents, being affluent, to gratify his passion for art, placed him under Peter Snayers the battle-painter, under whose instruction he made great progress, and surpassed his master before he left his school. Some of his works having been sent to Paris, they attracted the attention of Charles le Brun, at that time the arbiter of art in the French Capitol, who recommended him to M. Colbert, minister of State, as a proper person to immortalize the victories of his master, Louis XIV., and he was accordingly invited to Paris by the King, who gave him a pension of 2000 livres, besides a remuneration for his work. He attended the King in most of his campaigns, designing on the spot the sieges, battles, encampments, and marchings of the royal armies; also taking views of the towns and places rendered memorable by success. From these sketches he painted the principal battles and sieges of that monarch in Flanders, to decorate the royal chateau of Marly. Vander Meulen carefully studied and copied every object after nature; hence his pictures have a pleasing effect, although it is to be regretted that he was confined to the representations of modern military tactics and evolutions, and monotonous uniforms, than which nothing can be less picturesque. His works are admired for an exact and local representation of events, a bold design and animated pencil, and a clear and silvery tone of coloring. His landscapes are distinguished by the freshness of the verdure and foliage, the clearness and brilliancy of his skies, and the pleasing degradation of his distances. His figures are designed and grouped with great judgment, his touch is free and full of spirit, and the effect is heightened by a judicious distribution of his lights and shadows. If his pictures are less effective than those of Borgognone and Parrocel, it may perhaps be attributed to the restrictions under which he wrought, and they certainly have more nature and sweetness. Few painters could excel him in the various attitudes, motions, and actions of his horses. Vander Meulen also painted some pictures of huntings and cavalcades with equal success. His principal works are at Versailles and Marly, though there are many of his easel pictures dispersed through France, Flanders, and England. He is usually classed among the French painters, as he passed most of his days in that country. The battles and sieges of Louis XIV. by vander Meulen have been engraved in a set of large plates, some of them by Hughtenberg, and also in a set of smaller size. He was chosen a member of the French Academy in 1673. He died at Paris in 1690.

MEULEN, PETER VANDER, was the brother and scholar of the preceding, in whose style he painted battles and hunting-pieces. In 1670 he went to England, where he was employed by King William, the rival of Louis XIV., in celebrating his exploits. He was originally bred a sculptor, but abandoned the chisel for the pencil. He did not acquire much distinction. Time of his birth or death not known.

MEUNIER, LOUIS, a French architectural designer and engraver, who flourished about 1665. His works consist chiefly of views of royal residences and public places in Spain. Dumesnil gives a list of eighty-eight prints by him.

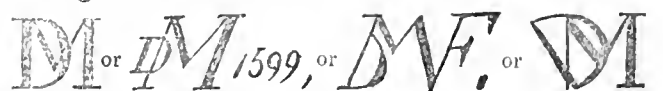

MEURS, J. V., a Dutch engraver, who was employed chiefly in engraving frontispieces and other plates for the booksellers, which are executed in a neat, finished style. He engraved a portrait of Tycho Brahe, the astronomer.

MEURS, C. H. VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam, about 1760. According to Basan, he engraved some plates after Mieris, Vanderwerf, and other masters.

MEUSNIER, PHILIPPE, an eminent French painter of perspective and architectural views. He studied under Jacques Rousseau, and on leaving that master went to Rome, where he resided several years, designing the most magnificent edifices in that metropolis. On his return to France, he was patronized by Louis XIV. and his successor. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and his works were held in high estimation. He was a skillful and correct designer. He died at Paris in 1734.

 MEYER, ANDREW, a Swiss painter and engraver, of whom little is known. According to Professor Christ, he was a native of Zurich, where he practised both painting and engraving. There are some prints of views of towns by him, which are marked with the above curious monogram.

MEYER, DIETRICH, a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1571. He engraved a set of portraits of the illustrious persons of his country, which are marked with one of the following monograms. He died in 1658.

MEYER, RODOLPH, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Zurich in 1605. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation, but he was more distinguished as an engraver. He executed quite a number of prints after his own designs, some of which are portraits and emblematical subjects. He made the designs for Death's Dance, engraved by his brother Conrad.

MEYER, CONRAD, was the younger brother of Rodolph M., born at Zurich in 1618. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Frankfort, and studied with Matthew Merian.

He was a man of wonderful industry, and executed a multitude of plates, in a free and spirited manner. Caspar Fuessli endeavored to make a complete collection of his prints, and got together upwards of nine hundred, and yet it was far from embracing all his works. He also painted a few historical subjects, and many portraits, well designed and colored, and executed with a spirited pencil. He died at Zurich in 1689. His prints embrace a great variety of subjects, as portraits, views, landscapes, emblematical pieces, sports, &c. The following are among his principal works :

A set of thirty Portraits of the Burgomasters of Zurich. Twenty portraits of the Clergy of Zurich. Forty Portraits of Laicks and Artists ; some of which are from the designs of his father and brother. One hundred and three portraits of the Reformers, Ecclesiastics, and literary characters. A set of sixty-one plates of the Dance of Death ; principally from the designs of Rodolph Meyer. A set of fifteen prints ; entitled the Mirror of a Christian. Twenty-six prints of the Sports of Children. Ten plates of the Ages of Man. One hundred and twenty-two subjects from the Old Testament.

MEYER, JOHN. This artist was probably of the same family as the preceding. He resided chiefly at Nuremberg, where he practised painting, and more especially engraving. He painted history and portraits, and executed many prints after his own designs, the principal of which are a set of battles, finished in a peculiar and beautiful manner, and a set of the Fountains of Rome, published at Nuremberg in 1600.

MEYER, FELIX, a Swiss painter, born at Winterthur in 1653. He was the son of a clergyman, who intended him for the church ; but his passion for the fine arts occasioned him to neglect his studies, till at length he was permitted to follow the bent of his genius, and was sent to Nuremberg, where he became the pupil of John Francis Ermels, a landscape painter. He made surprising progress, and was soon able to draw from nature with facility and correctness. In company with Roos and Rugendas, he was indefatigable in designing the most picturesque scenery of Switzerland, so favorable to the studies of a landscape painter. He afterwards went to Italy for improvement, and carefully studied and sketched the beautiful scenery and ruins that environ Rome. The climate proving inimical to his health, he returned to Switzerland, and pursued his studies among his own native mountains, till he acquired an extraordinary facility of hand. He designed everything from nature, and being indefatigable in the pursuit of excellence in his art, he made a multitude of sketches of the prospects, mountains, craggy rocks and precipices, with rivers and waterfalls, in Switzerland, sufficient to satisfy any painter of romantic compositions. From these, and other drawings he had made in Italy and Germany, he executed many noble landscapes, which procured him high reputation. He possessed an uncommon facility of invention, and Descamps relates the following instance of his extraordinary powers. In his travels through Germany, he visited the celebrated Abbey of St. Florian, at a time when the abbot was desirous of having two of the apartments decorated with landscapes in fresco. An artist of the country had been applied to for the purpose, and having been occupied several months in preparing designs, the abbot became impatient of his dilatory way ; and on Meyer's being introduced to him as an eminent artist, he took the liberty to consult him on the best manner in which the work could be accomplished. Our artist being shown the apartments, surveyed them for a few moments, and then, taking a long stick, to which he attached a piece of charcoal, immediately began to design, and in a few moments sketched the outline of a noble landscape on the wall, explaining as he proceeded to the Superior, who beheld in mute astonishment the elegance and taste of the design sketched before his eyes without any time allowed for reflection. At the Abbot's urgent request, Meyer undertook to decorate the rooms, which he did in a shorter time than the other painter had been employed in making his drawings. This adventure spread his reputation throughout Germany, and he was employed by several princes, as well as many nobles, in decorating their palaces.

In the earlier part of his life, Meyer designed everything from nature, and finished his pictures with great care and attention ; and, as he could not design figures well, he often employed his friends, Melchior Roos and George Philip Rugendas, to insert them in his works, and these are esteemed his best performances. After he began to paint his large works in fresco, and found abundant employment, he no longer designed from nature, and finished his works with negligence and haste, so that his later easel pictures do not compare with his earlier works. He etched a few landscapes after his own designs, among which are a set of twelve Views in Switzerland, nearly square, signed Felix Meyer fec ; four Italian landscapes, with ruins and figures, same mark, 1701 ; four Views in Switzerland, with figures ; and four mountainous Landscapes, with buildings. He died in 1713.

MEYER, or MEYERLE, FRANCIS ANTHONY, a German painter, born at Prague in 1710. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Italy, where he passed the rest of his life, and where his works are to be found. He painted historical subjects and domestic scenes, of small size, in the exquisite style of the Flemings. Lanzi says the royal collection at Turin was enriched by the addition of nearly four hundred pictures by the best Flemish masters. About this time, Francisco Antonio Meyerle, commonly called Monsieur Meyer, from Prague, was court painter at Turin. He did not acquire so much fame from his larger works as from his small pictures, in the Flemish style, which indeed were excellent. He was also a fine painter of portraits. The Bishop of Vercelli possesses one of an old man, scrutinizing some object with an eye-glass, executed with great truth and humor. In the same city, where he spent his latter days, his works are frequently met with, and the smaller they are in size, the more are they prized. He died at Vercelli in 1782.

MEYER, HEINRICH, a Swiss painter and designer, born at Zurich in 1759. He produced few pictures in oil, but he obtained a high reputation for his works in water-colors, and other drawings from antique remains and from the works of the great Italian masters, which he executed in an exquisite manner. His principal work is an allegory of human life, represented by children, as a painted frieze, in the palace at Weimar. He also distinguished himself as a writer on art. He died in 1832.

MEYER, HENDRICK, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1737. He painted landscapes, chiefly in water-colors and India ink, and these works are held in high estimation. His design is correct, his compositions easily understood, and his landscapes are well furnished with objects; but his oil paintings are somewhat deficient in vigor, from his having practised so much in water-colors. He resided a long time at Haerlem, where he was appointed one of the Directors of the Academy. Late in life he went to England, and died in London in 1793.

MEYER, HENRY, an English engraver, born in London in 1782. He studied under Bartolozzi, and engraved both with the point and in mezzotint. His best prints are his portraits, which he managed very skillfully, and to which he chiefly devoted himself. He died in 1846. The following are among his best prints:

Admiral Nelson and Lord Cathcart; after Hoppner. The Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold; after Chalon. Miss O'Neal in the character of Belvidera; after Devis. Mr. Matthews in various characters; after Harlowe. Sir John Nicholl; after Owen. Mary anointing the feet of Jesus; after Hilton. Sir Roger de Coverly; after Leslie. The Proposal and the Congratulation; after Harlowe. The Stolen Kiss; after Kidd. The Dancing Bear; after Witherington; and other popular subjects of the day.

MEYER, JOACHIM, a German wood engraver, who flourished at Strasburg about 1570. There is a set of sixty-two wooden cuts by him, representing a variety of combats with the sword.

MEYER, JEAN LOUIS, DE KNONAN, was born at Zurich in 1705, and died there in 1785. His life was chiefly devoted to science, but he designed and engraved the prints to illustrate his Book of Fables, published at Zurich in 1758.

MEYERING, ALBERT, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1645. He was instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, Frederick Meyering, an indifferent artist. When about twenty years of age, he went to Paris, where he resided some time with no great encouragement; but he contrived, by perseverance and rigid economy, to raise money enough to enable him to proceed to Italy. At Rome, he met with his friend and countryman, John Glauber, with whom he studied with great assiduity the most remarkable views in the vicinity of that city. His abilities procured him the esteem and friendship of some of the first artists at Rome, and he met with sufficient employment to induce him to continue his residence in that capital for several years. After an absence of ten years, he returned to his own country an accomplished artist, with his friend Glauber; and they were immediately employed by William, Prince of Orange, in painting the ceilings and otherwise decorating the palace of Loo and the chateau of Soesdyk. He now found abundant employment in decorating the halls and saloons of the wealthy and the nobility. In Italy he had acquired a free pencil and a ready hand, which peculiarly fitted him for that kind of compositions. His views are agreeably varied, frequently embellished with the ruins of ancient architecture, and decorated with figures representing historical or mythological subjects, in the style of Gerard Lairese. There is a grandeur in the taste of his trees and buildings, a richness in his ornaments, a clearness in his skies, and a transparency in his water that gives singular satisfaction to the beholder. He painted many easel pictures, which were handled in an excellent manner. He also etched a few plates of landscapes, after his own designs, in a free and painter-like manner. Bartsch describes twenty-six prints by him. He died at Amsterdam in 1714.

MEYERS, JEREMIAH, a German painter, born at Tubingen about 1728. He went to England when he was about fourteen years of age, and became a pupil of Zinck, who at that time had acquired great fame for his miniature and enamel paintings. Meyers acquired great reputation for his miniatures, and was considered one of the ablest artists of his time in his particular branch. He was honored by being appointed miniature painter to the Queen, and was one of the forty original members of the Royal Academy, at its foundation in 1768. He died at London in 1789.

MEYNIER, CHARLES, a French historical painter, born at Paris in 1768. He first studied engraving under Choffard; but was afterwards placed by an elder brother, Meynier St. Phal, under Vincent. In 1789 he gained the grand prize of the Academy, and visited Rome with the king's pension. After studying the antique, and the best works of art in that city, he returned to Paris. His pictures are often too highly labored, and evince considerable mannerism, particularly in the similarity of his heads; but they are characterized by excellent judgment of composition, and correctness of design. Meynier was appointed member of the Institute, of the Academy of Fine Arts, and of the Legion of Honor; also Professor in the Ecoles Royales. He established a school of painting exclusively for ladies, which produced many scholars, among whom was Madame Hersent. Among the principal works of Meynier are three pictures of subjects from French history, in the Museum Historique at Versailles; Phorbias presenting Œdipus to the Queen of Corinth, in the Louvre; Telemachus in the Isle of Calypso; and Wisdom preserving for Youth the lineaments of Love. Meynier died in 1832.

MEYSSSENS, JOHN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Brussels in 1612. He first studied painting under Anthony van Opstal, and afterwards with Nicholas vander Horst. He painted both history and portraits, but was particularly successful in the latter, and having painted that of Prince Henry of Nassau, his reputation was established, and he executed the portraits of the Countess of Stirum, Count de Bentheim, and other noble personages of the court. His greatest excellence consisted in producing a striking resemblance, while at the same time, he finished his pictures with great care, giving them a lively and good expression. One of his best pictures, is a portrait of Admiral van Tromp, in the Museum at Amsterdam. He afterwards settled in that city, where he not only painted portraits, but carried on an extensive commerce in prints, and engraved many plates after his own designs, as well as other masters, among which are several portraits of eminent artists. As an engraver, he is not entitled to much praise. His plates are executed in a style every way inferior to what might have been expected from his abilities as a painter. It is proper to observe here, to put readers on their guard, that Balkema gives this artist a double life, applying the same facts to two persons, under the names of Jan Meyssens and Jan Meytens; and Immerzeel mentions him as Jan Mytens. Pilkington, and all his editors, have copied these errors. He died at Brussels in 1666. The following are his principal prints :

PORTRAITS.

Charles I. Henrietta Maria, his Queen. Henry de Keyser, Architect and Sculptor; J. Meyssens, fec. Guido Reni; se ipse pinx. J. Meyssens, fec. Francesco Padouanino, Painter; se ipse pinx. Daniel Segers, flower painter; after Lievens. Cornelius de Bie; after Eras. Quellinus. William de Nieulant, painter. Mary Ruthven, wife of A. Vandyck; after Vandyck. John Meyssens, Painter and Engraver; se ipse pinx.

SUBJECTS.

MEYSSSENS, CORNELIUS, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp about 1636, though Nagler says in 1646, which is doubtless an error, as his print of Charles II. is dated 1660, and others bear earlier dates. He was instructed in engraving by his father. He engraved many plates of portraits, some of them after designs of John Meysens. They are executed with the graver in a stiff, tasteless style. He also engraved several frontispieces and other book ornaments; the following are his best works :

A set of Portraits of the Emperors of the House of Austria; entitled Effigies Imperatorum domūs Austriacæ, delineatæ per Joannem Meyssens, et æri insculptæ per filium suum Cornelium Meyssens. The Portraits of the sovereign Princes and Dukes of Brabant; entitled Les Effigies des Souverains Princes et Ducs de Brabant.—A part of these are engraved by P. de Jode, Waumans, and others.

DETACHED PORTRAITS.

Charles II.; for the History of Leopold. Octavius, Duke of Aremberg; C. Meyssens, sc. Cardinal Antonio Barberini. Cardinal Rinaldo, Principe Estense. John de Witt, Pensionary of Holland. David, Count of Weisenwolff, &c.

MEYSSONIER. See MEISSONIER.

MEYTENS, MARTIN DE, a Swedish painter, born at Stockholm in 1695. He studied in Italy, and afterwards settled at Vienna, where he painted portraits with sufficient reputation to be appointed painter to the Imperial Court. He died in 1770.

MEZIOS, M., an engraver, of whom little is known. Mr. Strutt says he executed some portraits in a neat, clear style, which possess great merit; among others, is one of Petrus Lothicus, Medicus et Poeta, prefixed to his works published in 1626.

MEZZADRI, ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, who flourished about 1688. Lanzi says that he so excelled in fruit and flowers, that the works of the famous Il Gobbo de' Caracci were scarcely superior to many of his productions.

MIAZZI, GIOVANNI, an Italian architect, born, according to Milizia, at Bassano, in 1699. He was originally bred to his father's trade of a carpenter; but by studying the works of Vignola, Scamozzi, Palladio, and others, he attained considerable ability in architecture, and erected a small theatre in his native town a casino for the Signori Caffi, of Bassano, and the church of La Trinità in the Borgo of Angarano. It was not until the age of forty, that he applied for regular instruction in the art, and availed himself of the abilities of Francesco Maria Preti, who was two years his junior. Placing himself entirely under the direction of that eminent architect, he adopted his plans and style, especially the proportions of the harmonic medium in the height of buildings, which he subsequently used in works of his own invention. He was commissioned to rebuild the church of S. Giovanni Battista at Bassano, and executed the work in a highly satisfactory manner, notwithstanding the numerous obstacles arising from the peculiarity of the site, and the conditions annexed to the commission. The Spineda Palace, at Venegazza, in the Trevegiano, excited much admiration for its elegant design, but has since been greatly injured by the demolition of the chapel and corresponding wing, and the arcades uniting them to the principal edifice. Miazzi also erected the beautiful theatre at Treviso. The design of this admirable work was by Bibiena, but was greatly improved by Miazzi, to whom are attributed the internal arrangements, the vestibule, and the façade. Even Milizia says that the work of Miazzi "corresponds exactly with that elegance and correctness which predominates throughout the whole interior building." Among his other works, are the Collegiate church at Schio; that at Valdagno; another at San Vito; and a fourth at Simonzo; besides that at the convent of Monte Gargano, in Puglia. Miazzi continued active and vigorous during his old age, and died about 1780.

MICARINO. See BECCAFUMI.

MICHAELIS, J. W., an indifferent German engraver of portraits, who flourished at Frankfort about 1700. He engraved several heads for a work entitled Notitia Universitatis Francofurtana, published in 1707.

MICHALLON, CLAUDE, a French sculptor, born at Lyons in 1751. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and visited Paris for improvement, where he was successively instructed by Bridan and Coustou. Devoting his entire energies with incredible assiduity to the prosecution of his art, he was successful in gaining the grand prize of the academy, and visited Rome with the royal pension. He formed an intimate connexion with Drouais, the historical painter, and at his death, was commissioned to execute the mausoleum erected in honor of that artist, in S. Maria in Via Lata. On returning to Paris, he practised the art with reputation for a number of years, and carried off several prizes in sculpture. He was killed by a fall in 1799, while laboring on a bas-relief in the Theatre Français.

MICHALLON, ACHILLE ETNA, a French landscape painter, the son of Claude M., born at Paris in 1796. Losing his father during infancy, he was reared in the family of his mother, daughter-in-law to Francine, sculptor at the Louvre, who attended to his education with the greatest care. Michallon studied under David, Valenciennes, and Bertin. He evinced such remarkable talents, that the Russian Prince Youssouppoff gave him a pension to assist him in his studies. In 1811, he drew the second gold medal of the Academy, and in 1817, the grand prize, which entitled him to the royal pension. He immediately went to Rome, where he spent five years, studying the works of the great masters. In 1819 he sent to Paris his picture of Roland at Roncesvalles, in the style of Salvator Rosa. His next production was the Combat of the Lapithæ and Centaurs, in the style of Poussin, evincing excellent progress, both in the disposition of his groups, and skill in the figures. After traveling through Italy and Sicily, Michalson returned to Paris in 1822, and exhibited a number of landscapes, among which were the Ruins of a Roman Circus, a Swiss Cascade, and a View near Naples. He died very suddenly, in the month of September, of the same year.

MICHAU, THEODORE, a Dutch painter, born at Brussels in 1676. He studied under Francis Bout, and painted landscapes and merry-makings, village festivals, &c., in which he attempted to imitate David Teniers the younger, with but very little success. He also painted landscapes and cattle. His earlier pictures are his best; his later ones are sketchy and insipid. It is said he became blind some years before his death, which happened in 1755.

MICHAULT, GEORGE, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1752. He studied under Francis Aliamet, and engraved some plates in the style of his master, among which are a part of the views of the Garden of Monceau, near Paris; Acis and Galatea, after la Fosse; and the Dead Christ, in the Orleans Collection, after Schiavone.

MICHEL, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1738. He studied under Chenu, whom he greatly surpassed. He went to England about 1780, and engraved several plates for Alderman Boydell. He died at London in 1804. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Sir Thomas Gresham; after Sir A. More. Rubens' Wife; after Rubens. Francis Hals; after a picture by himself. La Joconda; after L. da Vinci. M. F. A. de Voltaire.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Two prints of the Bath of Venus; after Boucher. The Death of Dido; after M. A. Challes. The Death of Hercules; do. Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar; after P. da Cortona. The Prodigal Son; after Salvator Rosa. Hercules and Omphale; after Romanelli. Venus and Cupid; after Carlo Maratti. The Death of St. Joseph; after Velasquez. The Three Graces; after Rubens. Faith, Hope, and Charity; do. The Nativity; after Carlo Cignani. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Guido. Clytie; a circular print; after Ann. Caracci. Cupid stung by a Bee; after West. Alfred dividing his last Loaf with a Pilgrim; do. The Continence of Alfred; do.

MICHELA, an Italian painter, mentioned by Lanzi. He flourished about 1740, and painted perspective pieces, ornamented with figures, in the royal castle at Turin, in competition with Lucatelli, Marco Ricci, and Gio. Paolo Pannini, all celebrated artists of the time.

MICHELE, PARRASIO, a Venetian painter, who studied under Paul Veronese, and was an exact imitator of his style of design and coloring. He painted several works for the churches, which, according to Zanetti, were worthy of his master, especially a Pietà, in a chapel of the church of San Giuseppe, into which he introduced a portrait of himself. He flourished about 1590.

MICHELINI, GIO. BATTISTA, a native of Foligno, was a scholar of Guido Reni, in whose style he painted. He wrought in the churches of the Romagna, and Lanzi says there are several of his works at Gubbio, particularly a Pietà, or Dead Christ, worthy of the school of Guido. He flourished about 1650.

MICHELINO, an old Milanese artist, ranked by Lomazzo among the best painters of his time; flourished at Milan about 1435. He retained the ancient style of making his buildings small and his figures large, a practice blamed by Lomazzo, even in the oldest painters; but his figures were spirited, and he painted animals wonderfully well.

MICHELOZZI, MICHELOZZO, an eminent Florentine sculptor and architect, born about 1402. He studied under Donatello, and obtained a patron in Cosmo de' Medicis, for whom he erected the edifice since denominated the Palazzo Riccardi, at Florence, a noble monument of the older Florentine style, simple and severe, but characterized by an air of grandeur and even magnificence. The façade consists of a lofty rusticated basement, with comparatively small apertures, above which are two ranges of large arched windows, seventeen on a floor, each divided into two lesser arches resting on a central column. The whole is crowned with a very rich cornice. The interior court has upper and lower porticos, with arches resting upon columns, and with an enriched frieze between the first and second arcades. Michelozzi was so sincerely attached to his patron Cosmo de' Medicis that, in 1433, he followed him into banishment, to Venice, where he resided some time; made designs for many public and private edifices, and erected the celebrated Library in the convent of S. Giorgio. On their return to Florence, Michelozzi greatly improved the court of the Palazzo Vecchio (originally built by Arnolfo,) in a rich, though somewhat fanciful style, inclining to Gothic. He was employed by Cosmo to enlarge and embellish a palace at Milan, bestowed upon him by Lodovico Sforza. Among his other works at Florence, is the Palazzo Tornabuoni, now Corsi; in the vicinity of that city, the villas Cafaggiuolo and Carregi; also a palace at Fiesole, for Giovanni de' Medicis, son of Cosmo I. His last work was the monumental chapel of the Annunciation, erected by Piero de' Medicis, in honor of Cosmo, in the Chiesa dei Servi, at Florence. Michelozzi died at the age of sixty-eight, probably about 1470.

MICOCARD, an old French wood engraver. Papillon mentions a wooden cut by him representing Diogenes, after Parmigiano. It is probably a copy of a wooden cut of the same subject by Ugo da Carpi.

MICON, an eminent Greek painter, and a sculptor of some distinction, was the son of Phanochus of Athens. He flourished about B. C. 450, and was the cotemporary of Phidias and Polygnotus. His history is less known than that of many other ancient Greek painters, but he was the most celebrated of them all, for painting horses. The Athenians selected Micon to perpetuate their great victories in the colonnades of the Ceramicus, which was enlarged or rebuilt by Cimon, after his victory over the Persians; and he was also appointed to paint the walls of the temple of Theseus at Athens; which sufficiently evince his high reputation.

Micon painted the Battle of the Amazons and the Athenians under Theseus, in the gallery of the Ceramicus. In the temple of Theseus he painted another battle of the Amazons and Athenians; and opposite to it the battle of the Centaurs and the Lapithæ. A third wall also was painted by Micon in this temple, but Pausanias says it was nearly defaced by age, so that the subject could not be ascertained. In concert with Polygnotus, Micon decorated the temple of the Dioscuri; he painted there the return of the Argonauts to Thessaly with Medea, Æsteropea and Antinœe, the daughters of Pelias. Pausanias remarks that the best part of these paintings was Acastus and his horses. It is observable that all of Micon's subjects are such as admit of introducing horses; and he showed so much skill in painting these animals, that one Simon, an Athenian writer, from whose knowledge of horses, according to Pliny, there was no appeal, could only say of Micon, that he represented his horses with lashes on their under eyelids. The criticism is correct, but Micon could not receive higher praise.

As a sculptor, Micon executed, according to Pausanias, the statue of Callias, the Athenian pancratiast, at Olympia. None other of his works are mentioned, and it is probable that they have all been destroyed.

MICON, a Syracuse sculptor, the son of Niccratus; flourished about B. C. 215. At the request of the children of Hiero II., he executed two statues of that monarch, one representing him on horseback, and the other on foot. They were both sent to Olympia.

MICONE, NICCOLO, called Lo Zoppo, the Cripple, was born at Genoa in 1650, and died in 1730. He excelled in landscapes, which, according to Ratti, he executed in the style of Carlo Antonio Tavello, with warm skies, beautiful distances, and pleasing effects of light and shadow; the trees, flowers, and animals, were gracefully touched, and true to nature. His works are much esteemed at Genoa.

MIDDIMAN, SAMUEL, an eminent English engraver, born in 1746. He studied first under Woollett, and afterwards with Bartolozzi, and he excelled in all the various modes of engraving. His forte was landscape, of which he left many beautiful examples; his two large plates for Boydell's Illustrations of Shakspeare, The Storm Scene in Winter's Tale, and the melancholy Jacques, in As You Like It, both engraved in line, vie with the best productions of Woollett; he also engraved several other plates, both for the larger and smaller Illustrations of Shakspeare; and others, after Berghem, Gainsborough, Barret, Zuccarelli, and Hearne. His Select Views in Great Britain, are admirably engraved, and were very popular, both in England and on the continent. He died at London, in 1818.

MIEL, CAV. JOHN, (not JAN.) called also BICKER, and by the Italians, GIOVANNI DELLA VITE, was born at a small village near Antwerp, in 1599. He studied under Gerard Seghers, and was one of his ablest scholars. Lanzi says he also studied under Vandeyck. On leaving his master, he went to Rome, and entered the school of Andrea Sacchi, where he gave such proofs of his genius, that Sacchi employed him to assist in his works at the Palazzo Barberini, where he represented a Procession of the Cavalry of the Pope. Miel, whose disposition and education naturally led him to the grotesque, introduced something ludicrous, which was deemed inconsistent with the dignity of the subject. This occasioned a dispute, and his dismissal. Stung with the reproaches of Sacchi, and stimulated by the advice of his friend Bernini, Miel visited Lombardy, for the purpose of improving himself by the study of the works of Correggio and the Caracci, and he also passed some time at Parma and Bologna. On his return to Rome, he was employed by pope Alexander VII. to paint a picture of Moses Striking the Rock, for the gallery of Monte Cavallo. He also painted a picture of the Baptism of St. Cyrillio, for the church of S. Martino de' Monti; and the Annunciation, and some frescos of the Life of St. Lamberti, in S. Maria dell' Anima. In these, and other considerable works at Rome and Turin, he showed himself capable of treating historical painting with dignity and success, though his genius and inclination turned to those familiar and lighter subjects, for which the Flemings were præeminent, and which, a short time before, were so successfully treated in Italy by Peter de Laer and Cerquozzi. On his first arrival at Rome, he adopted the subjects and manner of Bamboccio with great success, and his best works are his easel pictures of huntings, carnivals, fairs, markets, gipsies, beggars, conversations, and pastoral scenes, which are admired for their spirit and truth of design, the brilliancy of their coloring, the clearness of their tints, the delicacy of their penciling, and the great intelligence of their chiaro-scuro, in which respects, he is not inferior to Bamboccio, though he has less dignity in his heads, is less select in the choice of his forms, and less graceful in his attitudes. He was invited to Turin by Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, who appointed him court painter, and retained him in his service during the rest of his life. It was at this time, that he painted his celebrated hunting pieces and fables, in the saloon of the chateau of the Venerie, which were engraved by Tasniere. The Duke was so much pleased with the execution of these works, that he made him a knight of the Order of St. Mauritius, and presented him with a cross set with diamonds of great value, as a mark of his esteem. His pictures of huntings are particularly admired, in which he designed the figures, and every species of animals of the chase with uncommon beauty, spirit, and nature. His best works are said to be in the Grand Saloon of the Ducal Palace at Turin, and in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1648. He died at Turin in 1664.

John Miel etched a few plates from his own designs, in a masterly style, and with a charming effect. His point is free and playful, and his figures and animals are designed with great spirit. The following are by him: The Holy Family. The Assumption of the Virgin. A set of Four Pastoral Subjects; in one of them is a figure seated on a bank, picking a thorn from his foot. These are charmingly etched. Three Battle Pieces; for the History of the Wars in Flanders, by Flaminius Strada.

MIERHOP, FRANCIS VAN CUYCK DE, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges in 1640. He was of a noble family, and at first studied painting only for amusement. The vicissitudes of fortune at length reduced his family to indigence, when he experienced the benefit arising from his cultivation of the art. Unable to bear the shock, or from a feeling of false pride, he left Bruges, and settled at Ghent, where he acquired great reputation and abundant patronage. He particularly excelled in pictures of still-life, such as game, fish, fruit, and animals, in which he imitated the manner of Francis Snyders; and some of his best works approach those of that admired painter. In the monastery of the Alexines, at Ghent, is one of his pictures portraying dogs, dead game, and fish, which has frequently been mistaken by judges for a work by Snyders. He died at Ghent in 1701.

MIERIS, FRANCIS, THE ELDER, one of the most eminent of the Dutch painters, born at Leyden in 1635, and not at Delft, as asserted by Descamps. He was the son of a goldsmith and lapidary, who, discovering in his son an early inclination for painting, placed him with Abraham Toornvliet, an eminent painter on glass, and one of the best designers in the Low Countries, with whom he learned the elements of design. He next entered the school of Gerard Douw, with whom he made extraordinary progress, and was called by his master the prince of all his disciples. Being eager for improvement, he left Douw and went to study with Adrian vander Tempel; but not finding his expectations realized, he again returned to that master, whose taste and genius more nearly corresponded to his own, and he continued with him until he wanted no farther instruction, except in studying after nature. In fact, before he left Douw, his fame was bruited abroad as the prodigy of the age. His first work was executed at the commission of the Archduke of Austria, and excited universal admiration. It represented the interior of a mercer's shop, with a beautiful young woman showing various silks to a gentleman, who was evidently admiring the bonnie lass more than the goods. The Archduke was so much pleased with the performance, that he immediately invited him to Vienna, and offered him a munificent establishment, which his engagements or inclinations did not permit him to accept. When the Grand Duke of Tuscany visited Leyden, he was struck with admiration at the exquisite finishing of his works, and engaged him to paint a picture, which is regarded as one of his most admirable productions. It represents a young lady dressed in white satin, playing on a lute, with another female and a young man seated on a couch, to whom a domestic presents a silver salver with refreshments. He also painted for that prince his own portrait, which was placed in the Florentine Gallery. The works of Mieris are similar to those of Douw, though on a more extended scale. He sometimes painted portraits, but oftener conversations, mercer's shops, persons playing on musical instruments, chemists in their laboratories, patients attended by the doctor, &c. He had an unusual sweetness of coloring, a neat and wonderfully delicate touch, and the same transparency that characterizes the paintings of Douw, and they say he excelled him in several particulars; his design is more extensive, his drawing more correct, his pencil more free and spirited, and his coloring, by being less disturbed, is more pure and delicate, and that Douw only excelled him in the extraordinary finishing of his pictures. This, doubtless, is too high praise, and his warmest admirers ought to be satisfied to place him next in rank to that great artist. His manner of painting silks, velvets, stuffs, and carpets, was so remarkable that the different kinds and fabric of any of them could easily be distinguished. His works are exceedingly scarce, and command enormous prices whenever they are offered for sale. Most of them are now in the royal galleries of Europe. Smith, in his catalogue raisonné, vols. i. and ix., gives descriptions of one hundred and fifty pictures by him. He died in 1681.

MIERIS, JOHN, was the eldest son of the preceding, born at Leyden in 1660. He was instructed in the art by his father, but despairing of ever being able to equal him in the minuteness and delicacy of his finishing, without which he knew he could never hope to acquire any reputation in that line, he devoted himself to a different pursuit, and painted history and portraits, as large as life. After his father's death he went to Germany, and thence to Italy. He stopped first at Florence, where the fame of his father procured him a most honorable reception from the Grand Duke, who offered to retain him in his service. But Mieris declined the offer, and proceeded to Rome, where his abilities were already well known. He was unfortunately affected with the stone, and applying himself with great assiduity to his studies, his malady increased, and he died in the flower of life, in 1690.

MIERIS, WILLIAM, called the Younger, was the second son of Francis M., born at Leyden in 1662. He studied under his father, whose style he adopted with great success, so much so that some of his best works have been attributed to the elder Mieris, though he was much inferior to that master in every respect. At the age of nineteen, he was already an able artist, when the death of his father occurred. At first he continued to pursue the same course which had led his father to such excellence and renown; but afterwards he was induced by the fame of Gerard Lairese, whose works at that time excited universal admiration, to aim at a more elevated style, and to attempt to paint historical and mythological subjects, and also landscapes. This attempt, however, was not very favorable to his reputation, for his incapacity for designing the naked, and his ignorance of the proprieties of costume, rendered him totally inadequate to the dignity of history. His extreme labor in finishing, was also prejudicial to the effect of the whole; and his carnations, from their smoothness and polish, have the appearance of ivory. He did not succeed much better in landscapes. His best pictures are his domestic subjects, which are deservedly held in high estimation, and are admitted into the choicest collections. Smith gives a descriptive list of one hundred and sixty pictures by this master. He also modeled in clay and wax, in so sharp and accurate a manner as to show that he would have distinguished himself as a sculptor, had he devoted himself to that art. He died in 1747.

MIERIS, FRANCIS, called the Younger, was the son of William Mieris, born at Leyden in 1689. He was instructed in the art by his father, painted similar subjects, and endeavored to imitate his style, but with comparatively little success. His design is heavy and tasteless, his touch dry and hard, and his coloring false and unnatural. He was industrious, however, and bestowed a great deal of time in copying the works of his father; and though these are said to be so much inferior that the least experienced collector cannot mistake them for the works of William M., yet there can be little doubt, from reading the accounts of different authors, that at least some of the works of this artist are attributed to his father, and greatly tend to injure his reputation; for there is a great contradiction about the real merits of William Mieris, some ranking him nearly equal to Francis Mieris the Elder in his best works, while others put as wide a distinction between them as they do between William Mieris and his son Francis. Time of his death not known.

MIERS, a Dutch painter who, taking a part in the revolutionary troubles, fled to London in 1788, where he acquired considerable reputation by his landscapes, with figures and cottages, which are well designed and executed; his figures and trees are finished with care and neatness. He also excelled in water-colored drawings. He died in 1793.

MIGER, SIMON CHARLES, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1736; died in 1820. He studied under Charles Nicholas Cochin the younger, and engraved a number of plates of historical subjects, in a neat, clear style. He acquired considerable distinction, and was a member of the Academy of Painting. He executed most of the portraits which illustrate the Histoire de la maison de Bourbon; all the designs for the Menagerie du Museum; and several plates for the Voyages of Cassas. The following are among his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

David Hume, Historian; after Cochin. John Stanley, Musician; do. Count Maurice de Bruhl; do. Christopher Gluck, Musician; after Duplessis. Laurent Cars, Engraver; after Peronneau. John James Rousseau; after Le Moyne. Francis Mieris, Painter; after a picture by himself.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Hereules strangling Anteus; after Voiriot: engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1777. The Flaying of Marsyas; after C. Vanloo; his other reception plate. Hereules and Omphale; after Dumont. The Rape of Europa; after Hüllé. A View of the Coast near Civita Vecchia; after Vernet.

MIGLIARA, GIOVANNI, an eminent Milanese painter of the present century, born in 1785. He excelled particularly in painting interiors of ancient edifices, and his pictures of the Cathedral at Milan, and the Portico of the church of S. Ambrogio in the same city, have been highly praised. At Paris, in 1817, there were exhibited by the purchasers three of his paintings, representing the Interior of the grand court of the Milanese Hospital; a View of the Canal of Milan; and a colonnade of the Baths of Maximus Aurelius. Migliara subsequently executed many excellent works, which were exhibited at Turin, Milan, and Paris. He was appointed painter to the King of Sardinia, and Cavalier of the Order of Civil Merit, instituted in 1831, by the King, Charles Albert. He died at Milan, in 1837.

MIGLIONICO, ANDREA, a Neapolitan painter, and a scholar and imitator of Luca Giordano. According to Dominici, he acquired considerable reputation, and executed many works for the churches at Naples, the Descent of the Holy Ghost in the church of S. S. Nunziata, which is highly commended. He had a fertile invention, a correct design, harmonious coloring, and great facility of handling, though he was somewhat deficient in grace. He died about 1710.

MIGNARD, NICOLAS, an eminent French painter, born at Troyes in Champagne, in 1608. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he went to Fontainebleau, where he had the advantage of studying the works of Primaticcio and Il Rosso, the antique statues, and other works collected by Francis I. He afterwards went to Italy to complete his education, and studied diligently two years at Rome. On his return to France, he stopped at Avignon, where he married, settled, and acquired considerable distinction in his profession. From his long residence in that city, he was called Mignard of Avignon, to distinguish him from his brother, Pierre Mignard, who was called the Roman. By the advice of Cardinal Mazarin, he was invited to Paris, and employed to execute several important works in the palace of the Tuileries, among which are Apollo crowning the Muses of Poetry, Painting and Music; Apollo and Daphne; and Mercury presenting a Lyre to Apollo. He acquired considerable distinction, was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and afterwards appointed Rector, which office he held till the time of his death. He had a good invention, his composition is ingenious, his design dignified and correct, his coloring agreeable, his carnations lively, his attitudes and expressions graceful, and there is an abundance of union and harmony in his works. He also painted many portraits of distinguished personages, though his genius inclined him more strongly to historical compositions, and more especially to classic and poetic subjects, particularly those which call for an expression of the gentler emotions. Some of his works have been admirably engraved by Antoine Masson and others. He also etched a few plates in a bold and spirited style, among which are a set of eight prints after pictures of Annibale and Agostino Caracci, in the Farnesian Gallery. He died at Paris in 1668.

MIGNARD, PIERRE, called the Roman. This eminent painter was the younger brother of Nicolas M., born at Troyes in 1610. His father intended him for the profession of medicine, and after giving him the preliminary education, sent him to Bourges, and placed him with an eminent practitioner of that city; but young Mignard paid more attention to drawing than to physic, and without the help of an instructor painted the portraits of the professor and his family, which excited surprise. The commendation he received for these performances induced him to abandon his medical studies, and to place himself under the tuition of Jean Boucher, a reputable painter in that city, with whom he continued two years. He then proceeded to Paris, and entered the school of Simon Vouet, where he studied some time. About this time the Marquis de Crequy, the French ambassador to Rome, returned to Paris, and brought with him some valuable paintings by the Italian masters. Mignard being allowed to study them, soon perceived that Italy was the great centre of the art; and he accordingly proceeded to Rome, where he resided twenty-two years, and hence acquired the name of Mignard the Roman. He lived in habits of the closest intimacy and friendship with Charles Alphonse du Fresnoy, who had been his fellow-student with Vouet, during the residence of the latter in that metropolis, and derived much advantage from the counsels of that excellent theorist. He studied diligently the works of the best masters, particularly of Raffaele and Annibale Caracci. His pictures of the Virgin and other holy subjects, designed and executed in the graceful and dignified style of Raffaele, were greatly admired at Rome. He acquired a distinguished reputation in that city, and found abundant employment. He also distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and was patronized by Pope Urban VIII., Alexander VII., and many of the nobility. He executed some works for the churches, the principal of which is a picture of the Trinity, in S. Carlo; and a Holy Family, in S. Maria in Campitelli. He was invited back to Paris by Louis XIV., and on his way, passing through Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, he was honored by the princes of those cities, whose portraits he painted. Louis sat to him ten times for his portrait, and had such a respect for his talents that he ennobled him, and after the death of le Brun appointed him his principal painter and director of the manufactories. Mignard was chosen a member of the Academy, and was successively appointed professor, rector, director, and chancellor of that institution. His principal historical works in France are his great cupola in the church of Val-de-Grace, and twelve frescos in the Gallery at St. Cloud, which are highly commended. He also painted the portraits of many of the nobility. The works of Pierre Mignard are not distinguished for commanding genius, or great originality of invention, but they claim our approbation for richness of composition, a learned and correct design, a classic elegance of forms, an amiability of expression, and a harmonious coloring, though not rich, nor very vigorous. Several of his works have been engraved by some of the most distinguished French engravers, as Gerard Audran, Poilly, Roulet, Nanteuil, &c. There is a spirited etching by him, representing St. Scholastique kneeling before the Virgin. He died at Paris in 1695.

MIGNARD, PIERRE, a French architect, the son of Nicolas M., and the nephew of Pierre Mignard the painter, was born at Avignon in 1640. He traveled through France and Italy, studying and copying the finest monuments of architecture, after which he settled at Paris, where his father was residing. He was commissioned to erect the Abbey de Montmajour, near Arles, which gained him great reputation; and he was intrusted with many important works. Among them were the façade of the church of St. Nicolas, and the Porte St. Martin. The Abbey de Montmajour was subsequently destroyed by fire, and was rebuilt precisely according to the designs of Mignard. He was one of the six architects who founded, in 1671, the French Academy of Architecture, of which he was appointed professor, and continued to discharge the functions of that office until his death, in 1725.

MIGNON, or MINJOHN, ABRAHAM, an eminent German fruit and flower painter, born at Frankfort in 1639. His father was a merchant, but failing in his business, and being reduced to necessitous circumstances, his friend Jacob Murel, an eminent flower painter, took the child, and discovering in him a genius for painting, instructed him in his art, in which he made such progress that at the age of seventeen he surpassed his master. Murel carried on a considerable commerce in works of art; and about this time, his business leading him to Holland, he took his pupil with him, and recommended him to the especial care of John David de Heem, whose works were held in the highest estimation. Under the instruction of this able master he made such progress, and deported himself with so much urbanity, that he won his friendship and favor, so that he rendered him every assistance in his power. The pictures of Mignon were soon universally admired, and so much sought after, that with all his industry he could hardly execute all the commissions he received. He founded his manner on that of de Heem, but he improved himself by studying nature with the most curious and exact observation. He has seldom been surpassed in the selection of his objects, in the picturesque manner of his composition, and in the beauty and freshness of his flowers and fruit, which have all the bloom of nature. His butterflies and other insects seem to live and feed, and the dew drops on the leaves have all the transparency of real water. He died in 1679.

MIGNON, JEAN, an obscure French engraver, who executed a few plates. Among them is one of Abraham purchasing the Cave of Machpelah, signed Io. Mignon. fec.

M or M or M MIGNOT, DANIEL, a French engraver, who flourished about 1593. He engraved a few plates, among them a set of ornaments for goldsmiths, marked with one of the above monograms.

MIKKER, JOHN, a Dutch landscape painter, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1650. He painted well wooded landscapes, ornamented with cottages, or gentlemen's parks with country residences, in rather a dark tone of color. He was the first instructor of J. B. Weenix, whose earliest pictures are painted in his style, for which reason the works of Mikeker are sometimes passed upon the ignorant for those of Weenix.

MILANESE, IL. See CITTADINI. See GUGLIELMO DELLA PORTA.

MILANESE, FELICE, an Italian painter, by whom there is a spirited etching of the Virgin and Infant seated on a throne, with a Bishop, and several children, signed Felice Milanese. fec.

MILANI, GIULIO CESARE, a Bolognese painter, born in 1621. He studied under Flaminio Torre, and was the most successful and the most eminent follower of his style. He executed many works for the churches at Bologna, and in the adjacent cities. His most esteemed productions in his native city are the Marriage of the Virgin, in the church of S. Giuseppe; St. Antonio di Padova, in S. Maria del Costello; and a Holy Family at the Servi, which are pronounced such excellent performances as not to be "disgraced by the proximity of such powerful competitors." Lanzi says "he was the most eminent of Torre's disciples, and he was rather admired in the churches at Bologna, and extolled in many adjacent states." He died in 1678.

MILANI, AURELIANO, was the nephew of Giulio Cesare M., born at Bologna in 1675. He first studied with Cesare Gennari, and afterwards with Lorenzo Pasinelli. He did not attach himself to the style of either of these masters, but enamoured with the works of the Caracci, he devoted himself a long time in copying their compositions entire, as well as in part, repeating his designs of the heads, the feet, the hands, and the outlines, till he caught the spirit, without borrowing the forms. Crespi remarks that no one showed more of the manner of the Caracci in the naked figure, and in the symmetry and whole character of his paintings; and, next to Carlo Cignani, no one did more to maintain the dignity and credit of the Bolognese school. Lanzi says he was not so excellent in his coloring. His principal works at Bologna are the Resurrection, in the church of La Purità; the Stoning of St. Stephen, in S. Mascarella; and St. Jerome, in S. Maria della Vita. He went to Rome, where he resided a long time, and found abundant patronage from the churches and individuals. The best at Rome, perhaps, is the Beheading of St. John the Baptist, in the church of the Bergamaschi. He died in 1749.

MILANI, GIOSEFFO MARIA. This painter was born at Pisa in 1678. He studied under Camillo Gabrielli, and following the example of his instructor, he attached himself to the style of Pietro da Cortona. On leaving his master, he applied himself to the study of perspective, and made designs after the most magnificent buildings, ancient and modern, in Pisa and elsewhere, which he afterwards introduced into his compositions with great effect. He excelled in perspective and architecture, which he embellished with figures elegantly designed, and grouped with great ingenuity, and his coloring was rich and harmonious. He acquired great reputation, and executed many works in fresco for the churches at Pisa and in other cities. One of his best works is a grand ceiling in the church of S. Matthew, in his native city. He borrowed so much from Cortona that he has been accused of plagiarism.

MILANO, AGOSTINO. See AGOSTINO DI BRAMANTINO.

MILANO, ANDREA, a painter of Milan, who flourished in 1495. He was an able painter, and his altar-piece at Murano extorted the admiration of Zanetti. There is no certainty about this artist. Vasari's annotators call him Andrea Salai, and Battoni says his name was the same as Andrea del Gobbo, mentioned by Vasari in his life of Correggio. Lanzi thinks otherwise, and that he was a Venetian painter, or at least had studied in Venice, from his style and coloring.

MILANO, ANDREA DA. See SOLARI.

MILANO, FRANCESCO DA, a painter whose name is found on an exquisite altar-piece in the parish church of Soligo, quite in the style of Titian, dated 1540.

MILANO, GIOVANNI DA, was a favorite pupil of Taddeo Gaddi, and one of his ablest scholars. He painted much at Florence and in Lombardy. To him, and to Jacopo di Casentino, Taddeo on his death-bed commended his two sons for their protection. He flourished about 1370.

MILBERT, JACQUES GERARD, a French landscape painter, born at Paris in 1766. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, which he cultivated with assiduity; and in 1795, he was appointed professor of the Ecole des Mines. In that capacity he was sent by government to the Pyrenees, to design the various localities supposed to be rich in mineral wealth. In 1798 he was appointed a member of the scientific commission to Egypt, but was unavoidably prevented from visiting that country. In 1800 he was appointed chief designer of the Australian expedition commanded by Baudin, composed of the two corvettes Geographe and Naturaliste. Ill health compelled him to stop at the Isle of France, where he remained two years, and collected the materials for his pictorial work, published in 1812, entitled Voyage pittoresque à l'Île de France, au cap de Bonne Esperance et à l'île de Teneriffe. Paris, 1812; 2 vols. 8vo. In 1815, Milbert visited the United States, in the suite of the French Consul General, commissioned by the French Minister, M. Hyde de Neuville, to make researches in natural history. After employing nine years in this mission, he returned to Paris; and his discoveries gained him great reputation, being highly praised by Baron Cuvier. Milbert subsequently published his pictorial work, entitled L'Itinéraire pittoresque du fleuve Hudson et des parties laterales de l'Amerique du Nord, d'après les dessins originaux pris sur lieux. Paris, 1827—1829; 2 vols. 4to., with an atlas. Milbert died at Paris in 1840.

MILÉ, FRANCIS, sometimes called FRANCISQUE, and often wrongly written Millé or Millet, was born at Antwerp in 1644. His father was a Frenchman, and had accompanied the Prince of Condé, to whom he was attached, into the Netherlands, at the time of the revolt. He showed an early inclination for art, and his father placed him with Laurent Franck, under whom he made great progress, and whose daughter he married at eighteen years of age. Having contracted a friendship with Abraham Genoels, they studied together after nature, and increased each other's ardor by a friendly emulation, which, with an unreserved communication of observations, ideas, and sentiments, greatly tended to the advantage of both. Milé was remarkable for such a tenacious memory that he could copy any scene he had observed in nature, or any particular picture which had struck his fancy, and what was still more extraordinary, he could readily recollect every remarkable aspect of nature, as the form of any particular cloud, or tints in the skies, and those evanescent beauties that pleased his eye and imagination. Soon after his marriage he went to Paris, where he made the works of Nicholas Poussin his study and his models. According to D'Argenville, he traveled through England and Holland, leaving in those countries abundant proofs of his ability. On his return to Paris he acquired much distinction, was received into the Academy, and his works were held in high estimation. The favorite subjects of Milé were heroic landscapes, in the style of Poussin; and though he was unequal to that master, he approached him nearer than any of his countrymen, or perhaps any other painter; like that master, his scenery is always appropriate to and in harmony with his subject. He was a strict observer of the propriety of costume, his pencil was broad and facile, and his coloring appropriate and agreeable, though in some of his pictures there is too great a monotony, and a want of intelligence in the distribution of his masses of light and shadow. He died in 1680. in the prime of his life, as some say, by poison administered by some one of his profession, envious of his merit and reputation. There are a few etchings by this able artist, after his own designs, which are much admired for their picturesque subjects, and their light and spirited execution. Among others are the following:

A Landscape, with Egyptian Ruins, with the subject of Moses saved from the waters of the Nile; Francisque, in. Another grand Landscape, with the History of Cephalus and Proeris. A Mountainous Landscape, with figures, and a town in the middle. Six other Landscapes, of various sizes. The Two Friends. The Voyagers. An Ancient City.

MILIZIA, FRANCESCO, an eminent Italian writer on architecture, of a noble and opulent family, born in 1725, according to his own authority, at Oria, a small town in the province of Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples. At the age of nine years, he was placed under the charge of his maternal uncle, who was practising the medical profession at Padua. After remaining with the latter until the age of sixteen, he ran away from Padua to Rome, and joined his father, who sent him to Naples, to study logic and metaphysics under the celebrated Genovesi, and physics and geometry under Padre Orlandi. Desiring to see more of the world, he quitted Naples with the intention of going to France; but the low state of his finances prevented his going farther than Leghorn. After this, he was obliged to content himself with living a half studious, half indolent life at Oria; but at the age of twenty-five, he married a young lady of good family at Gallipoli, and having obtained a handsome allowance from her father, he went to Rome, and ultimately settled with his wife in that city, in 1761. He then began to apply his energies to the study of architecture, and published his Lives of the Architects, entitled Vite dei più celebri Architetti, antichi e moderni, Rome, 1768, 8vo. The second edition appeared under the title of Memorie degli Architetti antichi e moderni, Parma, 1781, 8vo. It may rather be termed a history of the art, than a biography of architects. In 1772, Milizia published his Trattato Completo formale e materiale del Teatro, Rome, 1772. This work excited so much scandal on account of certain observations in it, as to cause its suppression by withdrawing the copies; but it was subsequently reprinted at Venice. His next work was the Principi d'architettura civile, Finale, 1781; Bassano, 1785; Ibid. 1825, 3 vols. 8vo.—This was considered the best production of Milizia, and greatly extended his reputation, being almost the first attempt to base the art upon rational principles, and to expose the pedantry with which it had been taught. It is moreover written in an attractive style, and the criticisms are characterized by highly caustic qualities. On the latter account, although admired by young artists, it was censured by many more advanced professors, who charged the author with speaking too freely of many eminent names, with attacking high authorities, and propounding his own views without regard to the example of others. His work entitled L'Arte di Vedere nelle Belle arti del disegno, Venice, 1781, is perhaps more fearless and unsparing than the preceding. It is written with great eloquence, and attacks Michael Angelo and others, in a very spirited style. For a specimen of his criticisms, the reader is referred to the article BUONAPORTI. He was appointed Royal Superintendent of the Buildings in the States belonging to the King of the two Sicilies, but he resigned the office in 1786, preferring to be free from the responsibility.

Milizia published a work entitled Roma delle Belle Arti di Disegno, Bassano, 1787, 8vo.; and his Dizionario delle Belle Arti, Bassano, 1797, 2 vols., 8vo., which latter is chiefly a translation from the French work Encyclopédie Méthodique. After this, disgusted with the attacks upon his Roma, he desisted from publishing the first and second parts which he had prepared of this work, abandoned the Fine Arts, and devoted himself to the study of Natural History. He died at Rome in 1798.

The works of Milizia are pervaded with great severity of criticism, and a general tone of causticity, which render it highly improbable that he possessed an impartial judgment. He seems to delight in finding as much fault as possible with every work of architecture, and gives the good qualities but a slight prominence. Notwithstanding this hyper-critical disposition, he undoubtedly possessed an intimate knowledge of architecture; his works have overthrown many incorrect ideas based upon false principles, and sanctioned by nothing but the prestige attached to great names. They have greatly promoted the dissemination of the principles of pure architecture. His criticisms, if taken with proper allowance for his peculiarity of temper, may be safely relied upon. His Lettere Inedite, addressed to the Count San Giovanni, first published at Paris in 1827, serves to portray his disposition, and abundantly proves that he abhorred pedantry, dogmatism, quackery, and false enthusiasm. Milizia's writings were published in one entire collection at Bologna, in 1826, 9 volumes 8vo.

Pommereul has translated his first work into French, under the title of Essai sur l'histoire de l'architecture, précédé d'observations sur le bon gout et les beaux arts, La Haye, 1819, 3 vols. 8vo. Mrs. Cressy has also translated this work into English, under the title of Milizia's Lives of Celebrated Architects, Ancient and Modern, London, 1826, 2 vols., 8vo.

MILLER, ANDREW, an Irish engraver, who flourished at Dublin about 1740. He executed some portraits in mezzotinto, which possess considerable merit; among others are the following:

Dean Swift; after F. Bindou. 1743. Robert Boyle, Philosopher. Charles Lucas, M. D. of Dublin. Robert Joselyn, Lord of Newport, Chancellor of Ireland. 1747.—Josiah Hort, Archbishop of Taum. Eaton Stannard, Recorder of Dublin. Joseph Baudin, Painter. Joseph Miller, Actor, in the character of Teague. John Harper, in the character of Jobson. Snowdon, in the character of Caius, in the siege of Damascus. Turbutt, in the Character of Sosia, in Amphitruon.

MILLER, J., an English engraver, who flourished in London about 1760. He engraved many plates, chiefly portraits, which possess considerable merit. The following are the most interesting:

King George III.; ad vivum. Queen Charlotte; do. Jeffrey, Lord Amherst. George Bridges Rodney, Lord Rodney. Charles Townsend, Chancellor of the Exchequer. Thomas Gray, Poet. Charles Churchill, Poet. Sir John Vanbrugh. John Wilks, M. P. and Chamberlain of London.

MILLER, JOHN SEBASTIAN. See MULLER.

MILN, ROBERT. a Scotch engraver, who flourished at Edinburgh about 1710, and engraved some plates of Scottish antiquities for a work entitled Miscellanea quædam Erudita Antiquitatis, quæ ad Borealem Britannia majoris partem pertinent, &c.

MILOCCO, ANTONIO, an eminent painter of Turin, the friend and companion of the Cav. Claudio Beaumont, in whose style he painted, but with far less merit. He flourished in the first part of the 18th century. Lanzi says he was more dry in his design than Beaumont, less cultivated in his taste, and inferior to him in all the qualities of a painter; but from his peculiar facility, he was much employed by individuals, and sometimes by the court.

MILOT, an obscure French engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1620. He engraved some frontispieces, portraits, and other book plates, in a rather neat, but stiff and tasteless style.

MINDERHOUT, HENDRICK, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1637. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted marines and seaports, particularly views of Antwerp and Bruges, and other ports in the Netherlands. His works evidently show that he designed every thing from nature; his shipping in particular, are drawn with great accuracy and precision. His works are usually of a large size, and possess the merit of a bold design, a spirited pencil, a pleasing tone of coloring, and an intelligent management of the chiaro-scuro, which give them a fine effect.— He was elected a member of the Academy of Antwerp, and painted for his reception piece a splendid view of the port of Antwerp, with a variety of shipping, and many figures, which adorns their hall. He afterwards settled at Bruges, where he practised his profession the rest of his days.— There are some of his best works in the public edifices of that city. He was elected a member of the Society of Painters of Bruges in 1660. He was an unequal painter, and in the latter part of his life, seems to have painted with negligence and haste. His best works are highly esteemed, and are found in the principal collections in Flanders. He died at Bruges in 1696.

MINGA, ANDREA DEL, a Florentine painter, who studied under Ridolfo del Ghirlandaio, and who is recorded by Orlandi and Bottari, as a fellow student with Michael Angelo. His works are generally indifferent. Lanzi says his Prayer in the Garden, in the church of the Holy Cross, rivals the works of any of his cotemporaries; hence it is alleged that he was assisted in its execution by his friends. He was living in 1568.

MINGOT, TEODOSIO, a Spanish historical painter, and a native of Catalonia, born in 1551. Palomino erroneously states that he studied under Michael Angelo at Rome, for Angelo died when he was only thirteen years of age; but he was a pupil of Gaspar Becerra, at Madrid, an eminent painter, who had studied with Buonarrotti. It is believed, however, that he visited Italy, where it is said he acquired a correct and elevated style of design. He was also a vigorous colorist. He was employed by Philip II. in the palace of the Prado, where he executed some excellent works, all of which perished in the conflagration that destroyed the edifice. He died in 1590.

MINI, ANTONIO, a Florentine painter, and a favorite pupil of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. He did not acquire much distinction for original works, which was difficult in that glorious age of painting, but there is an anecdote, connected with his history, worth recording. Angelo, when he had finished his famous picture of Leda for Alphonso, Duke of Ferrara, offended at the manner of one of the courtiers who came for it, refused to sell it to that prince, and gave it to Mini, who took it with him to Paris. Vasari describes it as "a grand picture, painted in distemper, that seemed to breathe on the canvass." Mariette also asserts that he saw the picture, and that in coloring "it approached the tone of Titian." Mariette is probably describing a copy in oil, as D'Argenville informs us that the original was destroyed by fire in the reign of Louis XIII.

MINNEBROER, FRANS, a Flemish historical painter who flourished at Malines about 1540. Little is known of him. There is a Flight into Egypt in the church of Notre Dame in that city, and the Visitation to St. Elizabeth in the church of the same name in Hanswick, by him, which are considered remarkable productions.

MINIATI, BARTOLOMEO, a Florentine painter, was a scholar and able assistant of Il Rosso. He accompanied that artist to Paris, and assisted him in the great works he executed for Francis I.

MINIERA, BIAGIO, a reputable painter, commended by Orsini, was born at Ascoli in 1697, and died in 1755. Some of his works are to be found in the churches in his native place.

MINNITI, MARIO, a Sicilian painter, born at Syracuse in 1577, and died in 1640. According to Hackert he was a good artist, and executed several works for the churches in his native city.

MINORELLO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, born at Esté in 1624. He studied under Luca Ferrari at Padua. According to Lanzi, on the death of his master, he contributed to support the reputation of the Bolognese school in that city, where are some of his works. He died young in 1657.

MINOZZI, BERNARDO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1699, and died in 1769. He studied landscape painting under Nunzio Ferraiuoli, and struck out into a style of his own, which gained him considerable reputation. He painted in fresco, distemper, and water colors. He was distinguished most for his landscapes in water colors, painted on fine paste-board, which were much admired and sought after, both at home and abroad.

MINZOCCHI, FRANCESCO, called IL VECCHIO DI SAN BERNARDO. This painter was born at Forli in 1513. He first studied the works of Marco Palmigiani in his native place, and his earlier productions, as the Crucifixion, at the Osservanti, are designed in the stiff formal style of that master. He afterwards changed his manner by studying with Girolamo Genga, and, as some writers add, with Pordenone, assuming, in his subsequent productions, a more correct, graceful, and animated style, with an expression that looks like nature herself. He acquired great reputation, and executed many works for the churches in his native city and elsewhere. Lanzi says his works are so much esteemed at Forli, that whenever a chapel was taken down, his pictures were carefully cut out of the walls and replaced elsewhere. Among his best works are two pictures in a chapel of the cathedral of Loretto, representing the Sacrifice of Melchisedec and the Miracle of the Manna, in which the prophet and principal characters have all the dignity of character, nobleness of drapery, and splendor of coloring belonging to the school of Pordenone; but Lanzi says he represented the crowd in the most popular features and attitudes, almost sufficient to excite the envy of Teniers, and the most popular painters of the Flemish school; his various and numerous animals are painted to the life, and his baskets and different utensils appear like reality, though the attempt to excite mirth in treating a serious subject always detracts from its dignity. Scannelli extols one of his frescos in the church of S. Maria della Grata at Forli, representing the Deity on a ceiling, surrounded by angels; the figures are full of spirit, majestic, varied, and painted with a power and skill of foreshortening which entitles him to greater celebrity. There are other excellent works by him in the cathedral and the church of S. Domenico at Forli. He also painted many easel pictures for the collections. He died in 1574.

MINZOCCHI, PIETRO PAOLO, and SEBASTIANO, were the sons and scholars of the preceding, but far inferior to him. They painted easel pictures of historical subjects, and executed some works for the churches at Forli. Lanzi says they "painted in the same natural style as their father, but they were not above mediocrity in invention, not select in their forms, and their works had little relief."

MIO, GIOVANNI DI, an eminent artist of whom little is known with certainty, save that, from the archives of Venice, he painted in the Library of St. Mark about 1556, in competition with such eminent artists as Schiavone, Porta, Zelotti, Franco, and with Paul Veronese himself. He is supposed to have been a native of Vicenza, and perhaps a pupil of Gio. Battista Maganza. Lanzi thinks he may be the same as one Fratina, recorded by Ridolfi, as one of the assistants in ornamenting the Library. But this degrades him in the face of the authentic document before cited.

MIOZZI, NICCOLO, and MARC' ANTONIO, two reputable painters of whom little is known, who, according to the Guida di Rovigo, were natives of Vicenza, and flourished about 1670. They painted in the style of Giulio Carpioni, of whom they were probably scholars.

MIRADORO, LUIGI, commonly called IL GENOVESINO, a painter of Genoa, who, according to Lanzi, after having learned the first principles of the art in his native city, went young to Cremona, towards the beginning of the 17th century, and began to study the works of Panfilo Nuvolone. He afterwards formed a manner partaking much of the Caracci, though less select and studied, but bold, large, correct in coloring, harmonious, producing a fine effect. He settled at Cremona, where he opened a school for the instruction of young artists, and executed some excellent works for the churches and public edifices of that city and elsewhere. Among his most esteemed works are a picture of St. Gio. Damasceno, in the church of S. Clemente, at Cremona; and a Pietá, or Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin, in the Merchants' College at Piacenza. In all subjects he was successful, and remarkably so in those of a terrific cast. He also painted some excellent works for the collections. Lanzi says that, though this artist is unknown in his native city, and is not mentioned by Orlandi, he nevertheless is held in high repute in Lombardy, and particularly in Cremona. The time of his birth or death is not known, but one of his works in S. Imerio, bears date, 1651.

MIRANDOLA, DOMENICO, an eminent Bolognese painter and sculptor, who, according to Malvasia, was educated in the school of the Caracci, and acquired much distinction. Lanzi says, that when Pietro Facini opened his academy at Bologna, Mirandola quitted that of Lodovico, and entered the former, became a celebrated sculptor, enriched himself with the spoils of both, and kept an open studio, regulated according to the method of his first masters, which, for this reason, was called by some, the school of the Caracci. Mirandola had possessed himself of the casts, &c., of the Academy of the Caracci, which was closed on the death of Lodovico. But Lanzi must be in error, for Facini died in 1602, Lodovico in 1619, and Mirandola in 1612, according to his monument in the church of S. Tommaso at Bologna. According to Lanzi, he was one of those kind of men who gain more reputation, by management and address, than by true merit.

MIRANDOLESE, IL. See PIETRO PALTRONIERI, and GIUSEPPE PERRACCINI.

MIRE, NOEL LE. See LEMIRE.

MIRETI, or MIRETTI, GIROLAMO, a reputable old painter of Padua. There are authentic notices of him and his works from 1423 to 1441. Lanzi says this artist is the famous Nicolo Moretto commended by Vasari, which see.

MIRETTO, GIOVANNI, an old artist of Padua, supposed by Lanzi to have been a brother of the preceding. There is one of the largest pictures in the world in the great Hall at Padua, consisting of a mixture of sacred and historical subjects, the signs of the Zodiac from Igino, and of the various operations carried on during the respective months of the year, besides some curious ideas evidently suggested by some learned man. This work was formerly attributed to Giotto; but Morelli, in his Notizia, upon the authority of Campagnola, says it was executed conjointly by an artist of Ferrara and Gio. Miretto of Padua. Lanzi says this discovery justifies his previous opinions of his being unable to prevail upon himself to ascribe such a work to Giotto, although executed in his style.

MIREVELT, or MIREVELDT, MICHAEL JANSEN, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1568. He was the son of a goldsmith, who, perceiving in him an early inclination for art, placed him with Jerome Wierix, an eminent engraver. When he was twelve years of age, he executed a plate of Christ and the Woman of Samaria, and soon after another of Judith with the Head of Holofernes. These juvenile performances attracted the attention of Anthony de Montfort, called Blocklandt, who advised him to apply himself to painting, and took him into his school. On leaving that master, he at first devoted himself to historical painting, and executed some altar-pieces for the churches at Delft; but having painted the portraits of some of the princes of the House of Nassau, which were universally admired, he ever after gained such abundant and profitable employment in that branch that he devoted himself entirely to it. He executed an incredible number of portraits, Houbraken and others say five thousand; but Landart, Descamps, and others, swell it to ten thousand—which number, though he is supposed to have lived to a great age, was assiduous and wrought with great facility, is beyond credibility. He studied and imitated nature exactly, and gave striking likeness; designed his portraits in good taste; and finished them with great care. His pencil is free, his touch neat, and his coloring good. He obtained so great celebrity that he was invited to England by Charles I.; though the great plague, then raging in London, prevented his accepting an offer so much to his interest and honor. He never left Delft, except at particular times, when he went to the Hague, to paint the portraits of the princes of Nassau, who held him in the highest esteem. He received a very high price for his portraits, for the time in which he lived, obtaining one hundred and fifty guilders for the smallest size; and for full size, half and whole lengths, his charges were proportionably large. The portraits of Mirevelt are finely drawn and full of expression. Several of them were admirably engraved by his brother-in-law, James William Delft. He died in 1641.

MIREVELT, PETER, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Delft in 1596, and died young, in 1632. He painted portraits exactly in the style of his father, and in his best pictures was accounted no way inferior to him. One of his most esteemed works is in the Hall of the Surgeons of Delft, representing the portraits of the principal members of that institution at that time.

MIROU, ANTHONY, a Flemish painter, who flourished about 1640. Little is known of the events of his life. He painted landscapes and scriptural subjects, correct in design, and executed with a spirited pencil.

MIRUOLI, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, who, according to Vasari, was a native of Romagna, and flourished about 1570. He studied under Pellegrino Tibaldi, and executed several works in fresco in the churches at Parma. He acquired so much distinction that he was appointed court painter by the Duke, and died in his service. He also painted at Modena and Bologna, in which latter city are some of his frescos, in the church of the Servi.

MISCIROLI, TOMMASO, called IL PITTOR VILANO (rustic painter), was born at Faenza in 1636, according to Orlandi; died in 1699. He gained considerable reputation in his time, and executed some works for the churches. Lanzi says he owed his reputation rather to his genius or management than to any precepts of the art. In other words, he was what Fuseli terms a bold adopter. He took his attitudes and coloring from Guido, his draperies from the Venetians; and Lanzi says that his best works are equal to many of the Venetian school. This remark applies only to a few of his best works, executed with much care. His chief works are in the church of St. Cecilia at Faenza particularly an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of that Saint, in which he introduced an executioner stirring up the flames—a figure almost copied from Lionello's grand picture of the Martyrdom of St. Domenico, in the church of that saint at Bologna.

MISEROTTI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1750, and engraved several plates for the collection of prints from the paintings in the Gallery of the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

MITCHELL, J., a Scotch engraver, who flourished at Glasgow about 1765. He engraved a few plates of historical subjects, most of them executed entirely with the graver.

MITELLI, AGOSTINO, an eminent fresco painter, born at Bologna in 1609. According to Passeri, he acquired a knowledge of the human figure in the school of the Caracci, and was well grounded in perspective and architecture under Falchetta. He was not only one of the first perspective and architectural painters of his time, but an able figurist. Lanzi says, "his first labors proved very attractive to the public; not that they equaled the force, solidity, and reality of Dentone, but on account of their peculiar beauty and grace, such as to almost obtain for him the name of the Guido of ornamental architecture. Employing his own taste, he softened down the harder features of the art, made his elevations more delicate, the tints more mild, and added a style of foliage, scrolls, and arabesques, decorated with gold, which seemed to breathe of grace and elegance. The style of his ornaments was adapted to the nature of the edifice, and suited to the solemnity of the temple, the elegance of the saloon, or the splendor of the theatre. Each ornament filled its appropriate place at just intervals, and was executed with such delightful symmetry and harmony as to surprise and entrance the beholders, by the perfection of the illusion, and to remind them as it were of the enchanted palaces of the romancers." Mitelli's first assistants were two of his fellow pupils, Andrea Sighizzi and Gio. Paderna, with occasionally the figurist Ambrogi. But Michael Angelo Colonna alone seemed born to associate with him, as he did on the death of his favorite Curti (Dentone), and an intimacy and friendship sprung up between them, strengthened by interest and mutual esteem, which lasted till the death of Mitelli, and they wrought conjointly for twenty-four years, producing many magnificent works at Bologna, Rome, Parma, Modena, Genoa, in which Mitelli executed the ornamental, perspective, and architectural parts, and Colonna the figures. Among their most celebrated performances are the chapel of Rosario and the Palazzo Caprara, at Bologna; the Palazzo Spada, at Rome; and in the latter, Lanzi says, "they enlarged the ample hall, as it were, and dignified it by means of feigned colonnades, artful recesses, and magnificent steps, on which numerous figures, arranged in varied and novel drapery, were seen ascending and descending." In 1658, they were invited to Madrid by Philip IV., whose palace they decorated with several works, among which were a grand saloon in the royal palace at Madrid, in which Colonna painted his celebrated Fable of Pandora. Mitelli died at Madrid in 1660. He etched some plates of architectural ornaments, and a set of forty-eight friezes dated 1645, admirably designed, and executed in a spirited style. See Michael Angelo Colonna.

MITELLI, GIUSEPPE MARIA, was the son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1634. After having received instruction from his father, he entered the school of Flaminio Torre. He painted history with considerable success, and occasionally introduced the figures into the perspective pieces of his father. He executed several works for the churches at Bologna, the principal of which are St. Reniero healing the Sick, in S. Maria della Vita; a Pietà, in the Nunziata; and Christ taken in the Garden, at the Cappuccini. But he was more distinguished as an engraver, and he etched a great number and variety of plates from his own designs, and after some of the most celebrated masters. They are executed in a slight, feeble style, and the drawing is often incorrect. He possessed, however, a fruitful and inventive genius, which renders his works valuable. Bartsch describes one hundred and sixty-two prints by him, and Nagler has increased the list. He died in 1718. The following are his best prints:

SMF, or SM or GMA. MFI

A set of twelve plates after the most esteemed pictures in the churches at Bologna. The history of Æneas, in twenty plates; after the pictures by the Caracci, in the Palazzo Favi, at Bologna. The Cries of Bologna, in forty-one prints; after An. Caracci. The Adoration of the Shepherds; called the Notte; after Correggio. The Martyrdom of St. Erasmus; after Poussin. David and Goliath; after Titian. The finding of the Cross; after Tintoretto. The Rich Man and Lazarus; after P. Veronese. The twenty-four Hours of Human Felicity.—There are two additional prints, making a set of twenty-six, probably from his own designs. They were published at Bologna in 1675, and are now become scarce.

MNESICLES, an eminent Greek architect, who flourished in the time of Pericles, the golden age of Grecian art. He was chiefly distinguished by that magnificent portico, the Propylea, which formed the façade and entrance to the Acropolis or citadel of Athens. It was commenced B. C. 437, and completed in five years, at a cost of about $2,500,000. Each front had a Doric hexastyle portico, raised upon three steps; the columns were nearly five feet in diameter, and twenty-nine feet high, including the capital. From the west front was entered a vestibule fifty-nine feet two inches wide, which was divided into three aisles by Ionic columns, three on each side; these supported a marble ceiling, divided into lacunaria; these lacunaria are formed of blocks twenty-two feet long, and extended from the walls to the columns; some of them are now remaining. The wall at the end of the vestibule had five openings, in which were hung the gates of the Acropolis; the central one is much the widest. The eastern portico, to which there was an ascent by five steps, was entered through these gates; from hence there was a descent of three steps, to the level of the ground before the interior front. The whole was of white marble, with Doric columns; and the façade was ornamented with equestrian statues, on isolated pedestals. Among the ruins may be observed some of the members of the cornice, which were gilt, and other parts painted with a reddish ochre. Although the Turks have greatly injured this masterpiece of art, sufficient remains to immortalize the name of its architect.

MOCETTO, GIROLAMO, or HERONYMUS MOCETUS, an old painter and engraver, a native of Verona, who studied under Giovanni Bellini at Venice, and hence some call him a Venetian. Lanzi says he was one of the earliest and least polished of the disciples of Bellini, and that the Verone-nese boast the possession of his portrait, among those of the painters of the town in Scuola del Nudo, and an altar-piece in the church of S. Nazario e Celso, bearing his name, and dated 1493. He died about 1500. He is chiefly worthy of notice as an engraver. His works in this line are extremely scarce and valuable, as early specimens of the art. They are executed with the graver, in a neat but stiff style, and marked with one of the accompanying monograms. We have about a dozen prints by him, among which is the Resurrection, with four Soldiers; the Sacrifice, with many figures, from an antique bas-relief; the Virgin and Child, with St. John the Baptist and another Saint, now in the British Museum; the Virgin and Child seated on a Throne, with lattice work and trees; Men sacrificing a Pig; Judith, in a landscape with trees; a wooden cut of the Entry of Christ into Jerusalem. Mr. Ottley attributes two prints to him—the Calumny of Apelles, and a Nymph sleeping on a Bank, bearing a curious inscription. He also engraved some battle pieces and other subjects. Bartsch describes eight pieces by him under the name of Jerome Mozzetto. Zani denies that Mocetto engraved on wood.

MODANINO, IL. See CAV. GUIDO MAZZONI.

MODENA, BARNABA DA, an old painter of Modena, some of whose works are still found in excellent preservation. Lanzi says he was one of the first artists of his time. Two of his works are in the church and convent of the Conventuals, at Pisa. One represents the Coronation of the Virgin, and the other, the Virgin surrounded by St. Francis and other Saints of the Order. Morona praises the beautiful character of the heads, the draperies, and the coloring, and prefers him to Giotto. Della Valle mentions another fine altar-piece of the Virgin, in the possession of the Conventuals at Alba in Piedmont, which he says is painted in a grander style than any of his contemporaries. This picture bears his name, and date 1357.

MODENA, PELLEGRINO DA. The real name of this eminent painter was Pellegrino Munari. He is also sometimes called Aretusi, but generally Pellegrino da Modena, from the place of his nativity. According to Tiraboschi, he was born about 1485, which is evidently an error, as there is an altar-piece by him at Modena, dated 1497. Lanzi says he studied with his father, Giovanni Munari, who was also an able artist. In 1509, he painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Giovanni at Modena, which gained him great reputation. The celebrity of Raffaello, then in the zenith of his fame, drew him to Rome, where he became the pupil of that sublime master, who, quickly perceiving his talents, employed him to assist him in the great works in the Vatican. He was first employed in the open galleries, but he afterwards executed from the designs of Raffaello the histories of Jacob and Solomon in the Vatican, which Lanzi says were painted entirely in the style of his master, in an incomparable manner. After the death of Raffaello he remained some time at Rome, and executed some admirable works for the churches from his own designs, particularly some fresco histories of St. James, in S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli. On his return to Modena, with a distinguished reputation as one of Raffaello's ablest scholars, he found abundant employment in the churches and public edifices, till his brilliant career was cut short by a melancholy event. His son happening to quarrel with one of his companions, slew his antagonist in the fight that ensued. Pellegrino, apprized of the fatal accident, ran into the street to save his son from the vengeance of the relatives of the deceased, who, directing their fury against him, slew him on the spot. This tragic event happened in 1523, and was deeply deplored by his fellow-citizens. Another of his sons Tiraboschi conjectures to have been Cesare de Pellegrino Aretusi, the same artist who is called by many writers Modenese; but Zani says he was the son of another Pellegrino, a painter of Bologna, and a nephew of the present, which is contrary to the opinion of Lanzi, and the name Modenese would seem to contradict it. (See Aretusi.) Pellegrino was the only pupil of Raffaello who came near him in sublimity of style, and purity and elegance of design. Titi says that several of his pieces in the church of S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli at Rome "boasted figures designed and executed so truly in the manner of Raffaello, that the modern retouches they have received is a circumstance greatly to be deplored"; and Lanzi says that his celebrated picture of the "Nativity of our Lord, in the church of S. Paolo at Modena, seems to breathe, in every part, the graces of him of Urbino."

MODENA, NICCOLETTO DA, an old Italian painter and engraver, who flourished at Modena from 1500 to 1515. He painted perspective and architecture, but is better known as one of the earliest engravers in Lombardy. His plates are well designed, but are rudely executed with the graver, which clearly proves that he received no instruction in the art, but was obliged to work out his own system. Bartsch gives a list of sixty prints by him, of which thirty-six have his monogram, but in this matter he was very capricious, using various characters, rebuses and initial letters, as well as his name in full; and sometimes he omitted the distinguishing mark altogether. His prints are very rare, and much sought after by the curious collector. The following are the principal:

The Adoration of the Shepherds, marked with his name. St. Sebastian, with Niccolotto on a tablet. Another St. Sebastian, inscribed Ora pro nobis, Sancte Sebastiane. St. Jerome reading, with monogram. St. George, with name. A Triton embracing a Syren, marked N. M. on a tablet. A whole-length figure of Christ, with monogram. St. Sebastian, his arms tied over his head to a column, and body pierced with six arrows; marked with name. Another St. Sebastian, similar to the preceding, except that it is much larger, and body pierced with three arrows; marked with monogram. St. George in complete armor, with monogram; in the British Museum. St. Catherine, with name. Mars in armor, name on a tablet hung to a tree. Three Children, with name on a scroll. A Female wearing a Helmet, pouring incense on an altar; no mark. Persens and Pegasus, marked N. M. The Nativity. St. Cecilia. Christ crowned with Thorns. St. Jerome in penitence. A group of four Women, copy from Albert Durer. Hercules and the Cretan Bull. Two whole length figures on one plate. Two winged figures, supporting a Standard; in the British Museum. St. Roch. A Marine Monster holding a Sea-horse; a Boy with a Torch and Olive Branch, sitting on his tail; marked N. M. on a tablet. A Man crowned with Laurel, looking at some Geometrical figures; in the British Museum. David with the Head of Goliath, marked with monogram. St. Anthony, marked with monogram. A Saint, running with a large bag on his back; with monogram. Victory; a winged female figure, standing on the ruins of a large edifice; marked VICTORIA. N. R. Fame; a winged figure, sitting on some armor, writing FAMA VOLAT on a shield; marked N. M. Neptune, holding a Trident, and sitting on a chair, on which is written NEPTUNI SIMULACRON; marked with the letters ONRM. Mercury standing, marked N. J. RO. Another Mercury, marked N. R. on a vase. Four Children; Opus Niccoletti de Mutina on a tablet. The Vestal Lucia carrying Water in a Sieve, to prove her Virginity; marked with monogram. A Vase surrounded with a wreath of Roses, for a goldsmith's ornament; marked N. R. Another do., smaller size; same mark.

MODENA, or MUTINA, TOMMASO, an old painter who flourished at Modena in 1352. There has been a great deal of disquisition about this artist, among the Italian and German writers, arising from the fact that his altar-piece, in three compartments, representing the Virgin and Child, with Saints Wenceslaus and Palmatus, patron saints of Bohemia, was claimed to be an oil painting, and to have been executed in 1297. This picture was formerly at Carlestein, but is now in the Belvidere Gallery, at Vienna. The two following lines are inscribed upon it, in ancient characters:

Quis opus hoc finxit? Thomas de Mutina pinxit, Quale vides lector Barisini filius auctor.

It was, therefore, eagerly caught up by the German and Italian authors, to vindicate the claims of their respective countries to the honor of the invention of oil painting, in opposition to the Flemings. The indefatigable German historians traced his origin to Mutttersdorf, and made him master of Theodoric of Prague, followed in succession by Wemser, Schoen, Wolgemut, and Albert Durer. Von Michel reads Barisini in the last line quoted, but Federici, Tiraboschi, and Lanzi show that Barisini is the true reading, and Zani clearly shows that the date was 1357, which Michel read erroneously, 1297. At Trevigi, in the chapter house of the Padri Predicatori is a very extensive work by him, representing the saints and learned men of the order, bearing this inscription: "Anno Domini MCCCLII. Prior Travisinus ordinis predicatorum depingi fecit istud Capitulum, et Thomas Pictor de Mutina pinxit istud." This again led to warm disputes as to his real name, and whether the artist was a native of Modena or Trevigi. Federici, in his learned work on the Antiquities of Trevigi, thus admirably proves the paternity of Tommaso, and that he was a native of Trevigi, from the archives of the city. He says "he discovered that the father of Tommaso, named Borasino or Bizzarrino, an abbreviation of Buzzaccarino, became nominated to the citizenship, and to the public notaryship of Trevigi in 1315, in all which his family was called di Modena, as that of Girolamo Ferrarese was called di Carpi." In conclusion, it will be sufficient to satisfy most persons, to add that the picture at Vienna has been proved by analysis to have been painted in tempera, and not in oil; and that Lanzi pronounces the works at Trevigi, judging from the engravings done by the Dominican, Father Federici, "tolerably good in design for those times." (See the articles van Eyck, and Antonello da Messina.) Those who are fond of such profound and intricate disquisitions, are referred to Bartsch, Nagler, Zani, Lanzi, and a host of others, where they can pursue the subject ad libitum.

MODIGLIANI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Forli, who flourished about 1600. Lanzi says he was a scholar of Pontormo, and, though he was not remarkably powerful, nor always consistent, yet he was very graceful and beautiful, and deserves a place in pictoric lexicons. He executed some good works at Urbino, where he is known under the name of Francesco da Forli, the chief of which is a Descent from the Cross, in oil, in the church of S. Croce, and a ceiling in fresco, of some angels, in S. Lucia, which are much commended. His best works are in the churches at Forli and Rimino, among which are Adam driven from Eden, the Deluge, the Tower of Babel, with similar Old Testament histories, previously painted by Raffaele at Rome, and by Agresti at Forli.

MODONINO, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter, of Modena, who, according to Tiraboschi, acquired a distinguished reputation at Rome for his frescos of perspective and architecture, and is supposed to have executed some works in the Palazzo Spada. He died of the plague at Naples, in 1656.

MOELART, JACOB, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1649. He studied under Nicholas Maas, applied himself with great assiduity, and became a reputable painter of history, but he most distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and was much employed in that branch by many of the most distinguished persons of that country. Houbraken commends two of his historical works, Pharaoh and his Host drowned in the Red Sea, and Moses striking the Rock. He died in 1727.

MOERIKHOFER, JOHN MELCHIOR, a Swiss medalist, born at Frauenfeld in 1706. He attained sufficient excellence to be honored with the friendship of Hedlinger. During the latter part of his life, he was employed in the mint at Berne, where he engraved the dies. Among his best medals, are those of Haller, Voltaire, Frederic II., and George II. He died at Berne in 1761.

MOERIKHOFER, JOHN GASPARD, a Swiss medalist, the nephew and scholar of John Melchior M., born at Frauenfeld in 1733. In 1759, he visited Paris for improvement, and at the death of his uncle he was appointed to succeed him in the mint at Berne. Among his best medals, are those of Catherine II., Stanislaus II., and the Count de Caylus.

MOFFEI, C. F., an obscure engraver, by whom there is an indifferent etching of the Death of St. Francis signed C. F. Moffei fecit.

MOGALLI, COMO, or COSIMO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence in 1667. He was instructed in the elements of design by Gio. Battista Foggini, a Florentine sculptor; but he afterwards applied himself to engraving. He engraved a part of the plates for the book of Florentine Antiquities, published at Florence in 1724, by Thomas Dempster. He was employed in conjunction with Antonio Lorenzini, and others, to engrave the plates for the Museo Fiorentino. He also engraved some plates after Santo di Titi, F. Perucci, and others. He died about 1730. The following are from pictures in the Florentine gallery, and are among his best works:

The Holy Family reposing; after Albano; circular. Apollo and Marsyas; after Guercino. Magdalene carried up to Heaven by an Angel; after Guido Cagnacci. The Holy Family; after Carreggia. Eve presenting the Apple to Adam; after Gab. Cagliari. Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; da. Christ and the Disciples at Emmaus; after Palma. The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Fra. Bartolamea. David and Bathsheba; after Salviati. The Annunciation; after Andrea del Sarto. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Titian. A Bacchanalian Dance; do. Philip II., King of Spain; do.

MOGALLI, NICCOLO, was the son of the preceding, born at Florence in 1723. Losing his father at a tender age, he was placed with Francesco Conti, to learn the elements of design, and he was afterwards instructed in engraving by G. D. Pichianti. About 1750, he went to Rome, where he was employed by the Abbé Winckelmann to engrave from the designs of Casanova, the plates for his work entitled Monumenti antichi, inediti, spiegati et illustrati da Giovanni Winkelmann, Roma, 1767. He also engraved some plates for the Florentine gallery, and for the Cabinet of Portici.

MOHEDANO, ANTONIO, an eminent Spanish historical painter in fresco, born at Antequera, in Andalusia, in 1561. He studied under the celebrated Pablo de Céspedes, at Cordova, but preferring fresco to oil, he became one of the most eminent artists of his country at that time. He followed the practice of his master, and designed every thing after nature; he first meditated, next studied his composition, and then proceeded to trace his figures after nature, or from models arranged by himself, and with the assistance of the lay figure. Hence, he was happy in his compositions, learned in the art of contrasting groups, and gave fine character and grandeur to the forms of his figures. He ornamented his works with grotesques in the manner of Giovanni da Udine, in the Vatican. He distinguished himself by many works for the churches and convents at Seville, particularly by four large pictures in the convent S. Francisco de Seville, and some other works painted in the same place, in conjunction with Alonso Vasquez. He also painted some excellent works in the cathedral at Lucena. He died in that city in 1625. He was a poet, as well as a painter, and specimens of his poetic talents may be found in a work published by Pedro Espinosa, in 1605, entitled Flores de poetas ilustres de Espana.

MOI, PETER VAN. See MOL.

MOIETTA, VINCENZIO, a reputable painter, who, according to Morigia, was a native of Caravaggio, and flourished at Milan about 1500. He painted some pictures for the churches, but more for the collections.

MOINE, FRANÇOIS LE, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1688. He showed an early inclination for art, and studied with Louis Galloche, under whom he made great progress, and drew the first prize in the Academy, which entitled him to go to Italy with the king's pension, but the difficulties of the times prevented his enjoying this advantage; and his parents, being in indigent circumstances, had not the means of supporting him abroad. But he studied with great assiduity the best works in his own country, and soon acquired the distinguished reputation of being the most promising young artist of his country. He was admitted a member of the Academy at Paris in 1718, on which occasion he painted his picture of Hercules and Cacus. This picture, though not one of his best performances, is remarkable for correctness of design, and materially added to his reputation. In 1724, he accompanied his friend and patron M. Berger, to Italy, and during a short residence at Rome, he seems to have been more captivated with the splendor of Pietro da Cortona and the celerity of Lanfranco, than the sublime talents of Michael Angelo, or the elegance and grace of Raffaele. On his return to Paris, he was chosen to paint the cupola of the chapel of the Virgin in St. Sulpice, where he distinguished himself by his elegance of grouping, and the beauty and freshness of his coloring. This work, which occupied him three years, established his reputation, and he was appointed by Louis XV. to paint the ceiling of the grand saloon at Versailles, where he represented the Apotheosis of Hercules, one immense fresco, deemed the largest in Europe, being sixty-four by fifty-four feet. It consists of nine compartments, and occupied him four years. At the death of Louis de Boullongne, in 1734, he was appointed painter to the King, with a large salary. Notwithstanding this distinction, and the liberal patronage he met with, he fell into a state of melancholy and despondency, and was afflicted with a monomania, so that the officers of justice were in search of him to convey him to prison. His friends endeavored in vain to console him and dissipate his fears. One day, being called upon by his old patron, M. Berger, for the purpose of inviting him to his country seat, he imagined the day of his doom had come, and seizing his sword, he stabbed himself in several places, and fell dead as his friend entered the apartment, in 1737.

MOINE, or MOYNE, FRANCIS LE, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1660. In conjunction with Berain and Chaveau, he was employed in designing and engraving the ornaments of painting and sculpture in the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre. His plates are executed with the graver in a neat, but rather stiff and formal style.

MOINE, JEAN LE, a French painter, born at Paris in 1635, and died in 1713. He painted history and portraits, but did not acquire much distinction.

MOINE, LE, a French painter, born at Rouen in 1740; died in 1803. He studied under Descamps, and executed a number of good works in his native city, among which is the Apotheosis of Corneille, in the vault of the Theatre des Arts.

MOINE, PIERRE ANTOINE LE, was born at Paris in 1695, and died in 1665. He excelled in flower and fruit pieces, especially the latter, which were admired for their tasteful design, fresh and beautiful coloring, and natural expression.

MOINE. See MOYNE.

MOITTE, PIERRE ETIENNE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1722. He studied under P. F. Beaumont, and engraved quite a number of plates of portraits and various subjects, executed with the graver, in a clear neat style. His principal works are the plates he engraved for the Dresden Gallery, and the Cabinet of Count Bruhl. He was chosen an academician in 1770, upon the presentation of his portrait of Restout. He had two daughters, Angelique Rose, and Elizabeth Melanie, who practised the art with success. He died about 1780. The following are among his best portraits:

PORTRAITS.

J. Restout, Painter to the King; after de Latour. Charles John Francis Hénault, Historian; after St. Aubin.

The Holy Family; after Andrea del Sarto; Dresden collection. Another Holy Family; after F. Vanni; do. The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Correggio. Christ praying on the Mount of Olives; do. A Halt of Travelers; after Wouwerman. The Watering-place; do. The Dutch Cook; after Gerard Douw. The Fish Woman; do. Aeneas saving his Family from the Burning of Troy; after M. Corneille. The Triumph of Venus; after Boucher. The Pleasures of Summer; do. Several Prints after Greuze, Cochin, and other masters.

MOITTE, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE, a French engraver, the son and scholar of Pierre Etienne M., was born at Paris in 1748. His plates are distinguished for neatness of the graver, and delicacy of the execution. He engraved a number of plates after Greuze and other masters, among which are a set of twenty-four plates entitled Divers habillements, suivant la coutume d'Italie, dessinés d'après nature, par J. B. Greuze, ornés de fonds, par J. B. Lallemante, et gravés par A. Moitte, d'après les dessins tirés du cabinet de l'Abbé Gougenot; also a pair, Poetry and Painting, after Greuze; and a Flemish Repast, after Jordaeus, his best plate.

MOITTE, JEAN BAPTISTE PHILIBERT, the brother of the preceding, was an able professor of architecture in the school at Dijon. He gained considerable distinction for his plan of a cathedral, and also for one of a triumphal arch, which drew a prize in 1792. He died in 1808.

MOITTE, JEAN GUILLAUME, an eminent French sculptor, the brother of the preceding, born at Paris in 1747. He early manifested a strong inclination for design, which was increased by the meetings of artists, held frequently at his father's house. At the request of Pigalle, he was placed under that master, and devoted all his leisure hours to studying the living model. After the death of his instructor, he entered the atelier of Jean Baptist Lemoyne. He drew several prizes at the Academical exhibitions, and finally, in 1768, carried off the grand prize of sculpture, for his statue of David with the head of Goliath, which entitled him to the royal pension, and he immediately departed for Italy. On arriving at Rome he abandoned his former ideas of the art, and proceeded at once to the study of the antique. By a five years' course of assiduous study in the metropolis of art, he acquired a correct and exquisite taste of design; and his works are characterized by elegance of the forms, beauty of proportions, appropriate choice of draperies, and great variety of expression. In 1773 he returned to France, and was received by amateurs and artists with great enthusiasm. For some time after his return, Moitte was engaged in designing figures for M. Auguste, goldsmith to the King, which were greatly admired. Associated to the Academy in 1783, for a statue of a Priest, he was soon employed in many important works, among which were a Vestal scattering the Holy Water, for M. Joubert; a statue of Arian, for Mr. Brackford; the bas-reliefs of many of the Parisian Barrières; and his admirable statue of Cassini. In 1794 a prize was offered for the finest model for a bronze statue of Rousseau, to be cast in bronze. Moitte was the successful competitor, and he gained the prize, but the project was never completely executed. After the Battle of Marengo, he was commissioned to execute the mausoleum of Gen. Desaix, which is lacking in vigor, but has been greatly admired for its elegance, grace, and finished execution. His statues of Moses and Numa, and the Historical Muse, in the court of the Louvre, are in a more elevated style. Moitte was a member of the Legion of Honor. He died in 1810.

MOL, JAN BAPTIST VAN, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known. He was a cotemporary and imitator of Rembrandt, and for this reason his works are highly prized.

MOL, PETER VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1590. He studied in the school of Rubens, and painted many excellent works for the churches in Flanders and Brabant, in the style of his master. In the cathedral at Antwerp is his Adoration of the Magi, beautifully executed in the manner of Rubens. Another fine picture by him, representing Christ after the Crucifixion, with the Marys, Joseph of Arimathea, and St. John, adorns the gallery of the Louvre. He painted many easel pictures of large size, in the manner of Rubens, which, though they are but coarse imitations, have frequently been sold as originals by that great master, and it may be safely affirmed that of the many paintings sold in the United States as the works of Rubens, not one of them is genuine; because his time was wholly occupied by church and state, and princes, and it is known where all his works are to be found.

MOLA, PIETRO FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, born, according to Passeri, at Lugano, in the diocese of Como, in 1612, and died in 1668; though, according to Pascoli, Mariette, and Desaix, at Coldré in the Milanese territory, in 1621, and died in 1666. Others place his birth in 1609, and death in 1665. He was the son of an architect, who first placed him under the instruction of Giuseppe Cesari d'Arpino, at Rome, with whom he continued several years. He afterwards went to Bologna, studied with Albano, and became his most distinguished disciple. He did not however, adopt the principles of either of his masters, but sought a bolder style of design and a more vigorous coloring. The works of Guercino were particularly the objects of his admiration, and he was ambitious of acquiring the energy and powerful effect of his chiaro-scuro, and the magic of his relief. Aiming at a fresher and more harmonious style of coloring than found in the works of Guercino, he went to Venice, where he assiduously studied the works of Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano, and Veronese. From all these, he formed a charming style peculiar to himself, at once bold, vigorous, elegant and graceful, which spread his fame throughout Italy. He returned to Rome in the pontificate of Innocent X., by whom he was immediately employed in several considerable works, particularly in a chapel of the church del Gesu, where he painted in fresco, St. Peter delivered from prison by the Angel, and the Conversion of St. Paul, which gained him great reputation. He was not less patronized by Pope Alexander VII., for whom he painted his most celebrated work of Joseph making himself known to his Brethren, in the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, for which he received the highest commendation and a noble reward. He painted many other works in the churches at Rome. He also painted at Milan, where, in the church of S. Maria della Vita, are two of his most admired performances, representing St. John in the Wilderness, and St. Paul the Hermit; these works are designed with a dignity and correctness worthy of the Caracci, and in the latter he introduced a noble landscape, resembling that in the famed St. Peter Martyr, by Titian. Besides the many fresco works he executed for the churches, he painted many pictures in oil, both of historical subjects and landscapes, which are to be found in the private collections in Italy. Lanzi says that, "after having diligently studied coloring at Venice, he attached himself to the school of the Caracci, but more particularly to Albano; he never equaled his master in fresco, though he had a bolder tone of coloring, greater invention, and more vigor of subject." Although Mola reached a distinguished rank as an historical painter, he is still more esteemed for his admirable landscapes, to which his genius and inclination seem to have particularly directed him. His scenery is generally solemn and sublime, but where his sites are more pleasing and extensive, they are always marked with a grandeur which is hardly surpassed in the best productions of the Caracci or Domenichino. His touch is firm and free, his coloring usually vigorous and glowing; his figures are introduced so as to represent subjects of history or fable, and with such taste, intelligence, and grace, that it is doubted whether they were executed by himself or Albano. He died suddenly at Rome in the prime of life, as he was preparing to set out for Paris, where he had been invited by the King of France, and appointed his painter, with a liberal pension. He executed a few spirited and masterly etchings, as follows:

The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; after his own design. The Holy Family, with Angels; this plate was first etched by Mola, and was afterwards finished with the graver by a clumsy, unskillful hand. Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren; this print has been sometimes attributed to Carlo Maratti. The Holy Family, with Angels presenting Flowers to the infant Jesus; after Albano.

MOLA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, OR JEAN BAPTISTE. This artist is said by some authors to be a brother of Pietro Francesco M.; but, according to Malvasia, Orlandi, and others, he was a Frenchman, and born about 1620. This opinion is followed by Lanzi, and adopted by D'Argenville and other French writers. At all events, he studied under Simon Vouet at Paris, afterwards went to Bologna, and became the scholar of Albano, with whom he continued many years, and accompanied him to Rome. Boschini says he resided for some time "with Pietro Francesco Mola, at Venice, where they copied a vast work by Paul Veronese for Cardinal Bichi." Lanzi says "he displayed surprising skill in drawing rural scenes and trees; and being preferred by many in this branch to Albano, he often added landscapes to his master's figures, and occasionally adapted figures to his own landscapes, very beautiful, in Albano's style, but without his softness." While at Rome, he studied carefully the works of the best masters, particularly those of Annibale Caracci, in the Farnesian Gallery. Among his best performances at Rome are four large landscapes in the Palazzo Salviati, painted so entirely in the charming style of Albano that they are universally taken for the works of that master. There is an exquisite Repose in Egypt by him, in the collection of the Marchesi Rinuccini, at Florence. Though he is said to have been far inferior to the other more famous Mola in style, dignity, taste, and coloring, yet his works are rare, being doubtless attributed to his namesake and to Albano. He executed a few spirited etchings, among which is one of Cupid in a Car, drawn by two little Loves; after Albano. Malvasia says he died at Rome in 1678, but Oretti finds his death inscribed in the Register of the Chiesa della Lama, where he was buried in 1661, aged 45; and Zani says that he was born in 1616, and died in 1661, which accords with Oretti.

MOLENAER, CORNELIUS, a Flemish landscape painter, surnamed the Cross-Eyed, was born at Antwerp in 1540. His talents were unquestioned; his facility was so great that he could paint a large landscape in a single day; and he was highly esteemed by his cotemporaries: but his intemperate habits reduced him to so low a condition that he was obliged to paint the backgrounds in the pictures of other artists, at the miserable pittance of thirty sous per day! He at length sunk so low in vice as to work for six or seven sous per day, and subsequently died, at Antwerp, in obscurity and disgrace.

MOLIGNY, C. D, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1760, and engraved several portraits of distinguished persons, principally after Cochin.

MOLINAER, JOHN or JAN. There were several Dutch artists of the name of Molinaer or Molenaar, whose history and subjects are so mixed up by the Dutch writers themselves, that is difficult to distinguish them. They were probably relations, if not brothers, and flourished at Amsterdam about the same period. John Molinaer is said to have painted drolls and merry-makings, ingeniously composed, and colored with a richness and harmony approaching the admirable productions of Adrian van Ostade, though greatly inferior to him in the beauty of penciling, and the expression of the heads. The name of J. Molinaer, and sometimes it is spelled Molenaar, is frequently found on paintings, not only of the subjects above attributed to him, but on winter pieces, with figures skating, and practising other winter amusements, which are spirited and faithful representations of winter scenes in Holland.

MOLINAER, NICHOLAS MIENSE or MINS, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1627, and died there in 1686. He painted interiors of farm-houses, and rustic sports and employments, admirably depicted, in a manner approaching Adrian van Ostade.

MOLINAER, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1629. He also painted landscapes in the manner of Ostade.

MOLINAER, JAN MIENSE, a Dutch painter, whose subjects are the same as those of John Molinaer, and who is probably the same artist.

MOLINARETTO, IL. See DALLE PIANE.

MOLINARI, GIO. BATTISTA, a Venetian painter, was born, according to Melchiori, in 1636. He studied under Pietro Vecchia, and was a good artist.

MOLINARI, ANTONIO, was a son of the preceding, but lost his father at a tender age. He studied under Antonio Zanchi, but, according to Lanzi, almost wholly renounced the maxims he had learned, and struck out into a style of his own. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed some excellent works for the churches at Venice and other places, though he wrought with an unequal hand. Lanzi says his best works, "as the History of Hosea, in the Corpus Domini at Venice, he displays a style no less solid than pleasing, which equally satisfies the judgment and the eye. There is a study of both design and expression; ample beauty of forms; richness of drapery; with a taste, and a harmony of coloring not surpassed by any artist of the time." He was employed at Venice in 1727.

MOLINARI, GIOVANNI. This eminent painter was born at Savigliano in 1721, and died in 1793. He studied under Cavaliere Beaumont, and executed some works for the churches at Turin and other places, which gained him great reputation. On his death, he was honored with an elegant eulogium by the Baron Vernazza, which will confer lasting honor on his memory. He also painted history and portraits with great reputation. Lanzi says that, owing to his naturally timid, reserved, and modest character, he did not paint history as much as he ought. His historical works are mostly in the collections at Turin. Among his best portraits was one of the king, which was highly applauded, and has been frequently copied.

MOLITOR, MARTIN VON, an eminent German painter and engraver, born at Vienna in 1759, and died there in 1812. He studied under Christian Brand, and painted landscapes, both in oil and water-colors, which were greatly admired, and much sought after by connoisseurs and others. He also executed a considerable number of etchings, after his own designs, marked M.M. Bartsch gives a list of fifty-two pieces by him, which Nagler has copied into his Lexicon. Bartsch engraved some plates after his designs, which are marked M. M. inv., A. Btch. f.; also Gabet, marked M.M.d.G.S., signifying Martin von Molitor delineavit, (Francois) Gabet sculpsit.

MOLYN, PETER, THE ELDER, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Haerlem about 1600. He painted landscapes in a very pleasing style. His pictures are well designed, his coloring pleasing and natural, his penciling light and free, but delicate, his perspective and distances portrayed with fidelity and airy gracefulness, his fore-grounds are enriched with ruins or edifices in a picturesque manner. He executed a few spirited etchings after his own designs, erroneously attributed to his son Peter Molyn, called Tempesta. They are generally marked with his name, the P. and M. formed into a monogram, as above. Among others are the following: A set of four Landscapes; inscribed P. de Moly, fecit et exc. 1626. Another set of four Landscapes; P. Moly, fecit. 1626. Several Candle-light pieces and dark subjects.

MOLYN, PETER, THE YOUNGER, called by the Italians first Il Tempesta, next Cavaliere Tempesta, and last Pietro Mulier, was the son of the preceding, born at Haerlem in 1637. He studied under his father, but having seen some of the hunting pieces of Francis Snyders, he applied himself with great assiduity to imitate the manner of that master, and with such success that his pictures were scarcely less esteemed than those of Snyders. He traveled through Flanders and Holland, to observe the works of the best Flemish and Dutch masters, and soon changed his subjects for sea pieces. At the age of twenty-five he went to Rome, where he soon obtained great reputation for his surprising pictures of sea-storms, which acquired him the name of Il Tempesta. His compositions of this class are executed with such wonderful truth and force, that they inspire the beholder with real terror. The devoted ships are seen overtaken by the tempest and darkness, fired by lightning, or driving helpless before the demons of the storm, now rising on the mountain waves, and again submerged in the abyss of the ocean, or splitting on the rocks, while all on board are stricken with horror and dismay. At Rome, he changed his religion from Calvinism to Popery, which, together with his great talents, recommended him to the nobility, and secured him the friendship of Count Bracciano, who became his patron. At length his commissions became so numerous that he called in the assistance of a young Roman artist, who in consequence was called Tempestino, whose sister, a beautiful woman, became the wife of Moly. At Rome, he not only painted storm-pieces, but huntings and animals, for which purpose he kept a great variety of them about his house. He also painted landscapes with equal celebrity, in some of which he showed himself a not unworthy follower of Claude Lorraine in invention, enriching them with a great variety of scenery, hills, lakes, and beautiful edifices, although far behind that inimitable master in tone of color and finishing. At length he grew rich, and received the title of Cavaliere, and a golden chain from the pope. Having spent many years at Rome, he received the most flattering invitations to visit Genoa, whither he proceeded, met with an honorable reception, and found abundant employment. Here a fatal passion blasted all his prospects, and from an enviable height of public esteem and admiration, he sunk into the abyss of guilt, infamy, and remorse.—Having become deeply enamored of a Genoese lady, he left no art untried to seduce her, but failing in this he proposed to marry her, though it was well known that he had a wife at Rome.—When this objection was urged by the lady and her friends, he was exceedingly mortified, and resolved secretly to put his wife out of the way. For this purpose, he wrote her an affectionate letter, desiring her to come to him at Genoa, and murdered her by means of the very messenger he had sent to accompany her, an hired assassin. His crime did not long escape the vigilant eye of justice; he was arrested on suspicion, and so many circumstances appearing to confirm his guilt, he was condemned to death; but by the powerful intercession of the nobility, and in consideration of his extraordinary abilities, his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life, and he probably never would have been released, but for a critical accident. When Louis XIV. bombarded Genoa, and the city was in danger of being burned, the prisons were thrown open, and Tempesta seized the opportunity to escape to Piacenza, after a confinement of sixteen years. From this affair he was nicknamed Pietro Mulier or De Mulieribus, (wife or mistress). He passed the remainder of his days at Parma, Bergamo, Piacenza, and Milan, where his works are numerous, especially in the latter city, and held in the highest estimation. During his long confinement, he wrought diligently, and executed many of his best works; indeed, his pictures of storms painted at that time, which were his favorite subjects, seem to have acquired additional gloom from the horrors of his dungeon. Tempesta was the first at Rome to decorate his landscapes with battles and skirmishes, which he did with great spirit and effect. He died in 1701. Balkema, differing from all authors of credit, says he was born in 1643, and died in 1699.

MOMBASILIO, CAVALIERE, an eminent portrait painter of Turin, who flourished there in 1675. Little is known of him, except that his splendid portraits are frequently met with at Turin and elsewhere.

MOMBELLI, LUCA, a painter of Brescia, who according to Orlandi, studied under Alessandro Bonvicino, in whose style he painted with considerable reputation. Lanzi says that after a time he changed his style, and by adopting too great delicacy of manner, his productions became somewhat tame and feeble. He was living in 1553.

MOMMERS, HENDRICK, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1623. After studying in his own country, he went to Rome for improvement, where he was called by the Bentivogli Society Meleager, from his hunting pieces of the wild boar. He painted a variety of subjects, as Italian markets, with peasants; hunting pieces; landscapes, with figures and animals, seldom without an Ass. He also painted sea-ports, which might easily be taken for the works of Weenix. His coloring is warm and harmonious, his touch vigorous and clear, and his pictures have a pleasing effect. After his return to Holland, he acquired considerable reputation, and instructed several scholars, among whom were Brackenbourg, Thierry Maes, and Bernard van Schendel. He signed his pictures sometimes with his initials, H. M., and sometimes with his name. Balkema mentions an artist of this name, who, he says, was a scholar of Karel du Jardin, went to Italy, and painted the same subjects; but says he was born at Haerlem in 1650, and died in 1708. He was doubtless the same painter.

MOMPER, or MOMPERT, JOOS or JOBOCUS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1580. It is not known with whom he studied, but as his manner differs from that of any other painter of his country, he must have founded his style from a close observation of nature. He painted mountainous landscapes in a bold, free style, and appears to have taken his views from the romantic scenery of Switzerland, rather than from the confined prospects of his own country. Contrary to the usual style of the Flemish artists, his works have nothing of the minute and precise finishing so much admired in the works of Breughel and Savery. His pencil is broad and facile, his coloring clear and of an agreeable effect, though in the forms of his trees and mountains there is occasionally an appearance of stiffness and formality. His landscapes often show an immense tract of country, and the imagination is agreeably amused with the vast extent of the prospect, which is admirably conducted. He was an unequal painter; but his best works are much admired, and admitted into the choice collections. His pictures were frequently decorated with figures by the elder Teniers, Francks, and John Breughel. Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country. Momper etched a few plates of landscapes from his own designs, as well as his own portrait, after Vandyck. They are executed in a free, spirited style, and are very scarce.

MONA, or MONNA, DOMENICO, a painter of Ferrara, born in 1550, and a disciple of Giuseppe Mazzuoli, called Il Bastaruolo. Baruffaldi read on his tomb, Domenico Mona, though he is variously called by writers Mona, Monna, Moni, and Monio. After studying the various professions of law, medicine, and theology, he attached himself to painting, in which he became eminent, and executed an extraordinary number of works for the churches and public edifices of Ferrara. His earliest productions were indifferent, but he applied himself with diligence to correct these faults, by studying the works of the best masters. Lanzi says he possessed fervor and richness of imagination, was learned in design, and wrought with a rapid hand. There is a surprising inequality in his works, and in viewing his best productions, works of a high order, as the Birth of the Virgin and the Nativity of our Saviour, in S. Maria in Vado; the Deposition from the Cross, in the Cathedral; and the Entombment, at the Servi, it appears unaccountable that, with the possession of such powers, he could be so negligent of his fame as to expose to public view the mediocre productions which form the majority of his works. Lanzi attributes this to an occasional derangement of his mind, to which he at length became a victim; in a fit of insanity, he slew a courtier of the Cardinal Aldobrandini, and ended his days in banishment from his native place. This, however, was by some attributed to enmity. He sought refuge at Modena, and then at Parma, where he is said to have afterwards painted some of his best works. Orlandi highly extols two of his pictures, representing the Conversion and Martyrdom of St. Paul, in the church of S. Paolo at Ferrara. He died in 1602.

MONACO, PIETRO, an ingenious Italian engraver, born at Belluno in 1720. He visited Rome and other Italian cities, after which he settled at Venice, and soon gained encouragement. He was appointed Inspector of the Mosaics of St. Marco, and held that office until his death, about 1804. His plates possess considerable merit. Among them are a collection of fifty-five prints, published in 1743, engraved after the finest pictures in the Venetian collections, and entitled Raccolta di stampe copiate da gli originali, folio. In 1763 he published a similar work, containing one hundred and twelve plates. His plates are quite unequal in merit. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Giovanni Battista Tiepolo; after a picture by himself. Jacopo Tatti, called Sansovino, Sculptor; after Titian.

Tobit restoring his Father's Sight; after Dom. Feti. The Adulteress before Christ; after P. Veronese. The Nativity; after Seb. Ricci. The Murder of the Innocents; after Giulio Carpioni. The Last Supper; after Pittori. Lot and his Daughters; after P. Liberi. Christ conducted to Mount Calvary; after Gio. Bat. Tiepolo. Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after Bellini. The Presentation in the Temple; after Anto. Balestra.

MONALDI, a scholar of Andrea Lucatelli, who flourished at Rome about 1700. He painted landscapes, in the style of his master. Lanzi says, "in some collections we find the works of Monaldi approaching those of Lucatelli, though somewhat inferior to them in design, coloring, and that natural grace which may be termed the attic salt of this mute poetry."

MONAMY, PETER, an English marine painter, a native of Jersey, born about 1670. He was sent to London when young, and apprenticed to a house painter on London Bridge. He acquired considerable reputation in his time for his sea-pieces, which were compared to those of W. Vanderelde; but Stanley says, "the pictures of Monamy should not be named with those of W. Vanderelde; they are very inferior productions, and are seldom admitted into choice collections."

MONANNI, MONANNO, a Florentine painter, who, according to Baldinucci, studied under Cristoforo Allori, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He went to Rome, where he seems to have resided a long time, and was admitted a member of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1652. In the church of S. Giovanni Decollato at Rome, is a picture by him, representing the Baptism of Christ.

MONCALVO IL. See GUGLIELMO CACCIA.

MONCE, FERDINAND DE LA. This architect was born at Munich in 1678, of French parents. His father was Paul de la Monce, first painter and architect to the Elector of Bavaria. After acquiring the elements of design from his father, he went to Paris for improvement, and subsequently visited the principal cities of Italy. During his sojourn at Rome, the Duke d'Orleans commissioned him to purchase the celebrated cabinet of Queen Christina, then in the possession of the Duke de Bracciano. On returning to France, he stopped at Grenoble, and executed several works which gained him considerable reputation. In 1731 he concluded to marry, and settle at Lyons. Among his principal works are the Church des Chartreux, considered one of the finest edifices of that city; the gate of the church of St. Juste, highly esteemed by connoisseurs for its simple and elevated style; and the grand Hotel Dieu, which is reckoned his finest work. In his old age, when prevented by bodily infirmities from practising the art, he occupied his time in designing for the engravers.— Among these productions were the illustrations for Pope's Essay on Man, published by Lausanne. La Monce died at Lyons in 1753.

MONCHINO, IL. See ANTONIO DAL SOLE.

MONCORNET, BALTHAZAR a French engraver, born at Rouen, according to Nagler, in 1630, and died in 1670. Basan styles him one of the most indifferent engravers of his country; but France has produced many engravers inferior to him. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he engraved an incredible number of portraits and other subjects, and carried on quite an extensive commerce in prints. Nagler gives a long list of his portraits, which possess no interest aside from the persons they represent. His best prints are the Battle between Constantine and Maxentius, after Rubens; the Triumph of Constantine, do.; a set of goldsmith's ornaments; and a small etching of Rabbits, in imitation of the style of Hollar.

MONDINI, FULGENZIO, a Bolognese painter, and a pupil of Guercino. He acquired considerable reputation in his native city, and executed several frescos for the churches, the principal of which are two pictures in the Annunziata, representing the Angel appearing to Joseph in his Dream, and the Repose in Egypt; and in S. Antonio di Padoua, two subjects from the life of that saint, which are highly commended. He went to Florence where his merits recommended him to the patronage of the court, and was employed by the Marchesi Capponi to decorate their villas of Colonnata. He died in the flower of his life in 1664. Malvasia honors his memory in a long eulogy, in which he declares that he knew none more gifted with qualities that promised so much in that age, and he conjectures that, had his life been prolonged, he would have become the first fresco painter of his age.

MONEGRO, JUAN BAPTISTA, a Spanish sculptor and architect of Toledo, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He studied under Alonso Berruguette, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement. On his return to Spain, he gained considerable encouragement and reputation. By order of Philip II., he made six statues for the porticos of the Escorial; and to him are attributed the architecture and sculpture of the Evangelists, which are in the gardens of the cloister of that edifice. Among his other works, is the chapel of the Sacrament at Toledo, erected in 1600.

MONERI, GIOVANNI, a Piedmontese painter, born at Visone, a small town near Acqui, in 1637. He studied in the school of Romanelli at Rome. He did not acquire any great distinction, but executed many good works for the churches in the provincial towns. In 1657, he returned to his native place, and was employed in the cathedral at Acqui, where he painted two frescos representing the Assumption of the Virgin and Paradise, in the style of his master, which were much commended. He executed other works for the churches in the neighboring cities, in which he continued to improve, exhibiting a greater copiousness of composition, a more correct design, a finer expression, and a stronger relief. One of his most esteemed works is a picture of the Presentation, in the church of the Capuchins at Acqui, executed at a more advanced period of his life. He was also employed in the churches at Genoa, Milan, and in their dependencies; also in several places in Piedmont. He died in 1714.

MONGEROUX, M. DE, a French amateur engraver, who, for his amusement, etched a few plates, among which is a landscape with figures and animals, after Casanova.

M. MONI, J., an engraver who, according to Papillon, was a native of Lyons, and flourished about 1570. He was an eminent engraver on wood, and executed a set of plates from his own designs, for the Bible History, published at Lyons by Guillaume Rouille in 1570. He also copied the engravings on wood from the Bible, executed by Solomon Bernard, called Little Bernard, which copies were published at Lyons in 1570. He sometimes marked his plates with the initials of his name, J. M., and at others with the above monogram.

MONI, LOUIS DE, a Dutch painter, born at Breda in 1698. He studied successively under van Kessel, Emanuel Biset, and Philip Vandyck. He painted small pictures, in which he endeavored to imitate the manner of Gerard Donw. His compositions are simple and animated, and deserving of high commendation. He understood the principles of light and shadow, and the harmony of color; and his handling is free, light, and firm. His pictures are occasionally found in the best collections in Holland. He died at Leyden in 1771.

MONICA. See CAVAGNI.

MONNICKS, or MONNIX, a Dutch painter, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1606. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he went early to Rome for improvement, where he resided till advanced in life, and acquired great distinction. He designed everything from nature, and painted the most remarkable views in that capitol, as the Coliseum, the Columns of Trajan and Vespasian, the Campo Vaccino, the public fountains, and other noble edifices, ancient and modern. He embellished his pictures with numerous figures, representing people engaged in different occupations or amusements, sports, carnivals, or processions. He was a perfect master of perspective, and had an excellent knowledge of chiaro-scuro. His figures are well designed and grouped, though the airs and countenances partake somewhat of the Flemish school. His penciling is free, but delicate, and his coloring transparent. At Rome and throughout all Italy, his works were universally esteemed. His talents recommended him to the patronage of pope Urban VIII., in whose service he continued for thirteen years. His best works are entirely confined to Italy, as he did not return to Holland until upwards of seventy years of age; and though he painted a few perspective pieces afterwards, his powers had much declined. He died at Bois-le-Duc in 1686.

MONNOT, PIERRE ETIENNE, a distinguished French sculptor, born at Besançon about 1660. He went to Italy early in life, and by studying the antique, assisted by the instruction of the best masters, he attained a high excellence in the art. In 1690 he was commissioned to execute the marble tomb erected to pope Innocent XI., in one of the side chapels of St. Peter's, which gained him so much reputation that he had plentiful encouragement. Among his principal works are two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, in St. John of Lateran. Monnot was employed by the Emperor Leopold, and by the Elector of Hesse, the latter of whom commissioned him to execute a number of copies after the finest antique statues, which are still to be seen in the palace and gardens at Cas- sel. He was ennobled by the pope; honored with the title of Cavaliere; and was one of the directors of the Academy of St. Luke. He died at Rome about 1730.

MONNOYER, JOHN BAPTISTE, called BAP- TISTE, an eminent Flemish fruit and flower paint- er, born at Lisle in 1635. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Antwerp, and at first devoted himself to historical painting, but afterwards, following the bent of his genius, he painted fruit and flowers, in which branch he ac- quired great fame. He went young to Paris, where the beauty of his works soon brought him into notice. In 1663, he was received into the Academy with distinction. He was employed in the royal palaces at Versailles, Trianon, Marly, and Meudon. At the invitation of Lord Montague, the English ambassador, he accompanied that noble- man to London, where he first displayed his tal- ents in painting some of his choicest works, for the embellishment of Montague House, now the British Museum. During a residence of nearly twenty years, he found abundant employment, and executed a multitude of pictures which are now in the collections of the nobility and persons of distinction. He was much employed at Hamp- ton Court, Windsor, and Kensington. His pic- tures are not so exquisitely finished as those of van Huysum, Rachel Ruysch, and Mignon, but his composition and coloring are in a bolder style. His flowers have a remarkable freedom and loose- ness, as well in the disposition as in the penciling, with a tone and brilliancy of coloring, that rivals nature herself. The disposition of his objects is surprisingly elegant and beautiful. A celebrated work of this artist is a looking-glass in Kensing- ton palace, which is decorated with a garland of flowers, for Queen Mary II., who sat by him dur- ing the greater part of the time he was engaged in painting it. He also produced a few etchings after his own designs, representing vases of flowers, executed in a tasteful and spirited style; and about eighty prints were afterwards engraved by others after his designs, and published in a folio volume. He died in 1699.

MONNOYER, ANTHONY, called YOUNG BAP- TISTE, was the son and scholar of the preceding, whose subjects and style he imitated with consid- erable success, though his works are far inferior to those of his father in every respect.

MONODORUS. See MENODORUS.

MONOSILIO, SALVATORE, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina about 1700. He went to Rome and studied under Cav. Sebastiano Conca, whose style he adopted with great success. Lanzi says he very nearly approached him, both at Rome and in other places. His most esteemed productions at Rome are the ceiling in a chapel of S. Paolino della Regola, the Conversion of St. Paul, in the church of the Priests of the Mission, and other works at S. S. Quaranta, and in the Polacchi. At Piceno, where Conca was held in great estimation, Monosilio was also in high repute, and was em- ployed both in public and private edifices. An al- tar-piece of St. Barnabas in the church of that saint, is highly commended. The time of his death is not known, though it is supposed he returned to Messina late in life.

MONSIAU, NICOLAS ANDRE, a French histor- ical painter, born at Paris in 1754. He was a scholar of Peyron, who is said to have been very fond of his pupil. Little is recorded of the circum- stances of his life. In 1787 he was admitted to the Royal Academy, and exhibited his pictures of Alexander and Bucephalus, the Death of Cato Uticensis, and the Death of Phocion. His design was often incorrect, and his coloring defective; but his compositions were arranged with judg- ment; and although his abilities would never have ranked him among eminent historical painters, yet in conversation pieces he evinced considerable tal- ent. Monsiau made many designs for book illus- trations, particularly for the works of Delille. His pictures of St. Vincent de Paul, and Moliere read- ing the Tartuffe to Ninon l'Enclos, have been high- ly praised. Among his principal historical works, are Philoctetes in the Isle of Lemnos, exhibited in 1810; Alexander and Diogenes, exhibited in 1819, now in the chateau of Versailles; Ajax and Uly- ses disputing for the Arms of Achilles, exhibited in 1827. Monsian died in 1837.

MONSIGNORI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Ver- ona, born in 1455, and brought up in the school of Andrea Mantegna, by whose precepts he acquired a good taste for historical painting, as well as por- traits. His talents procured him the patronage of the Marquis of Mantua, an excellent and learned critic, who employed him for several years. Lanzi says of this artist, that, "if he does not exhibit the beautiful forms and the purity of design so remarkable in the works of his master, he ap- proaches nearer to the modern taste; his contours are full, his drapery less formal, and his coloring softer and more studied." He was a master of perspective, and in the Refectory of the Francis- cans, is a picture of Christ, surrounded by the Apostles, in which the architecture produces a grand effect.

MONSIGNORI, FRA GIROLAMO, was a brother of the preceding, born at Verona about 1460.— When young, he became a monk of the order of the Dominicans. He executed several works for the church of his monastery. In the great Li- brary of S. Benedetto, is a fine copy of the Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci, by this artist, which, according to Lanzi, is considered the best ever ex- ecuted of that miracle of art. He died in 1520.

MONT, DEODATO DEL. See DELMONT.

MONTAGNA, BARTOLOMEO, an old Italian painter, was a native of Vicenza, and studied un- der Andrea Mantegna. According to Lanzi there are many of his works in his native city, and some in Venice, which rank him at least among the chief of his cotemporaries. His subjects are sacred and scripture pieces. He is exact in his design, and skilful in his naked parts, and his coloring is fresh and warm. His cherubs are particularly pleas- ing and graceful, and in his altar-piece at the church of S. Michele at Vicenza, he has introduced architecture, which recedes from, and deceives the eye with a powerful illusion, sufficient of itself to have rendered him conspicuous. There are no- tices of him up to 1507.

MONTAGNA, BENEDETTO, was a BM. younger brother of Bartolomeo, with whom he is often confounded. He is said to have flourished at Vicenza about 1500, but Zani gives the inscriptions and dates on two of his pictures, 1524 and 1533. According to Ridolfi, he painted some works for the churches of Vicenza, so much in the style of Giovanni Bellini, that they might easily be mistaken for the works of that master. He is however, better known as an engraver, and though his prints are feeble and imperfect, both in design and execution, they are deserving of notice, as among the earliest specimens of the art in Italy. It is probable that the fame of the works of Albert Durer, at that time considered a wonder at Venice, encouraged him to attempt the art, then in its infancy in Italy. Marc' Antonio had made considerable progress, and successfully imitated some of Durer's prints at Venice, though he did not arrive at his zenith till some years after, at Rome. The prints of Montagna have a slight resemblance to the earliest and rudest engravings of Marc' Antonio. They are from his own designs, and usually marked with his name in full, but sometimes with his initials, B. M., on a tablet, and sometimes B. M., without the tablet. They are now very scarce, and their antiquity and scarceness renders them valuable to the collector of rare prints. The following are the principal :

The Virgin seated, holding the infant Jesus, St. John standing by her side, and St. Joseph below. In the background is a town, with a river and a bridge over it. A young Man sitting on a Rock. Venus punishing Cupid. The Rape of Europa. The Judgment of Midas. A naked Figure standing by a Tree. Two figures, an old man playing on the bag-pipes, and a young man on the violin. Three Women in a landscape, one of them taking a Child from a Tree, representing the Birth of Adonis. A landscape with a Cottage, and an old Man seated on a Bank. The Nativity, with St. Joseph at the Well; copied from Durer, and marked B. M. on a tablet. St. Anthony standing praying; marked B. M. Two Hunters observing a wounded Stag. Venus standing naked, holding a mirror in her hand. A River God seated on a Rock on the right, Cupid on the left. The Saviour standing in a landscape after his resurrection, a banner in his right hand and scroll in his left, with Jerusalem in the distance. A Woman, with two Children, and a Man, seated in a landscape. A Nymph with two Children and two Satyrs. The Holy Family seated near a Fountain. A River Goddess, with a winged Boy holding a Sphero; in the British Museum. The Sorceress; copy from Durer, marked B. M. An old Man in a turban, with a book in his hand, sitting on a Bank. Christ in the Manger, with the Ox and Ass near him, with the Virgin, St. Joseph, St. Catherine, and an Angel. The Repose in Egypt. St. Catherine. Christ showing himself to his Disciples, after his Resurrection; marked B. M.—The Saviour. The Virgin nursing the Infant; copy from Durer, marked B. M. The Satyr and his Family; three figures.

MONTAGNA, MARCO TULLIO, a Roman painter, who flourished in the pontificate of Clement VIII. He studied under Federigo Zuccaro, and assisted him in his works both at Rome and Turin. He painted both in oil and fresco, and executed a few works for the churches at Rome and elsewhere. Lanzi says "he painted at Rome in the church of S. Nicolo in Carcere, in the vaults of the Vatican, and in many other places, in a tolerable style, but nothing more."

MONTAGNA, IL, an eminent painter of sea-pieces, of whom little is known with certainty, except from his works. Lanzi says he was a native of Holland, and "left many works in Italy, especially at Rome and Florence, where he is sometimes mistaken for Tempesta, in the galleries and in the picture sales; but Montagna is more serene in his skies, and darker in his waves and the appearance of the sea." Malvasia says he was a Frenchman, calling him, Mons. Rinaldo della Montagne, and states that he was held in high esteem by Guido, for the excellence of his sea views. Felibien says he was a Venetian, and calls him Montagna di Venezia. There is a magnificent picture of the Deluge in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Bergamo, in which the figures were inserted by Cav. Liberi, supposed to be by this artist, painted in 1668. Lanzi doubts its authenticity, as this Montagna is known to have died at Padua, and a MS. by a cotemporary author says he died there in 1644. Others confound him with Matthew Plattenberg, who styled himself in Italy Plate Montagne, but the style of Plattenberg was entirely different, besides, he did not reside in Italy many years, and died at Paris in 1660.

MONTAGNA, MATTHEW. See PLATTENBERG.

MONTAGNANA, JACOPO, an old Italian painter, a native of Padua, where he flourished in the zenith of his fame, from 1495 to 1508. Vasari and Ridolfi erroneously call this artist Jacopo Montagna. He is supposed to have studied with Giovanni Bellini at Venice. He was accounted by his townsmen the Apelles of his age. There are several of his works in the Episcopal palace at Padua particularly worthy of notice. They represent Christ risen from the dead, together with the portraits of all the Paduan Bishops, the busts of the Apostles, and several histories of their acts. Lanzi says they are executed with much elegance in chiaro-scuro. There is also a very extensive altar-piece at the Santo, with glowing colors, in the Venetian style, though in design and expression, it partakes more of the precise and formal principles of the Paduan school. There is also a celebrated picture by him in the Council Hall at Belluno. It is an immense production, representing Roman Histories. Lanzi says it so much resembles Andrea Mantegna, in composition, design, drapery, and expression, that at first view, one would be apt to attribute it to the pencil of that master. The following laudatory epigram is inscribed upon it:

Non hic Parrhasio, non hic tribuendus Apelli,
Hos licet auctores dignus habere labor.
Euganeus, vixdum impleto ter mense, Jacobus
Ex Montagnana nobile pinxit opus.

MONTAGU, a French engraver, who flourished about 1760. Little is known of him. He went to Rome, where he appears to have resided some time, and engraved several plates of the principal edifices and views in that metropolis.

MONTALTO. See DANEDI.

MONTANI, GIOSEFFO, a painter of Pesaro, born in 1641. According to Malvasia, he studied at Venice, where he flourished about 1678. He was an excellent landscape painter.

MONTANINI, PIETRO, called PETRUCCIO PERUGINO, a painter, born at Perugia in 1619. He first studied under Pietro Barsotti, and afterwards with Ciro Ferri. Lanzi says that, ambitious of the higher walks of art, he attempted the decoration of a church, but failing in this, he followed the natural bent of his genius, and restricted himself to landscape. He then studied under Salvator Rosa, whose style he imitated with great success, though his figures are more spiritedly than correctly drawn. He was nevertheless a pleasing painter, and his pictures were much sought after by foreigners. There is an abundance of his works in the collections at Perugia; there are some in the church of the Eremitani, which may be said to discover a Flemish style. He died in 1689.

MONTANO, IL. See DELLA MARCA.

MONTANO, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian sculptor and architect, born at Milan about 1545. He was thrown upon his own resources early in life, but by great exertion he gained a knowledge of design and modeling. Visiting Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., he soon became distinguished for his talents in sculpture. He gained great improvement by studying the antique. He practised the art with reputation at Rome for many years, and died in 1621. His scholar, J. B. Soria, published his designs after his death, under the title of Architettura con diversi ornamenti cavati dall' antico, Rome, 1684 and 1691.

MONTE, GIOVANNI DA, was a native of Cremona, and a scholar of Titian. He painted some works for the churches in his native city. Torri mentions him as one of the most distinguished artists who ornamented Milan. Lanzi says he was an excellent artist, and deserves to be better known. He flourished about 1580.

MONTELATICI, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, supposed by some to have been a Pisan, and others, a Florentine, studied under Giovanni Bilivert at Florence, in whose style he at first painted; but Lanzi says he afterwards abandoned it, or rather blended it with that of Passignano. He was a fanciful and spirited designer, and a good colorist. He acquired considerable reputation, painted some for the churches, but more for private, and sometimes for royal collections. There is a very fine painting by this artist in the church of S. Simone at Florence, representing the history of St. Niccolò Vescovo, and another of the Fall of Lucifer, in the Teatini. He was invited to Inspruck, and appointed court painter, which office he held till his death, in 1661. He was surnamed Il Cecco Bravo, from his quarrelsome disposition.

MONTEMEZZANO, FRANCESCO, a painter of Verona, born about 1555. He studied under Paul Veronese, whose style he followed in the copiousness of his compositions, the airs of his heads, the beauty of his figures, and the splendor of his draperies; but his coloring in comparison with that of his master was languid and feeble. He nevertheless acquired great reputation, and was employed in several of the churches, and in the Ducal Palace. His picture of the Annunciation in the church of the Osservanti alla Vigna, at Venice, is highly commended. Another fine work by him, is Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, in the church of San Giorgio, at Verona. He died in the prime of life in 1600.

MONTEN, DIETRICH, an eminent German painter, born at Dusseldorf in 1799. He showed from early youth a passion for depicting battles, and Homer, Tasso, and Ariosto, were his favorite authors. In order to acquire some practical military knowledge, he entered as a volunteer in the Prussian army for twelve months. At the expiration of his term of military service, he entered the Academy at Dusseldorf, and after studying two years in that institution, he went to Munich and placed himself under the instructions of Peter Hess. His talents attracted the attention of Cornelius, then at the head of the painters at Munich, who entrusted him with the execution of three of the frescos in the arcade of the Hofgarten, where he represented the Storming of the Turkish Entrenchments by the Bavarians, in 1717; the Battle of Arcis sur Aube, and the granting of the Bavarian Constitution by Maximilian Joseph in 1818. He painted many other large battle pieces representing the victories of his country, as well as many easel pictures of the same subjects, in which he is said to have displayed extraordinary spirit in the design and execution, with correct drawing and good coloring. His horses in particular were very spirited in their motions and attitudes. His faults were an occasional extravagance of action, and the want of necessary patience for elaborate modeling and uniform finish, some parts of his pictures being too sketchy and undefined.

MONTENAT, J., a French engraver on wood, who executed some cuts from the designs of Simon Vouet and others. Dumesnil mentions a print by him of the Virgin and Infant, inscribed J. Montemat fecit.

MONTEPULCIANO. See MOROSINI.

MONTEREAU, PIERRE DE, a French architect, who flourished under the reign of St. Louis, about the middle of the 13th century. He erected the Holy chapel at Vincennes, the Refectory, the Dormitory, the Chapter-house, and the chapel Notre Dame des Pres. These were all in the Gothic style, but distinguished for beauty of proportions and delicacy of ornament. His master-piece, however, was the Sainte Chapelle at Paris, commenced in 1245, and finished in three years. De Montreau was a man of learning, and was highly esteemed in his day. He died in 1266, and was buried in the chapel built by him in S. Germain des Pres; his portrait was carved on the tomb, with a rule and compass in his hand.

MONTERO, DE ROXAS, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1613. He studied under Pedro de las Cuevas, and then went to Italy to improve himself, and founded his style on that of Caravaggio, many of whose works he copied. On his return to Madrid, he acquired considerable reputation by the novelty of his style, and was much employed in the churches and convents.—Palomino highly commends several of his works, particularly the Assumption of the Virgin in the church of the Collegio de Atocha; the Angel appearing to St. Joseph, in San Juan de Alarcon; and the Destruction of Pharaoh's Host in the Red Sea, in the sacristy of the convent de la Merced. He died at Madrid in 1683.

MONTERO, DON LORENZO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1656. He excelled in architecture, landscapes, fruit and flowers, which he painted in distemper, and was thus employed in decorating some of the churches at Seville and Madrid, especially in the Retiro at Seville. His works have mostly perished, but there are some traces of his skill in ornamental design in the church of St. Jerome, at Madrid. He was not equally successful in oil painting, and seldom practised it. His only work in oil worthy of notice is a portrait of Philip V., dated 1701. He died at Madrid in 1710.

MONTEVARCHI, IL, an Italian painter, so called from the place of his nativity. He was a scholar of Pietro Perugino, and executed some works for the churches of his own country, out of which Lanzi says he is unknown.

MONTFORT. See BLOCKLANDT.

MONTI, FRANCESCO, called IL BRESCIANO DELLE BATTAGLIE, a painter of Brescia, born in 1646. He first studied under Pietro Ricci, and afterwards with Borgognone, whose subjects and manner he adopted. He painted horses and battles, designed and executed with great spirit, but much inferior to Borgognone in point of coloring. He acquired considerable distinction, was called Il Bresciano Battaglie, or the Brescian Battle-painter, and was much employed for the collections at Rome, Genoa, and Parma. He settled at Parma, where he opened a school, and exerted a marked influence on the school of Parma. Lanzi says he was employed by the court, and painted for the churches as well as for individuals; and that his works are numerous, but in many collections they do not appear under his name, but are attributed to the school of Borgognone. He had a son whom he instructed in the art, and who painted similar subjects. He died, according to Orlandi, in 1712, but Zani says in 1703.

MONTI, FRANCESCO, called BOLOGNESE, a painter born at Bologna in 1685. He studied under Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. Lanzi says he was endowed by nature with an enthusiasm for ample and copious subjects. On leaving his master, he was patronized by the Count Ranuzzi, for whom he painted one of his finest pictures, representing the Rape of the Sabines. He was afterwards employed at the court of Turin, where he painted the Triumph of Mordecai—a copious composition, highly commended by Crespi. He also executed many oil paintings for the churches, as well as for different collections, at Turin, Bologna, and other places. Lanzi says, “his surprising merit is to be sought for in his frescos, particularly at Brescia, where he fixed his residence. He also executed many pieces for the adjacent cities, which are applauded for the fertility of his genius, and the masterly style of his coloring.” He also decorated the palaces of many noble houses, on a very extended scale, particularly of the Martinengo, Avogadro, and the Barussi. There are many of his works in the churches and other edifices of Bologna, the most admired of which are Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, at the Osservanti; the Virgin in Glory, St. Barbara and St. Filippo Neri, in the Madonna di Galeria; and the Martyrdom of St. Fidele, at the Cappuccini. He died in 1768.

MONTI, ELEONORA, was a daughter of Francesco Monti, of Bologna, born in 1727. She was instructed in the art by her father, and painted history, and especially portraits, with great ability. Lanzi says her portraits are held in high esteem, and that she received constant commissions from the nobility.

MONTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter, born at Genoa about 1610. According to Soprani, he was the son of a poor mendicant, and, when a boy, exhibited an uncommon disposition for the art, by sketching rude designs of what he saw on the walls of buildings, which attracted the attention of a Genoese nobleman, who took him under his protection, and placed him under Luciano Borzone, with whom he made such rapid progress as to surpass his instructor. He became eminent in his profession, painted history with reputation, but was chiefly distinguished for his excellence in portraits; and he painted many of the principal personages of his country. He died in the great plague of 1657.

MONTI, GIO. GIACOMO, a Bolognese painter and architect. Lanzi, in his Index, places his birth in 1692, but says that he wrought in concert with Baldassare Bianchi, who died in 1679. He was undoubtedly born in the first half of the 17th century. He studied under Agostino Mitelli, and was an eminent painter of perspective and architecture. He traveled professionally with his partner, Baldassare Bianchi, the son-in-law of Mitelli, and they met with much employment, particularly at Mantua. The figures in their works were inserted by Gio. Battista Caccioli, a good disciple of Cignani.

As an architect, he attained deserved eminence, and erected a number of edifices which are highly esteemed. Among them are the church of S. Agostino at Modena; and the beautiful church of Corpus Domini at Bologna. He made the designs for the galleries of the choir of the Basilica of S. Petronio; and built a magnificent gallery in his own house, which is now the Palazzo Monti. His principal work, however, was the grand portico which led from the Saragossa gate at Bologna to the Monte della Guardia, a distance of two and a half miles. This great undertaking was commenced in 1674, and Monti was indefatigable in prosecuting the work, but died, according to Milizia, in 1692, before it was completed.

MONTI, INNOCENZIO. Crespi classes this artist among the Bolognese painters, but Orlandi among those of Imola, where he left some works, particularly one of the Circumcision at the Gesù of Mirandola, executed in 1690—a work highly commended. This artist went to Germany and Poland, where he is said to have met with great success, and executed many works.

MONTI, ANTONIO DE’, a native of Rome, who flourished during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., and, according to Baglioni, was the first portrait painter of his age.

MONTI, DE’, OF DALLE LODOLE. See GIUSEPPE FRANCO.

MONTICELLI, ANDREA, a Bolognese painter, born in 1640. He studied under Agostino Mitelli, and painted perspective and architecture in the style of his master; but his genius afterwards led him to practise in an entirely different branch, in which he excelled—that of easel pictures of fruit, flowers, vases, carpets, and other objects of still life, executed with freedom, spirit, and natural coloring. He also painted landscapes. He died in 1716.

MONTICELLI, MICHELE ANGELO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1678. He first studied under Marc’ Antonio Franceschini, and afterwards with Domenico Maria Viani. He excelled in painting landscapes and battle-pieces, which his biographer Crespi highly extols. No painter of his time surpassed him in the composition of his subjects, the degradation of his distances, and the forms and foliage of his trees. He also enriched his pictures with noble edifices, and with figures correctly disposed, and touched with a spirited pencil. Unfortunately, he lost his sight in the prime of life, when his powers were in their perfection. He died in 1749. Zani says he was born in 1670, and died in 1748.

MONTMIRAL, MARQUIS DE, a French nobleman, who, according to Basan, etched for his amusement a few plates of landscapes from his own designs, and others after Albert. They are dated about 1733.

MONTORFANO, GIOVANNI DONATO, a Milanese painter, who, according to Zani, was born in 1440, and died in 1510. He executed some works for the churches at Milan, the chief of which is a Crucifixion, a grand composition, abounding in figures, in the Refectory of the Dominicans in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, where Lanzi says "it is unfortunately thrown into the shade by the Grand Supper of Leonardo da Vinci. He cannot compete with a rival to whom many of the greatest masters are compelled to yield the palm. He excels in his coloring, which has preserved his work fresh and entire, while that of Vinci showed signs of decay in a few years. What is original in Montorfano, is a peculiar clearness in his features, as well as a dignity in his attitudes, which, if united to a little more elegance, would have left him but few equals in his line." He introduced into this picture a group of soldiers gaming, in whose countenances are depicted attention and a strong desire of gain. The architecture introduced of the walls, gates and edifices of Jerusalem, is both correct and magnificent, presenting those gradual retrocessions of perspective, upon which the Milanese school prided itself at that time. This work is dated 1495, and was painted before the Last Supper of da Vinci, which was executed about 1500. Lanzi says he retained the old custom, which continued at Milan till the time of Gaudenzio, though long before reformed in other places, of giving relief to his glories of Saints, and to arms and ornaments of men and horses, "by mixing with his pictures some plastic work in composition."

MONTORSOLI, FRA GIOVANNI ANGELO, an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, born in 1507, at Montorsoli near Florence, a villa belonging to his father, Michele d'Angelo da Poggibonzi. He studied three years under Andrea Fiesole; and, after the death of his father, he found employment at Rome, Perugia, and Volterra, where he assisted in executing the monument to Raffaele Maffei. He was next employed by Michael Angelo Buonarrotti in the church of San Lorenzo, at Florence, and gained, according to Vasari, the admiration and lasting friendship of that great man. In 1530, Montorsoli became a friar of the Order dei Servi della Nunziata at Florence, and entered the convent of that fraternity; but he was shortly afterwards called to Rome by Clement VII., at the recommendation of Buonarrotti, to restore several ancient monuments, much to the dissatisfaction of the brothers of the Nunziata. Montorsoli restored the Laocoon, to which he made the right arm; he made the left arm of the Apollo, besides several other restorations, and a statue of the Pope. After the death of Clement VII., Montorsoli again joined Michael Angelo at Rome, and assisted him in the monument of Julius II.; but while engaged in this work he was invited by Cardinal Turnone, and advised by Michael Angelo, to visit the court of Francis I. On arriving at Paris, he was commissioned to execute four colossal statues; but owing to difficulties with the treasury and servants of the court in the king's absence, Montorsoli left Paris, and returned to Italy, without executing the works. After completing several fine productions in Florence and its vicinity, he visited Rome by way of Naples, and there constructed the tomb of Jacopo Sanazzaro. He next finished, at Genoa, the statue of Andrea Doria, which was commenced by Baccio Bandinelli, and ornamented the church of S. Matteo in that city with many works. In 1547 he went to Messina, and executed the magnificent fountain in the square before the Cathedral. The successful completion of this great work induced the Messinese to commission Montorsoli to erect another fountain in front of the Custom House. He also designed at Messina the church of S. Lorenzo, a lighthouse, aqueducts, and many other important works in sculpture and architecture. In 1557, by a decree of Pope Paul IV., all persons who had taken religious orders, and were living at large in the world, were ordered to return to their convents and reassume their religious habits; and Montorsoli was accordingly obliged to leave many works unfinished, which he entrusted to his pupil Martino, and then returned to his convent at Florence. Shortly after, however, he was invited to Bologna, to construct the high altar of the church of the Nunziata, which he completed in the most splendid style in twenty-eight months. In 1561 he returned to Florence. Possessing an ample fortune, he erected a common sepulchre for artists in the chapter house of the Convent della Nunziata, with the requisite endowment for regular masses at appointed times; and gave the whole sepulchre, chapter, and chapel to the then almost decayed Society of St. Luke. At a solemn feast, celebrated by forty-eight Florentine artists in honor of the completion of the sepulchre, the Society was reestablished by the consent and authority of Duke Cosmo I. upon a firmer and more permanent basis. The Society has since been considerably enriched, and endowed by successive Dukes of Tuscany, and still exists as the Academy of Florence. Montorsoli died, according to Vasari, in 1563.

MONTPETIT, ARMAND VINCENT DE, a French painter, born at Macon in 1713. He went to Paris, where he gained considerable distinction as a portrait painter. He also invented a method of painting in miniature, which he termed Eludoric. He had a great knowledge of and genius for mechanics, and produced several valuable inventions.

MONTREUL, EUDES DE, an eminent French architect, who flourished, according to Felibien, in the latter half of the 13th century. His talents were highly esteemed by Saint Louis, king of France, whom he accompanied in the expedition to the Holy Land, and was employed to fortify the city of Jaffa. On returning to Paris, he was commissioned by the king to erect a number of churches, among which are those of St. Catherine du Val des Ecoliers; de l'Hotel de Dieu; des Blancs Manteaux; des Cordeliers; des Mathurins; and les Chartreux. He died in 1289.

MONVERDE, LUCA, a painter born at Udine in 1501. He studied under Pellegrino di San Daniello, and early exhibited such extraordinary talents that, according to Renaldi, "he was regarded as a sort of prodigy of genius"; but he died in 1522, aged 21 years. He painted an altarpiece for the church of S. Maria delle Grazie at Udine, representing the Virgin and Infant, with Sts. Gervasio and Protasio, which is highly commended. His premature death was lamented by every true lover of art.

MOOJAERT, MOOYAERT, or MOONYAERT. See MOYAERT.

MONZA, NOLFO DA, an old painter, who flourished at Milan about 1500, and studied under Bramante. Lanzi says, if he was not equal to the first painters of the time, he was, nevertheless, of a superior character. He is said to have painted at the church of S. Satiro and other places, from the designs of his master. In S. Satiro, near the beautiful temple of Bramante, are several old pictures, attributed to Nolfo.

MONZA, TROSO DA, an old painter much praised by Lomazzo, for his works in the Palazzo Landi, at Milan. "They consist of Roman histories," says Lomazzo, "quite surprising for the figures, as well as the architecture and perspective, which is stupendous." Resta, who saw them in 1707, says that "he was almost astounded by their surpassing excellence, beauty, and sweetness." He painted much at Milan and his native place, particularly at the church of S. Giovanni. In the same church are several histories of Queen Teodelina, executed in various compartments, in 1444, which are attributed to him. Lanzi does not think this artist worthy of so much praise as has been bestowed upon him, yet he admits that he had not seen his best works.

MONY, LOUIS DE. See MONI.

MOOR, CHEVALIER KAREL DE, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1656. He was intended by his father for one of the learned professions, but exhibiting an early and decided inclination for art, he was placed under the instruction of Gerard Douw, with whom he made considerable progress, but disliking his slow and tedious manner, and anxious to adopt a larger scale, he was sent to Amsterdam, and placed under Abraham vander Tempel. The death of that master happening soon afterwards, he returned to Leyden, and studied with Francis Mieris. On leaving this master, he went to Dort to practice with Godfrey Schalcken, though at that time he was superior to him as a designer, but wished to learn his method of handling. When he first began to practice his profession, he painted portraits and domestic subjects, and took the most effectual method to establish his reputation by exhibiting in his works a greater regard to fame than fortune. His pictures were greatly admired, procured him abundant employment, and he was soon considered one of the ablest artists of his time. The states of Holland commissioned him to paint a picture for their Council Chamber, and left the selection of the subject to himself, with the proviso that it should relate to the administration of Justice. On this occasion, he proved himself capable of nobler exertions than had hitherto engaged his pencil, and represented the Judgment of Brutus, in the most sublime and impressive manner. Moor acquired immense reputation for his portraits, and being familiar with the manners of the best masters of his country, he sometimes imitated the dignity, force, and delicacy of Vandyck, and at others, the striking effect and spirit of Rembrandt. He was commissioned by the Emperor of Germany to paint equestrian portraits of Prince Eugene, and the Duke of Marlborough, which he executed so much to the satisfaction of that monarch, that he conferred on him the honor of knighthood. These works were regarded with universal admiration, and produced several poems laudatory of the artist. He also painted the portrait of Peter the Great, and of many other distinguished personages. The celebrity of Karel de Moor reached Italy, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany requested him to paint a portrait of himself to be placed in the Florentine gallery, on the receipt of which, he rewarded him with a gold chain and medal. One of his most capital performances is a large picture in the hall of the magistrates at the Hague, representing the Burgomasters and Echevins, in the year 1719. The pictures of Moor are ingeniously composed, his figures are correctly designed, and his coloring clear and transparent. His works are always very highly finished; yet his touch is firm and free, and they have nothing of the appearance of labor. Although he was mostly employed on large works, he often painted small easel pictures of history or conversations, elegantly designed and executed, which are exceedingly valued. He also etched a few portraits of eminent artists from his own designs, among which are those of Gerard Douw, Francis Mieris, and John van Goyen. He died in 1738.

MOORE, JACOB, or JAMES, a Scotch painter, born at Edinburgh about 1740, and brought up in the school of design established in that city under the direction of Alexander Runciman.—About 1770, he went to Italy and settled at Rome, where he continued to reside till his death in 1795. He acquired considerable reputation as a landscape painter, and appears to have founded his style by studying the works of Claude. He was much employed by the English nobility and gentry, who visited that capital.

MOORE, SAMUEL, an English amateur designer and engraver, who flourished about 1715. He executed a few plates from his own designs, among which are the Coronation Procession of King William III. and Queen Mary, coarsely etched, and retouched with the graver.

MOORTELE, or MORTEL, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1650. He excelled in fruit and flower-pieces, and other objects of still-life. He carefully studied and painted all his subjects after nature, which are elegantly designed, and executed with great delicacy and truth. There is a mellowness and relief in his pictures of fruit, and a freshness and brilliancy in flower-pieces, that rivals nature, and approaches to illusion. He copied de Heem and Mignon so skilfully as to deceive connoisseurs of his time. His works are chiefly confined to Holland, where they are highly esteemed.

MORA, GIOVANNI GOMEZ DE, an eminent Spanish architect, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. About 1620 he erected the church and college of the Jesuits at Alcalá, praised by Milizia for its correct and magnificent proportions. The façade is of granite, of two orders; one with pilasters, and the other with Doric columns. Among the other works of Mora, is the church and convent of the Franciscans at Madrid; and the royal convent of the Augustins in the same city. His greatest work, however, was the grand square at Madrid, in which the size and uniformity of the edifices are worthy of high praise. The royal house, called the Panaderia, has a portico of pilasters, with twenty-four columns of the Doric order.

MORA, FRANCISCO DE, an eminent Spanish architect, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. At the death of Giovanni d'Herrera in 1597, he succeeded that architect in the erection of the Escorial, and built a chapel in the villa at the foot of the hill. Milizia says it is entirely of wrought stone, and is exceedingly attractive on account of its simple grandeur, being entirely destitute of ornament. Mora improved the cloister of the convent of S. Filippo el Reale; and erected at Madrid the Palace de los Consejos, the most superb edifice in that capital.

MORACE, ERNEST, a German engraver, born at Stuttgart in 1766. He studied under J. G. Müller, and engraved quite a number of plates in the neat, finished style of his master. He went to Paris, where he resided a long time, and engraved several of the plates for the Galerie de Florence, the Galerie d'Orleans, and for the Musée Français. He died in 1820.

MORALES, LUIS, called EL DIVINO, an eminent Spanish painter, born at Badajos in Estremadura in 1509. Palomino erroneously states that he studied with Pedro Campagna, for the latter did not arrive in Spain, according to Bermudez, till 1548, and there are pictures by Morales in the church of the Conception at Badajos, dated as early as 1546. His pictures generally represent the head of our Saviour crowned with thorns, or that of the Virgin in grief, and those of penitent Magdalens. He seldom painted beyond the bust, and it is supposed that he scarcely ever designed full length pictures. His heads are of the most admirable and touching character, and are finished with exquisite care, without weakening the force or diminishing the expression. His pictures of the Ecce Homo, exhibit the height of human suffering, endured with more than mortal resignation; while those of the Mater Dolorosa, are expressive of the deepest anguish, and Magdalenes of penitential sorrow. Hence he was called El Divino Morales; and hence too, his works are said to resemble in many respects those of Leonardo da Vinci. Yet it must be allowed that he was an artist of contracted genius, and barren of invention, never venturing beyond the delineation of a single figure, and seldom beyond a single head. His works are dispersed all over Spain, and seldom seen out of that country. His larger pictures are in the churches; his smaller ones are found in the best collections, and are usually painted on wood or copper. He died in 1586.

MORAN, SANTIAGO, a Spanish historical and landscape painter who flourished at Madrid about 1640. According to Bermudez, he is deserving of more notice than he has received. He mentions three pictures by him, one of St. Jerome, in the possession of the Baron de Casa-Davalillo, in which he design, brilliancy of color, and anatomical science displayed, are admirable, and the landscape part, enchanting; another, the head of St. Jerome, was in the possession of Don Nicholas Lameyra, which le Brun mistook for the work of Albano; and a third, St. Jerome on his knees, quite naked, which has been engraved, but the engraver put the name of Guercino to the print. Moran designed the Muses which embellish the beautiful works of Quevedo, edition of 1670. He also painted many fine landscapes.

MORAND, JEAN ANTOINE, a French architect, born at Briançon in 1727. His father intended him for the priesthood, but having a strong inclination for art, he left the paternal roof at the early age of thirteen, and went to Paris. He studied perspective and decoration under Servandoni, and subsequently entered the school of Soufflot, who treated him as a friend. He erected, after the designs of that master, the Salle de Spectacle of Lyons, of which the decorations gained him great reputation. In 1759, at the marriage of the archduchess of Parma, Morand was invited thither to erect a theatre with the necessary machines. His work was much admired by his patrons, as well as by the Italian artists. He subsequently settled at Lyons, and erected the great bridge over the Rhone, 640 feet long, with seventeen piers. During the siege of Lyons in 1793, Moran used all his art to protect this bridge from an infernal machine, and was successful. In the next year he was proscribed and led to the scaffold.

MORANDI, GIOVANNI MARIA, an eminent painter, born at Florence in 1622. According to Pascoli he studied under Giovanni Bilivert, on leaving whom he went to Venice, where he resided sometime, studying and copying the works of the best Venetian masters. He afterwards went to Rome, where Lanzi says he established himself and formed a style of his own, Roman in design and Venetian in coloring, while some parts of it partook of the manner of Cortona. He acquired great reputation and executed several works for the churches, the chief of which are the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in the church of La Madonna del Popolo, and the Death of the Virgin in La Pace. The latter may be considered his master-piece, and has been engraved by Pietro Aquila. He was also celebrated for his easel pictures of historical subjects. But he was more celebrated for his admirable portraits, which gained for him a great reputation, both at home and abroad, and he was much employed in that branch by the nobility of Rome and Florence. He was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Leopold I., whose portrait he painted, and those of the Imperial Family. He also painted the portraits of several of the lesser princes of Germany, and many of the nobility. He lived to the great age of 95, and died in 1717.

MORANDINI, FRANCESCO, called IL POPPO, from the place of his nativity, a small town in the Florentine territory, where he was born in 1544. He was a scholar and imitator of Giorgio Vasari, though more minute in detail, and preferring more gay and cheerful compositions. He executed several works for the churches at Florence, the chief of which are the Conception in S. Michelino, and the Visitation of the Virgin, in S. Nicolo, which are highly commended by Vasari.

MORAZONE, GIACOMO, a Lombard painter, who flourished at Venice about 1441, where there are some of his works. His name is variously given by Italian authors. Vasari calls him Girolamo Mazzoni, or Morzoni, and Orlandi and Guarino enti call him Giacomo Marzone. Zanetti says his real name, as appears from his signature on his picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, in the Island of St. Elena, near Venice, is Giacomo Morazzone, dated 1441. He was an artist of distinction in his time, as is evident from the fact that he painted at Venice in competition with Jacobello del Fiore.

MORAZZONE, IL, or CAV. PIER FRANCESCO MAZZUCHELLI, was born at Morazzone, in the Milanese territory, in 1571; hence he is usually called Il Morazzone. After painting for a period in his native place, he went to Rome, where he passed the early period of his life, and by studying the works of the great masters in that metropolis, he acquired a correct design, and executed some works for the churches, the chief of which are the Assumption of the Virgin, in S. Maria Maddalena al Corso, and the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Silvestro in Capite. He afterwards went to Venice, where he studied the works of the best Venetian masters, especially Titian and Paul Veronese, and greatly improved his style of coloring. On his return to Milan he executed several works for the churches, in which he entirely changed his manner, adopting the graceful style of the Roman school, with the glowing coloring and rich draperies of the Venetian, so that one who had seen his pictures at Rome, could not have recognized his hand. The Adoration of the Kings in S. Maria Abate, is pronounced an admirable production. Lanzi says the genius of Morazzone was not so well adapted to the graceful as to the strong and magnificent, as is exhibited in his Conquest of the Archangel Michael, over the rebel Angels, in the church of S. Giovanni at Como, which is designed in a grand and sublime style, and executed with a powerful effect. He was also much employed for the different collections, as well as for the churches of the neighboring places, and he received several commissions from the King of Sardinia, who conferred on him the honor of knighthood. In 1626, he was invited to Piacenza, to paint the great cupola of the cathedral, which he only lived to commence. It was finished by Guercino, and that magician of art made it one of his grandest productions.

MORE, CHEVALIER ANTHONY, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1519. He studied under John Schoreel, on leaving whom he went to Italy, and spent some time at Rome in studying the works of the great masters, especially of Michael Angelo and Raffaele, and thence proceeded to Venice, and improved his coloring by contemplating the works of the best Venetian masters. On his return to Holland he painted history, but more especially portraits, with great success, and soon acquired the reputation of one of the ablest artists of his time. In 1552, he accompanied Cardinal Granville to Spain, who recommended him to the patronage of the Emperor Charles V., whose portrait he painted, and that of Prince Philip, which gave so much satisfaction to the monarch, that he sent him to Portugal, to paint the portraits of King John III, Catherine of Austria his Queen, and sister to Charles, and that of their daughter, the Princess Donna Maria, then contracted to Philip; he also painted the portrait of Donna Catalina, Charles' younger sister; all of which gave entire satisfaction, and the artist was munificently rewarded, and the honor of knighthood conferred upon him. The Emperor next despatched More to England to take the portrait of the princess Mary, previous to her marriage with Philip of Spain. On this occasion he is said to have employed all the flattering aids of his art, and so captivated the courtiers of Spain, with the charms of Mary's person, that he was employed by Cardinal Granville and several of the grandees to make copies of it for them. He accompanied Philip to England, where he remained till the death of Queen Mary, who highly honored him, presented him a gold chain, and allowed him a pension of £100 a year. The Emperor Charles V., having abdicated in favor of his son Philip II., the latter returned to Spain, and made More his court painter, where his talents procured him great respect and abundant employment. The King was accustomed to honor him with frequent visits, and treated him with extraordinary familiarity, such as he was not wont to bestow on the highest dignitary of his realm, and one day, in a moment of condescension and admiration, the monarch jocosely slapped him on the shoulder, which compliment, the painter in an unguarded moment, playfully returned by smearing his hand with a little carmine from his brush. The King withdrew his hand and surveyed it for a moment, seriously; the courtiers were petrified with horror and amazement; the hand to which ladies knelt before they had the honor to kiss it, had never before been so dishonored since the foundation of the monarchy; at that moment, the fate of More was balanced on a hair; he saw his rashness, fell on his knees, kissed the King's feet, and humbly begged pardon for the offence. Philip smiled, and pardoned him, and all seemed to be well again; but the person of the King was too sacred in those days, and the act too daring to escape the notice of the Inquisition, from whose bigotry and vengeance the King himself could not have shielded him. Happily for More, one of Philip's ministers advised him of his danger, and without loss of time, he set out for Brussels, upon the feigned pretence of pressing engagements, nor could Philip ever induce him to return to his court. More was employed by most of the princes of Europe, who liberally rewarded him, and at every court his paintings were beheld with admiration and applause, but at none more than those of Spain and England. He acquired an ample fortune. When he was in Portugal, the nobility of that country, in token of their esteem, presented him, in the name of their order, a gold chain, valued at a thousand ducats. He closely imitated nature. He designed and painted in a bold masculine style, with a rich tone of coloring; he showed a good knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, and he finished his pictures with neatness and care; his style is said to resemble that of Hans Holbein, though not possessing his delicacy and clearness; and there is something dry and hard in his manner. His talents were not confined to portraits; he painted several historical subjects in Spain for the Royal Collection, which were highly applauded, but which were unfortunately destroyed in the conflagration of the palace of the Prado. While he resided in Spain, he copied some portraits of illustrious women, in a style said to approach Titian. His own portrait, painted by himself, charmingly colored, and full of life and nature, is in the Florentine gallery. His best work was a picture of the Circumcision, intended for the cathedral at Antwerp, but he did not live to finish it, and died there in 1575. There is a slight discrepancy among authors as to the time both of his birth and death.

MORE, JOHN GASPAR, a Swiss engraver, who flourished at Zurich about 1694. He was principally employed in engraving portraits and other subjects for the booksellers, which are indifferently executed.

MORE, JACOB. See MOORE.

MOREAU, EDMÉ, a French engraver, who, according to Florent le Comte, flourished at Rheims about the end of the 17th century. He engraved some plates from his own designs, as well as from the works of other masters.

MOREAU, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1712. He was chiefly employed in engraving theses and ornamental subjects. He also engraved a few portraits and other subjects, among which are Lodovicus de Ponte Societatis Jesu; L. Moreau fec.; J. B. Bebel, after Watteau, and Christ raising the daughter of Jairus, after La Fosse.

MOREAU, JEAN MICHEL, a reputable French engraver, born at Paris in 1741; died in 1814. He attained considerable eminence in the art, and was received into the Academy in 1781. There are a great variety of vignettes and other book ornaments by him, chiefly etched, and assisted with the graver, in a very neat style. He wrought with great industry, and is said to have executed about 2000 designs for illustrating the works of La Fontaine, Marmontel, Voltaire, Rousseau, and other French authors. Among others, we have by him the following:

The Bath of Bathsheba; after Rembrandt. The Consecration of Louis XVI. at Rheims. Four plates, forming a large print of the Fête given at Paris in 1782, for the Birth of the Dauphin. The Tomb of J. J. Rousseau; J. M. Moreau, fec. 1778. A set of twenty-five small plates for the first volume of the Chansons de la Borde.

MOREAU, P., a French architect of little note, who flourished from 1750 to 1760. He is chiefly known by his tasteful designs; and there are a few etchings by him of architectural subjects, from his own compositions.

 MOREELZE, PAUL, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1571.

He was a disciple of Michael Mirevelt, whose manner he adopted. He went to Italy, where he resided some time, and improved himself by a diligent study of the works of the great masters. On his return to his own country, according to van Mander, he distinguished himself as a painter, engraver, and architect. He painted history with reputation, but excelled in portraits, in which he was little inferior to Mirevelt, and obtained so much patronage, that he devoted his talents mostly to this branch. During his residence at Rome he carefully studied and drew the magnificent edifices in that city, and applied himself to the study of perspective, so that he painted architecture extremely well. As an architect, the only work mentioned by him, is the Gate of St. Catherine at Utrecht, which was built after his designs. As an engraver, he executed some wooden cuts in chiaro-scuro in a masterly style, after his own designs, which are very scarce and highly prized. The harmonious union of the three tints produces a very pleasing effect. They are sometimes marked with his monogram, and sometimes, with P. Moreelze, the P. and M. being formed into a monogram as above. He died about 1638.

MOREL, ANTOINE ALEXANDRE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1764. He studied successively under Pierre Charles Ingouf, and Jean Massard. He engraved quite a number of plates after David, Ingres, and other French masters, and some of the plates for the Galerie de Florence, and the Musée Francais. His plates are executed with the graver in a clear, neat, finished style, possessing considerable merit. He was living in 1827.

MOREL, FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century, and engraved some plates of landscapes after P. Hackert, and others.

MOREL, JAN EVERT, a Dutch painter of fruit and flowers, born at Amsterdam in 1777. He had first studied under Thierry vander Aa at the Hague, and after his return to Amsterdam, with J. Linthorst. He made the works of John van Huysum his model, and became one of the best fruit and flower painters of his time, and is said to have very nearly approached that master in the lightness of his touch, and the brilliancy and delicacy of his coloring; which is high commendation. There is a superb vase of flowers by him in the Museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1808.

MOREL, JEAN MARIE, an eminent French architect, born at Lyons in 1728. In early youth he manifested a great love of art, and he vigorously prosecuted the study of mathematics and architecture. At the age of eighteen he was appointed architect to the Prince de Conti, who soon became convinced of his superior abilities, and gave him the entire management of his buildings. Morel showed his admirable taste, in arranging the gardens of the Isle Adam, which have been highly extolled. He subsequently transformed the Parc Guiscard into a beautiful landscape for the Duc d'Aumont, who obtained for Morel the appointment of architect des Menus Plaisirs, at the time of the marriage of Louis XVI. He preferred however, to remain with the Prince de Conti. After the death of that nobleman, Morel visited Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and Spain. He was constantly employed during a long life in designing and laying out gardens and parks in France, which gained him a wide reputation. His work entitled Theorie des Jardins, Paris, 1776, 8vo., has been highly praised for its originality and simplicity. He died in 1810.

MORELL, NICHOLAS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1664. He studied with N. Verendael, an eminent painter of flowers and fruit, whose manner and subjects he imitated with great success. He also excelled in painting vases, bas-reliefs, and other objects of still-life. He obtained great celebrity, and was invited to the court at Brussels, where he found so much employment in painting for the nobility and the collections, and obtained such round prices for his works, that he was enabled to maintain a magnificent establishment, and to live on terms of intimacy with persons of the first rank, by whom he was greatly respected. The pictures of Morell are correctly designed, and elegantly disposed; his pencil is broad and facile, and shows great facility of execution; his touch is full of spirit; his coloring fresh and true to nature, and suitable to the subjects. In some respects he was superior to his master, especially in the foliage of his plants and flowers. Two capital flower-pieces by this master are painted on the folding doors of the cabinet in which are preserved the tapestries belonging to the church of the Abbey of St. Peter, at Ghent. They are composed in a grand style and beautifully executed. He died at Brussels in 1732.

MORELLI, BARTOLOMEO, called IL PIANORO, from his native place in the Bolognese Territory, was born about 1629. He studied under Francesco Albano, at Florence. He painted history with great reputation, and some of his works are compared by Crespi with those of Albano. He was particularly excellent in his frescos, and was much employed by the churches. Among his numerous works at Bologna, the most esteemed are his St. Teresa, in la Madonna delle Grazie; and the Resurrection, in the Buon Gesù. Lanzi says, "he succeeded so admirably in his frescos, more especially in the chapel of the Casa Pepoli, in S. Bartolomeo di Porta, decorated by him throughout in such exquisite taste, that, were History silent, it would be said to have been designed and executed by Albano's own hand." He died in 1683.

MORELLI, FRANCESCO, a reputable Florentine painter, who flourished about 1600. He painted history; and also instructed pupils, among whom was the Cav. Giovanni Baglioni of Rome.

MORELLI, COSIMO, an eminent Italian architect, born at Imola in 1732. He was the son of Domenico Morelli, and the scholar of Domenico Trifogli. Fortunately for his success, he obtained powerful patronage at the very outset of his professional career; first, that of Gio. Carlo Bandi, Bishop of Imola, for whom he made designs for rebuilding the Cathedral of that city; and through him that of his nephew, Gio. Antonio Braschi, who was elevated to the pontifical office in 1775, with the title of Pius VI. The new pontiff, who had a personal regard for Morelli, appointed him city architect at Cesena; he also procured him a variety of commissions, among which was a design for a new sacristy at St. Peter's. The latter work, with several others, was not carried into execution; but the designs were universally admired.

Morelli executed a large number of works, which gained him great reputation. Among them are the cathedrals of Macerata and Imola; the metropolitan church at Fermo; the Conventuali, at Fossombrone, &c. It is somewhat singular that Morelli was almost as much employed in theatrical as in ecclesiastical architecture. Among his productions in the latter department of art, were the theatre of Imola (since destroyed by fire); those of Fermo, Jesi, and Osimo; also that of Ferrara, which he probably erected in concert with Foschini. Among his other edifices, are the Palazzo Braschi, at Rome; the Anguisola, at Piacenza; the Cappi, at Bologna; the Berio at Naples; the façades of the Ridotto at Cesena, and the Hospital at Imola; the façades of the Palazzo Publicco, and the Palazzo Vescovile. He died in 1812.

MORELLON. See F. MORELLON LE CAVE.

MORENO, FRA LORENZO, a Genoese painter, who, according to Soprani, flourished in 1544. He was a Carmelite monk, and was a very skillful fresco painter. He painted the Annunciation in a cloister at the Carmine, which was so much admired, that it was cut out of the wall to preserve it, when the edifice was repaired.

MORESINI. See FORNARI.

MORETTI, CRISTOFORO, a Cremonese painter, who flourished about 1460. According to Lomazzo, he painted a History of the Passion, representing our Redeemer before his Judges, opposite the Epiphany and the Purification of Bembo, in the Cathedral at Cremona. He was also employed with Bembo at the Court of Milan, and in the church of S. Aquilino. Lanzi considers him an able artist of the time, and one of the reformers of the art in Lombardy, particularly in perspective and design. In his History of the Passion, in which he excluded all kinds of gilding, he approaches the moderns. On one of his Madonnas in S. Aquilino, he signs his name Christophorus de Moretis de Cremona. The Cremonese writers call him the son of Galeazzo Rivello, and father and grandfather of several other Rivelli, all artists of Cremona, Moretti being only an assumed name.

MORETTO, IL. See BONVICINO.

MORETTO, NICCOLO, a painter who, according to Vasari, was a native of Padua, where he flourished about 1495, and executed many good works. Lanzi says that Vasari is in error, and that this artist is no other than Girolamo Mireti; but the names and dates do not at all agree. Mireti flourished from 1423 to 1441.

MORETTO, GIOSEFFO, a painter of Friuli, who flourished about 1588. He studied under Pomponio Amalteo, whom he assisted in his works, and whose daughter Quintilia he married. This lady had the reputation of a fine genius, and practised both painting and engraving, or rather etching. Lanzi says there remains only a single altarpiece of his at Friuli, inscribed Inchoavit Pomponius Amalteus, perfecit Joseph Moretius, anno 1588. He was a good artist.

MORETTO, FAUSTINO, was a native of Valcamonica, in the Brescian territory. According to Orlandi he was a reputable artist, and painted for the churches, both at Venice and Brescia, but mostly in the former city. He flourished about the middle of the 17th century.

MORGENSTERN, JOHANN LUDWIG ERNST, a German painter, born at Rudelstadt in 1738. He excelled in painting views of the interiors of churches and other edifices, in which the perspective is excellent. His subjects are similar to those of Peter Neefs, but have no appearance of imitation. They are painted with a full, rich pencil, a spirited touch, and a good knowledge of light and shade. His pictures are also ornamented with figures, elegantly designed and skillfully introduced. He died at Frankfort in 1819.

MORGHEN, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, the son of a lace merchant of Montpellier of German origin, who settled at Florence. Giovanni Mor-ghen was born in that city, flourished about the middle of the last century, and was the uncle of the celebrated Raphael Morghen. He was employed by the Marquis Gerini to engrave part of the plates after the works of the Florentine artists, in the Ducal Gallery. In 1767, he published six plates of the Antiquities of Paestum, after the designs of Antonio Joli.

MORGHEN, FILIPPO, an Italian engraver, the brother of the preceding, and the father of Raphael Morghen, flourished about 1757. He married the daughter of Francesco Liani, painter to King Charles III. of Naples, where he permanently settled. He executed part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples in 1757; also a number of other prints, among which are a set of the Twelve Apostles, after the statues of Baccio Bandinelli at Florence; and thirty-one Views and Ruins in the environs of Naples.

MORGHEN, RAPHAEL SANZIO, a preëminent Italian engraver, born at Florence, June 19, 1758, by his own account, according to the authority of Niccolo Palmerini, his favorite pupil, who published a complete catalogue of his works. His grandfather was a lace merchant of Montpellier, of German origin, who married a Genoese wife, and settled at Florence, where he had two sons, Filippo and Giovanni. They both devoted themselves to art; Filippo, the preceding artist, being an engraver. He early settled at Naples, and married the daughter of Francesco Liani, court painter to Charles III., by whom he had several daughters, and one son named Raphael, the subject of the present notice. Filippo must have made a visit to Florence some time after his marriage, and before the birth of Raphael, as the latter was born in that city.

Raphael Morghen was early instructed by his father in the elements of the art, and he made such rapid progress as to be able to engrave a tolerable plate when he had reached the age of twelve years. He first gained distinction by seven engravings from the masks of the carnival of 1778, the Pilgrimage of the Grand Signior to Mecca. This work possessed such extraordinary merit that his father determined to give him the best advantages, and accordingly sent him to Volpato at Rome. The latter first set him at copying Sadeler's print of Christ and Mary Magdalene in the Garden; and he shortly afterwards engraved Gavin Hamilton's allegorical figure of Painting, for the brothers Hackert. In 1781, he engraved Raffaele's allegorical figures of Poetry and Theology, from the Vatican, and in the same year he married Volpato's only daughter, Domenica. Morghen then wrought in concert with his father-in-law, and assisted him in his plate of Raffaele's Parnassus, or the Historical Illustration of Poetry, in the Stanze of the Vatican. In 1787 he engraved the Aurora of Guido, painted in fresco in the Rospigliosi palace, which was greatly admired, though inferior to many of his works. The impressions taken without the words In Ædibus Rospigliosis, and those taken before the plate was retouched by the Volpato school, are much the most valuable. In 1790 Morghen visited Naples, and engraved a portrait of his father. The Neapolitan court, in 1792, wished him to remain permanently at Naples, and offered him a salary of 600 ducats; but Morghen chose to accept an invitation from the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and accordingly settled at Florence in 1793, with a salary of 400 scudi and free apartments in the city, under the sole condition that he should keep a public school; with the privilege of engraving what he might choose, his prints remaining his own property.

The fame of Morghen soon rose to a great height, and he received many commissions from the royal family of Florence. In 1795, he commenced the celebrated Madonna del Sacco, after Andrea del Sarto; and the Transfiguration of Raffaele. The latter was not completed until 1812, when it appeared, with a dedication to Napoleon. This print was originally sold at twenty scudi, or about twenty dollars; but the price was much increased, and some impressions commanded one hundred, and even one hundred and fifty dollars. He was occupied three years on his print of the Last Supper, after Leonardo da Vinci, which is his master-piece. Later impressions are retouched; the first, and by far the most valuable, have no comma after the words robis-dico robis, &c. The last impressions are also without the comma, which was removed. All the prints of Morghen have been described by his pupil Palmerini, to whom it was his custom to give an impression in every stage of the plate, from the first outline to the finished proof. Morghen was associated with the French Institute after the year 1803, and he visited Paris in 1812, at the invitation of Napoleon, who honored him with many presents. By Louis XVIII. he was honored with the decoration of the Legion of Honor, and the cordon of St. Michael.

Although Raphael Morghen cannot, perhaps, be ranked with Marc' Antonio, Edelinck, Nanteuil, and Gerard Audran, he yet holds a very high rank among engravers. He deserves great credit for his correctness of design, vigorous and characteristic expression, not less than for the delicacy and harmony of his execution. His facility of execution was wonderful; no engraver ever had a more perfect control of his instrument. He is also said to have been the first to use the point in executing the flesh parts. His plates all appear to be after one master, consequently they can give no idea of the styles of those artists after whom he engraved. His execution is generally flat, lacking tone and aerial perspective.

Morghen married three times, and left several children. He died at Florence in 1833. His pupil, Palmerini, published at Florence in 1824 a life and portrait of him, with a catalogue of his works, entitled Catalogo delle Opere d'Intaglio di Raffaele Morghen, raccolte ed illustrate da N. Palmerini. According to this catalogue, Morghen has engraved seventy-three portraits; forty-seven religious subjects; forty-four historical and mythological pieces; twenty-four views; and thirteen vignettes and crests—in all 201 pieces. M. Feuillet de Conches, in the Biographie Universelle, says his entire work amounts to two hundred and fifty-four pieces, eighteen of which are after Raffaele. Among his portraits are those of Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarch, Ariosto, Tasso, Raffaele, the Fornarini, Leonardo da Vinci, and a magnificent plate after Vandyck, of the Duke de Moncada. Among his other plates are Lot and his Daughters, after Guercino; the Repose in Egypt, and Angelica and Medora, after Teodoro Matteini; the Virgin sleeping, with the infant Jesus, after

MORIER, DAVID, a Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1705. He distinguished himself as a painter of battle-pieces, managed horses, &c. He went to England soon after the battle of Dettingen, where he procured, through the interest of Sir Edward Faulkener, an introduction to the Duke of Cumberland, who took him into his service, and settled upon him a pension of £200 a year. He also painted portraits with reputation. He died in London in 1770.

MORIN, JEAN, an eminent French painter and engraver, born at Paris about 1612. He studied painting under Philippe de Champagne, practised the art for some time, and executed many portraits, as well as some historical subjects. He afterwards abandoned it, and devoted himself entirely to engraving, in which he became very eminent. His plates are executed in a singular style, being a mixture of strokes and dots; but they are so harmonized as to produce a very pleasing effect. They are executed chiefly with the point, in a masterly manner; and though they are not finished with all the neatness and delicacy which the graver is capable of producing, yet they are etched with uncommon taste, and great freedom of hand, possessing extraordinary merit. His portraits are the most esteemed. He died in 1666. The following are his best prints:

MORINA, GIULIO, a Bolognese painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th and first part of the 17th centuries. According to Malvasia, he studied under Lorenzo Sabbatini, but formed his style of design by an attentive study of the works of the Caracci, and the airs of his heads show that he was emulous of imitating the expression of Correggio. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed many works for the churches at Bologna, the most esteemed of which are the Presentation, at the Servi; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in S. Uomobono; and the Crucifixion, in SS. Sebastiano e Rocco. He was also considerably employed at Parma, and was some time in the service of the Duke.

MORINELLO, ANDREA, a native of Val di Bisagno, in the Genoese territory, according to Soprani, flourished about 1516. Lanzi says he was very graceful in his countenances, soft and clear in his outlines, and one of the first in those parts to open the way for the modern manner. There is a fine altar-piece by him at S. Martino di Albaro, dated 1516. He also excelled in portraits.

MORINI, GIOVANNI, a native of Imola, who studied under Giuseppe Maria Crespi, at Bologna, and whose manner he imitated. He was living in 1769.

MORIS, R., a scholar and imitator of Godfrey Schalcken. Little is known of him. He died young.

MORLAND, HENRY ROBERT, an English painter, born at London in 1724, and died in 1797. He was the son of an obscure painter, who instructed him in the art. He painted portraits, both in oil and crayons, and scraped a few mezzotinto plates. He also painted domestic subjects, and was very successful in representing scenes by candle-light. He found considerable employment in cleaning and repairing ancient pictures. Embarking in the business of picture dealing, he became a bankrupt.

MORLAND, GEORGE, was the son of the preceding, born in London in 1764. He possessed, naturally, extraordinary talents for painting, which, if they had been improved by judicious instruction, assiduous study, and a noble ambition, would have led him to the very pinnacle of fame and fortune; but unfortunately his early mental and moral culture was neglected, and his professional instruction was defective; his early companions were dissipated and worthless, and he sunk a victim to intemperance almost as low as the swine he delighted to depict. After he had acquired distinction, and his works commanded high prices, he was surrounded by harpies, who took advantage of his necessities and misfortunes. Many of his best pictures were painted in sponging houses, to clear him from arrest; or in ale-houses, to discharge his reckoning. He died in one of the former, and his wife survived him only two days. He had no other instruction than what he received from his father, who early discovered in his son a genius for painting, and employed it for his own advantage; he had him indentured to him, and kept him constantly employed in making pictures and drawings for sale. By these means, young Morland acquired a wonderful facility of execution, but wholly neglected academic studying. Owing to the narrow and illiberal manner in which his talents were employed, he fell into low habits, and formed bad connexions. On the expiration of his indenture, he left his father's house, and the remainder of his life is the history of genius degraded by intemperance and immorality, which alternately excites our admiration at his great talents, and our regrets at the profligacy of his conduct. Morland's subjects are usually from low life, such as pig-sties, farm-yards, landscapes with cattle and sheep, fishermen or smugglers on the sea-coast. He seldom or never produced a picture perfect in all its parts, but those parts adapted to his knowledge and taste were exquisitely beautiful. He knew well his faults, and usually selected those subjects best suited to his talents. His knowledge of anatomy was extremely limited; he was totally unfitted for designing the human figure elegantly or correctly, and incapable of large compositions. He also possessed little mental refinement, and perhaps lost the little inherent feeling he possessed by associating with low company, and indulging in slothful inebriety. In portraying the broad and vulgar walks of life he was imitable, but his landscapes were not always critically exact, nor his coloring uniformly good, for he had not devoted sufficient time to acquire a true knowledge of nature, or to develop the powers he possessed. Never having traveled, even in his own country, nor seen any romantic scenery, his landscapes generally consist of fields, hedges, ponds, and clay-banks, introduced as backgrounds to his figures. His most admirable pictures are his interiors, those comprising inland scenery, sheep, pigs, and asses. The more confined the subject the greater his success; and his faults increase as the scene expands. He was peculiarly happy in depicting a flock of sheep under a dwarf oak. He selected those animals that require the least correctness of drawing, as sheep, hogs, asses, and old clumsy horses, being unacquainted with the anatomy of that noble animal. An old white horse was a favorite subject with him, from its affording a mass of light, with a most favorable opportunity for a display and contrast of coloring. But the hog was his favorite animal, and that which he introduced most frequently and with the greatest success; his touch was well adapted to the representation of its bristly hide, and he seldom failed to depict to the life the appearance and character of that lazy and gluttonous animal. According to his biographer, Mr. George Dawe, who wrote an impartial and excellent life of Morland, he arrived to the full maturity of his powers about 1790, in the short space of six years after he left his father, and from that time they began and continued to decline, till the day of his death. His earlier works are hard, formal, labored, and carefully finished; as he acquired confidence in his powers, he adopted a broader style and greater freedom of execution, and he wrought with extraordinary facility. During the last few years of his life he was seldom sober, and only painted to supply his animal wants and to escape from arrest; and it was a common practice of the sharpers about him to get him in debt, shut him up in a room, and thus compel him to paint for a guinea a picture which they could readily sell for thirty. Though Morland wrought with extraordinary facility, it is falsely said that he painted four thousand pictures. Even in his life-time his works were so much admired and sought after that they were imitated by some of his cronies, with his consent and connivance. Stanley says that his brother Henry "kept a regular manufactory of them." His best works now command very high prices. He died in 1804. What a melancholy history, and how full of admonition!

MORMANDO, GIO. FRANCESCO, an Italian architect, born at Florence in 1455. He studied architecture under Leon Battista Alberti, and subsequently went to Rome for improvement. After studying the remains of antiquity in that city, he settled at Naples, and became the friend and competitor of Novella da S. Lucano and Gabriello d' Agnolo. He erected the church of S. Severino, and gained so high a reputation for this admirable work, that King Ferdinand invited him to Spain, and appointed him first royal architect. On returning to Naples, he continued the church of S. Severino, and made some additions to the monastery. The Duke de' Viestri commissioned him to erect a massive palace, subsequently called Filomarini, which has been greatly injured by various insurrections. Among the other works of Mormando is the small church della Stella, near S. Severino; and the Palazzo Cantalupo, erected from his design. He died, according to Milizia, in 1552.

MORO, ANTHONY. See MORE.

MORO, IL. See TORBIDO.

MORO, GIO. BATTISTA D'ANGELO, a painter, born at Verona about 1512. He was a scholar of Francesco Torbido, called Il Moro, but afterwards went to Venice to improve his coloring by studying the works of Titian. He painted both in oil and fresco, acquired considerable distinction, and executed several works for the churches at Verona, sometimes in competition with Paul Veronese. His design was graceful, and his coloring rich and vigorous. His picture of St. Paul before Ananias in the church of S. Eufemia, is so highly prized that it was sawed out of the wall with great care and expense, and removed to a place of safety, when that edifice was repaired. Another fine picture by him, is an Angel presenting the Palms of Martyrdom to the Innocents, in S. Stefano. He also painted at Venice, where his most capital work is an altar-piece in S. Maria Maggiore, representing the Virgin between St. John and St. Mark, surrounded with several figures in ducal robes, which are the portraits of the Marcello family, for whom it was painted. He also executed some slight, but spirited etchings, from his own designs, in which the extremities in particular, are drawn in a very masterly manner. In conjunction with Battista Vicentino, he engraved a set of fifty landscapes, mostly after Titian, executed in a bold, free style. We have also the following prints by him:

The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds; after Parmigiano. The Virgin, with the infant Christ and St. John; B. A. del Moro, fec. The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth and St. John; after Raffaele. Another Holy Family; do. The Martyrdom of St. Catherine; after Bernardino Campi. The Baptism of Christ by St. John; do.

MORO, MARCO D'ANGELO, was the son of the preceding, who instructed him in the art. He assisted his father in some of his works at Venice, and Lanzi says he possessed excellent abilities, as is shown by his picture of Paradise, in the church of S. Bartolomeo at Venice. He died young about 1560.

MORO, GIULIO D'ANGELO, was a younger brother of Marco M. He studied under his father, whose style he followed, and whose reputation he justly sustained. Zanetti calls him the dotto pittore, the learned painter, and says that he distinguished himself alike in all the arts. His chief works at Venice are the Four Coronati, in the church of S. Apollinare, which discover an elegance and precision of design, sufficient to rank him among distinguished artists.

MORO, LORENZO DEL', a Florentine artist, who studied under Jacomo Chiavistelli, and, according to Orlandi, was a spirited painter of fruit, flowers and animals. He was living in 1718.

MORONI, DOMENICO, an old painter of Verona, born in 1430. According to Vasari, he was instructed in the art by one of the pupils of Stefano Veronese. There is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Bernardino at Verona, which is highly esteemed and preserved with great care. He died about 1500.

MORONI, FRANCESCO, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Verona in 1474. Vasari says he excelled his father, and commends him for the graceful style of his design, and the harmony and suavity of his coloring, "in which he was inferior to none." Lanzi says he was bound by the strictest ties of friendship with Girolamo da' Libri from his youth, and that they were frequently employed together in the same labors. The latter part of his life was spent at Rome, where he executed several altar-pieces for the churches and convents, which hold a respectable rank even in that emporium of art. There are several pleasing pictures of Madonnas and Saints, inscribed with his name in the Museum at Berlin. He died at Rome in 1529.

MORONI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA. This painter was born at Albino, in the Bergamese Territory, in 1528. He was a pupil of Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto, and, according to Tassi, was one of his ablest disciples, and the most successful follower of his style. He executed many works for the churches at Bergamo, and other places in the vicinity. He was an excellent colorist, but was inferior to his instructor in invention and design, and in the graceful airs of the heads, which distinguish the productions of Il Moretto. Among his most esteemed works at Bergamo are, the Crowning of the Virgin, in the church of La Trinità, the Assumption, in S. Benedetto, and a Pietà, or a Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin, surrounded by several saints, at the Cappuccini. He was one of the best portrait painters of his time, excelled only by Titian. He died in 1578.

MORONI, PIETRO, called MORONE BRESCIANO, was the son of the preceding, by whom he was first instructed. According to Averoldi, he afterwards became the disciple of Paolo Veronese.—Lanzi says, "he studied a good deal the works of Titian, and was one of the most accurate and elegant designers the Venetian school could boast at that period, nor does he yield to any of his cotemporaries in the strong body and clearness of his coloring." He executed some works for the churches of Venice and other places, particularly at Brescia; hence he is sometimes called Morone Bresciano. His picture of Christ bearing his Cross, in the church of S. Barnaba at Venice, is commended as one of the most masterly productions of the time. He was considered one of the ablest artists of the Venetian school. His name is improperly written by some authors, Marme. He died at Riva di Soldo about 1625.

MOROSINI, FRANCESCO, called IL MONTEPULCIANO, from the place of his nativity. According to Baldinucci, he studied under Orazio Fidani, whose style he adopted. He executed some works for the churches at Florence, but was chiefly employed by individuals. His best work is a picture of the Conversion of St. Paul, in the church of S. Stefano, at Florence. He flourished in the last half of the 17th century.

MORTIMER, JOHN HAMILTON, an English historical painter of considerable eminence, born at Eastbourne, in Sussex, in 1739. His father was a collector of customs, and his uncle is said to have been a painter of talents, whose studio he frequented. He was sent to London, and placed under the tuition of Hudson, but their tastes being different, he did not derive much advantage from his instructions. He was indebted for his greatest improvement to his constant attendance in the Duke of Richmond's gallery, which that nobleman liberally opened for the study and advancement of the young artists of the time. He soon after gained the pension of one hundred guineas, given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for the best historical picture, which was adjudged to his St. Paul converting the Britons. This picture established his reputation as an able artist, and he successively increased his celebrity by the production of several admirable works, among which are, King John granting the Magna Charta to the Barons, the Battle of Agincourt, Vortigern and Rowena, &c. He was a member of the Society of Artists for many years, and exhibited at their room in the Strand. In 1779, without solicitation or expectation, he was elected a royal academician. He executed a few etchings from his own designs, and after others, in a bold, free style, among which are a Set of twelve circular plates of characters from Shakspeare; Nature and Genius introducing Garrick into the Temple of Shakspeare; the Virgin teaching St. John, after Guercino; a set of fifteen plates of Studies, after S. Rosa, Lairese, and other masters.

MORTO, DA FELTRO. See FELTRO.

MORVILLO, SILVESTRO, called IL BRUNO, a Neapolitan painter, whose works date, according to Dominici, from 1571 to 1597. He was a good artist, and was considerably employed by the churches.

MOSCA. There seem to have been several artists of this name, but they are so vaguely mentioned that it is difficult to distinguish them. Malvasia mentions a Giovanni Maria Mosca, of Padua, or Milan, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century, and executed some works in sculpture at Orvieto. Also a Mosca of Mantua, a painter, who lived about the same time. Lanzi, in his history of the Roman school says, "Mention is made of one Mosca, whether a native or a foreigner, I know not, as a disciple of this school; his Christ on the way to Mount Calvary, now in the Academy of Mantua, is certainly a Raffaellesque picture; but we may rather consider Mosca an imitator, and a copyist, than a pupil of Raffaele." Stanley mentions a picture of the Virgin and Child in a landscape, which is supposed to be by this master, from its being inscribed with a fly, his rebus.

MOSCATELLO, CARLO, a Neapolitan artist, born in 1655, and died in 1739. He was an excellent perspective painter, and executed the architectural parts of some of the works of Luca Giordano, and other eminent artists of the time.

MOSER, GEORGE MICHAEL. This artist was born in Switzerland in 1707, but went to England very young. He was by profession a gold chaser, in which he arrived at great eminence. He did not confine his talents to this art, but painted in enamel with considerable success. He was also a skillful draughtsman, and had a good knowledge of the anatomy of the human figure, which perfectly qualified him for the office of Keeper of the Royal Academy, which he held from the foundation of that institution in 1768, till his death in 1783. The occupation of the Keeper principally consists in superintending and instructing the students who practise drawing and modeling from the antique statues.

MOSER, MARY, was a daughter of the preceding, who painted fruit and flowers in an exquisite manner, was much patronized by the nobility, and was elected a member of the Royal Academy;—an honor never conferred upon any other lady, except Angelica Kauffmann. It is said that Queen Caroline entertained so high a regard for her virtues and talents, that she paid her the highest respect, and frequently visited her studio. Miss Moser decorated an entire room at Frogmore with flowers, for Queen Charlotte, and received £900 for the work. She subsequently married a Mr. Lloyd, after which she practised only as an amateur. She died at an advanced age in 1803.

MOSES, called LITTLE MOSES. See UYTENBROECK.

MOSIN. See MOTZYN.

MOSLEY, CHARLES, an English engraver, who flourished in London about 1760. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. His portraits are his best prints, of which King Charles I. on horseback, after Vandyck, and Marshal Belleisle on horseback, are worthy of notice.

MOSNIER, JEAN, a French painter, born at Blois in 1609. He was the son of a painter on glass, who instructed him in his own profession. He afterwards went to Italy, and studied under Cristofano Allori at Florence. On his return to his native country, he settled at Paris, where he acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He executed some works for the churches and public edifices, the best of which are in the church of St. Martin at Paris. He died in 1656.

Haerlem in 1499. He was of an honorable family, and studied under Jacob van Haerlem. His personal accomplishments, and the politeness of his address, together with his professional merits, procured him the esteem and patronage of persons of the highest rank, and he acquired great reputation as an historical and portrait painter. The Princess Margaret, sister to Philip I. of Spain, retained him in her service eighteen years. He painted the portraits of many of the nobility, and other distinguished personages of his country. Van Mander commends several of his historical works, which remained in his time in the churches and public edifices of Flanders, particularly a Nativity in the church of the Jacobins, at Haerlem; an Ecce Homo, in another church; and the Banquet of the Gods, a grand composition, full of dignity, and beautifully executed. He died in 1555. Balkema and Immerzeel both state that he was born in 1474, but they differ from all other authors.

MOSTAERT, FRANCIS and GILES, twin brothers and Flemish painters, born at Hulst, near Antwerp, in 1520. Francis studied with Henry de Bles, and Giles with John Mandyn; the former excelled in landscape, the latter in figures, so they mutually assisted each other. They settled at Antwerp, where they gained considerable reputation. Francis died in 1557, and Giles, as variously stated, in 1579, 1598, or 1601. Giles was a good historical painter, and in the Museum at Antwerp is a picture by him of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, St. John, and eight other large figures.

MOT, FRANÇOIS FREDERIC LE, a French sculptor, born at Lyons in 1773. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was sent to Paris, where he entered the Academy of Painting and Sculpture. While occupied one day in designing the Hercules of Puget, in the gardens of Sceaux Penthièvre, he attracted the attention of Dejoux, who received him into his school. Here le Mot made rapid advances, and at the age of seventeen gained the grand prize of sculpture, for his bas-relief of the Judgment of Solomon. He then visited Italy with the royal pension. Recalled to Paris in 1795, he was employed on the statue of the French Hercules, but it was never completed. He gained a high reputation, and was successively appointed member of the Institute; Professor of the School des Beaux Arts; Member of the Legion of Honor; Baron; and Chevalier of St. Michael. Among his principal works are the bas-relief which decorates the grand façade of the colonnade of the Louvre; the marble bas-relief for the tribune of the Chamber of Deputies; and the colossal equestrian statue of Louis XIV., at Lyons. He died in 1827.

MOTTA, RAFFAELLO, called RAFFAELLINO DA REGGIO, was born at Reggio in 1550. He studied under Lelio Orsi, and, according to Tiraboschi, he was one of the most promising artists of his age. He painted a few frescos in his native city, but his principal works are at Florence, where his two fables of Hercules in the Ducal Hall, and two Gospel histories in the Ducal Gallery, are highly commended. He also painted at Capraruola in competition with Zuccari and Vecchi, with such success that his lively figures make those of his competitors seem inanimate. He also painted in oil for the collections. Lanzi says he possessed an astonishing genius, deserving of Rome for its theatre of action. Nothing was wanting in this artist except a greater knowledge of design. His works are full of delicacy, relief, and spirit. He died in 1578, aged 28 years, deeply lamented like another Raffaele, prematurely passing away.

MOUCHERON, FREDERICK, called THE OLD, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Embden in 1633. He showed an early inclination for art, and was placed with John Asselyn, an eminent landscape painter, under whose able instructions, united with indefatigable application, he made extraordinary progress. When he was about twenty years of age he went to Paris, and met with such flattering encouragement that he abandoned the visit he had projected to Rome by the recommendation of his instructor. After a residence of several years at Paris, he returned to Antwerp, and afterwards settled at Amsterdam, where he acquired great distinction, and met with abundant employment. He designed everything after nature; consequently, though there is a great difference in the choice of his subjects, there is always an air of truth in his works. His landscapes are generally well chosen, and exhibit pleasing scenery; his touch is light and free; and his coloring generally agreeable; the forms of his trees well chosen, and his foliage light and apparently in motion. His foregrounds are clear and well finished, though his distances have frequently the appearance of mistiness or vapor, but they are in keeping with his subject. He frequently introduced waterfalls rushing through the different plans of his pictures, and enriched them with picturesque buildings and other architecture. He sometimes painted architectural views on a grand scale, with a magnificent effect. He did not succeed in his figures so well, and therefore employed other eminent artists to insert them for him, as Theodore Helmbrecker at Paris, and Adrian Vandervelde and John Lingelbach at Amsterdam. The works of Moucheron, though inferior to those of Berghem, Both, and other distinguished artists of the Dutch and Flemish schools, are yet esteemed worthy of a place in the choicest collections. He died at Amsterdam in 1686.

MOUCHERON, ISAAC, called the YOUNG, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1670. Although he lost his father at the age of sixteen, he had already made such progress, and was so thoroughly grounded in the principles of the art, that he needed no further instruction, but only an attentive study of nature. After having acquired the reputation of an able artist in his native city, desirous of further improvement, he went to Italy, where he resided four years, contemplated the works of the best masters, and filled his portfolio with the choicest designs of the picturesque scenery and ancient ruins in the vicinity of Rome and Tivoli. He thus acquired an extraordinary readiness for designing, and facility of execution, and was enabled to exhibit truth in all his compositions. On his return to Amsterdam he acquired great reputation, and was chiefly employed in decorating the grand saloons and halls of the nobility and wealthy persons with landscapes on a grand scale, in which the figures were usually inserted by Nicholas Verkolie, de Witt, and others. In the scenery, as well as the style of his landscapes, he seems to have emulated the grand manner of Gaspar Poussin. His pictures are enriched with figures and animals, and noble architecture. He was a perfect master of perspective and architecture. His coloring is extremely fresh, clear, and natural, with an abundance of harmony and union, and his touch is full of ease and spirit. He executed many easel pictures, which are exceedingly prized in Holland, and in every part of Europe. He also etched quite a number of plates, in a neat and very spirited style, after his own designs and those of G. Poussin, as follows. He died at Amsterdam in 1744.

A set of four Views of Gardens, with buildings and figures; inscribed J. Moucheron inv. pinx. et fec. Another set of four Views of Gardens and Buildings; inscribed J. Moucheron, inv. et fec. Four Landscapes, with Figures; after Gaspar Poussin; inscribed Einige Landscapen gescheldert door G. Poussin, &c. A set of nineteen Views of Heemstede in the Province of Utrecht; J. Moucheron, inv. et fec.

MOUCHET, FRANÇOIS NICOLAS, a French painter, born at Grai, in Franche Comte, in 1750. He visited Paris, and entered the school of Greuze. In 1776 he gained the grand prize of the Academy, and then devoted his talents to miniature painting. When the Revolution broke out, he took an active part, and was successively elected member of the municipality, and justice of the peace. In 1792 he was sent to Belgium, to select the finest works of art for the Louvre. During the reign of terror he opposed its bloody excesses, and was imprisoned fourteen months, during which time he painted miniatures for the support of his family. Liberated in 1794, he retired to his native place, and established a school of design. His portraits are distinguished for a broad, free, and vigorous pencil. There were two compositions by Mouchet exhibited at the Louvre: the Origin of Painting, and the Triumph of Justice. He died in 1814.

MOUCHY, MARTIN DE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1746. He studied with Augustine de St. Aubine, in whose style he executed quite a number of prints, chiefly for the booksellers, among which are the following:

A pair of Views in the environs of Triel; after Hackert. A View of Marienberg, near Stockholm; do. Another View in Sweden; do. A set of sixteen plates from the History of Telemachus; after the designs of Cochin and Monnet.

MOUZYN, or MOSIN, MICHAEL, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1630. He endeavored to unite the point with the graver, in the execution of his plates, but with no great success. His drawing is incorrect, and his style appears heavy and labored. The following are among his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Jacob van Wassenaer, Admiral of Holland. Michael Ruyter, Dutch Admiral; after H. van Alde. Cornelius de Witt, Pensionary of Holland; do. John van Galen, Admiral of Holland; after J. Livius.

SUBJECTS.

Venus sleeping; after J. A. Backer. The Four Elements under the empire of Venus; after C. Holsteyn. A Satyr presenting a Bunch of Grapes to a Woman and Child; do.

MOYA, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Granada in 1610. After acquiring some knowledge of the art in his own country, an ardent desire to view the works of the best Flemish painters induced him to go to Antwerp, where he was captivated with the style of Vandyck, and set out for England to place himself under that master.

He did not enjoy this advantage long, for Vandyck died a few months after his arrival in London. On his return to Spain he acquired considerable reputation, and executed several good works for the churches of Granada, of which the most admired is an altar-piece of the Conception, in the church of Nuestra Señora de Gracia. He died there in 1666.

MOYAERT, or MOOJAERT, CLAAS or NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1600. It is not known under whom he studied, but he is said to have formed his style by studying and imitating the works of Adam Ælzheimer. At all events, he could imitate Ælzheimer, Rembrandt, and Lievens so closely that some of his pictures have been sold for the genuine works of those masters. He was an eminent artist in his time, and taught many pupils, among whom were some of the most distinguished masters of the Dutch school, as Berghem, vander Does, Salomon de Koninck, John Baptist Weenix. The pictures of Moyaert bear a strong resemblance to those of Weenix. He also etched some spirited plates after his own designs, among which are a set of six different Animals, a Landscape with Cattle, and Lot and his Daughters, in the style of Ælzheimer.

C. M. MOYART, CHRISTIAN LOUIS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1600. He is said to have engraved a set of eight emblematical plates of the History of Mary de Medicis, marked with the above monogram. But Brulliot and Zani both assert that he and Claas are one and the same artist, and that the part of the monogram composed of C. L. signifies Claas, and not Christian Louis, as supposed. It is also ascertained, beyond a doubt, that the plates of the History of Mary de Medicis, published by Blaeu at Amsterdam in 1639, were engraved by Peter Nolpe, from the designs of Claas Moyart.

MOYNE, JEAN LOUIS, a French sculptor, born at Paris in 1665. He studied under Coysevox, and executed a number of esteemed works. He was chosen a member of the Academy, and was also honored with the office of rector of that institution. Among his best productions are his heads of distinguished personages, as the Duke d'Orleans, Mansard, and Largilliere; also two statues of Angels, in the church des Invalides; and a bas-relief in the church at Versailles, representing Christ bearing his Cross. He died at Paris in 1755.

MOYNE, JEAN BAPTISTE LE, an eminent French sculptor, the son and scholar of Jean Louis le Moyne, born at Paris in 1704. He was also a scholar of his uncle, Jean Baptiste le Moyne, a reputable sculptor; and of Robert le Lorrain. At the age of twenty, he gained the grand prize at the Academy, for a bas-relief, representing the Sacrifice of Polixena. Although entitled to the royal pension, he did not visit Rome, his father being very unwilling to part with him. In 1729, he executed a group of St. John baptizing Christ, for the church of S. Jean in Greve, which gained him so much reputation that the city of Bordeaux commissioned him to execute the bronze equestrian statue of Louis XV. For this work, the king settled upon le Moyne a pension of 1500 francs. His works have nothing of the purity and simlicity of the antique, which he regarded as feebleness of design; they are in a theatrical taste, and deserve no credit, except for mechanical execution. Besides those mentioned, there are many others, among which are the mausoleums of Cardinal de Fleury, Mignard, and Crebillon; the statues of St. Gregory and St. Teresa, at the Invalides; besides many heads of distinguished individuals; that of Coysevox is in the Musée des Monuments Français. Le Moyne died at Paris in 1778.

MOYREAU, JEAN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1712. His plates are very unequal in merit, but some of them possess considerable excellence. In 1736 he was chosen an academician, and engraved two fine plates on that occasion, a Halt of Hunters and the Rendezvous of the Chase, after van Falens. Moyreau also executed eighty-nine plates after Philip Wouwerman, which give an inferior idea of his correctness of design, and the spirit and elegance of his pencil. The following is a list of his best prints:

Rebecca receiving the Presents from the Servant of Abraham; after Paolo Veronese; for the Crozat collection. The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Bon Boullogne. The Parting of Hector and Andromache; do.—Bacchus and Ariadne; do. A Halt of Hunters; after van Falens. The Rendezvous of the Chase; do. (The two last plates were engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1736, and are among his best prints.) A Seaport; after Claude. La Partie Quarrée; after Watteau. A Waterfall; do. Of his best prints after Wouwerman, may be mentioned those entitled Le Colombier du Maréchal; La grande Chasse à l'oiseau; La Fontaine du Dauphin; La Fontaine de Neptune.

MUCCIOLI, BARTOLOMEO, an old artist of Ferrara, who flourished about the middle of the 15th century. His works have mostly perished.

MUCCIOLI, BENEDETTO, was the son of the preceding, and flourished at Urbino in 1492, where it seems the family had settled. According to Lazzari, there is a fine altar-piece by him in the chapel of the Muccioli, their descendants, in the church of S. Domenico at Urbino, signed Benedictus quondam Bartholomæi de Fer. Pictor. 1492.

MUDO, EL, an eminent Spanish painter, born at Logrono in 1526. His real name was Juan Fernandez Navarette, or Juan Fernandez Ximenes de Navarette. He was called El Mudo after he had acquired distinction as a painter, from his having been deaf and dumb from his infancy. He showed a talent for art early in life, and first studied under Fray Vicente de Santo Domingo, a monk of the Order of the Geronomytes, under whom he made such rapid progress, and exhibited so much genius, that his parents, by the advice of his instructor, sent him to Italy to study with Titian, with whom he remained several years, and thoroughly imbibed his principles and manner of coloring, so that he was called by his countrymen the Spanish Titian. He remained in Italy twenty years, visiting all the principal cities, Rome, Florence, Naples, &c., studying the works of the best masters, and frequenting the studios of the most eminent painters, who entertained for him the highest respect for his eminent abilities, perhaps heightened by his infirmity. He had already acquired a distinguished reputation in Italy, when, in 1568, he was summoned to Madrid by Philip II., to paint in the Escorial, and on his arrival he was appointed painter to the king, with a pension of two hundred ducats, in addition to the price of his works. He was naturally of a delicate constitution, and he had hardly commenced his labors, when a severe malady compelled him to retire to his native place, Logrono, with the permission of his royal patron, where he remained three years, during which time he painted four magnificent pictures, and brought them with him to Madrid in 1571. These were the Assumption of the Virgin, the Martyrdom of St. James the Great, a St. Philip and a St. Jerome, which were placed in the Escurial, and the artist rewarded with five hundred ducats, besides his pension. The head of the Virgin in the Assumption is supposed to be a portrait of his mother, the Donna Catalina Ximenes, who in her youth was very beautiful. In 1575 he added four more pictures, the Nativity, Christ at the Pillar, the Holy Family, and St. John writing the Apocalypse, for which he received eight hundred ducats. In the Nativity, El Mudo successfully overcame a formidable difficulty in painting—the introducing of three lights into the picture, as in the famous Notte of Correggio; one from the irradiation proceeding from the infant Jesus, another from a glory of Angels above, and a third from a flaming torch. It is related that Pellegrino Tibaldi, on seeing it, exclaimed, Oh! i belli pastori! This exclamation gave name to the picture, and it continues to be known to this day as the beautiful Shepherds. In 1576, he painted his famous piece of Abraham entertaining the three Angels, for which he received five hundred ducats. He now undertook a stupendous work, and was engaged to paint thirty-two pictures for the Escurial; twenty-seven of which were to be seven feet and a half in height, and seven feet and a quarter in breadth; and the other five thirteen feet high and nine feet broad. He did not live to complete this vast undertaking; he painted eight, representing the Apostles, the Evangelists, and St. Paul and St. Barnabas; the others were finished by Alonso Sanchez Coello, and Luis de Caravajal. He died in 1579. El Mudo's pictures are extremely scarce, and little known, as all his works in Spain, except a small picture of the Baptism of Christ in the Museum at Madrid, are buried in the royal solitude of the Escurial, where they are almost inaccessible. There were two other Spanish painters, of little note, called El Mudo, one Pedro el Mudo, and the other Diego Lopez, who must not be confounded with the illustrious Navarrette.

M U E T. PIERRE LE, a French architect, born at Dijon, in 1591. He practised the military as well as the civil branch of the art, and was employed by Cardinal Richelieu in fortifying a number of situations in Picardy. He was commissioned to complete the church of Val de Grace at Paris, and erected a façade of two orders, Corinthian and Composite, with windows richly decorated with columns and a balustrade. Among his other works were the designs for the hotels Luynes, Laigle, and Beauvilliers; the chateau of Pont en Champagne, and Chavigny en Touraine. He commenced the church des Augustins, in the Place des Victoires, but died before its completion, in 1669. Muet composed a treatise on architecture, and translated Palladio's work on the Five Orders; also the work of Vignola, adding to both a number of his own inventions and reflections. He published a work in folio, containing many plans, entitled Le Maniere de Batir pour toutes sortes des Personnes.

MUGELIO, ANDREA DEL CASTAGNO DI, a Venetian painter, born in 1655, and died in 1726. He was deemed a good painter of history.

MUGNOZ, or MURENOS, a Spanish painter, so called by the Italian writers. See Munoz.

MULDER, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1720. He engraved a set of Bible plates from the designs of Picart, published at Amsterdam in 1720, entitled Figures de la Bible. They are executed with the graver in a stiff, tasteless style, and the drawing is incorrect. There is a set of small plates by him, entitled Vues de Guenterstein, inscribed J. Mulder ad vivum del. et fecit. He also engraved some plates of churches and public edifices, which are his best prints.

MULIER, PIETRO, or DE MULIERIBUS. See PETER MOLYN THE YOUNGER.

MULINARI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, called IL CARACCINO, a painter born at Savigliano, in Piedmont, in 1577. His name is often erroneously written Mollineri. There is considerable discrepancy about the history of this artist and his merits. His works are highly esteemed in his native place. He is said to have studied under the Caracci, and hence his surname of Caraccino. This is denied by Della Valle and others, who say that he only studied the prints of the Caracci, and never visited either Rome or Bologna. Lanzi says he acquired great celebrity in his native place, and was considerably employed at Turin; he is correct, energetic, and if not dignified, yet animated and varied in his male heads, though his females are all deficient in grace. His coloring is also good, though not resembling the Caracci; his tints being clearer, differently disposed, and sometimes feeble. His Deposition from the Cross, in the church of S. Dalmasio, is considered one of his best performances at Turin. But his best works are at Savigliano, his native place, where he passed the greater part of his life, and where his works are to be found in almost every church. In fact, his talents and his merits are only known in his native place. He died about 1640.

MULINARI, STEFANO, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Florence about 1740. He studied with Andrea Scacciati, whom he assisted in a series of engravings after the most beautiful drawings in the Florentine Gallery. He is chiefly known by his numerous engravings after the best Italian masters. Nagler gives a list of 200 of his prints in his Kunstler Lexicon, among which are four after Leonardo da Vinci, five after Michael Angelo, twenty-two after Raffiello, eight after Giulio Romano, six after Polidoro da Caravaggio, twenty-six after Parmiggiano, five after Daniello di Volterra, eight after Baroccio, seven after Giulio Cesare Procaccini, three after Guido, three after Andrea Sacchi, and thirteen after Guercino. His works are executed in a masterly style, and possess great interest and merit. His name is frequently but erroneously written, Molinari. He died about 1800.

MULLER, HERMANN, an engraver who is said by Huber to have been a native of Amsterdam, though he resided, during the greater part of his life, at Antwerp. He flourished about 1585. He is supposed, from his style, to have been a pupil of Henry Goltzius, and to have studied afterwards in Italy. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in the labored and formal style which distinguished the Flemish school of that period. He engraved, in conjunction with Cornelius Cort, several plates for Jerome Cock; also in conjunction with the Galles, the Sadeliers, and others, a set of Bible plates, after Martin de Vos, John Stradan, and other masters. His plates are marked with one of the accompanying monograms.— Among others, we have also the following prints by him :

MVF, or MZL, or MZLFe or MZL
Fec

The Fates; after Cornelius van Haerlem. The Four Cardinal Virtues; after Martin Hemskerk. The Ten Commandments; do. A set of seven plates of the Creation; after H. Goltzius. The Death of Cleopatra; after C. van Haerlem. The Death of Lueretia; after Cornelius Ketel.

MULLER, JOHN. This eminent engraver is supposed to have been of the same family as the preceding. He was born at Amsterdam about 1570, and studied under Henry Goltzius, whose vigorous style he followed with an enthusiasm bordering on extravagance. He handled the graver with the most extraordinary and daring facility, and his works are worthy of the careful study of those who wish to distinguish themselves in the free use of the burin, though it is to be regretted that his drawing is not more correct. His plates are numerous, and though inferior to those of Goltzius in taste, correctness of drawing, anatomy and finish, they are more freely executed, and are considered extraordinary productions. Many of his prints are from his own compositions, and are very creditable to him as a designer. The following are among his most admired prints :

PORTRAITS.

Bartholomeus Spranger, pictor celeberrimus; J. ab Ach, pinx. Maurice, Prince of Orange; after Mirevelt. John Neven, of Antwerp, his hand resting on a Skull; do. Ambrosé Spinola; do. Albert, Archduke of Austria; after Rubens. Isabella, Infanta of Spain; do. Christian IV. King of Denmark; after P. Isachs.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Baptism of Christ. An Ecce Homo, with angels. Balthasar's Feast; fine and rare. The Adoration of the Magi; do.

SUBJECTS AFTER BARTHOLOMEW SPRANGER.

Hagar in the Desert, comforted by an Angel. Lot and his Daughters. The Nativity; J. Müller, scul. 1606. The Holy Family, with two Angels. Venus and the Graces. Venus, Bacchus, and Ceres. A Satyr taking a Thorn from the Foot of a Faun. Venus and Mercury. Persens armed by Minerva and Mercury; one of his finest plates. Cupid and Psyche. The Apotheosis of the Arts. Fortune distributing her Gifts.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Raising of Lazarus; after Ab. Bloemaert; fine. Cain slaying Abel; after Cornelius van Haerlem. The Rape of the Sabines; after the sculpture of A. de Vries. Mercury and Pandora; do. The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; after J. van Achen; fine.

MULLER, SOLOMON, is supposed to have been a member of the same family, and, from his style, to have been brought up in the school of the Wierixes, whose neat, finished style, he imitated with considerable success, though his drawing is incorrect, and his heads often lack expression. Among other prints he engraved a set of small plates of sacred subjects, which, as they are without the name of the painter, are probably from his own designs. He flourished about 1610.

MULLER, G. A., a German engraver, born at Vienna about 1700. In conjunction with Andrew and Joseph Schmutzer, he engraved a part of the plates of the life of Decius, after the designs by Rubens in the possession of the Prince of Lichtenstein. Among others, are the following by him: Philip Louis, Count de Sintzendorf, Minister of State. Jacob van Schuppen, Director of the Academy at Vienna. The two Children of Rubens; from a picture by that master, in the Lichtenstein collection.

MULLER, JACOB, a German engraver of little note, who flourished at Augsburg about 1750, and engraved some frontispieces and other book plates, executed with the graver in a neat, but a dry and tasteless style.

MULLER, CHEVALIER JOHN GOTTHARD VON, an eminent German engraver, born at Bernhausen, in the Duchy of Wurtemberg, in 1747. It is not mentioned under whom he first studied, but he showed so much talent that the King of Wurtemberg took him under his protection, and sent him to Paris to study under J. G. Wille, under whose able instruction he made rapid progress, and soon acquired distinction in his profession. He was admitted into the Academy at Paris in 1776. He soon afterwards returned to Stuttgart, and was appointed Director of the Academy of Design in that city. He was elected successively a member of the principal German Academies; was presented, in 1808, by King Frederick of Wurtemberg, with the order of Civil Merit; and in 1818, was made a knight of the Wurtemberg Crown. Müller engraved only thirty-three plates, a small number, but most of them are of large size, very elaborate, and engraved in a neat, finished, and masterly style. His print of the Madonna della Seggiola, after Raffaele, engraved in 1804, for the Musée Français, is considered by many, superior to the print of the same subject by Raphael Morghen. He died at Stuttgart in 1830. The following are his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XVI. full-length; one of his finest plates. J. G. Wille, Engraver; after Greuze. Louis Galloche, Painter; engraved for his reception into the Academy. Louis Lerramberg, Sculptor to the King; do. Augustus Gottlieb Spanganberg; A. Graff, pinx. F. Schiller; do.

SUBJECTS.

Ceres; after Goltzius. The Nymph Erigone; after Jollain. A Lady playing on the Guitar; after P. A. Wille. Lot and his Daughters; after Gerard Houhorst. A subject from the Life of Alexander; after G. Flinck.

MULLER, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH VON. This extraordinary engraver was the son of the preceding artist, all whose genius he inherited, and whom he surpassed in his last great work, the Madonna di San Sisto, and equaled in some others. He was born at Stuttgart in 1783. He was carefully educated by his father in all those branches of the art which he knew, by experience, to be essential to constitute an excellent engraver, and in 1802, he sent him to Paris to complete his studies. In 1808, he engraved his admired plate of St. John about to write his Revelation, after Domenichino, in which an eagle brings him a pen in its beak; and shortly afterwards, Adam and Eve, under the Tree of Life, after Raffaele. His last and greatest work was the Madonna di San Sisto, after the picture by Raffaele in the Dresden gallery. He had received a commission from Rittner, the celebrated printseller of Dresden, to engrave this work without any limitation as to time or expense. He concentrated all his powers upon it, in the execution of which, his soul and existence seemed to be wrapped up. He applied himself incessantly, day and night, and being naturally of a sickly constitution, the infallible result of such lengthened and constant application and excitement, made its appearance. He lived to finish the plate, but he never saw a finished proof from it. On its completion, it was sent to Paris to be printed, and he had just strength enough to permit his being carried to Sonnenstein, near Dresden, where he died in 1816, only a day or two before the proof of his plate arrived from Paris. It was suspended over the head of his bier, as he lay dead, thus reminding the spectators of the untimely fate of the great master of the original. C. F. Müller engraved only eighteen plates, most of them portraits, but the Madonna di San Sisto is a host in itself, and is considered one of the most masterly productions of the burin.

MÜLLER, or MILLER, JOHN SEBASTIAN, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1715. After acquiring his art, he visited England with his brother Tobias, probably early in life. About 1760 he was employed by John Boydell, and executed several plates for his collection, which possess great merit. He engraved the plates for Smollett's History of England; Chandler's Arundelian Marbles; the Ruins of Paestum; &c. His principal work, however, was the Illustratio systematis sexualis Linnaei, London, 1777, 104 pl. Müller was living in 1783, and is said to have had twenty-nine children! The following are among his prints:

The Holy Family; after Federigo Baroccio. Another Holy Family; after Murillo. Nero depositing the Ashes of Britannicus; after le Sueur. A Landscape, with Apollo and Marsyas; after Claude. A Moonlight; after vander Neer. Two Views in Rome; after Gio. Paolo Pannini.

MÜLLER, WILLIAM JOHN, an eminent English painter, born at Bristol in 1812. His father, a native of Germany, was Curator of the Bristol Museum, and from him he acquired a taste and knowledge of science, especially of botany and natural history. He received some instruction in painting from J. B. Pyne, but he owed most of his success to his own genius and an attentive study of nature. On leaving Pyne, he made the tour of Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, filling his portfolio with choice drawings after nature, and returned to his native city an accomplished landscape painter. Meeting with little encouragement, he went to Greece and Egypt, and made numerous sketches of the interesting scenes and objects he met with in those countries. In 1839, he returned and settled in London. In 1841, he published his "Picturesque sketches of the Age of Francis I.," which extended his fame beyond his own country. He next, at his own expense, joined the expedition to Lycia, projected by the government. On his return to London, he exhibited at the Royal Academy and at the British Institution, during the last three years of his life, several excellent paintings from his sketches made in Lycia; but his pictures were placed in improper positions, of which he bitterly and justly complained, without however, obtaining any redress. He died in 1845, and then it was that his talents were appreciated, for at the public sale of his effects, some of the choice sketches he had made in Lycia brought extraordinary prices, varying from £20 to £60 each, and the whole amount of the sale was £4600; nor were these fictitious prices, for many of them were bought by dealers, who reaped a rich harvest, by their resales. His works are still greatly increasing in value; Stanley says, they are already being imitated and palmed off on the unwary at exorbitant prices, by unprincipled traffickers in the fine arts.

MUNARI, PELLEGRINO. See PELLEGRINO DA MODENA.

MUNARI, GIOVANNI, a painter who flourished at Modena in the latter part of the 15th century. Lanzi says he was commended by historians for his works. He was the father and instructor of the celebrated Pellegrino da Modena.

MUNERO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter, born at Genoa in 1613. He studied under Luciano Borzone, and chiefly excelled in portraits, in which branch he acquired distinction. He died in 1657.

MUNIER, JEAN, a French engraver on wood, who flourished at Toulouse about 1553. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. Among others, he engraved a set of 100 emblems for a small octavo volume published at Lyons in 1553, entitled La Morosophie de Guillaume de la Perriere Tolsain. He also executed some cuts in conjunction with Jean Perrin.

MUNNIKHUYSEN, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about 1680. He engraved some plates, mostly portraits, executed with the graver in a neat, clear style, which possess considerable merit. The following are among the best:

PORTRAITS.

Hendrick Dirksen Spiegel, Burgomaster; after Limburg. Francis Burmann, Professor of Theology; after C. Maas. Henry vander Graft. Cornelius Tromp, Admiral of Holland; after D. vander Plaas. Peter van Staveren, of Amsterdam; after W. Mieris. Peter Zurendonk, Rector of the Latin School at Amsterdam.

MUNOZ, SEBASTIAN, a Spanish painter, born at Navalcarnero in 1654. He first studied under Claudio Coello at Madrid. In 1680, he went to Rome, and studied in the school of Carlo Maratti six years. On his return to Spain, he settled at Saragossa, where he acquired great reputation, and in conjunction with his former master, Coello, executed some considerable works for the churches. In 1688, he was invited to Madrid by the King, who appointed him his painter, and employed him in decorating the Royal Palaces, in one of which, he painted a series of frescos, representing the fable of Cupid and Psyche. He imitated the manner of Carlo Maratti, but his coloring was gaudy, without dignity in composition, beauty in the forms, or expression in the heads. He was killed by a fall from a scaffold in 1690.

MUNOZ, EVARISTO, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1671. He studied under Conchillos, and painted history with reputation. His works evince an abundant invention; but his design is often incorrect, and is lacking in elevation. He formed a school of design at Valencia, which was much frequented till his death, in 1737. Most of his pictures are in the churches of Valencia.

MUNTINCK, GERARD, a Dutch engraver, born at Groningen, where he flourished about 1640. He engraved some portraits, executed with the graver in a neat style, but without much effect.

MUNTZ, J. H., an English artist, of German descent, who was much employed by Lord Orford in making drawings for his villa at Strawberry Hill. He invented a method of painting in encaustic, concerning which he published a volume in octavo in 1762.

MUOLTSCHER, HANS, or JOHN, an old painter of Ulm, in Suabia, of whom nothing is known except an altar-piece, dated 1436. This picture is now in England.

MURA, FRANCESCO DE, called FRANCESCHIELLO, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1696. According to Dominici, he studied under Francesco Solimena, and was his ablest disciple, the most successful imitator of his style, and approached nearest to his fame; hence his acquired name. He was much employed in decorating the public and private edifices of Naples. Lanzi says perhaps none of his works procured him greater celebrity than his frescos in the Royal Palace at Turin, where he successfully competed with Cav. Claudio Beaumont, then in the height of his reputation. He decorated the ceilings of several apartments, particularly of those containing the Flemish pictures. The subjects which he treated with the greatest success were the Olympic Games and the Deeds of Achilles, in which his composition is rich and ingenious, his figures elegantly designed, and the airs of his heads expressive and graceful. His coloring unites tenderness with grace, and his draperies are judiciously cast. He died in 1759.

MURANO, DA. a name given to several old Venetian artists from the place of their nativity, the Island of Murano, near Venice. The eldest of these was Quirico da M., whose name is found inscribed on ancient pictures. Quiricius de Muriano. The second was Bernardino M., of whose productions Zanetti saw nothing but a rude altar-piece. The third, and most eminent, was Andrea da Murano, who was an excellent artist of his time, and established a school, which, through the Vivarini, his disciples, was continued at Venice for nearly a century, with distinction. There is a fine altar-piece by him in the church of S. Pietro Martire, in his native place, in which a St. Sebastian forms so conspicuous a figure from the beauty of its torso, that Zanetti conjectures he must have copied it from an ancient statue. It is dated 1402.

MURANO, NATALINO DA, a Venetian painter, who studied under Titian. According to Ridolfi, he was a good composer of cabinet pieces, and particularly excelled in portraits, which he executed and colored in the style of his master. Lanzi says he executed many easel pictures, from which the Venetian dealers derived more profit than himself, and that he saw one of his Magdalenes, put up for sale at Udine, which, in spite of frequent retouching, preserved much of Titian's manner. It bore the name of Murano, and the date 1558.

Amsterdam, according to Houbraken, in 1622, but probably later, as he was a scholar of Philip Wouwerman, who was born in 1620. Though he did not adopt the subjects of his master, he acquired from him that correctness of design, purity and brilliancy of coloring, and neatness of pencil, which rendered him deservedly eminent. His subjects were views in Holland, cities, towns, and villages, decayed castles, and ruined buildings, which he drew from nature, and finished with such astonishing accuracy and precision, that it has been said, that "every particular brick or stone might be counted in his buildings by the assistance of a convex glass," in which particular he was only excelled by John vander Heyden. He went to Paris, and resided some time in that city, where his works were greatly admired. On his return to Holland, he settled at Lewarde, where he died in 1700. His works are exceedingly valuable and scarce, owing to the extraordinary labor he bestowed upon them. They have the rare merit of exhibiting the most exquisite finish, without the appearance of stiffness and labor, and without the interruption of that harmony of color and union of effect, which are usually the attributes of a process so tedious and precise. His tones are artfully broken, and there appears a vagueness and neutrality in his tints, which are only to be found in the works of the most intelligent colorists.

MURATORI, DOMENICO MARIA, a Bolognese painter, born in 1662. He studied under Lorenzo Pasinelli at Bologna, after which he went to Rome, where he resided the greater part of his life, and acquired a distinguished reputation for the grandeur of his compositions, correctness of design, good coloring, and excellent chiaro-scuro. He executed many works for the churches in that metropolis, as well as in other cities. His Christ Crowned with Thorns, in the church of the Stimate, was universally esteemed, and procured for him the commission to paint one of the Prophets in the Basilica of St. John of Lateran—a high honor. In the church of the Apostles, he painted the great altar-piece, said to be the largest in Rome, representing the Martyrdom of St. Philip and St. James, composed and designed in a grand style, with a fine effect of chiaro-scuro, though in coloring, it is not equal to some of his other works. In the cathedral of Pisa, he painted a large picture of St. Ranieri casting out a Demon, which Lanzi considers one of his best works. He also etched a few plates from his own designs, and others, executed in a spirited and masterly style. He died in 1749. Zani, whose work is full of errors, as to dates, and who seems to delight in contradictions, says he was born in 1655, and died in 1742; but the dates given, were furnished to Oretti by the son of Muratori, and Lanzi and others state the same.

MURATORI SCANNABECCHI, TERESA, a Bolognese paintress, born in 1662. She was the daughter of an eminent physician, and at an early age discovered an uncommon genius for drawing and music. She studied painting successively with Emilio Taruffi, Lorenzo Pasinelli, and Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. She acquired considerable distinction, and executed several reputable works for the churches of Bologna, the chief of which are, St. Benedetto restoring a dead child to life, in S. Stefano; the Annunciation, in S. Trinitá; and the

leria. She died in 1708.

MUREL, or MOREELS, JACOB, a German painter of fruit and flowers, who, according to Füessli, was born at Frankfort in 1628, and died there in 1683. Little is known of his life, but incidents mentioned in the history of art show that he was not only a reputable artist, but a true lover of art, and an excellent man. He painted fruit and flower-pieces, married the widow of Matthew Merian the Elder, and was the instructor of at least two distinguished artists. See Abraham Mignon, and Maria Sybilla Merian.

MURENA, CARLO, an eminent Italian architect, born at Rome in 1713. He studied polite literature, philosophy, and the law, intending to follow the legal profession; but acquiring a strong inclination for architecture, he studied that art under Niccolo Salvi. In order that he might acquire a knowledge of hydraulics, the Cardinal Barberini, his patron, sent him to Luigi Vanvitelli, who was then building the Lazaretto at Ancona. Murena made such rapid progress as to be entrusted by his master with those buildings to which he could not personally attend; and he had the entire charge of the edifices of his Sicilian majesty, attached to the Caserta. He was subsequently employed to erect the building for the Olivetani monks of Monte Moreino at Perugia, and superintended the church of that order to its completion. He designed an isolated tabernacle for the cathedral of Terni, adorned with mixed stones and gilt metal, producing rather an elegant effect; and at Foligno, the church of the monks of the Holy Trinity.

Milizia says of Murena, that "he was a good man, possessing a highly cultivated mind, exceedingly industrious, and rapid in execution. His style of architecture was simple and rational. He fell into some of the prevailing errors, but never into absurdities." Besides the works previously mentioned, Murena erected an edifice for the Cistercians, near Santa Lucia della Chiavica, which is simple and solid in the exterior; the internal arrangements are distributed with great order, convenience and beauty. His sacristy of the church S. Agostino is in a very elegant style. He also built the rich Zampaj chapel in S. Antonio di Portoghesi at Rome; and acquired great honor by the façade which he designed for the French ambassador Rocheconart. Murena died in 1764.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMÉ ESTÉBAN, a preëminent Spanish painter, was born at Pilas, a small town about five leagues from Seville, on the 1st of January, 1613. There is a great deal of contradiction among authors, no two agreeing about the history of this great artist's life, which we cannot touch upon, farther than to say that the stories of his having gone to South America in the early part of his career, and that he studied in Italy, are wholly unfounded, for the later Spanish historians have proved that he never left Spain. He was descended from an ancient family, who once held ample possessions in the province of Andalusia, but were then in reduced circumstances. Young Murillo, discovering an early inclination and genius for art, was placed in the Academy of his maternal uncle, Don Juan del Castillo, a distinguished historical painter of Seville, who was the instructor of some of the greatest artists of the Spanish school, among whom were Alonso Cano and Pedro de Moya, the very mention of whose names will contradict some of the assertions with regard to Murillo. When Murillo left the school of Castillo which he did while young, when that master went to Cadiz, the first subjects he painted were rustics and beggar-boys, in which he discovered a faithful and accurate attention to nature, and a charming simplicity of character that was peculiar to him. His pictures of this description are vigorously colored, but with the dark and heavy shadows of his master, and lack that tenderness and suavity that distinguish his later productions. It was the custom of the young artists of that time to expose their works for sale at the annual fairs held at Seville, and many of his earlier productions, which were greatly admired, were produced in this manner, and exported to South America, and there can be little doubt that the pictures of the Virgin and Saints, said to be in some of the churches of Spanish America, were thus procured, and gave rise to the false tradition of his having proceeded thither in person. The fame of Don Diego Velasquez, then at its zenith, inspired Murillo with a desire to visit Madrid, in hopes to benefit by his instruction. On his arrival at the capital in 1642, he paid his court to Velasquez, who, perceiving his merits, not only received him into his academy, but procured him the best means of improvement beyond his own instruction, by obtaining for him access to the rich treasures of art in the royal collections. Some say that when he left Seville he was extremely poor, and having disposed of all his pictures and effects, set out for Italy, by way of Madrid, without the knowledge of his relatives, and that on his arrival there, Velasquez dissuaded him from his object; which is an improbable story. At all events, a new scene was opened to his view, which inspired him with such zeal for advancement that he redoubled his efforts to attain the highest excellence. His attention was particularly directed to the works of Titian, Rubens, and Vandyck, which he continually studied and copied, and thus greatly improved his manner of design and coloring. After passing three years under such favorable circumstances, with the advantage of the instructions and counsels of Velasquez, he returned to Seville in 1645, and resumed the practice of his art with redoubled alacrity, and with the most flattering success. His first great work was a fresco in the convent of San Francisco, or the Capuchins, consisting of sixteen compartments, in one of which is his celebrated picture of St. Thomas of Villanueva distributing Alms to the Poor. This subject suited the bent of his genius, and gave full scope for the display of his powers, which were peculiarly adapted to the representation of nature in her most simple and unsophisticated forms. The saint stands in a dignified posture, with a countenance beaming with benevolence and compassion, while he is surrounded by a group of paupers, eagerly pressing forward to receive his charity, whose varied character and wretchedness is portrayed with wonderful art, and truthfulness of expression. At the principal altar in the church of the same convent, is a large picture of the Jubilee of the Porciuncula, representing Christ holding his Cross, and the Virgin interceding for the supplicants, with a group of Angels of extraordinary beauty. These works produced emotions of the greatest astonishment among his countrymen, procured him numerous commissions, and proved him one of the greatest artists of that age, so prolific in renowned masters. About this time he was employed by the Marquis of Villamanrique, to paint a series of pictures from the life of David, in which the back-grounds were to be painted by Ignacio Iriate, an eminent landscape painter of Seville. Murillo rightly proposed that the landscape parts should be first painted, and that he should afterwards put in the figures, but Iriate contended that the historical part ought to be first finished, to which he would adapt the back-grounds. To put an end to the dispute, Murillo undertook to execute the whole, and changing the History of David to that of Jacob, he produced the famous series of five pictures, now in the possession of the Marquis de Santiago at Madrid, in which the beauty of the landscapes contends with that of the figures, and which remain a monument of his powers in these different departments of the art. In the same collection are two other pictures, which are considered among his finest works; one represents St. Francis Xavier in a dignified and sublime attitude, his eyes devoutly raised to heaven, and his countenance beaming with devotion and fervor, while a stream of light from above strikes him on the breast, as if receiving the divine inspiration previous to his entering on his mission to the Indians, a group of whom are seen in the distance; the other represents St. Joseph, leading by the hand the young Saviour, apparently eight or ten years old; over the heads is a Glory of beautiful Angels, and a fine landscape in the background. He painted for the Cathedral of Seville his admired picture of San Antonio and the Holy Infant, with a glory of Angels, and a background of noble architecture; the Miraculous Conception; and the portraits of Leandro and Isidore, archbishops of Seville, all of them executed in his finest manner. He painted in the church of the Hospital of Charity three admired works—Moses striking the Rock, the Miracle of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, both grand compositions of numerous assemblages of people, the principal figures full of dignity, and the people exhibiting a striking variety of character, grouped with surprising ability; and one of St. John supporting a poor old man, aided in his charitable office by an Angel, whom the Saint regards with a look of reverence and gratitude, beautifully expressed. It is impossible to specify here Murillo's numerous works. He resided most of his life at Seville, where he executed many works, not only for the churches, but for the private collections. He also painted several pictures for the churches at Cadiz, Granada, and Cordova. At Cadiz are two of his most admired works, an altar-piece of the Conception, in the church of San Felipe Neri, and a picture of St. Catherine at the Capuchins, which is not only remarkable for its beauty, but from its being the last picture he ever painted. In the Chapel of the Nuns of the Angel, at Granada, is one of his most celebrated pictures, representing the Good Shepherd. In 1670, Charles II. invited him to Madrid, with liberal offers; but his natural humility, love of retirement, and his attachment to Seville prevailed over every consideration of promotion or advantage, and he excused himself to the king. Murillo died at Seville, in 1685, his death being hastened by a fall from a scaffold while painting the St. Catherine at Cadiz. Few painters have a juster claim to originality of style than Murillo, and his works show an incontestible proof of the perfection to which the Spanish school attained, and the real character of its artists—for he was never out of his native country, and could have borrowed little from foreign artists; and this originality places him in the first rank among the painters of every school. All his works are distinguished by a close and lively imitation of nature. His pictures of the Virgin, Saints, Magdalenes, and even of the Saviour, are stamped with a characteristic expression of the eye, and have a national peculiarity of countenance and habiliments, which are very remarkable. There is little of the academy discernible in his design or his composition. It is a chaste and faithful representation of what he saw or conceived; truth and simplicity are never lost sight of; his coloring is clear, tender, and harmonious, and though it possesses the truth of Titian, and the sweetness of Van-dyck, it has nothing of the appearance of imitation. There is little of the ideal in his forms or heads, and though he frequently adopts a beautiful expression, there is usually a portrait-like simplicity in his countenances. In short, his pictures are said to hold a middle rank between the unpolished naturalness of the Flemish, and the graceful and dignified taste of the Italian schools. The works of Murillo are numerous and widely scattered over the world. His greatest works, as before mentioned, are in the churches in Spain, some in the royal collection at Madrid, some in France and Flanders, many in England, and a few in the United States. They now command enormous prices. The National Gallery at London paid 4000 guineas for a picture of the Holy Family, and 2000 for one of St. John with the Lamb. Murillo was of a noble and charitable disposition, and though he received large and increasing prices for his works after his return from Madrid to Seville, he is said to have left but little property.

MURPHY, JOHN, an English mezzotinto engraver, born about 1748, and died about 1810. He engraved some of the prints in the Houghton collection, and others after the Italian masters; also after Reynolds, West, Romney, Northcote, Stothard, and Ramberg. He was an excellent engraver in his branch of the art. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

The Brothers of Joseph showing his bloody Garment to Jacob; after Guercino. Joseph interpreting Pharaoh's Dream; do. Mark Antony's Oration over the Body of Cæsar; after West. Elisha restoring the Widow's Son; after Northcote. The Tiger; do.

MURRAY, THOMAS, an eminent Scotch portrait painter, born in 1666. He went to London at an early age, where he studied with John Riley, at the time he was painter to William and Mary. He studied nature carefully, imitated his master in his coloring, to whom his pictures have a striking resemblance. He was patronized by the royal family and many of the nobility, and acquired a considerable fortune. His portrait, painted by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1724.

MUSIS, AGOSTINO DE,
called AGOSTINO VENEZIA-
NO, an eminent engraver, born at Venice about 1490, and a disciple of Marc' Antonio Raimondi, of whose fine style he was one of the most successful followers. Several of his earlier plates were executed in conjunction with Marco da Ravenna, who had been his fellow-student under Marc' Antonio. After the death of Raffaele in 1520, they separated, and each wrought alone. At the sacking of Rome in 1527, the artists in that capital sought refuge in other Italian cities, and Agostino went to Florence, where he is said to have applied to Andrea del Sarto for employment; but having previously engraved, in 1516, a plate from a picture by him, representing a Dead Christ supported by Angels, which did not meet the painter's approbation, he would not permit him to engrave any more of his pictures. Musis was one of the most eminent engravers of his time. His prints are equally neat and finished as those of Marc' Antonio, but they are inferior to him in the purity and correctness of his drawing, and the tasteful expression of his heads. Very many of his works are after Raffaele. The earliest dates found on his plates are 1509, and the latest 1536, about which time he is supposed to have died. Fine impressions of his prints are extremely scarce and valuable. He sometimes marked them with a tablet, similar to that used by Marc' Antonio, but more frequently with a date and A. V., for Agostino Veneziano. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Paul III., in profile; inscribed Paulus III. Pontif. Max. 1534. The same Pontiff, with the papal crown; dated 1536. Charles V. holding a sword; after Titian. Another Portrait of Charles V.; dated 1536. Ferdinand, King of the Romans; inscribed Proximus a summo Ferdinandus, &c. 1536. Francis I. of France; dated 1536. The Emperor Soliman; dated 1535.

SUBJECTS OF SACRED HISTORY.

The Creation; engraved in conjunction with Marco da Ravenna; after Raffaele. The Sacrifice of Isaac; do. The Benediction of Isaac; dated 1522; do.; very scarce. The same subject; dated 1524. The Israelites passing the Red Sea; do. The Israelites gathering the Manna; do. This plate is supposed to have been begun by Marc' Antonio. Samson bound by the Philistines; circular; from his own design. The Nativity; after Giulio Romano. 1531. The Four Evangelists; in four plates; do. 1518. The Murder of the Innocents; copied from the print by Marc' Antonio. A. V.; very scarce. The Nativity; copied from a wooden cut by A. Durer; very scarce. Christ bound to the Pillar; do.; very scarce. The Last Supper; do.; 1514. The dead Christ, with Angels; after A. del Sarto. 1516. The Archangel Michael; after Raffaele. The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Francia. St. Jerome with the Lion; after Raffaele.

HISTORICAL AND MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS.

Diogenes seated by the side of a River; after Baccio Bandinelli. Tarquin and Lucretia; after Raffaele. The Death of Lucretia; copied from the print by Marc' Antonio; after Raffaele. Cleopatra; after Baccio Bandinelli. 1518. Vulcan giving Cupid's Arrows to Venus; after Raffaele. 1530. Venus riding on a Dolphin, with Cupid holding a Torch; do. Jupiter and Leda. Apollo and Daphne; after Raffaele; attributed by some to Marc' Antonio. The Fall of Phaeton; marked A. V. on a tablet. The Triumph of Silenus; after Raffaele; do. The infant Hercules destroying the Serpents; after Giulio Romano. Hercules strangling Anteus; after M. Angelo Buonarrotti. Hercules destroying the Nemean Lion; after Raffaele.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Burying-place, an assemblage of emaciated figures with skeletons, and a figure of Death holding a book; after Baccio Bandinelli; inscribed Augustinus Venetus de Musis, faciebat. 1518. A large print, called the Climbers; after the famous cartoon of Pisa, by M. Angelo Buonarrotti, dated 1523. This print is very different from that of the same subject engraved by Marc' Antonio, which consists of many more figures. It is marked with the name of the painter on a tablet, and dated 1524. The Academy of Baccio Bandinelli, in which that artist is represented in the midst of his disciples. 1531. The Battle of the Sabre, so called from a sword which lies on the ground, fallen from the hand of a warrior, who is represented as dead, on the right-hand side of the print. An Emperor on horseback, with attendants, called by some the Triumph of Marcus Aurelius. This print is marked with the tablet used by Marc' Antonio, who is supposed to have partly engraved it. An old Philosopher, or Magician, seated on the ground, measuring with his compasses a circle, in which are seen the sun and moon; dated 1509; after Dom. Campagnola.

MUSIS, LORENZO and GIULIO DE. These engravers are supposed to have been the sons of the preceding. They engraved some plates, in which they seem to have imitated Agostino de Musis, but with no great success. Their prints are marked with their names in full.

MUSS. CHARLES. a German painter in enamel, who ranked high in that branch. He also excelled in painting on glass. His picture of the Holy Family, after Parmiggiano, is the largest enamel ever executed. He died in 1824.

MUSSCHER, MICHAEL VAN, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1645. He first studied under Martin Zaagmoolen, an obscure artist; and afterwards successively with Abraham vander Tempel, Gabriel Metz, and Adrian van Ostade. He did not exactly follow the style of any of his instructors, but adopted one of his own, somewhat resembling Francis Mieris, without arriving at the harmony of his coloring, or the exquisite polish of his finishing. He painted conversations and small portraits, which are clearly and agreeably colored and highly finished, though his drawing is not very correct. He particularly excelled in portraits, which he executed with truth and fidelity; and he had the faculty of flattering his picture without spoiling the likeness, which doubtless was one reason for his great success. He settled at Amsterdam, where he found such abundant employment that he could hardly execute the numerous commissions he received. Descamps says he occasionally painted historical pieces, for which he received large prices. His works are highly esteemed in Holland, and are admitted into the choicest collections. His most remarkable work was a family picture of himself, wife, and children, which was sold for more than a thousand florins, and is now in the Museum at the Hague. He died at Amsterdam in 1705.

MUSSO, NICCOLO, an Italian painter, born at Casalmonteferrato. According to Orlandi, he went to Rome quite young, and studied in the school of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio. After spending two years at Rome, he returned to his native city, where he executed several altar-pieces for the churches, and wrought much for individuals.—Lanzi says, "his works possess an originality of style, though it leans to Caravaggio. His chiaro-scuro, however, is more delicate and more transparent; he is very select in his figures, and in expression; and he is one of those admirable painters almost unknown, even to Italy itself." He also commends his picture in the church of St. Francis, representing that saint at the feet of Christ crucified, and a group of Angels, partaking in his lamentations and devotions. He flourished about 1618.

MUSTACCHI, IL. See REVELLO.

MUTEL, M., a French engraver little known, who executed a few portraits, among which is one of Thomas Fantel de Lagny.

MUTH, or MUCCI, GIOVANNI. a native of Cento, was the nephew and scholar of Guercino. According to Crespi, he was a faithful imitator of his master, and a distinguished engraver. None of his works are specified. He flourished about 1650.

MUTIUS, CAIUS, a Roman architect, who flourished about B. C. 100. He erected the Temple of Honor and Virtue at Rome, near the trophies of Marius. The ancient ruins near St. Eusebius are supposed by Milizia to be the remains of this temple. That author, quoting Vitruvius, says that the cell, the columns, and the entablature, were in strict accordance with the true laws of art; and had the richness of the materials been suited to the delicacy of the work, this temple would have been one of the most celebrated of all antiquity.

MUTO IL, DI FICAROLO. See ERCOLE SARTI.

MUTO IL, DI VERONA. See FRANCESCO COMI.

MUTTONI. See PIETRO VECCHIA.

MUYS, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter, born at Schiedam in 1712. He settled at Rotterdam, where he painted portraits, and cabinet pictures, somewhat in the style of Mieris and vander Werf. He died there in 1763.

MUYS, NICHOLAS, was the son of the preceding, born at Rotterdam in 1740. He was first instructed by his father, and afterwards studied with Aart Schouman at the Hague. He then returned to his native city, where he painted portraits and cabinet pictures, chiefly interiors, with considerable success. His pictures exhibit a fine genius in composition, are correct in design, well colored, and carefully finished. He died in 1808.

MUYS, R., an obscure Dutch engraver, who executed some portraits, among which is one of William, Prince of Orange.

MUZIANO, GIROLAMO, an eminent Italian painter, born at Aquafredda, in the territory of Brescia, in 1528. After learning the rudiments of the art under Girolamo Romanino in his native city, he went to Venice, where he diligently studied the works of Titian, and other great masters. He next visited Rome in company with Federigo Zuccaro, where he soon acquired distinction. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Pope Gregory XIII., who employed him to superintend the architectural works going on in the Vatican, and commissioned him to paint two pictures for St. Peter's church, representing St. Jerome and St. Basil, which gained him considerable reputation, and he was considered the great supporter of true taste. He derived his principles both in design and color from the Venetian school, and acquired such skill in landscape, that he was named in Rome Il Giovane de' paesi. The Cardinal Farnese employed him in competition with Zuccaro and Tempesta to decorate his villa at Tivoli, where he evinced the superiority of his talents over both his competitors. But he was ambitious to distinguish himself in a more elevated style; therefore he applied himself to study with such assiduity, that he shaved his head to prevent his going abroad. He soon afterwards produced his celebrated picture of the Raising of Lazarus for the church of S. Maria Maggiore, which was removed to the Pontifical Palace of the Quirinal, afterwards transferred to Paris by Napoleon, and again restored to its place in 1815. This capital production procured him the esteem and friendship of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti, who assisted him with his instruction and advice. He soon afterwards painted his picture of the Circumcision for the church del Gesu, followed by many other admirable works in the churches and public edifices at Rome, the most remarkable of which are, the Ascension, in the Ara Coeli; St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, in the church della Concezione; the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the Hall of the Consistory; the Nativity, in S. Maria de' Monti; Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in S. Maria degli Angeli, and a Troop of Anchorites attentively listening to a Saint, at the Carthusians. He also executed some excellent works for the churches in other cities, particularly in the cathedrals of Orvieto and Foligno. In the latter, he painted a fresco representing the Miracles of St. Feliciano, which Lanzi says were long covered up with smoke and dust, but a few years ago they were restored to all their original freshness and charm of color.

The works of Muziano exhibit a grandeur of design and an intimate acquaintance with anatomy, in which he appears to have emulated the learned design of Buonarrotti. His composition is copious and ingenious, and the character of his heads is dignified and expressive. His coloring partakes of the truth and harmony of the Venetian school, and the back grounds of his pictures are often enriched with admirable landscapes, which remind one of the fine style of Titian. He particularly excelled in representing hermits and anchorites, men of severe aspect, with bodies attenuated by abstinence. He was also much employed in designing from the antique; and to him are we indebted for the engraving representing the bas-reliefs on Trajan's column. Giulio Romano had begun to copy them, and the laborious undertaking was continued, perfected, and prepared for the engraver, by Muziano. He died at Rome in 1592.

MUZIO, ANTONIO, a painter born at Verona in 1600. He studied under Enrico Fiammingo, at Bologna, the scholar of Guido, whose manner he adopted. He acquired considerable reputation, and was invited to Madrid, where he settled, and executed several works for the churches and palaces in that capital. He died there in 1648.

MY, JEROME VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1688. He studied under William Mieris, whose manner he adopted; he paid great attention to the finishing, but his pictures are laborious, and deficient in vigor of effect. His subjects were history, portraits, and domestic scenes, interiors &c.

MYCON. See MICON.

MYIN, HENRY ARNOLD, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1760. He studied with Omme-ganck, whose manner and subjects he adopted with considerable success. His pictures were highly esteemed, and are to be found in some of the best collections in his native city and country.

There are two fine landscapes with sheep, by him, in the Brentano collection at Amsterdam.

MYLNE, ROBERT, an eminent Scotch architect, born at Edinburgh in 1734. His father was also an architect, and a magistrate of that city. The son visited Italy for improvement, and resided several years at Rome, where he gained the first prize of architecture in the Academy of St. Luke, and was honored with a membership in that institution. He was also received into the Academies of Bologna and Florence. On returning to Great Britain, he settled at London; was commissioned to build Blackfriars' Bridge; and appointed surveyor of St. Paul's cathedral. Among other edifices which he erected or repaired, were Rochester Cathedral; Blaze Castle, near Bristol; Addington, the seat of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Duke of Northumberland's pavilion at Sion, on the banks of the Thames; and Greenwich Hospital, where he was clerk of the works for fifteen years. He was consulted in regard to nearly all the harbors in England, and held a very high reputation during his long career. In 1762, he was appointed Engineer to the New River Head Company, which office he retained till his death, in 1811.

MYN, A. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He engraved a few portraits and other subjects, indifferently executed.

MYN, GEORGE VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1725. It is not known under whom he studied, but he imitated the manner and subjects of Watteau with considerable success. He was also a good portrait painter. He died young, at Amsterdam, in 1763.

MYN, HERMANN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1684. He was the son of a clergyman, who intended him for the church, and educated him for that purpose; but his love of the fine arts induced him to study painting under Ernest Stuken, an eminent painter of fruit and flowers. Aspiring to a higher department of art, he quitted Stuken and flower painting, and devoted himself with assiduity to history. He made great progress, and acquired so much celebrity that he was invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, in 1716, where he continued some time. He afterwards returned to Holland, where he painted a picture of Jupiter and Danaë, which excited the admiration of the connoisseurs at the Hague. He also painted the history of Amnon and Tamar, in a noble style, as well as several other subjects from sacred and profane history, which were much admired for the beauty of the composition, elegance of expression, and excellence of the coloring; but, being excessively vain, he asked such enormous prices for his works that he could not find purchasers for them. He next visited Antwerp, and thence proceeded to Paris, where he was patronized by the Duke of Orleans, for whom he painted his picture of Peter denying Christ, which is considered his most capital work. In 1722 he went to London, at the recommendation of Lord Cadogan, where he was much employed in painting the portraits of the nobility, in which he carried to excess the laborious minuteness of his countrymen, imitating the details of lace, embroidery, fringes, &c., with the most patient precision. He painted the portraits of the Prince of Wales and the Princess of Orange; also a picture of the Duke and Duchess of Chandos, for which he received five hundred guineas. He lived in London for a long time in splendid magnificence; but, by indiscreet conduct and an unfortunate marriage, he sacrificed his fortune and reputation, and died there, in misery and contempt, in 1741.

MYN, AGATHA VANDER, was a sister of the preceding, and painted fruit, flowers, and dead game with considerable ability. According to Lord Orford, she accompanied her brother to London, where she practised her profession.

MYN, ROBERT VANDER, perhaps a son of Hermann vander Myn, born in 1724. He resided in London, where he painted many portraits, landscapes, and fruit and flower pieces.

MYNDE, J., an engraver who flourished in London about 1760. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. He also engraved a few portraits, indifferently executed.

MYRIGINUS, or MYRICINUS, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1550. He engraved some subjects after Jerome Bosche, Breughel, and others, marked with the above monogram; also a portrait of Albert Durer, copied from another print. He is supposed to be the same as Peter Martini, an engraver and print-seller of Antwerp, whose name appears on several prints published by Jerome Cock, marked Pet. Mercinius, sc., one of which is dated 1567.

MYRON, an eminent Greek sculptor, born at Eleutheræ, in Bœotia, about B. C. 480. He studied under Ageladas, at the same time as Polyclethus, and was therefore in the prime of life when Phidias died. At the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, Myron was settled at Athens, and in the height of his fame. Pliny says he first gained reputation by a brazen heifer. He also executed a Dog; a Quoit-thrower; Perseus killing Medusa; Delphic pentathletes; Paneratiasts; a Satyr admiring a flute; a Hercules, which was in the Temple of Pompeius in the Circus Maximus; also a statue of Apollo, taken from Ephesus to Rome by Marcus Antonius, but subsequently restored by Augustus.

Myron is said to have been the first sculptor who represented nature in a multiplicity of forms; he sculptured men and animals with equal success; and, according to Petronius, he imparted life itself to brass. Pliny says he was more varied than Polyclethus, but not so exact in his proportions; curious in all corporeal detail, but paid little regard to expression. He appears to have adhered in the head and face to the earlier type; but Pliny appears to imply that he did this from taste, rather than from any want of the faculty of imparting expression.

The most celebrated of all Myron's works was his cow, lowing, and, according to some writers, suckling a calf. There are no less than thirty-six epigrams on this work in the Greek Anthology. No human figure has attracted so much notice, which probably arose from its novelty, for Athens abounded in statues of men and gods, with but very few animals, even the horses of Phidias being of a small size, and only bas-reliefs under a colonnade. It was of life-size, fixed upon a marble pedestal, in a public place in Athens, as it stood in the time of Cicero. Pausanias did not see it at Athens, however; and in the time of Procopius it was in the temple of Peace at Rome. Another celebrated work was the Dioscopolus or Quoit-thrower. The original was in bronze, and there are several similar marble statues existing, more or less perfect, supposed to be copies of Myron's work. One is in the Capitol at Rome; one in the Vatican; a third in the Villa Massimi at Rome; the one in the British Museum was found in the Villa Adriana near Tivoli, in 1791, and passed into the possession of Mr. Townley through the hands of Mr. Jenkins, a dealer in works of art. The Townley copy is said by some critics to be incorrectly restored, as it varies from the description of the original given by Lucian, which exactly corresponds with the Massimi copy. The variation, however, only concerns the position of the head; and Barry says that the deviation in the Townley copy is much more consistent with the necessary impetus of the throw, the head shooting upward and forward, instead of being turned toward the quoit-bearer. It should also be remembered that there is no proof whatever that any of these statues are really copies of Myron's work. Among the other productions of Myron, were four oxen in the temple of Apollo on the Palatine Mount; a statue of Hercules, brought by Verres to Italy; a statue of Apollo, with Myron's name in silver letters on the thigh, in the temple of Æsculapius at Agrigentum; Jupiter, with Minerva and Hercules, a very celebrated colossal work, in the Heræum at Samos. The latter was removed to Rome by Antonius, but the Minerva and Hercules were subsequently restored to their places by Augustus, who placed the Jupiter in the Capitol.

MYTENS, JOHN. See JOHN MEYSSENS.

MYTENS, ARNOLD, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1541. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Italy for improvement, passing through Venice to Rome, where he resided several years, and became thoroughly imbued with the principles of that school. He afterwards went to Naples, where he painted an altar-piece representing the Assumption; also the Miraculous Conception, in the church of S. Lodovico, which gained him great reputation. At Abruzzo, he painted a grand composition, representing Christ crowned with Thorns, by the light of Flambeaux, in which the lights were judiciously and happily distributed, and the coloring excellent, with an admirable chiaro-scuro. On his return to Rome, he was employed in some considerable works in the church of St. Peter. He also painted much for the collections. He died at Rome in 1602.

MYTENS, A., a Dutch portrait painter, who flourished at the Hague from 1612 to 1660. Nothing is known of him except his works, which are well executed. Among other portraits at the Hague by him, are Frederick II Henry, Prince of Orange; the poet Jacob Cats; his housekeeper, named Havius, and a picture of the Celebration of the Marriage of the Elector of Brandenburg with the Daughter of the Prince of Orange.

MYTENS, DANIEL, THE ELDER, a Dutch portrait painter, born at the Hague. It is probable that he studied in the school of Rubens, as he imitated that master in his portraits, and in his backgrounds. He went to England in the reign of King James, where he painted several of the Court. He was appointed court painter by Charles I., in 1625. At Hampton Court are several whole-length portraits by him of the princes of the House of Brunswick Lunenburg, and one of Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham; at Kensington, a head of himself; and at St. James, a fine picture of Hudson, the king's dwarf, holding a dog with a string, in a landscape, warmly colored, and freely painted. Mytens continued in great reputation till the arrival of Vandyck, when the latter being appointed principal painter to the king, his pride was wounded, and he asked leave to retire to his own country. The king, learning the cause of his dissatisfaction, treated him with much kindness, and told him he could find sufficient employment for both him and Vandyck. He afterwards grew quite intimate with his rival, and Vandyck painted his portrait. It is supposed that he returned to the Hague about 1630, as none of his works in England bear a later date. Some of his portraits are so much in the style of Vandyck, that they have been taken for those of that master.

MYTENS, DANIEL, THE YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at the Hague in 1636. Some authors confound his history with his father's. He went early to Rome, where he studied in company with his countrymen, William Doudyns, and vander Schuur. The works of Carlo Maratti, were particularly the objects of his admiration, and he formed an intimacy with that master, whose advice and instruction contributed much to his advancement; and he acquired considerable reputation at Rome, both as an historical and portrait painter. He returned to the Hague in 1664, where he continued to practise his profession with distinction, and was received into the Academy there; but having inherited a considerable property on the death of his father, he neglected his business, became dissipated, and towards the latter part of his life, degraded his talents, and impaired his health by habitual intemperance. He died in 1688.

MYTENS, MARTIN, a Swedish painter, born at Stockholm in 1695. He showed an early inclination for art, and before he left Stockholm, painted several works which excited the surprise of the best judges and principal nobility at that court; but feeling satisfied that he could not obtain a thorough knowledge of art in his own country, he determined to go to Italy, and on his way, to visit some of the principal cities of Europe. He first proceeded to Holland, and thence to London, where he carefully studied, and designed after Vandyck, and other masters. In 1717, he went to Paris, where he obtained the favor of the Duke of Orleans, and had the honor of painting the portrait of that prince, and of Louis XV. He also drew the Czar Peter, who made him liberal offers to induce him to settle at St. Petersburg, which he declined. In 1721, he arrived at Vienna, where he was well received, and painted the portraits of the Imperial Family. In 1723, he proceeded to Italy, stopping some time at Venice, to study the works of the best masters of the Venetian school. At Rome, he exerted all his powers to obtain a grand style of composition and a correct design. He next went to Florence, where the Grand Duke took him into his service for some time, showed him many marks of favor and esteem, and placed his portrait among the illustrious artists in his gallery. He afterwards returned to his own country, where he was received with high distinction. He painted the portraits of the Royal Family; and the King and Queen, both of whom presented him a gold chain and medal, as marks of their esteem. He finally settled at Vienna, where he was appointed court painter, which office he held, universally respected, till his death in 1755. He chiefly excelled in portraits, but he also painted several historical works of great merit. His picture of Esther and Ahasuerus, in the Imperial Collection at Vienna, is considered as an admirable performance.

N.

NACHTGLAS, an engraver of uncertain age and country, who has executed a number of portraits, entirely with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style, marked Nachtglas, fecit. It is probable, from the inscription, that they are from his own designs.

NADAT, a German engraver, who flourished about 1530. His style resembles that afterwards adopted by Theodore de Bry, from which it is supposed he instructed the latter in engraving. There are only three of his prints mentioned, executed entirely with the graver; marked with a mouse-trap and the name NA DAT. Some authors have doubted whether Nadat was his real name, on account of the apparent division between the second and third letters. Zani calls him Natalis Dati. His prints are as follows:

The Virgin and Child, with St. Elisabeth; in an arch to the right is an Angel appearing to St. Joseph, and to the left an Angel appearing to St. Joachim. An Army on the march; dated 1530. An Army exercising. A Monstrous Infant, or two Infants joined back to back, inscribed Duo Gemini, &c.; H. 4 in., W. 6 l-8; not mentioned by Bartsch.

NAGEL, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1580. He is said to have been a disciple of Philip Galle, whose style he imitated at a very humble distance, his plates being incorrectly designed and coarsely executed. They are usually signed with his monogram, or P. N. fec., or P. Na. He engraved several sacred subjects, after Martin Hemskerck, and other Flemish masters, among which are the Seven Works of Mercy, after M. Hemskerck.

NAGLI, FRANCESCO, called IL CENTINO, from the place of his nativity, Cento, where he was born about 1615. He studied under Guercino, and Lanzi says he was an excellent imitator of that master, in point of coloring and chiaro-scuro, though he was somewhat dry in his design, cold in his attitudes, and no way novel in his ideas. He executed many works for the churches at Rimini and other places.

NAGTEGEL, ARNOLD, an engraver of little note, who executed, among other prints, a mezzotint portrait of Ishach Aboab Rabin, marked Arnold Nagtegel, delin. et fecit.

NAHL, JOHN AUGUSTINE, a reputable German sculptor, born at Berlin in 1710. He acquired the elements of design from his father, and at the age of twenty, started on a tour through France and Italy. Returning to Berlin in 1741, he received several commissions to decorate the gardens of Potsdam and Charlottenburg. He finally settled at Hindelbanck, in Switzerland, where is one of his finest works, a monument to the memory of Madame de Langhans, wife of the minister of the town. This admirable production is well known, and is celebrated in the verses of Haller and Wieland. In 1755, Nahl removed to Cassel, and was appointed Professor of Sculpture. He executed many excellent works in that city, among which is the statue of the Landgrave William. He died in 1785.

NAIGEON, JEAN, a reputable French historical and portrait painter, was born at Baune in 1757, and was living in 1831. He studied in the Academy at Dijon, and afterwards in the school of David. Among his principal historical subjects are, Æneas going to Battle; Numa consulting the Nymph Egeria; the Infant Pyrrhus presented at the Court of Closias; and the design for a grand vignette engraved by Roger, for the ordinances of the French Republic. He painted the portraits of several distinguished personages of his time; and also executed some theatrical decorations.—He was appointed Conservator of the Museum of the Luxembourg, and a member of the Legion of Honor.

NAIN, LE, a French painter, who flourished about 1650. He usually painted assemblages of peasantry, and other subjects of a domestic character. His composition is ingenious; his coloring is exceedingly sweet and simple; and there is an admirable appearance of nature and truth in the expression of his heads, which is peculiar to his works, and renders them highly interesting. (See the next article.)

NAIN, LOUIS and ANTOINE LE, two brothers, were French painters, born at Laon, in the years 1583 and 1585. It is highly probable that the interesting subjects attributed to the artist mentioned in the preceding article, are the productions of Louis and Antoine le Nain. They always wrought in concert, and painted interiors of inns, domestic conversations, and the pleasures of the peasantry, which are characterized by a wonderfully natural and truthful expression, great simplicity, clear and agreeable coloring. Their best pictures are of cabinet size, and are found in the choicest collections of England, Germany, and France. Several of them have been engraved by le Bas, Daullé, Earlom, and Strange. The two brothers were chosen members of the French Academy. They maintained during life a remarkable attachment, and died only two days apart, in 1648.

NAIN, MATTHIEU LE, was the brother of the preceding artists, born at Laon in 1593. Little is known of his life or works. He executed a portrait of Cardinal Mazarin, exhibited in the Academy, of which he was a member. He died in 1677.

NAIWINCK, NAIWYNCKX, or NAUWINCKX, HENRY, or HERMANN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born in 1620, at Utrecht, although Balkema says he was a native of Schoonhoven. He painted woody and mountainous landscapes, views of villages, and fortifications, in the style of Anthony Waterloo. The figures and animals in his pictures were inserted by John Asselyn. As an engraver, he executed some admirable etchings, which are much esteemed, being engraved in a free and original style, with a very pleasing effect. Among them are two sets of landscapes, eight in each, one of upright plates, and the other lengthways. Both sets are numbered from 1 to 8. Plate I. in each is marked H. Nainwinck inv. et. fe.

NALDINI, BATTISTA, an Italian painter, born at Florence in 1537. He first studied under Jacopo Carrucci, called Il Pontormo, and afterwards under Angiolo Bronzino. According to Baglioni, he visited Rome during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., and painted several altar-pieces for the churches, among which is a picture of the Baptism of Christ, in La Trinità de' Monti; and the Martyrdom of St. John the Baptist, in the church of that Saint. On returning to Florence, he was chosen by Vasari as a coadjutor in his works in the Palazzo Vecchio, and retained by him about fourteen years. Vasari makes honorable mention of Naldini, even when a young man, commending him as skillful, vigorous, expeditious, and indefatigable. He painted many pictures at Florence, especially the Deposition from the Cross, and the Purification, at S. Maria Novella, praised by Borghini for their judicious composition, correct design, elegant attitudes, beautiful coloring, and excellent perspective. His pictures are criticised by Lanzi as having the knee-joints too large, the eyes too widely opened, and generally marked with a certain fierceness; the coloring often characterized by changeable hues. In teaching his scholars, he followed the prevailing method of employing them to design after the chalk drawings of Michael Angelo, and giving them his own finished pictures to copy. He was living in 1590.

NANNI, GIROLAMO, called IL POCO E BUONO, a Roman painter, who flourished about 1643. His talents were by no means of a shining character, and he deserves little notice, except for his studious disposition, and slowness of execution. He was employed by Sixtus V. in several considerable works, and whenever requested by the director to hasten his operations, he always answered, "poco e buono" (little and good), which expression gained him his surname. There are a number of his pictures at Rome, among which are the Annunciation, in the church of the Madonna dell' Anima; and two subjects from the Life of St. Bonaventura, in S. Bartolomeo dell' Isola.

NANI, GIACOMO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about 1700. According to Dominici, he studied with Andrea Belvidere. He painted pictures of fruit, flowers, birds, and still-life, in the style of his master. In conjunction with Baldassare Caro, he was employed in decorating the palace of King Charles of Bourbon.

NANNI, GIOVANNI DA UDINE. See UDINE.

NANNOCCIO, N., an Italian painter, commended by Vasari, who flourished about 1550. He was a scholar of Andrea del Sarto, whose style he imitated with success. He went to France, where he resided a long time.

NANTEUIL, ROBERT, a preëminent French engraver and painter in crayons, was born at Rheims in 1630. His father was a merchant, and gave him a classical education: but having a decided inclination for art, he studied engraving under his brother-in-law, Nicholas Regnesson, and became one of the most eminent engravers of his country. In his first productions, he appears to have imitated the style of Claude Mellan, in single strokes only, without being crossed; but he afterwards adopted a manner greatly superior, which, for clearness and beauty of effect, has never been surpassed. Nanteuil acquired considerable reputation as a painter of portraits in crayons, and his talent in that branch recommended him to the protection of Louis XIV., who commissioned him to execute his portrait, and appointed him designer and engraver to the cabinet, with a pension. His portraits will always be ranked among the finest productions of art. The larger ones, although of life-size, are remarkable for harmony of execution and admirable color. He married the daughter of Edelinck. It is evident that Nanteuil was exceedingly industrious; because, although he died in 1678, at the age of forty-eight, he executed about two hundred and eighty plates, in a highly finished style. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Anne of Austria, Queen of France; after Mignard. Several Portraits of Louis XIV.; from his own designs, Mignard, and others. Louis, Dauphin; son of Louis XIV. 1677. Louis Bourbon, Prince de Condé; after his own designs. 1662. Henry Julius de Bourbon, Duke d' Enghien; after Mignard. 1661. Christina, Queen of Sweden; after S. Bourdon. 1654. Louisa Maria, Queen of Poland; after Juste. 1653. Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy. 1663. Charles, Duke of Lorraine. 1660. John Frederick, Duke of Brunswick Lunebourg. 1674. Charles II., Duke of Mantua. 1652. William Egon, Prince of Furstenberg, Cardinal. 1671. N. Duke of Albret. 1649; scarce. Louis Dony d' Attichy, Bishop of Autun. 1663. Antonio Barberini, Cardinal, and Archbishop of Rheims. 1663. Pomponne de Bellievre, President of the Parliament; fine. Peter de Bony, Archbishop of Narbonne. 1678. J. B. Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux. 1674. Louis de Boucherat, Chancellor of France. 1676. Emanuel Theodore, Duke de Bouillon, Cardinal. 1670. Leon le Bouthellier, Minister of State; after Champagne. 1652. John Chapelin, the Poet. 1655. Charles d'Ailly, Duke de Chaulnes. 1676. Francis de Clermont, Bishop of Noyon. 1655. Peter du Cambut, Bishop of Orleans, afterwards Cardinal. 1666. James Nicholas Colbert, Archbishop of Rouen. 1670. John Baptist Colbert, Minister of State. 1676; after Champagne. Francis de Bonne, Duke de Crequy. 1662. Ferdinand de Foix de la Valette, Duke d'Espéron. 1650. Caesar d'Etrée, Bishop of London, afterwards Cardinal. 1660. Francis de Harley de Chanvallon, Archbishop of Paris. 1675. Louis Hesselin, Counsellor of State; engraved in the style of C. Mellan. William de Lamignon, President of the Parliament. 1659. Dominick de Ligny, Bishop of Meaux. 1654. René de Longueil, Minister of State and President of Parliament. Henry d'Orleans, Duke of Longueville; after Champagne. John Loret de Carenton. 1658; scarce. Francis Mallier, Bishop of Troyes; after Velut. Leonor de Matignon, Bishop of Lissieux. Julius Mazarin, Cardinal. 1655. Edward Molé, President of the Parliament. Charles de la Porte, Duke de Melleraye. 1662. John Francis Paul de Gondy, Cardinal de Retz. 1650. Armand John du Plessis, Cardinal de Richelieu; after Champagne. Henry de Savoie d'Aumale, Archbishop of Rheims. 1651. Peter Séguier, Chancellor of France; after le Brun. 1656. John Baptist Steenberg, called the Advocate of Holland; one of his finest portraits. 1668. Charles Maurice le Tellier, Archbishop of Rheims. 1663. Michael le Tellier, Chancellor of France. 1662. Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount Turenne. 1665; fine.

NAPOLI, CESARE DI, a Sicilian painter, who flourished at Messina about 1583. According to Hackert, he studied in the Academy of Polidoro da Caravaggio, at Messina, and was one of his most distinguished disciples. He was a perfect imitator of his master's style, and executed some excellent works for the churches, but wrought more for individuals.

NAPOLITANO, IL. See FILIPPO D' ANGELI.

NAPPI, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, born at Milan, according to Baglioni, in 1573. After attaining some proficiency in the art, he settled at Rome, during the pontificate of Urban VIII. He painted a number of pictures for the public edifices of that city, but they are little above mediocrity. Lanzi says, "he displays great variety; and when he painted in his Lombard manner, as in the Assumption at the cloister della Minerva, and the Annunciation and other works in the Monasterio dell' Umiltà, he showed himself a naturalist far more pleasing than the mannerists of his time." Nappi died in 1638.

NARDI, ANGELO, an Italian painter, who, according to Palomino, passed the greater part of his life in Spain, where he flourished about 1645. He studied under Paolo Veronese, and imitated the style of that master in all his works. It is probable that he attained a good degree of excellence, as Philip IV. appointed him painter to the court. There are a number of his pictures in the churches at Madrid, among which the most esteemed are the Annunciation, in the Society of S. Justo; the Nativity and Conception, in the church of the Franciscans; the Guardian Angel and St. Michael the Archangel, in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites. Nardi died at Madrid in 1660.

NARDINI, D. TOMMASO, an historical painter, born at Ascoli in 1658, and died in 1718. He studied under Lodovico Trasi, an excellent scholar of Carlo Maratti. He was much employed in decorating the churches of his native city, the best of which are in the church of S. Angelo Magno. The perspective was painted by Agostino Collacconi, of Bologna. Nardini executed the figures, representing the Apocalypse, and other scriptural events. Lanzi says they display great spirit and harmony, richness of coloring, and facility of execution; which are the distinguishing characteristics of this master.

NASELLI, FRANCESCO, a distinguished Ferrarese historical painter, of noble birth, flourished about 1610. Lanzi says he practised drawing from the naked model with assiduity, and studied and copied the works of the Caracci and Guercino. By such practice he formed an excellent style of his own, on a large scale, soft, with vigorous coloring and rapid execution, inclining in those of his fleshes to a sunburnt hue. He made many excellent copies of the works of those masters, which are in the churches of his native place, and in private cabinets. Among these is his Communion of St. Jerome, from Agostino Caracci. He was exceedingly industrious and persevering, although in easy circumstances, and of noble rank. He painted at the Scala, in competition with one of the Caracci, Bonone, and Scarsellino; and, according to Lanzi, was deemed not unworthy of those eminent artists. Among his principal works are the Nativity, in the Cathedral; the Assumption, in S. Francesco; and several representations of the Last Supper, in private institutions. He died at Ferrara in 1630.

NASELLI, ALESSANDRO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, whose style he imitated, and executed, according to Crespi, some works for the churches at Ferrara. He was an artist not above mediocrity.

NASH, JOHN, an English architect, born in 1752. He was at first a miniature painter, but subsequently devoted himself to architecture, and is chiefly known as the promoter and author of the important improvements in London, effected by the formation of Regent street and the Regent's Park. Among his other works, were the designs for Buckingham palace, the Pavilion at Brighton, the United Service Club House, the Haymarket Theatre, and the terraces in St. James' Park. He died in 1835.

NASINI, CAV. GIUSEPPE, an Italian painter, born at Siena, according to Della Valle, in 1664. He first studied under his father, Francesco N., an artist of little note; but afterwards entered the school of Ciro Ferri, and became one of his ablest disciples. He was deficient in correctness of design, and dignity of character, but possessed a fertile imagination, and a resolute and commanding execution, which peculiarly qualified him for grand fresco works. At the recommendation of Ciro Ferri, he was employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany to paint in the Palazzo Pitti, from the designs of P. da Cortona, the Four Ages of Man, in emblematical subjects, which he finished to the satisfaction of his employer. There are many of his subjects at Siena, Foligno, and Florence, among which his masterpiece is supposed to be the St. Leonardo, in Madonna del Pianto, at Foligno. At Rome, he was commissioned to paint the ceiling of the Capella Bracciana, in the church de SS. Apostoli; in the large Prophets of the Lateran Cathedral, he competed with Luti, and the first artists then at Rome. Bartsch mentions a print by Nasini, representing the Virgin and the infants Jesus and John in a landscape, with Cherubs flying in the air; designed in the style of Ciro Ferri, and engraved with a delicate point in the manner of P. S. Bartoli. He died in 1736.

NASINI, CAV. APOLLONIO, born at Florence in 1697, was the son and scholar of the preceding, whom he assisted in the execution of his numerous works. Though he was inferior to his father in invention, he was an excellent artist, acquired distinction, and was much employed, not only by the churches, but by individuals. He died about 1754.

NASINI, D. ANTONIO, was a younger brother of Giuseppe, with whom he studied. According to Della Valle, he held an honorable rank among his cotemporaries. He was chiefly employed in painting portraits, in which branch he excelled. His likeness is in the Florentine Gallery. He entered the priesthood, but still continued to practise his art. He died in 1716.

NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, a Scottish landscape painter, born at Edinburg in 1758. He visited London, and became a pupil of Allan Ramsay; after which he went to Rome for improvement, and remained there several years, studying portrait, landscape, and historical painting. On returning to Edinburg, he painted the portraits of a number of persons, among which was that of Robert Burns; but subsequently devoted himself entirely to landscape. His favorite subjects were wild and mountainous views, usually designed from nature, and painted in a simple and picturesque style. He was much occupied in teaching the art. In 1813 he exhibited a View in Scotland, in the Royal Academy at London. He died in 1840.

NASMYTH, PATRICK, a Scottish landscape painter, the son of the preceding, was born at Edinburg in 1787. He early manifested a decided inclination for art, and studied under his father, after which, at the age of twenty, he went to London, and attained considerable reputation. His landscapes are of a pleasing character. He often painted scenes from the wild, mountainous regions of Scotland, greatly wanting in that breadth of handling so necessary in grand landscapes, and remarkably injured by excessive detail. Had he confined his pencil to quiet, Arcadian scenes, his reputation would be greater than it is. Nasmyth had but little success. He died at Lambeth, near London, in 1831.

NASOCCHIO, GIUSEPPE, a native of Bassano, who is said to have studied under Gentile da Fabriano at Venice, whose style he imitated. He was doubtless not a scholar, but an imitator of that master, as there is a picture by him dated 1529, whereas Fabriano probably died about 1423.—There were two other painters of this name, Bartolomeo and Francesco, who flourished about 1541. Little is known of these painters.

NASON, PETER, a Dutch painter, who flourished about 1670. He painted subjects of still-life, which are much esteemed, and are found in some of the principal German collections. It is said that he visited England, and painted the portrait of Charles II.; also that there are a number of portraits by him in that kingdom, colored in a delicate style, with considerable neatness of touch.

NATALI, CARLO, called IL GUARDOLINO, an Italian painter and architect, born at Cremona about 1590. He studied successively under Andrea Mainardi and Guido Reni; and subsequently resided during a number of years at Rome and Genoa, observing all that was most valuable, and exerting his own talents in the art. Among his best paintings is his St. Francesca Romana, in the church of S. Gismondo at Cremona, which Lanzi ranks above mediocrity. Natali did not execute many works in painting, being principally devoted to architecture. His edifices are principally at Genoa and Cremona, but none of them are mentioned. He was living in 1683.

NATALI, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian painter and architect, the son of Carlo N., was born at Cremona about 1630. He was instructed in both arts by his father, and afterwards went to Rome for improvement, where he pursued his studies under P. da Cortona. On returning to Cremona, he was employed for the churches, and established a school of painting upon the principles of Cortona, though without many followers. There is a large picture by him in the Predicatori, displaying some skillful architecture, representing the Holy Patriarch burning heretical books, which Lanzi says is not unworthy a follower of Cortona. As an architect none of his works are mentioned. He died about 1700.

NATALI, GIUSEPPE, an eminent painter, born at Casal Maggiore, in the Cremonese territory, in 1652. According to Zaist, possessing a natural genius for the art, he went to Rome, notwithstanding the opposition of his father; and from thence to Bologna, where he assiduously studied the works of Dentone, Colonna, and Mitelli, the most famous perspective and architectural painters of the age. He flourished precisely at the period which the architectural painters consider the happiest for their art. Lanzi says "he formed a style at once praiseworthy for the grandeur and beauty of the architecture, and the elegance of the ornamental parts, judiciously introduced. He gratifies the eye by presenting those views which are the most charming, and gives it repose by distributing them at just distances. In his grotesques, he retains much of the antique, shunning all useless exhibitions of modern foliage, and varying the painting from time to time with small landscapes. The softness and harmony of his tints extorted great commendation." He found abundant employment, and decorated a great many churches and public edifices, as well as many halls and chambers for individuals throughout Lombardy. He also executed a great many small oil paintings, which were in the highest repute. He died in 1722.

NATALI, FRANCESCO, was the brother and scholar of the preceding, whose style he adopted, and whom he nearly approached, and even surpassed in dignity. He executed many works on a large scale for the churches in Lombardy and Tuscany. He was also much employed at the courts of the Dukes of Massa, of Modena, and of Parma, in which latter city he died in 1723.

NATALI, LORENZO and PIETRO, were brothers of the preceding, whom they assisted in his works, but executed none of importance of their own.

NATALI, GIO. BATTISTA, was the son and scholar of Giuseppe, whom he assisted in many of his works. He was afterwards appointed court-painter to the Elector of Cologne.

NATALI, GIO. BATTISTA, was a cousin of the preceding, and the son and scholar of Francesco. He was an excellent artist in the same branch practised by his father and uncle. He was invited to the court of Charles, King of the Two Sicilies, in whose service he continued till his death, about 1750.

NATALINO DA MURANO. See MURANO.

Nf or Nfe, NATALIS, MICHAEL, a Flemish engraver, born at Liege about 1589. After acquiring the elements of design under Joachim Sandrart, he visited Antwerp, and studied engraving under Charles Mallery. From thence he went to Rome, and adopted the style of Cornelius Bloemaert, which he followed with some success. He engraved a number of plates after the great Italian masters; also part of the plates in the Giustiniani Gallery, in concert with Regnier Persyn, Theodore Matham, and others. On returning to Flanders, he was invited to Paris, where he resided some time. His plates are executed with the graver, in a free, open style, but deficient in taste. His drawing is usually incorrect, and the effect is generally cold and heavy; but his strokes are clear and regular, and he handled the burin with great facility. His portraits are his best productions. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Josephus Justinianus Benedicti Filius; Mich. Natalis, fec. Jacob Catz, Pensionary of Holland, and Poet. Eugene d'Alamond, Bishop of Ghent. Maximilian Emanuel, Elector of Bavaria; after J. Sandrart. Frederick, Count of Merode. Ernestine, Princess de Ligne; after Vandyck. The Marquis del Guasto, with his mistress represented as Venus; after Titian.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Raffaello. The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Joseph seated behind, leaning his head upon his hand; after A. del Sarto. The Holy Family; after N. Poussin; the first impressions are before the nudity of the child was covered with linen. St. Paul taken up into Heaven; do. The Holy Family, with angels presenting Flowers; after S. Bourdon. The Marriage of St. Catherine; do. The Virgin holding the infant Christ, who is sleeping, with St. John by her side; do. The first impressions are before the bosom of the Virgin was covered with linen. St. Bruno at prayer; after Bertholet Flemael. The Assembly of the Carthusians; in four sheets; do. Mary washing the Feet of Christ; after Rubens. The Last Supper; after Diepenbeck. St. Francis with a Lamb; do.

NATOIRE, CHARLES, a French painter and engraver, born at Nismes in 1700. He studied under François le Moine, and was employed to finish several works left incomplete at the death of that master. Little is recorded of the circumstances of his life. His chief merit seems to have consisted in the correctness of his design; his coloring has been criticised as feeble and cold. The principal works of Natoire are those which adorn the apartments of the first story of the chateau of Versailles; those in the Hotel de Soubise; and in the chapel of Les Enfants Trouvés, at Paris. He was appointed Director of the French Academy at Rome, which honorable office he filled for twenty years, until 1775, when he retired on account of old age, and was succeeded by Vien. He died, according to Dumesnil, at Castel Gandolfo, in 1777. There are a few etchings by Natoire, executed from his own designs, in a free and spirited style. Among them are the following:

The Crucifixion, with Mary Magdalene at the foot of the Cross. The Adoration of the Magi. The Martyrdom of St. Fereol. Two, of the Sports of Children. Spring and Winter; etched by Natoire, and finished with the graver by P. Aveline.

NATTER, LAURENCE, a distinguished German medalist, and an engraver on precious stones, born at Biberach, in Suabia, in 1705. He studied design and engraving in the Academy of Fine Arts at Rome, and subsequently visited London, where he settled, and practised his art for a few years. He engraved several works for various persons, among which was a diamond for Lord Cavendish. In 1742 he went to the Hague, to execute a commission for the Prince of Orange. The next year he went to Copenhagen, and engraved a royal medal and several seals. He afterwards visited Stockholm and Petersburg, leaving proofs of his abilities in each of those cities, and then returned to London. He subsequently made another trip on the continent, similar to the first; and finally visited Paris, where he died, in 1763. Natter was chosen a member of the Antiquarian Society; and was appointed medalist to the King of the Low Countries. He published at London, in 1754, a treatise on the antique method of engraving on precious stones, as compared with the modern method, illustrated with plates. Mariette, in the first volume of his Traité des pierres gravées, has recorded the list of Natter's engravings on precious stones.

NATTIER, MARC, a French painter, born at Paris in 1642, and died there in 1705. He painted portraits, but attained little distinction.

NATTIER, JEAN MARC, a reputable French historical and portrait painter, the son and scholar of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1685. At the age of fifteen he gained the grand prize of the Academy, and received the royal pension, though it does not appear that he visited Rome. He made designs of the pictures by Rubens in the Luxembourg Gallery, which were subsequently engraved, and published, under the title of La Galerie du Palais du Luxembourg, peinte par Rubens, dessinée par Nattier et gravée par les plus illustres graveurs; Paris, 1710, in grand folio. He subsequently devoted his energies to portrait painting, and obtained great encouragement, being patronized by the royal family and many noble personages. His portrait of the Empress Catherine gained him the favor of the Czar Peter, who desired him to visit Russia, but Nattier declined the invitation. His works are praised for tasteful composition, brilliant coloring, and freedom of pencil. Among his principal portraits are those of the Princes of the House of Lorraine; Mlle. de Clermont; Marshal Saxe; the Duke de Richelieu; and that of Marie Leczinska, queen of Louis XV., engraved by Tardieu. In 1713, Nattier was chosen a member of the Royal Academy; he had a pension of 500 francs from the king; and in 1759 was elected a member of the Academy of Denmark. He died in 1766. He had a son, who bid fair to attain distinction in the art; but unhappily, while pursuing his studies at Rome, he was drowned in the Tiber, at the age of twenty-two.

NAUCYDES, an eminent Greek sculptor, a native of Argos; who flourished, according to Pliny, about B. C. 396. He was the son of Mothon, and the master of the younger Polycleetus of Argos. According to Thiersch, he was one of the most important artists between Alcamenes and Praxiteles. Pausanias mentions six of his works; a statue of Hebe, in gold and ivory, placed near the celebrated chryselephantine statue of Juno by Polycleetus at Mycenæ; a bronze statue of Hecate at Argos; and four bronze statues of victors at the Olympic games, one of Eucles at Rhodes, two of Chimon, one of which was at Olympia, the other in the temple of Peace at Rome, and the fourth of Bacis the wrestler. Pliny mentions by him a statue of Mercury, a Discobolus, and a man sacrificing a ram. Pausanias says that the two statues of Chimon were his best works. The well known Discobolus in repose, standing with a quoit in his hand, is sometimes said, incorrectly, to be the work of Naucydes.

NAUDET, THOMAS CHARLES, a French landscape painter, born at Paris in 1774. He studied under Hubert Robert, painter and designer for the royal gardens, and became one of his most distinguished scholars. He made a collection of nearly 3000 designs, embracing the most beautiful views and the finest monuments of ancient and modern times, in Italy, Spain, Germany and Switzerland. Naudet died in 1810, but a part of his work was published by his friend M. Bruun Neergard, under the title Voyage pittoresque et historique du nord d'Italie; les dessins par Naudet, les gravures par Debucoart, Paris 1812—1813; fol.

NAUDI, ANGELO, an Italian painter, a pupil and imitator of Paul Veronese. He went to Spain, where, according to Palomino, he passed the greater part of his life, and executed many works for the churches at Madrid, which are highly commended by the author above mentioned. He was also appointed court painter by King Philip, in whose service he continued a long time.

NAVARETTE. See EL MUDO.

NAVARO, JUAN, a Spanish engraver, mentioned by Strutt as residing at Seville about 1598. Among other plates he engraved several book frontispieces, executed with the graver, in a very indifferent style.

NAVARRO, JUAN SIMON, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Madrid about 1650. He attained considerable distinction as a flower painter; and also produced some indifferent historical works. There is a Holy Family by him, which is well colored, but inferior in other respects. In a convent of the Carmelites at Madrid, there are two of his pictures, representing a Nativity, and an Epiphany.

NAZZARI, BARTOLOMEO, an Italian painter, born, according to Tassi, in the territory of Clusane, in the Bergamese, in 1699. After studying at Venice, under Angelo Trevisani, he went to Rome, and finished his course under Benedetto Luti, and Francesco Trevisani. He settled at Venice, and became an excellent painter of history and portraits. He visited various capitals of different Italian and German states, and gained great reputation for his portraits of princes and of their courtiers; also for his heads of youths and old men, drawn from the life, very fancifully dressed and decorated. Among his best historical works, is a Holy Family, with St. Anne, at Pontremoli. He died in 1758.

NEALCES, an eminent Greek painter, cotemporary with Aratus of Sicyon; flourished about B. C. 213. He is said to have succeeded by accident in representing the foam on a horse's mouth, by a dash of his sponge. Few of his works are mentioned, but he was the most eminent painter of his time. Pliny mentions a Venus by him, and a battle between the Egyptians and the Persians on the Nile. To show the locality of this combat, Nealces painted an ass drinking at the river side, and a crocodile lying in wait. This ingenious application of accessories, has many other examples in the history of Grecian art.

Aratus, in his zeal against tyrants, resolved to destroy all their portraits which were preserved at Sicyon. This he accomplished with but one exception; at the earnest request of Nealces he spared the picture of Aristratus in his chariot, by Melanthus and Apelles, on condition that the figure of Aristratus should be defaced, which was accordingly done by Nealces, and a palm tree substituted in its place.

NEALE, JOHN PRESTON, an English painter, and a distinguished architectural engraver, was born in 1770. He painted landscapes of considerable merit, decorated with architecture; but subsequently devoted his energies to engraving. He executed many plates for the embellishment of various publications, and in 1818 he published the first part of the History and Antiquities of Westminster Abbey. In 1823 he published the second part, making in both sixty-one plates. Neale wrought with very great industry, and his plates possess considerable merit. Besides the works already mentioned, he published The Seats of Noblemen and Gentlemen of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland; and in 1829 a second series of five vols., making in the whole 737 plates. He died in 1848.

NEALE, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about 1650. He resided at London, where he etched a good portrait of Bindo Altoviti, after Titian, in the style of Gaywood. It is said that he went to Paris, and engraved a number of plates in that city, among which are twenty-four pieces of Holbein's Dance of Death, the first of which is marked Paris, 1657; also several plates of Birds, after Barlow; Paris, 1659. Strutt supposes Neale had a share in engraving the plates for the octavo edition of Ogilby's Fables. His plates are usually marked with his name in full, or with the letters T. N.

NEAPOLI, FRANCISCO. See ARREGIO.

NEBBIA, CESARE, a reputable Italian painter, born at Orvieto about 1536. He studied under Girolamo Muziano, whose style he adopted, and assisted him in the important works he executed for Gregory XIII., in the Vatican, and the Capella Gregoriana. Assisted by Gio. Guerra da Modena, Nebbia superintended the works projected by Sixtus V., entrusting the completion of his designs to the younger painters. They were extensively employed during the five years' reign of that pontiff, in the chapel of S. Maria Maggiore, the Library of the Vatican, the Scala Santa, the Lateran and Quirinal palaces. Nebbia was very inferior to Muziano in dignity and grandeur, but possessed a very fertile invention, and great facility of execution. Lanzi says there are some beautiful pictures by him, finely colored, as the Epiphany, quite in Muziano's style, in the church of S. Francesco at Viterbo. Among his principal works at Rome, Baglioni mentions the Coronation of the Virgin, in S. Maria de' Monti; and the Resurrection, in S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli. He died at Rome in 1614.

NEBBIA, GALEOTTO, an old Italian painter, a native of Castellaccio, near Alessandria, who flourished at Genoa about 1480. In the church of S. Brigida in that city, are two altar-pieces by him, which are esteemed for their antiquity and originality. The first represents the Archangels, and the second, St. Pantaleone and other Martyrs. Lanzi says they are remarkably well executed for the time, the figures represented on a gold ground, the draperies extremely rich, with stiff and regular foldings, not borrowed from any other school. The grado, or step, is ornamented with minute histories, somewhat crude, but displaying much diligence and care in finishing.

NECK, JOHN VAN, a reputable Dutch painter, born at Naarden in 1636. He was the son of a physician, who intended him for the medical profession; but manifesting a strong inclination for art, he was placed under the eminent Jacob de Backer. He settled at Amsterdam, and painted portraits and history in the admirable style of his instructor, which he followed with great success. He was very extensively employed in portraits. As an historical painter, Houbraken commends him in the highest terms, and mentions his capital picture of the Presentation in the Temple, in the Romish church at Amsterdam. His works are finely composed, and correctly drawn, particularly his subjects from the fable, where the female figures are designed with great elegance and taste, evincing a perfect acquaintance with the nude, unusual among his countrymen, and the draperies are distributed in easy and natural folds. He died in 1714.

NECKER, or NEGKER, JOBST, or JOSSE DE, a distinguished wood engraver of Nordlingen, flourished in the 16th century. He is supposed to be the same as Jobst Denecker who wrought at Augsburg about 1544, and engraved the prints for Holbein's Dance of Death, published in that year.—This is very probable, since the subject of this article executed part of the plates in the Triumph of Maximilian, by Hans Burgkmair, who flourished at Augsburg; and at the end of the Dance of Death is inscribed Jobst Denecker Formschneyder. Brulliot supposes that the engraver of Augsburg was the son of him of Nordlingen; but the dates agree so nearly, as to render this theory extremely improbable.

NEDEK, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1616; died in 1678. He studied under P. Lastman, and painted landscapes, portraits, and history. His landscapes have considerable merit.

NÉE, DENIS, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1732. He studied under J. P. le Bas, and first gained distinction by restoring the plates of the Recueil des peintres antiques, published by Mariette and Caylus. Having formed a close intimacy with Masquelier, he executed in concert with that artist the vignettes for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and an Essay on Music. They were soon employed, however, upon more important works, among which were Tableaux pittoresques de la Suisse, 1 vol. fol., 430 plates; Voyage en Grece, by M. de Choiseul Gouffier; Voyage de Naples et de Sicile, by the Abbé de St. Non; and the elephantine Voyage pittoresque de la France; 12 vols. fol., 828 plates. The plates of Denis Née may also be found in Cassas' Voyage d'Istrie et de Dalmatie; and the Voyage de Constantinople et des rives du Bosphore, after the designs of Mellinger. He died in 1818. The following are a few of his best prints:

Several Views in Switzerland; after Chatelet. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew; after Gravelot. Three Views in Martinique; after the Chevalier d'Epervay. Benjamin Franklin; after Charmentel. A View of the City of Lyons; after Lallemand. The Environs of Frascati; do. A View of Tivoli; do.

NEEF, or NEEFS, PETER, THE ELDER, an eminent Flemish painter of interiors, born at Antwerp in 1570. He studied under Henry Steenwyck, and painted similar subjects to those of that master, representing interiors of churches and temples, which he finished with astonishing neatness and precision of pencil. All his architectural ornaments and various decorations of the churches, are designed with the utmost correctness, and touched with such delicacy as to render them objects of wonder rather than of imitation. Such was his knowledge of perspective, that he was accustomed to paint in the small space of a cabinet picture the largest and most magnificent Gothic edifices, in so masterly a manner, as to delude the spectator into the belief of the reality of the immense space the building represents. As the regularity of lines and great uniformity of tints would appear dull and insipid, Neefs was accustomed to introduce a variety of objects, to animate and diversify the scene; and by his admirable management of light and shade, he produced a lively and pleasing effect, where most artists would have been uninteresting and tame. Some of his interiors are represented by torch-light, with wonderful skill, and these are perhaps his most desirable productions. Neefs was not a good designer of the figure, and therefore employed John Breughel, the elder Teniers, and other eminent artists, to insert the figures in his pieces, which renders to them additional value. He died, according to Balkema, in 1651.

NEEF, or NEEFS, PETER, THE YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp, according to Balkema, in 1601. He painted interiors, similar to those of his father, but greatly inferior to that admirable master, both in correctness of perspective and neatness of finishing. According to Balkema, he died in 1658; but it is said there are pictures by him dated 1660, and even later.

NEEF, or NEEFS, JAMES, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp, according to Nagler, about 1610. There are various dates assigned for his birth, but Nagler is probably correct, as there are prints by him dated 1632 and 1633. His last print recorded is dated 1645. James Neefs was probably related to the preceding artists. He engraved a number of plates after Rubens, Vandyck, and other celebrated Flemish painters. His drawing is correct, but stiff and mannered, and his heads often have an extravagant expression; but his prints are much esteemed. They are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with great facility. Among them are the following:

Gaspar Nemius, Bishop of Antwerp; after Gerard Segers. John Tollenario, Jesuit; after P. Fruytiers. Francis Snyders, Painter; after Vandyck. Anthony de Tassis, Canon of Antwerp; do. The Marchioness of Barlemont, Countess d'Egmont; do. Josse de Hertoghe; do. Martin Ryckart, Painter; do.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Fall of the Angels; after Rubens. The Meeting of Abraham and Melchisedec; do. The Crucifixion, with the Virgin and St. John; do. St. Augustine; do. The Martyrdom of St. Thomas; do. The Judgment of Paris, and the Triumph of Galatea, called the Ewer of Charles I.; do; scarce. Christ and the six Penitents; after Gerard Segers. Job and his Wife; do. The Martyrdom of St. Lievin; do. Christ appearing to Magdalene; do. Christ brought before Pilate; after J. Jordaens. The Satyr, with the Peasant blowing hot and cold; do. St. Roch interceding for the Persons attacked by the Plague; after Erasmus Quellinus.

W.D. or N.D. W.D. W.D.

NEER, ARNOLD VANDER, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1619. His instructor is not known. He sometimes painted sunsets, in which the glowing richness and harmony of his coloring approach the excellence of Rubens and Rembrandt. His pictures of winter scenes, with figures skating on the ice, are only surpassed by the works of Albert Cuyp; but his views by moonlight are undoubtedly his finest productions. They represent views of cottages or fishermen's huts, on the banks of a river with boats and figures, and the moon pouring a flood of effulgence over the landscape, while the sparkling radiance reflected from the water produces the most fascinating and picturesque effect. Vander Neer died in 1683. There is a picture by him in the National Gallery, London, which brought $3,600. He used one of the above ciphers.

NEER, EGLON HENDRICK VANDER, a Dutch painter, the son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam in 1643. He first studied under his father, but his taste leading him to a different branch of the art, he was placed in the school of James Vanloo, an historical and portrait painter of Amsterdam. At the age of twenty he visited Paris, where he passed four years, and painted a number of small portraits and domestic subjects, which gained him considerable reputation. He afterwards returned to Holland, and painted some portraits and historical and fabulous subjects, colored with great delicacy, and carefully finished, although deficient in other respects. Among his portraits of life size, was that of the Princess of Neuburg, painted by order of the King of Spain, who was so highly pleased, that he desired vander Neer to visit Madrid, but he declined the invitation. He also painted conversation pieces and gallant subjects, in the style of Terburg, which are highly esteemed, and are considered his best works, being well colored, touched with great delicacy, and very highly finished, although less mel- low and harmonious than those of Mieris or Metz- u. Vander Neer was the instructor of Adrian Vander- werf. He was employed for some time by the Elector Palatine at Dusseldorf, and died there, in 1703. His portrait, by himself, is honored with a place among those of the illustrious painters in the Florentine Gallery.

NEGKER. See NECKER.

NEGRE, MATTHIAS VAN. This painter was probably a native of Holland, and is mentioned by Descamps as living about 1625. He painted historical and architectural subjects. There is a Holy Family by him, in the cathedral of Tournay.

NEGRE, NICOLAUS VAN, a portrait painter, who probably flourished in Holland about 1650. There are a number of plates after him, engraved by Suy- derhoef, van Dalen, and Crispin de Passe.

NEGRI, or NERI, PIER MARTIRE, a Cremonese painter, who flourished about 1600. According to Zaist he was a scholar of Cav. Gio. Battista Trotti, called Il Malosso. He painted history and por- traits in the style of that master, but with more boldness, and vigor of light and shadow, as is evi- dent from his admired picture representing Christ restoring Sight to the Blind, which Lanzi says is surpassed by his St. Giuseppe at Pavia. Negri passed some time at Rome, where he executed a number of works, and was received into the Acad- emy of St. Luke.

NEGRI, PIETRO, a Venetian painter, who flour- ished about 1680. He is supposed to have studied under Antonio Zanchi da Este, but Lanzi thinks he was rather an imitator of that master. He exe- cuted some works for the churches and public edi- fices of Venice, the most important of which is a picture in the College of S. Rocco, representing the Liberation of the city from the Plague in 1630, "in which," says Lanzi, "we perceive the peculiar ease and manner of Zanchi, somewhat improved and ennobled in the forms." This picture is placed opposite to the grand painting by Zanchi, repre- senting the great Plague of 1630. He was also much employed in painting for the collections.

NEGRI, GIO. FRANCESCO, an eminent Bolog- nese portrait painter, born in 1648. He studied under Odoardo Fialetti at Venice. On his return to Bologna, he acquired distinction for the excel- lence of his portraits. He is commended by Or- landi, Malvasia, and others. He was living in 1718.

NEGRONE, or NIGRONE, PIETRO, called IL GIOVANE ZINGARO (the young Gipsy) a painter of the Neapolitan school, born at Calabria about 1505. Dominici says he studied first under Gio. Antonio d'Amato; afterwards under Marco Cala- brese; and he commends him as a diligent and accomplished artist. In S. Agnello at Naples, there is a picture of the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with Saints and a glory of Angels; also in S. Maria Donna Romata, are two pictures by him, representing the Adoration of the Magi, and the Scourging of Christ, painted in 1541. He died, according to Lanzi, about 1565, aged 60.

NEGROPONTE, FRÀ FRANCESCO or ANTONIO, a monk of the order of the Cappuccini, who flour- ished at Venice in the early part of the 15th cen- tury. According to Kùgler, his works resemble those of Jacobello del Fiore.

NELLI, NELLO, an old painter of Pisa, by whom there is a Madonna painted on panel in the old church of Tripalle at Pisa, signed Nerus Nellus de Pisa me pinxit, 1299.

NELLI, SUORA PLAUTELLA, an Italian paintress of noble family, born at Florence in 1523. She became a nun of the Dominican convent of St. Caterina at Florence, and without other assistance than a collection of designs by Fra. Bartolomeo di S. Marco, she attained considerable excellence in painting. Her pictures are generally in the style of that artist, although she also imitated other mas- ters. Among them are a picture of the Crucifix- ion, with a number of small figures highly fin- ished; a Descent from the Cross, said to be af- ter a design by Andrea del Sarto, in the church of her order at Florence; and an Adoration of the Magi, of her own composition, possessing great merit. She died in 1588.

NELLI, NICCOLO, a Venetian engraver, who flourished about 1568. There is an architectural frontispiece, with figures inscribed Niccolo Nelli Veneziano f., engraved for a book of plans and views of the most illustrious cities and fortresses in the world, published in 1568. The figures are well drawn, and the plate is executed with con- siderable ability, somewhat in the style of Marco da Ravenna. It is observed by Strutt, that many of the prints without marks, of the above date, may be attributed to Nelli, particularly those in the style of Marco da Ravenna.

NELLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian archi- tect, and a writer on the art, born at Florence in 1661. He was of a noble family, and cultivated the Fine Arts, of which he was a zealous protec- tor. He was appointed Director of the public roads and bridges in Tuscany. He died at Flo- rence in 1725, leaving many manuscripts relating to literature and art, among which are his Dis- corsi di Architettura, Florence, 1753; 4to.

NELLI, PIETRO, a painter of distinction, who flourished at Rome in the beginning of the 18th century. He was probably a scholar of Gio. Ma- ria Morandi. He was a rival of Odoardo Vici-nelli, whom Pascoli commends as the ablest scholar of Morandi, and Lanzi says that Nelli alone could dispute precedence with him at Rome.

NELLO, BERNARDO DI GIO. FALCONI, an old painter of Pisa, who flourished about 1390. He was a distinguished artist in his time, and Lanzi says he still merits consideration. He painted many pictures in the Cathedral at Pisa. He is supposed to be the same as Nello di Vanni, who, with other Pisan artists, painted in the Campo Santo in the 14th century.

NERANUS, A., a painter of little note, who flourished about 1650, and is said to have imitated the styles of van Vliet and Rembrandt. There was a picture by him in Cardinal Fesch's collection, representing Pilate washing his hands before the Jews.

NERI, PIER MARTIRE. See NEGRI.

NERI, GIOVANNI, a Bolognese painter, who was living in 1575. He excelled in painting all kinds of birds, fish, reptiles, quadrupeds, and other animals, which he did from life, with such precision and beauty that he was called Giovanni degli Uccelli (painter of birds). Masini says he filled seven folio volumes with these subjects, which he saw in the studio of Ulisse Aldovrandi.

NERITO, JACOPO, an old painter of Padua, who, according to Rossetti, subscribes himself a pupil of Gentile da Fabriano, on an altar-piece in the church of San Michele di Padova. He flourished about 1450.

NERO, DURANTE DEL, a painter born at Borgo San Sepolcro, who flourished at Rome about 1560, at which time he was employed in decorating the pontifical palace.

NERONI, BARTOLOMEO, called MAESTRO RICCIO, a distinguished Sieneſe painter, who flourished about 1573. He studied under Giovanni Antonio Razzi, whom he assisted in his works, and whose daughter he married. Lanzi says that Neroni, after the death of the four great pillars of the Sieneſe school, sustained its reputation, and probably educated one of its restorers. His pictures unite the style of Razzi with a certain resemblance to the manner of Vasari, in the distribution of his tints. He had excellent abilities in perspective, especially in representing scenery; Andreani has engraved a specimen. He was also greatly skilled in architecture, and had a pension from the magistrates of Lucca for his assistance in their public works. In Siena, at the Oſservanti, is a Crucifixion by him, with a great number of figures; and in the church of the Derelitte, a Descent from the Cross, entirely in the style of Razzi.

NERVEſA, GASPARE, a painter born in the Friuli, who, according to Ridolfi, was a scholar and imitator of Titian, and painted mostly at Spilimbergo. There are some of his works at Trevigi.

NES, or NEES, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Delft, according to Immerzeel and Füessli, in the early part of the 17th century. He studied under Michael Mirevelt, and by his advice visited Italy for improvement, studying some time at Venice and Rome. On returning to Holland, he painted several historical pictures, which were much admired. He would probably have gained eminence in that branch of the art, had he not, for the sake of emolument, devoted himself to painting portraits, in the admirable style of Mirevelt. His works are distinguished for dignity of character, chaste and vigorous coloring, and accurate resemblance. Probably they are generally ascribed to Mirevelt, as the portraits of the latter are estimated at from 5,000 to 10,000! According to Immerzeel, Nes died in 1650; but Füessli says he flourished in 1670; and Balkema, that he died in 1692. It is probable that he lived longer than until 1650, as Mirevelt died in 1641.

NETSCHER, GASPARE. According to D'Argenville, this eminent painter was born at Prague, in Germany, in 1636; but Houbraken says he was born at Heidelberg in 1639. His father, a sculptor, and an engineer in the Polish service, died when he was only two years old, leaving a widow with three children, of whom Gaspar was the youngest. In consequence of the calamities of war, she was obliged to leave Germany and retire to Holland; but while on the way, two of her children perished with hunger, and she arrived at Arnheim, in Guelderland, in a state of abject wretchedness. Happily, she was met by the hand of charity; her wants were relieved by the compassionate people of that place, and her child was taken under the protection of an opulent physician, named Tullekens, who reared him as his own son. Netscher received an education fitted for his entrance into the medical profession; but manifesting a strong inclination for art, he was placed under Koeter, an obscure painter of still-life. Preferring some other department of art, he soon afterwards entered the school of Gerard Terburg, and made such rapid progress that, in a few years, his pictures were almost as highly esteemed as those of his instructor. On leaving the school of Terburg, he set out for Italy, sailing from Amsterdam to Bordeaux. Meeting some encouragement in portrait painting, and falling in love with the niece of the person with whom he lodged, Netscher remained rather longer in that city than he intended. He finally relinquished his project of visiting Italy, married the young lady, and returned to Holland, where he settled permanently at the Hague. He sometimes painted historical and fabulous subjects, but was more successful in small portraits. His reputation in this branch was so great that he was patronized by nearly all the best families, and the foreign ambassadors residing at the Hague. His best works, however, represent domestic subjects and conversations, characterized by a delicacy of pencilling and a lustre of coloring similar to the exquisite productions of Terburg and Metz. They are more tastefully composed and correctly designed than the pictures of Terburg. His touch is spirited, yet mellow, as is evident from his representations of silk, ermine, and white satin, so faithfully painted as almost to produce illusion. Netscher is said to have visited London, at the invitation of Sir William Temple, in the reign of Charles II.; but his stay in England was short. Among other portraits, he painted one of Lord Berkeley of Stratton, and his lady, dated 1676. In the royal collection at Paris, there are two pictures by Netscher; one a Lute-player, the other a Musician giving a Lady lessons on the Bass-Viol. He died at the Hague in 1684.

NETSCHER, THEODORE, a distinguished Dutch portrait painter, the son of the preceding, was born at Bordeaux in 1661, during the residence of his father in that city. He studied under that master, and attained such excellence that he was patronized by Count Davaux, ambassador from France to Holland, who induced him to visit Paris, and recommended his abilities to the people of that metropolis. Netscher was greatly encouraged, and acquired both fame and fortune. After an absence of twenty years, he returned to Holland, and settled at the Hague, where he was employed by the principal personages of the court. He sometimes introduced fruit and flowers into his larger pictures, and his peaches and grapes were colored with great transparency and beauty. According to Descamps, when the states of Holland sent six thousand troops to England, at the time of the rebellion in 1715, Netscher accompanied them as paymaster, and resided there six years, meeting great encouragement as a portrait painter. He returned to Holland in 1722, where he died in 1732.

NETSCHER, CONSTANTINE, a distinguished Dutch portrait painter, born at the Hague in 1670. He was the younger son of Gaspar Netscher, and acquired the elements of art from his father, who died when Constantine was fourteen years of age. It does not appear that he took lessons of any other master, but by assiduously studying the designs and pictures left by his father, he became an able and successful follower of his style, was extensively employed in portraits, and was patronized by the principal personages of his time. His talents were admirably adapted for success in portrait painting, combining accuracy of resemblance with the most flattering and favorable representations of his model, particularly in his female portraits, which are gracefully designed and beautifully colored. He also painted domestic subjects and conversations, but in these he was greatly inferior to Gaspar N. In 1699, he was chosen a member of the Society of Painters at the Hague; and was subsequently honored with the office of Director. One of his best performances is a family picture of the Baron Suesso, consisting of seven or eight figures, into which was introduced a dog, painted by vander Does. Among his other patrons, were the families of Wassenaer and Duivenvoorden, whose portraits he painted, together with those of the Earl and Countess of Portland. Descamps says that the Earl endeavored to induce Netscher to visit England, but he declined, on account of the infirm state of his health. He died in 1722.

NEUFFORGE, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE. This artist was the descendant of a noble family, born at Camblain, near Liege, in 1714. He early manifested a decided taste for architecture, and visited Paris to acquire a knowledge of the art, after which he commenced, in 1755, his great work entitled, Recueil elementaire d'architecture, contenant plusieurs etudes des ordres d'architecture, 8 vols. folio, illustrated with plates. It was completed in 1776, and gained for its author considerable praise. In 1770, Neufforge was chosen a member of the French Academy of Architecture. He died in 1811.

NEURAUTTER, A., a German engraver, who flourished at Prague, and executed, among other plates, a set of figures entitled Statue Pontis Pragensis, entirely with the graver, in a stiff, labored style; published at Prague in 1715.

NEVE, FRANCIS DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, according to Balkema, in 1625. He studied for some time the works of Rubens and Vandyck, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement, where he resided several years. On returning to Flanders, he painted a number of good historical works, which gained him considerable reputation; but he afterwards painted heroic landscapes, with subjects from history or the fable, in which he evinces great fertility of invention, and refinement of taste. Bartsch mentions fourteen etchings by this artist, executed in a slight, but very masterly style, embellished with figures correctly drawn and ingeniously grouped. Several of them are marked Fran. de Neve. He died in 1681.

NEVEU, or NAIVEU, MATTHEW, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1647. He first studied under Abraham Toren Vliet, but afterwards under Gerard Douw. He gained considerable distinction for his pictures of domestic subjects and conversations, in the style of his instructor, which, though inferior to the works of Douw, are correctly drawn and well colored. They are principally confined to Holland, where they are highly esteemed. Among others, there is one at Amsterdam, representing the Seven Works of Mercy, highly commended by Houbraken for its ingenious composition, and fine expression and character in the heads. Neveu died in 1721.

NEWTON, JAMES, an English engraver, who resided at London about 1778, and executed, among others, the following plates:

PORTRAITS.

Sidney Parkinson, Draftsman on board of the Endeavor, Capt. Cook. William Newton, Clerk of the Works at Greenwich Hospital. Edward Sargeant, Secretary to the Protestant Association in 1780.

LANDSCAPES.

Two Views in Italy; after Marco Ricci. A Landscape, with Cattle passing a River; after Claude. The Herdsman, a pastoral Landscape; after Zuccarelli.

NEWTON, FRANCIS MILNER, an English painter, born at London about 1720. He studied under M. Tuscher, and devoted himself to painting portraits, in which he gained considerable encouragement. In 1768, at the foundation of the Royal Academy, Newton was appointed Secretary, and discharged the duties of that office for a period of twenty years, until 1788, when he resigned. He died in 1794.

NEWTON, GILBERT STUART, a distinguished historical painter, was born in 1794, at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, where his father was collector of the customs. He studied at Boston, under his maternal uncle, Gilbert Stuart. About 1820, he visited England, and then proceeded to Italy, where he spent some time, afterwards returning to England, where he studied in the Royal Academy. He adopted the manner of Watteau in some degree, and produced several excellent pictures of a small size, in a style resembling the works of that master, but displaying great expression and character. He soon after painted two pictures of the Forsaken, and the Lover's Quarrel, which attracted considerable attention, and the latter was engraved in the Literary Souvenir of 1826. The Duke of Bedford commissioned him to paint the Visit of the Prince of Spain to Catalina, for which Newton received $2,500. His talents were greatly admired, and in 1833 he was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. He painted slowly, and finished his pictures with great care. Besides the works already mentioned, Newton painted a small picture of Abelard in his study, full of expression and sentiment; Macheath, purchased by the Marquis of Lansdowne for $2,500; Shylock and Jessica; Portia and Bassanio; King Lear, attended by Cordelia and the Physician; and the Vicar of Wakefield restoring his Daughter to her Mother. In 1832, Newton visited America and married; after which he returned to England. In the next year he exhibited symptoms of insanity, and died in 1835. His talents were undoubted, and had his life been spared, he would have attained a high degree of eminence in the art.

NEWTON, WILLIAM, an English architect, who flourished at London in the latter part of the 18th century. He published a translation of Vitruvius, London, 2 vols. 8vo., 1771—1791; also a second edition in 1793, folio, illustrated. In 1790, Newton published the second volume of James Stuart's Athenian Antiquities, with notes and explanations.

NEYN, PETER DE, a Dutch painter and architect, born at Leyden in 1597. He studied painting under Esaias Vandervelde, and gave promise of attaining eminence in landscape, in the style of his instructor; but subsequently applied his talents to architecture. He attained considerable distinction in that art, and was appointed architect to the city of Leyden. He died in 1639.

NEYTS, GILES, a painter and engraver of little note, who flourished about 1681, as appears from the date on one of the pictures by him, preserved in the gallery at Dresden. Bartsch mentions ten plates by Neyts, and Nagler eleven more, etched and finished with the graver in a good style. A number of small pen drawings of landscapes, washed with India ink, with the trees in the style of Swanevelt, are ascribed to this artist, being marked A. E. Neyts, perhaps for Ægidius instead of Giles. Brulliot supposes that pictures of landscapes, with the accompanying monogram, are by this artist.

NICASIUS, BERNARD, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1618. He studied under F. Snyders, and imitated the style of that master in fruit, still-life, huntings, and landscapes. He traveled through France and Italy for improvement, and finally died at Paris in 1678. Like other imitators, his reputation was transient, and nearly all his works are now ascribed to Snyders.

NICCOLA, DA PISA, an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, the precise dates of whose birth and death have not been ascertained. It is probable, however, that he was born near the commencement of the 13th century, as he was greatly advanced in years in 1273. He is distinguished among the earliest restorers of sculpture, which he elevated to a much higher state of perfection than he found it. He quitted the hard, dry, and mechanical style of his predecessors, and introduced a style which, though falling far short of the antique, was based upon similar principles, and evinced a vigorous mind and much feeling, if not always the most refined taste. In 1225 he was employed to execute the arca or tomb of St. Domenico at Bologna, which he embellished with a series of bas-reliefs and figures, truly admirable for the time. Several of these subjects are given by Cicognara, in his Storia della Scultura, and many of the heads and countenances are finely expressed. Among his other works in sculpture, are the pulpit in the Baptistery at Pisa, executed in 1260; and the pulpit in the Cathedral at Siena. These are highly praised by Cicognara, and are sufficient of themselves to prove the great excellence of Niccola in this department of art.

As an architect, Niccola seems to have acquired no less distinction. In 1231 he erected the celebrated church of S. Antonio at Padua. He was subsequently commissioned to build the church Dei Frari at Venice; and his reputation extended so widely that he was successively employed at Florence, Pistoia, Volterra, Naples, and Pisa.—Among his most important works at Florence, is the church and monastery of Santa Trinita, highly extolled by Michael Angelo as an edifice of surpassing excellence for its simple grandeur, and the nobleness of its proportions. In 1240 he commenced the cathedral of Pistoia; and likewise improved and embellished that of Volterra. Among his other works in architecture were the convent of S. Domenico at Arezzo; the church of S. Lorenzo at Naples; the campanile of S. Niccola at Pisa; and the magnificent abbey on the plain of Tagliacozzo, erected by Charles I. of Anjou, in 1268, in commemoration of his decisive victory over Corradino, and thence called Santa Maria della Vittoria.

NICCOLO, DEL ABATI. See ABATI.

NICCOLO, MAESTRO, an old painter of Friuli, some of whose works are still preserved at Gemona, among which are the façade of the Cathedral, and an altar-piece, signed Magister Nicolaus pictor me fecit. MCCCXXXII. To this artist is ascribed, by some writers, that vast and meritorious production, representing the solemn scene of the Consecration, which decorates the Cathedral of Venzone, and which is still in a fine state of preservation. This, however, is a matter of mere conjecture, founded on the resemblance of manner, vicinity of the place, and time of execution.

NICHOLS, SUTTON, an obscure English engraver, who resided at London about 1710. He executed a number of plates of shells and other trifling subjects for the booksellers, which possess little merit.

NICIAS, an eminent Greek painter, a native of Athens, flourished in the latter half of the 4th century B. C. He lived in the time of Alexander, and though probably younger than Apelles, he was a cotemporary of that master. He excelled in elegance of design, beauty of coloring, and in effect of light and shade. He was famous above all the artists of his time, for the beauty and grace of his female forms, which were executed with such admirable relief that Pliny says "they appeared ready to leave the ground they were painted upon, and walk out of the frames."

The most celebrated work of Nicias was the Region of the Shades, described in Homer's Odyssey, where Ulysses invokes the departed spirits.

Plutarch says that Ptolemy I. of Egypt offered the artist sixty talents (about $75,000) for this picture, but was refused by Nicias, who presented it to his native city, Athens. Pausanias says that on the way from Pharæ to Tritæa, there was a sepulchre of white marble, decorated with the paintings of Nicias. He also painted in encaustic; and, according to that author, he was the most excellent animal painter of his time. Among the other works of this artist was a picture in the Cura Julia, of Nemea sitting on a Lion; Alexander; Io; Andromeda; a sitting Calypso; another Calypso, in the Hall of Pompey; Bacchus; Diana; and an elegant Hyacinthus, in the Hall of Concord. The latter work was brought from Alexandria to Rome by Augustus, and was subsequently consecrated by Tiberius in the temple of Augustus. Nicias appears to have been a very studious and absent man; Ælian says he used to forget to take his meals. At his death, he was honored with a public burial, and was interred in the road from Athens to the Academy, the cemetery of all great Athenians, where his tomb was erected.

NICOLAI, G. D. C., a German engraver, who lived at Vienna about 1760, and, in concert with A. J. Prenner, executed part of the plates from the pictures in the Imperial Gallery, published in four sets in folio.

NICOLAY, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1539. He designed correctly, and gave great animation to his figures. He died in 1597, leaving two sons, whom he had instructed in the art; Nicholas Isaac Nicolay, born at Leyden in 1566, painted history in the style of his father, and died at Amsterdam in 1640; and James Isaac Nicolay, born at Leyden in 1569, painted in the style of his father, gained improvement by visiting Italy, and died at Utrecht in 1639.

NICOLAY, JAN HENDRICK, a Dutch painter, born at Leeuwarde in 1766. His forte was in painting dead birds, which he represented in a very skillful manner. His works were frequently exhibited at Amsterdam, and they are highly esteemed in Holland. He died in 1826.

NICOLE, NICOLAS, a French architect, born at Besançon in 1701. Being of a poor family, he was first apprenticed to a blacksmith, but on visiting Paris, he determined to relinquish his occupation; and accordingly he entered the free school of Blondel. After studying some time under that master, he returned to Besançon, and was commissioned to erect the church du Refuge, of which the beautiful façade has been often engraved. He afterwards executed the plan for the collegiate church of S. Anne of Soleure, and was invited by the authorities of that city, to superintend the execution of the works. The church of the Magdalen, at Besançon, is also the work of Nicole, but has never been completed. These two latter works have been justly criticised as to the details. He had a very lively imagination, and drew his designs with great facility; but his edifices have none of that ever attractive simplicity, which preëminently distinguishes the antique.—Nicole was honored with the confidence of several successive intendants of the province of Franche Comte, and was consulted concerning all architectural projects. He died at Besançon in 1784.

WR NICOLE, D. This name is affixed to a set of views slightly etched, in the style of a painter, and also marked with the accompanying monogram, which probably represents the initials of the designer.

NICOLET, BERNARD ANTHONY, a Swiss engraver, born at St. Imer, in the bishopric of Basle, in 1740. He visited Paris while young, and engraved several plates after the marines of Vernet, in concert with Longueil; also a number of plates for the Abbé de St. Non's Voyage Pittoresque du Royaume de Naples. There is some confusion among writers about this artist, as his name is sometimes written Benedict Alphonsius A., and the dates of his birth are differently stated: but the above is the account of Nagler, who places his death in 1807. The following are among his best works:

PORTRAITS.

Noel Hallé, Painter to the King. 1775; after Cochin. Thomas le Sueur, Professor of Mathematics at Rome; do. Francis de Paul Jacquier, Professor of Mathematics; do. Nicholas de Monthonon; do.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

St. Apollonia; after the picture by Guido; in the Orleans collection. Milo Crotoniate; after Giorgione; do. Susanna and the Elders; after Deshayes. A View of Naples; after Vernet. A Shipwreck; do. A View of the Interior of the Church of St. Januarius at Naples; after Dupres.

NICOLETTO. See NICCOLO CASSANA.

NICOMACHUS, an eminent Greek painter, a native of Thebes, flourished in the latter part of the fourth century B. C. Plutarch compares his paintings with the lines of Homer; Cicero says that, in the works of Nicomachus, Echion, Protagenes, and Apelles, all things are perfect. He was the most celebrated of all the Greeks for facility of execution. In illustration of this quality, Pliny relates that he executed, in a few days, the decorations of the monument to the poet Telestes, with remarkable beauty, and to the entire satisfaction of Aristratus, tyrant of Sicyon, who shortly before was exceedingly angry with the artist, because he thought the works would not be finished within the specified time. Nicomachus was the first artist who represented Ulysses with the cap of Liberty. Stobæus relates of Nicomachus that, hearing some one say he saw no beauty in the Helen of Zeuxis, he observed, "Take my eyes, and you will see a goddess."

Among the principal works of Nicomachus, Pliny mentions a picture of Scylla, in the Temple of Peace; Bacchantes, with Satyrs creeping up to them; Cybele sitting on a Lion; Apollo and Diana; a Victory in a Chariot, consecrated in the Capitol by Planus; a Rape of Proserpine, in the Temple of Minerva on the Capitol; and an unfinished picture of the Tyndaridæ, which was in greater repute than his finished works.

NICOPHANES, a Greek painter, who flourished about B. C. 300. He studied under Nicomachus, and although little is recorded of his works, Pliny ranks him among the most eminent artists of his time. He possessed a lively genius, great facility of invention, and rapidity of execution. From his practice of frequently choosing courtesans for his models, he was called "the Painter of Courtesans."

NIEULANT, ADRIAN, a Flemish painter, a native of Antwerp, flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He painted landscapes of considerable merit, and decorated them with small figures. Among other works, he executed a winter-piece, with masked figures skating on the moat of the citadel of Antwerp, which is now in the Museum at Brussels. He died about 1601.

NIEULANT, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1569. He studied under Peter Fransz and Francis Badens, and painted landscapes and historical subjects of small size, very highly finished. He died at Amsterdam in 1628.

NIEULANT, WILLIAM VAN, a Flemish painter of landscapes with architecture, born at Antwerp in 1584; died in 1635. He acquired the elements of design from Roland Savery, and afterwards went to Rome, where he studied for three years under Paul Bril, and followed the style of that master. On returning to the Low Countries, he settled at Amsterdam, and adopted a more bold and expeditious manner of operating. He was much employed in painting views of the ruins of ancient architecture in the vicinity of Rome, from the designs he had collected in Italy. His coloring is bold and effective; his buildings are drawn with neatness and precision; and his figures are designed with tolerable correctness. There are a number of plates of architectural landscapes etched by Nieulant in a free and spirited style, occasionally assisted with the graver. Among them are the following :

A Landscape, with ruins, and figures representing the Merciful Samaritan; P. Bril, inv. G. Nieulant, fecit. A Mountainous Landscape, with Tobit and the Angel; do. Two Views of the Sea Coast; do. Three Views of Ruins in and near Rome; Guil. Nieulant. A large print, representing three Bridges on the Tiber, and part of the City of Rome; in three sheets, inscribed Guilielmus van Nieulant, fecit et excud. Antwerpia. 1600.

NIGETTI, MATTEO, a Florentine architect, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. He studied under Buontalenti, and materially assisted that master in the erection of the Strozzi palace at Florence. According to Milizia, he erected a number of works in that city, among which were the cloister of the monks degli Angeli, completed by Silvani; and he made the design and model for the church of Ogni Santi, belonging to the brothers Osservanza. Nigetti also erected a beautiful edifice after the design of Vasari, near S. Lorenzo, intended as a sepulchre for the Grand Dukes. This architect was also an engraver on precious stones. Among his works in this branch of the art, was the wonderful shrine in the chapel of S. Lorenzo at Florence. He died in 1649.

NIKKELEN, J. VAN, a Dutch painter of interiors, who flourished about 1660. He was a good artist in perspective, and painted interiors of churches in the style of van Vliet, which possess considerable merit. They are signed J. van Nikkelen.

NIKKELEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, the son of the preceding, was born at Haerlem in 1649. He studied the elements of design under his father, but did not pursue the same branch of the art. He applied himself to landscape painting, and acquired considerable distinction, being invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, for whom he painted several pictures, and was afterwards made painter to the Prince of Cassel. His works are said to resemble those of Karel Dujardin. He died in 1716. His daughter, Jacoba Maria, was a pupil of vander Myn, and excelled in fruit and flowers. She painted several pictures at Dusseldorf, which are erroneously ascribed to her father. She married William Troost, a portrait painter.

NILSON, JOHN ELIAS, a German miniature painter and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1721. He engraved in a stiff, formal style, several portraits of eminent personages, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Clement XIII. Pontif. Max.; Nilson, inv. et fec. Petrus III., Russorum Imperator. Catherina Alexiowna, Russorum Imperatrix. Stanislaus Augustus, Rex. Pol.

NNIMECIUS, BALTHASAR MENEIUS, an obscure German wood engraver, is said to have been a native of Saxony. There are a number of wooden cuts, sometimes marked with the initials B. M. N., and sometimes with the accompanying monogram, which Prof. Christ attributes to Nimecius.

NIMEGUEN, ELIAS VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Nimeguen in 1667. He studied the elements of design under his elder brother, an inferior painter of portraits and flowers; but as his instructor died when Elias was only fourteen, he decided to dispense with farther assistance, and devote himself chiefly to the study of nature. By great assiduity he became a good designer of the figure, acquired a competent knowledge of architecture and perspective, and attained excellence in landscape and flowers. In concert with his younger brother Tobias, he executed an extensive series of decorations in the palace of Baron van Wachten-donk, which gained for the artists such high reputation, that they were employed by the Princess of Orange for several years, in painting emblematical and historical subjects on the walls and ceilings of her palaces, embellished with bas-reliefs and other accessories. The two brothers subsequently separated, Tobias going to the court of the Elector Palatine, and Elias to Rotterdam, where he was fully employed. His style was happily adapted to his subjects, being characterized by fertility of invention, great promptness and facility of execution, clear and agreeable coloring. Some writers place his death in 1745, aged 78; others in 1755, aged 87.

NIMEGUEN, TOBIAS VAN, THE YOUNGER, the brother of the preceding, born at Nimeguen in 1670. Like his brother Elias, he studied under his elder brother, and wrought in concert with Elias, as detailed in the preceding article, until invited to the court of the Elector Palatine. He was retained in the service of that Prince during the rest of his life.

NIMEGUEN, DIONYSIUS VAN, a Dutch painter, the son of Elias N., was born at Rotterdam in 1705; died in 1798. He studied under his father, and painted similar subjects to those of that master. He also excelled in portraiture, and is said to have painted at the age of 81, without spectacles, a perfect likeness of a young lady.

NIMEGUEN, GERARD VAN, a Dutch portrait and landscape painter, the son and scholar of Dionysius N., was born at Rotterdam in 1735. He manifested considerable ability in portraits, and was much employed, even by Prince William V., whom he painted at a very early age. He formed his style in landscape from the works of Everdingen, Ruysdael, and Pynacker. His pictures of mountains, landscapes, and forest scenery with rivulets, decorated with figures and animals, are highly esteemed, and are placed in the best collections. Nimeguen made many drawings and copies after Haackert, Hobbema, Wynants, and Ruysdael. Brulliot mentions twelve etchings of landscapes by him. He died at Rotterdam in 1808.

NINFE, CESARE DALLE, a Venetian painter, mentioned by Zanetti among the imitators of Tintoretto. He flourished about 1595. He possessed the fertility of invention, and facility of execution, which characterized his great model; and though inferior to him in design, he was an excellent colorist. His works, probably, are mostly attributed to Tintoretto.

NINO, DON JUAN. See GUEVARA.

NIQUET, THE ELDER, a French engraver, who flourished in the present century, and was living in 1831. He was employed by Filhol on the Galerie du Musée Napoleon. Among his principal plates, are the Triumph of Flora, after N. Poussin; Diana hunting; the Laocöon; Cupid and Psyche; the Death of St. Bruno; and Raffaele's Transfiguration.

NIXON, an English engraver, who flourished about 1750, and executed, among other plates, a number of portraits, in a very neat style, the faces entirely finished with dots. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick, Prince of Wales. William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland; two plates. Archbishop Tillotson. John, Earl of Granville.

NOBILI DURANTE DE', a painter born at Caldarola, who formed his style on that of Michael Angelo. Lanzi commends a Madonna by him, in the church of S. Pietro di Castello, at Ascoli, inscribed with his name, and dated 1571.

NOBLESSE, a French designer and engraver, mentioned by Basan as residing at Paris, where he died at an advanced age, in 1730. He excelled in pen-drawings, and appears to have formed his taste from studying the works of Callot. There are a few etchings by him, in the neat and spirited style of that master.

NOBLET, an engraver mentioned by Strutt, who says he executed a number of vignettes, and other book ornaments.

NOBLIN, H., an obscure engraver, who flourished about 1680. Among other plates, he executed the portrait of Cardinal Howard.

NOCHER, J. E., a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1760. He studied under Stephen Fessard, and engraved several book ornaments and portraits, among which is that of Jean Jacques Rousseau.

NOCRET, JEAN, a French painter and engraver, born at Nancy in 1618. He studied under Leclere, and afterwards visited Italy for improvement. On returning to France, he was much employed at the Tuileries and St. Cloud, and painted the portraits of several members of the royal family, which have been engraved. He is also said to have painted historical subjects. Felibien praises his abilities, and Dumesnil mentions a print by him, characterized by simple and graceful attitudes, draperies finely cast, and excellent gradation of the tints. Nocret was appointed rector of the French Academy. He died at Paris, according to Nagler, in 1672, though another authority says in 1676. His son and scholar, Charles Nocret, was born at Nancy in 1647; painted portraits with reputation; and died in 1719.

NOEL, a French marine painter, who flourished in the present century. He studied under Silvestre and Joseph Vernet, and painted several marine pieces, of views on the coasts of Spain and Portugal, with falls of snow, gales of wind, fogs, tempests, and conflagrations. He also executed views of Lisbon and Gibraltar, and exhibited many pictures up to the year 1822. He was living in 1831.

NOFERI, MICHELE, a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1660. According to Baldinucci, he studied under Vincenzo Dandini, and was a reputable artist.

NOGARI, GIUSEPPE, a reputable Venetian painter, born in 1699. He studied under Antonio Balestra, and attained such excellence in portraits and half-length figures, that, according to Lanzi, he was much patronized by the court of Turin for many years. His portraits are characterized by truth to nature, vigor of expression, and richness of coloring. He also painted history with considerable reputation, among which Lanzi commends his S. Pietro, in the cathedral at Bassano, combining the styles of Balestra and Piazzetta.

NOGARI, PARIS, a Roman painter, born in 1512. He imitated the style of Raffaellino da Reggio, and painted a number of frescos in the Vatican Gallery, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He also executed several oil paintings. Among his principal works is a picture of Christ bearing his Cross, in the church della Madonna de' Monti; the Deposition from the Cross, in the Trinità de' Monti; and the Circumcision, in S. Spirito in Sassia. He died at Rome, in 1577, aged 65.

NOIR, NICOLAS LE, a French architect, born at Paris in 1726. He studied under Blondel, and having gained the grand prize of the Academy, visited Rome, where he devoted himself with great assiduity to the study of the admirable remains of antiquity. On returning to Paris, he soon gained reputation, and was commissioned by Voltaire to erect an edifice at Ferney. His principal work is the theatre of the Porte St. Martin. He was much employed, and died in 1810.

NOLIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1657. He studied under Poilly, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement, where he engraved several plates after the great masters, among which was the Miracle of the Loaves after Raffaele. He also executed several plates in the work entitled Vues, Plans, Coupes et Elevations du Chateau de Versailles.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH FRANCIS, This painter was born at Antwerp in 1706, and was the father of Joseph Nollekens, the sculptor. He visited England while young, and studied painting under Peter Tillemans. He painted landscapes, and musical and fashionable conversations; and was much employed in copying the works of Watteau.

and the architectural views of Gio. Paolo Pannini. He was patronized by the Earl of Tilney, and executed several ornamental works for Lord Cobham. He died at London in 1748.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH. This eminent sculptor was the son of the preceding, born in London in 1737. He acquired the elements of the art under Scheemakers, and subsequently visited Italy for improvement, where he studied under Ciavetti, and remained nine years. He executed the busts of many distinguished Englishmen, among whom were Garrick and Sterne; and he also turned his attention to a lucrative, though rather undignified branch of the art—that of manufacturing antiques, by vamping up fragments; finding either heads and limbs for bodies, or bodies for heads and limbs. One of the statues thus compounded was the Minerva, afterwards purchased for a thousand guineas, and now in the Newby collection at Yorkshire. His skill in repairs of this kind was subsequently displayed in the Townley marbles. While at Rome, he also purchased for a mere trifle, from the workmen by whom they were discovered, a number of fine terra cottas, which he afterwards disposed of to Mr. Townley, and which are now let into the walls of the British Museum. He also obtained the patronage of Lord Yarborough, and the Earl of Besborough, for the former of whom he executed a group of Mercury and Venus chiding Cupid. During his residence at Rome, he gained a gold medal from the Academy of St. Luke.

Nollekens returned to England in 1770, and soon after married Mary, the youngest daughter of Justice Welch, with a handsome fortune. He soon took the lead in his profession, and attained a high reputation. Without the advantages of education it is rather surprising that he accomplished what he did in the superior branches of the art, than that his poetical subjects display so little of the higher powers of the imagination. His chief excellence was in executing busts, and he gained an extensive patronage in this branch of the art. Among his pieces in poetic sculpture were no fewer than five Venuses, one of them since known as the Rockingham Venus; and one representing the goddess anointing her hair. The latter was considered by the artist his master-piece. Among his groups were a Pætus and Arria, and a Cupid and Psyche. His best monumental sculpture was executed for the tomb of Mrs. Howard of Corby Castle. It is pathetic in composition, and elegant and tasteful in execution. In 1772, Nollekens was chosen a royal academician. He was a great favorite with George III. Eccentric in many points of his character, he was also distinguished for great penuriousness during his whole life, until the age of eighty, and the death of his wife, in 1817, when he began to relax a little of that economy which had always prevailed in his establishment. His whole history abundantly proves that he had a most contemptible idea of the art, regarding it merely as a means of acquiring wealth. During the few remaining years of his life, he was beset by a swarm of greedy legacy-hunters, all professing sympathy and attachment. He died in 1823, leaving a fortune of about $1,000,000, excepting a few small legacies, to his friends Francis Palmer, and Francis Douce, the antiquary.

NOLLET, DOMINICK. a distinguished Flemish painter, born at Bruges in 1640. He studied under Jacob van Oost the elder, and painted history with reputation; but was more distinguished for landscapes in a grand style, and for sieges and battle pieces, with figures and horses correctly drawn, and touched with great freedom and spirit. On a close inspection, his pictures appear crude; but when viewed at a proper distance, they have a fine effect. His style greatly resembles that of vander Meulen, and his talents nearly equaled those of that master. Nollet was patronized by Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria, the governor of the Low Countries, who appointed him his principal painter. He was chosen a member of the Society of Painters at Bruges, in 1687. There are a number of his works in the Flemish collections; and in the church of the Carmelites, at Bruges, is his picture of St. Louis embarking for the Holy Land. He died in 1736.

NOLLI, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1755, and executed, among other plates, several plans and views of buildings.

NOLLI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, the son of Gio. Battista N., flourished at Naples about 1760, and was employed upon the plates engraved by command of the king, representing the Antiquities of Herculaneum. He is said to have etched several plates in imitation of the drawings of Parmigiano.

NOLPE, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at the Hague in 1601. Little is known concerning his pictures, but he engraved a number of plates, etched with the point and finished with the graver, in a style of considerable ability; although his drawing is often incorrect, and his chiaro-scuro is ill managed. His best works are his landscapes, engraved in a free, bold, and masterly style. Nagler is of the opinion that he flourished until 1670. The following are his principal plates:

N. f. or N fe or N fe

The Portrait of John Adler Salvius, Swedish Minister Plenipotentiary. A set of eight Cavaliers; etched, scarce. A set of eighteen etchings of Beggars; in the style of P. Quast. St. Peter delivered from Prison; after J. V. Vucht. Judah and Tamar, in a large landscape; from his own design. The same figures were afterwards introduced into another landscape, of a smaller size. The Broken Dyke; from his own design. The fine impressions of this print are very scarce; it is one of his most esteemed plates.—Daniel in the Den of Lions; after Blancert. The Departure of King William from Holland to England in 1660. An Emblematical Print on the Marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Princess Mary of England. A set of six Landscapes; after Adrian van Niculant; fine. A set of six Landscapes; after R. Rogman; fine. Eight Months of the Year; Peter Nolpe, fec. et exc.; fine.—The Prophet Elias speaking to the Widow of Sarepta. St. Paul, the Hermit, fed by an Eagle in the Desert; after Peter Potter. The Cavalcade made in 1638 by the citizens of Amsterdam, on the entry of Mary of Medicis into that city; after C. Moly; a large print in six sheets.

NON, RICHARD ABBÉ DE ST., a distinguished French author and amateur engraver, born at Paris in 1730; died in 1792. He edited and published a large pictorial work, entitled Voyage Pittoresque des Royaumes de Naples et de Sicile. Paris, 5 vols. folio; embellished with engravings by the most eminent French artists of the day. He also etched a variety of subjects, from his own designs and those of other masters; and engraved several plates in a style resembling washed drawings. Among them are the following:

ETCHINGS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A set of six Landscapes, with rural occupations and amusements; oval. A set of seven Landscapes and Cottages. Six Views in Italy, with figures; in the style of Sal. Rosa.

ETCHINGS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Six Views in and near Rome; after Robert. Six Views near Rome and Tivoli; after Fragonard. Two Landscapes, with figures; after Boucher. Two, a Village Festival, and a Cattle Market; after Bernard. A Landscape, with a figure drawing; after Berghem. A variety of Views and other subjects, in aquatinta; after Boucher, Le Prince, Robert, Fragonard, and other artists.

NONNOTTE, DONAT, a French painter, born at Besançon in 1707. He early manifested an inclination for art, and acquired the elements of design under a relative, an artist of little note, whom he soon surpassed. In 1728 he visited Paris, and entered the school of Lemoine. With increased advantages he made rapid progress, and was soon honored with the particular notice and encouragement of his instructor, who employed him to paint the backgrounds and accessories in several of his works. Nonnotte painted an historical subject, representing the Protestants attacking Besançon, which deserves considerable praise for its design and coloring. The Duke d'Antin had promised to use his influence to obtain a pension to enable him to visit Rome, but that nobleman died; and Lemoine also died soon after; so that Nonnotte was obliged to devote his energies to portrait painting. In 1741, he exhibited a portrait of such excellence as to gain him admission to the Academy. In 1754 he was appointed painter to the city of Lyons, where he established a free school of design, and sustained it for some time from his own resources, for which he deserves the grateful remembrance of every lover of art. He was subsequently assisted by the liberality of Mathon de la Cour. Nonnotte died in 1785. He left several treatises on art, which are preserved by the Academy of Painting at Lyons.

NOP. GERRIT, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1570; died in 1622. He studied the elements of design in his own country, and afterwards visited Germany and Italy for improvement.

NOOMS, REMY or RENIER, called ZEEMAN, a Dutch painter and engraver of marine subjects, born at Amsterdam in 1612. Being the child of poor parents, he was obliged to gain a livelihood as a common sailor; but having a great inclination for art, he quitted maritime pursuits, and acquired a knowledge of design. From his original occupation, he acquired the surname of Zeeman (sailor), by which he is often known. He excelled in painting sea views and shipping, which he designed with great correctness and precision; his figures are well drawn, and touched in a very free and spirited style. He attained so high a reputation as to be invited to Prussia; and during his residence in that kingdom he executed many works for the public edifices of Berlin, and for the royal palaces. Nooms etched a number of prints in a bold and free style, among which are the following:

A set of eight plates of Shipping; designed and engraved by Remy Nooms. 1632. A set of four Views in Amsterdam. 1636. A set of four Sea Ports in Holland; published at Amsterdam in 1656; The Four Elements, Reinier Zee- man, fec. Two Views in Paris, one of the Faubourg St. Marceau, the other of the Gate of St. Bernard. A set of twelve Views of Shipping; published at London by Ar. Tooker.

NOORDT, J. VAN, a painter and engraver, who lived about the middle of the 17th century. He painted portraits, nymphs bathing, and emblematical subjects; of which some have been engraved. Strutt mentions him as an engraver of great merit, and notices a spirited etching by him, of a landscape with ruins, executed in a broad, masterly manner, with figures well designed. This plate is supposed the same as a landscape after P. Lastman, 1645, mentioned by Bartsch, who also notices another, after P. de Laer. Both are very scarce. There is a portrait of Cornelius Noordt, engraved by himself, who was probably a relative of J. van Noordt.

NORDEN, JOHN, an English engraver of topographical subjects, probably born in Wiltshire, about 1546. His principal work was his Speculum Britanniae, or An Historical and Chorographical Description of Middlesex and Hertfordshire, with a frontispiece and maps. He resided at Hendon, in Middlesex; was patronized by Lord Burleigh, and his son Robert, Earl of Salisbury; was Surveyor of the King's Lands in 1614.

NORISINI. See PARASOLE.

NORTHCOTE, JAMES, an eminent English historical painter, born at Devonport in 1746. He was the son of a watch-maker, who would not allow him to indulge in his desire to study painting, but brought him up to his own business. On attaining his majority, he followed the inclination of his genius, and after producing some pictures that were commended by his townsmen, he went to London and entered the school of Sir Joshua Reynolds, in which he continued five years; and by his assiduity, talents, and urbane deportment, he gained the esteem and friendship of his master. In 1777, he went to Italy, where he gained so much distinction that he was elected a member of the Imperial Academy of Florence, of the Ancient Etruscan Academy of Cortona, and of the Academy del Forti at Rome. He also painted a portrait of himself, at the request of the Grand Duke of Florence, to be placed among those of distinguished artists in the Florentine Gallery. In 1780, he returned to England, visiting the various academies and collections of note in Holland and Flanders. He settled in London, and soon gained distinction in his profession. Though he mostly confined himself to portraiture from necessity (as there was little encouragement at that time for any higher branch of the art in England), he executed a considerable number of historical works which materially added to his reputation. When Boydell projected the Shakspeare Gallery, Northcote entered into the project with enthusiasm. "It was this memorable occasion," says Gould, himself a painter, "that enabled Northcote to develop his powers. The public excitement at the opening of the Shakspeare Gallery exceeded the expectations of even the most sanguine. All the fashionable world, and crowds of every class, flocked to Pall-Mall to behold the interesting sight, and subscriptions poured in from all quarters in support of the glorious enterprise. Among the most splendid efforts of British art which were thus collected together, none were more justly attractive than the compositions of Northcote." The most celebrated of these were Prince Arthur and Hubert; the Murder of the Princes in the Tower; the Burial of the Princes; and the Entry of Bolingbroke and Richard II. into London. These pictures procured him being elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1787. Among his other principal works are the Death of Wat Tyler; the Death of the Earl of Argyle; the Landing of the Prince of Orange; Romulus and Remus; Prospero and Miranda; Jacob blessing the sons of Joseph; the Angels appearing to the Shepherds; Christ the Good Shepherd; the Disobedient Prophet slain by the Lion; Joseph and his Brethren. He also painted some fancy pieces, among which are a Bacchante; the Cradle Hymn; the Mother's Prayer; the Girl Reading; Girl going to the Show of Animals; Girl going to the Market; a Lady crossing the Alps; the Vulture and the Snake; the Leopards; Tiger Hunting; Buck Hunting; the Two Monkeys; &c. He excelled in painting animals, particularly the horse. He also painted a series of pictures intended to convey a great moral lesson, as follows: 1. The Modest Girl and the Wanton, fellow servants in a gentleman's house; 2. the Wanton reveling with her Companions; 3. Good advice given to both by an old Servant; 4. The Wanton in her bed-chamber; 5. The Modest Girl in her bed-chamber; 6. The Wanton turned out of doors for misconduct; 7. The Modest Girl rejecting the illicit advances of her Master; 8. The Wanton dying in poverty and disease, visited by the Modest Girl; 9. The Modest Girl receiving the addresses of her Master; 10. The Modest Girl, married to her Master, is led to her couch, while the Wanton, having died in misery, is laid in her grave.

As an author, Northcote also distinguished himself. Besides several essays on various subjects connected with the Fine Arts, he wrote a Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, published in 1813, in quarto; with a Supplement in 1815, and an enlarged octavo edition in 1819. In 1828, he published an octavo vol. of "One Hundred Fables," original and selected, and illustrated with numerous beautiful wood cuts, from his own designs. In 1830, appeared his "Life of Titian," and after his decease, a second volume of Fables, published under the title of "The Artists' Book of Fables," and illustrated with numerous wood cuts, from his own designs, executed under the direction of Harvey, by the most eminent engravers in that department. Northcote's life was one of indefatigable industry and perseverance. He was rather haughty in his deportment towards his brother artists, perhaps not without reason, and he was rather feared than beloved by them;—no one trod on his toes without receiving a kick in return. Few artists have encountered more severe, if not bitter and rancorous criticism. They say that he was a good portrait painter, to which branch he should have confined himself, and when he attempted historical painting, he aspired beyond his capacity. They say also that he wanted invention, that his compositions are formal and his heads lack expression. Yet his fables at least show that he had invention enough, and it is notorious, that his Hubert and Arthur, and the Murder of the Princes, drew tears from many beholders, that he often displeased his sitters, by giving them too exact a likeness. While with Reynolds he painted the portrait of one of the servant girls, whose evil genius was a large macaw, belonging to her master, and upon the picture being brought into the room where the bird was, it flew at it in a rage. It is also admitted that he was a good colorist and a "tolerably correct designer," and he died leaving an ample fortune. It would seem therefore fair to infer, that his critics have overlooked the fact, that with the exception of Boydell, there was little encouragement for the historical painters of his day; that he painted history more for the love of it, in his leisure hours, than for profit; that they measure him by a false standard, and demand from him too much, without duly considering his earlier and later disadvantages. Smith, in his Life of Nollekens, says of Northcote (vol. II, p. 424.) "There is one most honorable circumstance, which this celebrated artist has to boast of, namely, that his pictures, whenever they have been resold at auctions, have always been knocked down for more than four times their original price, and what is more, they have generally been purchased by men of rank and taste." He died in 1831.

NOSADELLA, IL. See GIO. FRANCESCO BEZZI.

NOTHNAGEL, JOHANN ANDREAS, a German painter and engraver, born at Buch, near Saxe Cobourg, in 1729. He resided at Frankfort, where he painted a number of good landscapes, with the sports of the peasantry, in the style of Teniers. As an engraver, however, he gained more distinction; Nagler notices sixty-six prints by him, among which are several heads and busts, in the style of Rembrandt, which he imitated with great success. He died in 1800.

NOTRE, PETER FRANCIS VAN, a Flemish painter and engraver of the present century, born at Waelhem, near Malines, in 1779. He studied sculpture for some time under van Geel, but in 1811 devoted his energies to painting, and attained considerable eminence in landscape and marines, but was particularly distinguished for his winter scenes and views of the interiors of cities. His pictures are characterized by a faithful imitation of nature, and great delicacy of penciling. Three of his works are in the Museum of Brussels, and many more are preserved in the richest collections of his country, where they are highly esteemed. As an engraver, Notre published a collection of landscapes, among which, several after Hobbema are in request. His talents were much esteemed; he was honored with many medals from different societies; was chosen a member of the Academy at Amsterdam; and Professor of Painting in the Academy at Ghent. He died in 1842.

NOTRE, HERMANN AUGUSTUS VAN, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Ghent in 1806; died in 1839. He painted landscapes, winter scenes, marine views, and other subjects.

NOTRE, ANDREA LE. This architect was born at Paris in 1613. He visited Italy for improvement, and devoted his talents to the planning of gardens, in which he attained great eminence. He was appointed superintendent of the gardens of the Tuileries. Among his finest performances, are the terraces of St. Germain en Laie; the woods of the Trianon; the natural porticos of Marly; the espaliers of Chantilly; the walks of Meudon; the gardens of Versailles, unrivalled in their richness and extent. Le Notre evinced his genius in the management of a morass near Versailles, the waters of which he united into a beautiful canal, enclosing the royal gardens. He was appointed Procurator-General of the royal buildings, and chevalier of the order of St. Michael. He died in 1700.

NOTTI, GHERARDO DALLE. See HONTHORST.

NOVA, PECINO and PIETRO DE, two old painters of Bergamo, who were conjointly employed many years, subsequent to 1363, in decorating the church of S. Maria Maggiore in that city.—Lanzi says they very nearly approached Giotto. Pecino died in 1403. There are notices of Pietro up to 1402.

NOVARA, PIETRO DA. "There are some pictures at Domodossola," says Lanzi. "that make us acquainted with an able artist of Nova. They are preserved in Castello Sylva, and in other places, and have the following inscription, Ego Petrus filius Petri Pictoris de Novaria hoc opus pinxi 1370." Doubtless he is the same as Pietro de Nova.

NOVELLANI, SIMONE. This engraver was probably an Italian. In concert with Francis Hogenberg, he etched, in a coarse style, twenty-one plates, representing the funeral ceremonies at the death of Frederick II., King of Denmark, published in 1592. He also etched several plates for Braun's Civitates Orbis Terrarum, published at Cologne in 1572.

NOVELLARA, LELIO DA. See LELIO ORSI.

NOVELLI, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter, born at Castelfranco in 1578. He studied under the younger Palma, in whose manner he executed many excellent works for the churches and public edifices at Castelfranco, and the adjacent places. Lanzi says he was a man of wealth, and painted more for amusement than for gain. He also instructed several pupils. He died in 1652.

NOVELLI, CAV. PIETRO, called IL MONREALESE, from the place of his nativity, an eminent painter and architect, who flourished at Palermo about 1660. He left many works both in oil and fresco in his native city, the most remarkable of which is his great picture of the Marriage at Cana, in the Refectory of the PP. Benedettini, which is particularly commended. He resided a long time at Palermo, where he painted many works for the churches, the most noted of which is the vault of the church of the Conventuals, wholly executed by himself in several compartments. Guarienti eulogizes him for his style, and says he was diligent in studying nature, correct in design, graceful in his forms, and rich in his coloring, with a slight imitation of Spagnoletto. Lanzi says, "the people of Palermo confer daily honor on him, since, whenever they meet a foreigner of taste, they show him nothing else in this city than the works of this great man."

NUCCI, ALLEGRETTO, an old painter of Fabriano, by whom, in the church of S. Antonio in that city, are some histories of that Saint, divided into pictures in the early style, resembling the school of Giotto, inscribed Allegrettus Nutii de Fabriano hoc opus fecit. 1366.

NUCCI, AVANZINO, a painter born at Città di Castello, in 1552. After studying in his native place, he went to Rome, and became the pupil of Niccolò Circignano, and was his ablest scholar. He assisted him in almost all the works he executed in the Vatican. He also painted many works by himself in the churches and palaces at Rome.

He afterwards went to Naples, where he painted for the churches. He wrought with great facility and despatch, in a style resembling his master, though he was inferior to him in grandeur. Lanzi commends his Murder of the Innocents, in the church of S. Silvestro at Fabriano. He died in 1629.

NUNEZ, JUAN, an old Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville about 1505. He was a scholar of Sanchez de Castro, and probably attained great eminence in his day; but most of his works have been destroyed. There is a picture by him in the Cathedral of Seville, in an excellent state of preservation, representing the Body of Christ in the Arms of the Virgin, with St. Michael, St. Vincent, and other figures. This work is in the stiff, Gothic style prevalent at that time; but it deserves praise for its rich and beautiful draperies.

NUNEZ, DON PEDRO VILLAVICENCIO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, of a noble family, in 1635. He studied design as an accomplishment, but made such excellent progress, that he was induced to enter the school of Murillo, although without the intention of practising painting. He was greatly beloved by that master, and studied for some time in his school, after which he visited Malta in discharging his duties as a Knight of St. John, and studied under Mattio Preti, called Il Calabrese. He followed for a short time the vigorous style of that master, but afterwards returned to the tender and harmonious coloring of Murillo. According to Bermudez, he was distinguished in portraits, and painted children in a very beautiful manner, little inferior to Murillo. He presented several of his pictures to the Academy of Seville, where he died in 1700. There is a Holy Family by him at Alton Tower, the seat of Lord Shrewsbury, which partakes of the dark style of Preti.

NUNEZ, PEDRO, a reputable Spanish painter of history and portraits, born at Seville in 1614. He studied under Juan de Soto, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement, where he is said to have studied under Guercino. His design was correct, and his coloring good, with a firm and vigorous execution. According to Palomino, he was one of the artists employed to paint the portraits of the Kings of Spain, in the Saloon of the Theatre at Madrid. There are several pictures by him in the church of the convent de la Merced. He died at Madrid in 1654.

NUNEZ, MATEO. See SEPULVEDA.

NUTTING, JOSEPH, an English engraver of little note, who resided at London about 1700, and engraved a number of portraits for the booksellers, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Charles I., with the persons who suffered in his cause. Mary Capel, Duchess of Beaufort; after Walker. Matthew Mead, father of Dr. Mead. Sir John Cheke. Lucius Cary, Vicount Falkland. Robert Pierpont, Earl of Kingston. George St. Loo, Commissioner for the Navy; scarce. Henry Sacheverel, D. D. John Locke. Aaron Hill. G. Parker, the Almanack-maker. after Melchior Fusslinus. William Elder, Engraver; after Faithorne.

NUVOLONE, PANFILO, a Cremonese painter who flourished, according to Zaist, about 1608.—He studied under Cav. Gio. Battista Trotti, called Il Malosso, and was among the ablest disciples of that master. Lanzi says he afterwards followed a more solid and attractive style. Among his principal works is one in the monastery of Sts. Domenico and Lazzaro, at Milan, representing Dives and Lazarus; and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of La Passione.

NUVOLONE, CARLO FRANCESCO, a distinguished Italian painter, the eldest son of the preceding, was born at Milan in 1608. He studied under his father, but finished his education in the school of Giulio Cesare Procaccini, although he did not adopt the style of either, but became a follower of Guido. According to Lanzi, the forms of his figures are elegant, and the airs of his heads graceful, with a remarkable sweetness and harmony of tints, so that he deserved the name which he still enjoys, of the Guido of Lombardy. His Madonnas are in high request for private collections. Nuvolone also painted many portraits for the nobility, which possess great excellence; and he was selected to paint the Queen of Spain, when she visited Milan in 1649. Lanzi mentions his fine picture of the Miracle of St. Peter, in S. Vittore at Milan; and says he painted many other works in excellent taste, at Milan, Parma, Cremona, Piacenza, and Como. He died, according to Orlandi, in 1651; though Bryan says in 1661.

NUVOLONE, GIUSEPPE, called IL PANFILO, was the younger son of Panfilo N., born at Milan in 1619. Like his brother, Carlo Francesco, he studied first under his father, and afterwards under Giulio Cesare Procaccini. Lanzi says that in his works may everywhere be traced a composition and coloring derived from the school of Procaccini. His compositions are copious, and the oppositions of his lights and shadows are conducted with great intelligence and vigor; but his taste is often inferior to that of his brother, and his shadows are occasionally harsh and sombre. He wrought with great facility, and was indefatigable in the practice of his profession during a long life, painting until his eighty-fourth year. His latter works bear traces of infirmity. There are many of his paintings in the cities of Lombardy; also in Brescia and other Venetian cities, among which Lanzi mentions his fine picture of St. Domenico resuscitating a Dead Man, in the church of that Saint at Cremona, animated by the most natural expression, and adorned with beautiful architecture. He died in 1703.

NUVOLSTELLA, or NIVOLSTELLA, JOHANN GEORG, a German wood engraver, born at Mentz, in 1594; died in 1624. Among other prints, he executed several of the Holy Fathers, after the designs of Tempesta; a set of cuts for Virgil's Aeneid; and other poetical subjects.

NUYEN, WYNAND JAN JOSEPH, a Dutch painter, born in 1813. He studied under A. Schelfhout, and in his sixteenth year exhibited a landscape at Ghent, which attracted much attention. He subsequently gained the first prize of the Society at Amsterdam; and in 1838, exhibited a Winter Scene at Ghent, distinguished for its beautiful coloring, and faithful imitation of nature. This picture gained him admission to the Academy of Fine Arts at the Hague, and he would probably have attained great excellence in the art, had he not died in 1839, at the early age of 26. There is an admirable landscape by him, in the Pavilion at Haerlem.

NUZZI, MARIO DELLA PENNA, called MARIO DA' FIORI, an eminent Italian flower-painter, was born at Penna, in the diocese of Fermo, in 1603. He studied under Tommaso Salini, and settled at Rome, where his pictures were highly esteemed, and were purchased at high prices. He was also much employed in painting garlands, to decorate figures of the Virgin and Saints, in the pictures of other artists. Unhappily for his posthumous fame, he made use of treacherous colors, which, after a number of years, lost their original freshness, and assumed a black and squalid appearance. He died in 1673.

NYTS, J., a French engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. Among other plates, he executed several neat and spirited landscapes, and a View of the city of Lisle, in French Flanders.

O.

O, LEON HENRY VANDER, a German engraver, who flourished about 1660. He engraved part of the portraits for Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold, among which are James, Duke of York, J. C. de Konigsmarch, Gualter Leslie, and Pietro Strozzi.

OBERTO, FRANCESCO DI, the earliest painter of the Genoese school, whose works are still extant. Lanzi mentions an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Domenico at Genoa, representing the Virgin between two Angels, signed Franciscus de Oberto. 1368.

OBREGON, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid, according to Bermudez, in 1597. He studied under Vincenzio Carducci, and gained a high reputation in historical painting, especially in works of an easel size. Palomino commends a large picture by him, representing the Trinity, in the refectory of the convent de la Merced; and another of the Immaculate Conception in the church of Santa Cruz. There are some of his easel pictures in the collections at Madrid, where they are highly esteemed. Bermudez says he was also an excellent engraver. He had two sons, Diego and Marcos, whom he instructed in the art. He died in 1659. There was another Pedro de Obregon, who was a miniaturist, and illuminated books of devotion. He flourished about 1564.

OCCHIALI. See FERRANTINI. See VANVI-TELLI.

OCHOA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1644. He studied under Murillo, whose manner he so successfully imitated, that his works have frequently been mistaken for those of his instructor, even by connoisseurs. The time of his death is not known.

OCHTERVELDT, JOHN, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except by his works. He is supposed to have studied under Gerard Terburg, whose manner and subjects he imitated so closely, that his pictures have frequently been taken for the works of that master. They usually represent domestic subjects, ladies at their toilet, musical parties, &c. They are well colored and highly finished. He excelled in his draperies, particularly in white satin, in which he equalled Terburg. He sometimes painted fish stalls, and other familiar outdoor objects in the towns of Holland, in which he imitated Peter de Hooge. His pictures seldom exceed the small cabinet size. He flourished about 1670.

OCTAVIAN, FRANCESCO, a painter, born at Rome in 1690. He went to Paris, where he acquired considerable distinction as an historical painter. He died there in 1736.

ODAM, GIROLAMO, a Roman artist born in 1681. He studied under Carlo Maratti, and is eulogized by Orlandi, in a long and pompous article, as a painter, sculptor, architect, engraver, philosopher, mathematician, and poet, accomplished in every art and science. Lanzi says he should suppose he was superficial, as nothing remains of him except some engravings, and a slender reputation, not at all corresponding to such unqualified commendation. He was living in 1718.

ODAZZI, or ODASI, GIOVANNI, a painter, born at Rome in 1663. He first studied under Ciro Ferri, and on the death of that master became the pupil of Gio. Battista Gaulli, called Baciccio. The liveliness of his genius, and his remarkable industry, gained him great distinction, and a multitude of commissions, not only for the churches and public edifices, but for individuals. He was one of the twelve artists selected to paint the prophets in fresco in St. John of Lateran. The prophet produced by Odazzi was Hosea, which was highly commended for correctness of design and dignity of expression. His most remarkable works are the Fall of Lucifer and his Angels, in the church of Santi Apostoli, and St. Bruno, in S. Maria degli Angeli. By aiming at the celerity and rapid execution of Baciccio, without possessing his powers, he proved but a feeble imitator of his style, and his design is frequently careless and incorrect, though he had a commanding facility and great freedom of pencil. He died in 1731.

ODDI, GIUSEPPE, a painter of Pesaro, who flourished about 1675. He studied under Carlo Maratti at Rome, and on his return to his native place, executed some reputable works for the churches, but wrought more for individuals.

ODDI, MAURO, a painter and engraver, born at Parma in 1639. After learning the elements of the art in his native city, he went to Rome and studied with Pietro da Cortona. On returning to his native city, his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Duchess of Parma, who employed him in decorating the Ducal Palace and the Villa di Colorno. He executed several other pieces in the churches of Parma, Piacenza, and Modena. He was also an eminent architect, and etched a few plates from his own designs, marked with the above monogram. He died in 1702.

ODEKERKEN, W., a Dutch painter, who flourished at Nimeguen about 1650. He painted subjects of still life with considerable success. He is also mentioned as having copied a picture by Metz, representing a Cook in a Kitchen, surrounded by various culinary utensils, so exactly, that it could with difficulty be distinguished from the original.

ODERICO, CANONICO, a priest and miniaturist, who flourished at Siena in 1213. There is a manuscript book entitled Ordo officiorum Senensis Ecclesie, preserved in the library of the Academy at Florence, written on parchment, and dated 1213, in which the initial letters are illuminated with little histories, ornaments of animals, &c., by this old painter. There are also other similar books, illustrated on the borders of the parchment by him, preserved at Siena. They are esteemed valuable, not only on account of their antiquity, but as showing the state of the arts at that early period.

ODERICO, GIOVANNI PAOLO, a Genoese painter of noble family, born in 1613. Soprani says he studied under Domenico Fiasella, and gained great reputation as an historical painter, though he chiefly excelled in portraits. He was a correct and tasteful designer, select in his forms, and rich and harmonious in his coloring. His principal historical work is a picture of the Guardian Angel in the church of the Padri Scolopi at Genoa. Lanzi says his easel pictures are rare, and only to be found in the choicest collections. His portraits, which display great talents, are of more frequent occurrence, as he received numerous commissions. He died in 1657.

ODERIGI. See DA GUBBIO.

ODEVAERE, CHEV. JOSEPH DIONYSIUS, an eminent Flemish historical painter, born at Bruges in 1778. After receiving a good scholastic education in the college of the Augustins, and obtaining several prizes in the Academy of Design in his native city, he went to Paris, and studied successively under Suvée and David. In 1804 he drew the grand prize of the French Academy, for his picture of the Death of Phocion, which entitled him to go to Rome, as a pensioner of the government. This distinction, so honorable to him, was duly appreciated by the artists and inhabitants of Bruges, and he was received in triumph on his return; escorted to the city by the students on horseback, in fanciful costume, preceded by a band of music; complimented by the Mayor, and the president of the Academy; presented with a gold medal and chain, and a silver tea service; feasted at the Hotel de Ville, and was honored in the evening with a grand ball and illumination of fire-works, amidst continual acclamations of Vive Odevaere! Shortly after this magnificent reception, he returned to Paris; and the following year went to Italy, where he remained about eight years, and executed several pictures of large dimensions, which gained him great reputation. On his return to Paris, he was presented with a gold medal by the Emperor Napoleon. In 1814, he painted for William I., King of the Netherlands, a picture representing the Union of Utrecht; and after the Battle of Waterloo, another, representing the action at the time the hereditary prince (now king of Holland) received his wounds. He also executed for the same monarch several other works relating to the history of the country, for which he received special marks of royal favor, and was made a Chevalier of the order of the Belgic Lion. His pictures are numerous, and are to be found at Paris, Brussels, Bruges, and Ghent. They are generally of large dimensions; one, painted for the King of the Netherlands, measures twenty-four by sixteen feet. Odevaere cultivated letters as well as the arts, was a member of the Royal Institute, and while in Italy, prepared a history of the arts in that country, from the time of Cimabue to that of Raffaele. He died at Brussels in 1830.

ODIEUVRE, MICHEL, a French engraver and printseller, who flourished at Paris about 1735. He engraved and published in 1738, a set of portraits of illustrious personages, entitled, Portraits des Personages illustres de l'un et de l'autre Sexe, recueillis et gravés par les soins de Michel Odièvre, marchand d'estampes à Paris. They are usually found in the large quarto editions of the Memoires de Sully and Memoires de Commines.

OEHLMULLER, DANIEL JOSEPH, an eminent German architect, born at Bamberg in 1791. He studied under Carl Fischer, and then visited Italy and Sicily, where he passed four years in studying and copying the principal edifices, until he was summoned home in 1819, to superintend the erection of the Glyptotheca at Munich, after the designs of Klenze. In 1831 he was commissioned to make designs in the Gothic style for a church in the suburbs of Munich, which gained him great reputation. He erected in the same style the national monument at Wittelsbach, and the Otto chapel at Kiefersfelden. Among his other works, is the church of S. Theresa at Halbergmoos, in the Italian style, commenced in 1833. At the death of Domenico Quaglio, in 1837, Oehlmuller was employed to complete the works at the Castle of Hohenschwangau. He died in 1839. In 1823 and 1825, he published a work containing designs for funeral monuments.

OERI, PETER, a Swiss painter, born at Zurich in 1637. After studying in his native city, he went to Italy, where he resided six years. According to Füessli, he was a correct and graceful designer, possessed a ready invention, and wrought with a spirited pencil. For lack of patronage, he abandoned painting, for the occupation of a gold-chaser.

OESER, FRIEDRICH, an eminent German historical painter and engraver, born at Presburg in 1717. He early showed an inclination and talent for art, and first studied with one Kamauf, an indifferent artist, who made him copy prints; on which account he ran away from him and went to Vienna, where he frequented the Academy, and continued to support himself by the sale of his sketches. At the age of eighteen, he gained the first prize of that institution. His talents attracted the notice of Raphael Donner, an eminent sculptor, who befriended him, taught him to model, and made him acquainted with the antique. In 1739, he went to Dresden, where his abilities procured him the esteem and friendship of several artists of distinction, as well as eminent literary men who resided in that city. He formed an intimate acquaintance with the celebrated Winckelmann, who mentions him in these flattering terms in his work on the imitation of the Grecian painters and sculptors, "These reflections are the result of my conversations with my friend Oeser, the successor of the Theban Aristides, who sketches the soul and paints the mind." In 1764, he was appointed Director of the Academy of Leipsic, where he settled, and passed the rest of his days. He painted both in oil and fresco. His works are mostly to be found in Dresden and Leipsic, especially in the latter city, where are many of his best productions in the churches and public edifices, as well as in private collections. He also etched a large number of plates from his own compositions, and after other masters, executed in a free and spirited style. Nagler calls his name Adam Friedrich, and gives a list of forty-five of his principal engravings. He died at Leipsic in 1799.

OESER, JOHN LOUIS, was the son of the preceding, born at Dresden in 1751. He was instructed in the art by his father. He was a good landscape painter, but devoted most of his time to engraving. His principal plates are after Rubens, Rembrandt, and Salvator Rosa. He died in 1792.

 OESTEREICH, MATTHEW, a German designer and engraver, who flourished at Dresden about 1750. His principal works are a set of twenty-four caricatures from the designs of Cavaliere Ghezzi, published at Dresden in 1750; afterwards republished at Potsdam in 1766, with the addition of eighteen more, from the designs of Gio. Battista Internari and others; a set of forty plates from the drawings in the collection of Count de Bruhl, published at Dresden in 1752. He also engraved part of the plates from the pictures in the Dresden Gallery. He usually marked his plates with one of the above monograms.

OGBORNE, JOHN, an English designer and engraver, born at London about 1725. He studied with Bartolozzi, whose manner he followed. He engraved quite a number of plates, most of them of large size, after some of the most celebrated English painters of his time, particularly Romney, Stothard, Westall, Smirke, Hamilton, Kauffman, &c. He was much employed by Alderman Boydell, and engraved several plates for the Shakspeare Gallery. He died about 1795.

OGGIONE, MARCO DA. See UGGIONE.

OIHMACHT, LANDELIN, an eminent German sculptor, born at Dunningen, near Rottweil, in Wurtemberg, in 1760. He studied under J. P. Melchior, and during his earlier years executed a good bust of Lavater, and several sculptures for the Kreuzkirche at Rottweil. In 1790, he visited Rome for improvement, and remained two years in that city, studying and copying the antique, and the works of the great masters. On returning to Germany, he soon gained reputation, and was employed on several important monumental works, the first of which was the monument to the Burgomaster Rhode, in the Cathedral at Lubec. In 1801 he settled at Strasburg, and soon after executed the monument to Gen. Desaix, erected on the Rheininsel near that city. His abilities were highly esteemed by the celebrated sculptor David, who is reported to have said that Ohmacht was the Correggio of Sculpture, and that his works could not be sufficiently admired. He executed four monuments in the church of St. Thomas, of which that to Prof. Oberlin is greatly admired. Among his other works are, the monument to the historian Koch; the monument to Dr. Blessig; another to Gen. Kleber, in the Cathedral; and a colossal statue in honor of Adolph von Nassau, in the Cathedral of Speyer. Ohmacht was an intimate friend of Klopstock, and executed several busts of that celebrated poet. Among his classical sculptures, are the statues of Hebe, Flora, Venus, Psyche, and the Judgment of Paris. The latter work is at Nymphenburg. Ohmacht practised the art at Strasburg for many years, and died there, in 1834.

OLDONI, BONIFORTE and ERCOLE, two old painters of the Milanese school, who, according to Della Valle, flourished at Vercelli about 1466, and executed some works for the churches.

OLEN, or OLIS, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1680. He painted conversations, game, fruit, and flower-pieces, and interiors of kitchens, ornamented with various culinary utensils, all of which are painted with a broad, free pencil, well colored, and carefully finished. He is also said to have painted landscapes, with sportsmen and dogs. Little is known of him except his works, and as his name is variously spelled by different writers, he may be the same as John van Alen, which see.

OLGIATI, GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1572. It is not known under whom he studied, though his style is evidently founded on that of Cornelius Cort. His drawing is incorrect, and his heads lack expression. One of his best plates is an arched one, representing the Trinity, with a number of Saints and Angels; after Federigo Zuccaro, inscribed Hieronymus Olgiatus f. 1572.

OLINDO, MARTINO DE, a Spanish architect of no great eminence, who flourished in the 16th century. According to Milizia, he erected the parochial church of Liria, of which the lower story has four Doric columns, on pedestals, with niches, statues, and bas-reliefs; the second order has the same number of Corinthian columns; the third order has two fluted, twisted columns, with a statue of St. Michael in the centre. Olindo also completed the monastery of S. Miguel at Valencia, commenced by Cobarrubias.

OLIVA, PIETRO, a painter of Messina, who flourished about 1491. He executed some works for the churches, which are highly commended by Hackert for correctness of design, and lively and natural expression.

OLIVER, ISAAC, an eminent English miniature painter, born about 1556. Lord Orford states that he first studied under Nicholas Hilliard, and afterwards received some instruction from Federigo Zuccaro. Vertue conjectures, from the variety of his drawings after Italian masters, that he visited Italy, which is doubtful. His principal employment was miniature painting, in which branch he acquired great distinction, and was patronized by the most distinguished personages of his time. Many fine miniatures by this master are to be found in the collections of the English nobility and gentry, among which are portraits of himself, Queen Elizabeth, Mary Queen of Scots, Prince Henry, James I., and Ben Jonson. In the particular branch which he mostly practised, it is said, by his countrymen, that he has hardly been surpassed by any artist of any country. He sometimes painted historical subjects, and executed many exquisite drawings after Raffaele, Parmigiano, and other Italian masters. He sometimes worked in oil, but did not succeed so well. He died in London in 1617.

OLIVER, PETER, was the eldest son of the preceding, born in London in 1601. He was instructed in the art of miniature painting by his father, whose excellence he nearly equalled. He not only painted portraits, but historical subjects, in water-colors. He was much employed by Charles I., in copying the finest pictures in the Royal collection, as it appears by the catalogue of that monarch and of James II. that there were thirteen historical miniatures by him in the royal collection, several of which are still preserved in Kensington palace. Vertue says he etched some small plates of historical subjects, but they are not specified by him, or any other writer. He died in 1660.

OLIVER, JOHN, an eminent painter on glass, is supposed to have been the nephew of Peter Oliver, born at London in 1616. He practised his art to a great age, as appears from an inscription on a window painted by him, in Christ's church, Oxford, representing the Angel liberating St. Peter from Prison, inscribed J. Oliver, ætat. suæ 84, anno 1700, pinxit deditque. He also engraved several plates, some of which are etched and others executed in mezzotinto. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

King James II., in mezzotinto. Judgo Jeffries, styled Earl of Flint. Thomas White, Bishop of Peterborough. John Woremburg, the Dutch Dwarf.

SUBJECTS.

A Boy sleeping, with a Skull by him; after Art. Gentileschi. A View of Tangiers; J. Oliver, fec. 1676. A View of the Hot Wells at Bath; J. Oliver, fec. aqua forti. 1676.

OLIVIER, M., a French painter of little note, born at Paris. He painted history and portraits. He went to London, and in 1772 exhibited in the Royal Academy six pictures, two of which were historical, representing the Murder of the Innocents and the Death of Cleopatra. Not meeting with much encouragement, he went to Spain about 1783.

OLIVIERI, DOMENICO, an Italian painter, born at Turin in 1679. According to Della Valle, he excelled in painting drolls, fairs, markets, merry-makings, in imitation of the style of Peter de Laer, in which he displayed a humorous talent for caricature which has seldom been surpassed. Lanzi says, "In his time the royal collection was enriched, at the death of Prince Eugene, by the addition of nearly four hundred Flemish pictures; and none profited more than Olivieri from the study of these works." He was a man born to amuse, from his singular personal appearance, his lively conversation, and the humorous productions of his pencil. He was extremely happy in his subjects, strong in his colors, and free in his touch. In the gallery of the court are two large pictures by him, one of which represents a fair with quack-doctors, drawers of teeth, villagers sporting or quarreling, and the variety of incident usually furnished by a busy assemblage of the vulgar, composed with an admirable variety of expression in the heads. Although he chiefly painted in what the Italians style Bambocciate, yet he was perfectly competent to tread in the higher walks of history, as is proved by his Miracle of the Sacrament, in the sacristy of Corpus Domini, in his native city. He died in 1755.

OLOTZAGA, GIOVANNI DE, an eminent Spanish architect, was a native of Biscay, and flourished during the latter part of the 15th century. His instructor is not mentioned, but he attained great excellence in the art. He erected the Cathedral of Huesca in Arragon, on the site of the celebrated mosque of Mislegda. This work gained him great reputation, and is greatly admired for its fine proportions. Milizia says "the principal façade is grand, with fourteen statues larger than life, on each side the entrance, placed on pedestals within niches; above these are forty-eight smaller statues, a foot in height." Under the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Grecian style of architecture became prevalent in Spain, and was adopted by Olotzaga. Among his principal works in that manner, were the great college of Santa Cruz, at Valladolid, commenced in 1480, and completed in 1492; also the Foundling Hospital at Toledo; and the great college of St. Idelfonso, founded by Cardinal Ximenes.

OMMEGANCK, CAV. BALTHASAR PAUL, one of the most eminent landscape and animal painters of modern times, was born at Antwerp in 1755. He studied with H. Antonissen. He was not one of those artists who astonish us by their precocity; his powers were long in being developed to full maturity, but he studied nature with wonderful assiduity, and carefully observed and noted every changing scene, and so impressed them upon his works that they truly represent not only the season, as the humidity of spring, the glowing heat of summer, and the picturesque alternations of autumn, but the very time of the day is perceptible, from the first roseate blush of the morning to the splendors of the evening sun. In his scenes of spring, all is dewy freshness; in those of summer, it is breathless sultriness—the ground is parched, the verdure withered and tinged, the atmosphere glowing with heat, and the very streams seem oppressed by its power. He enriched his pictures with figures and animals, especially with sheep and goats, which he painted to admiration, not only in the forms, but he represented their character and habits, to the life. OmmeGANCK acquired immense reputation, and though his pictures commanded such prices in his lifetime that only the rich could afford to buy them, they have more than trebled their value since his death, and are only to be found in the choicest collections in Holland, France, and England. He received many honors, was made a knight of the Order of the Belgic Lion, elected a member of several learned societies, and appointed in 1815, by Belgium, one of the commissioners to reclaim from France the works of art which Napoleon had acquired by force of arms, during the previous wars. He died at Antwerp in 1826. It is proper to caution amateurs that his works have been largely imitated and copied by several clever Dutch artists, many of which have been sent to England and to the United States, and sold as the genuine works of this master.

ONATAS, a Greek painter and sculptor, a native of Ægina; the son of Micon; cotemporary with Polygnotus; and flourished about B. C. 450. As a painter he executed, in concert with Polygnotus, the pictures on the walls of the vestibule of Minerva's temple at Plataea. He also painted the first Argive expedition against Thebes; and probably the picture of Euryganca lamenting the death of her sons Eteoches and Polynices, which, according to Sylburgius, is by a MS. error attributed to one Onasias, otherwise not mentioned.

As a sculptor, Onatas attained great excellence, according to Pausanias; although Pliny does not mention him. Pausanias observes that Onatas was not surpassed in his own time by any sculptor of Attica, since the days of Dædalus. That author speaks of a group of Homeric heroes near the great temple at Olympia; Thiersch attributes them all to Onatas, but his name was inscribed only on one of them—the statue of Idomeneus. The Thasians also dedicated a bronze statue of Hercules by Onatas at Olympia, which was ten cubits high. Among the other works of Onatas, was a statue of Apollo at Pergamus; and the bronze statue of Hiero, at Olympia.

ONATE, MIGUEL, a Spanish portrait painter, born at Seville in 1535. His parents, being in good circumstances, placed him while young under the Chev. Anthony More, then in high favor at the court of Madrid. He accompanied his instructor to Portugal, whither that painter was sent by the King of Spain to paint the royal family. He became one of the most celebrated portrait painters of his time, and found abundant employment at the Spanish court. His manner was exactly like that of More. He died at Madrid in 1606, leaving a considerable fortune to his heirs, which he had acquired by his profession.

ONOFRIO, CRESCENZIO DI, a painter born at Rome in 1650. He studied under Gaspar Poussin, and painted landscapes in the charming style of that master. Lanzi says "he is alone considered the true imitator of that master." He resided chiefly at Florence, where he was much employed by the court, and by individuals. It is said he painted much for the Ducal villas. There are few of his works remaining, either at Rome or Florence, as he painted many frescos, which have all perished. Lanzi says that the Sig. Cancelliere Scilli, at Florence, possesses several exquisite landscapes and a portrait of his ancestor by him, inscribed with his name, and dated 1712. He etched some plates of heroic landscapes, from his own designs, executed in a beautiful and peculiar style, somewhat resembling those of Il Bolognese. The time of his death is not exactly known, and there are many contradictions as to the time of his birth and death, which are evidently erroneous. Thus Bartsch says he was born in 1613, and died in 1688; and Nagler copies him; while Lanzi and Zani both say he was living in 1712, and there are prints by him dated as late as 1696.

OOLEN, JOHN VAN. See VAN ALEN.

OORT, LAMBRECHT VAN, a Flemish painter and architect, born at Amersfort, about 1520. He acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, but was more distinguished as an architect. He resided chiefly at Antwerp, where he was received into the Academy in 1547. In the Museum at Antwerp, is a picture of the Resurrection of Christ by him, and in that of Brussels are two, representing the Adoration of the Shepherds and the Descent from the Cross.

OORT, ADAM VAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1557. He was instructed by his father, possessed excellent abilities, and, had his habits been good and his ambition noble, he might have been one of the most distinguished artists of his country; but he was the slave of intemperance, by which he degraded his talents, and brutalized his disposition. His academy at one time was the most frequented at Antwerp, and he had the honor of instructing several of the most distinguished artists of the Flemish school, among whom were Rubens, Jordaens, Franck, and van Balen, but his outrageous conduct disgusted and drove all his pupils from his school except Jordaens, whose tender regard for his daughter, whom he afterwards married, induced him to remain. Notwithstanding the violence of his temper, and the depravity of his habits, van Oort executed numerous works for the churches in Flanders and Brabant, many of which have great merit, and are still highly esteemed. His compositions were agreeable, his coloring excellent, and he had great freedom of handling. His earlier works are studied, and the drawing tolerably correct, but his love of the art diminished as his excesses increased; he fell into mannerism, and wrought with negligence and haste, so that his later pictures have little to recommend them. Rubens used to say that van Oort would have surpassed all his cotemporaries had he seen Rome, formed his taste by studying the best models, and been regular in his habits. He possessed a giant constitution, and, notwithstanding his dissipated life, he lived to the great age of eighty-four years. He died in 1641.

OORTMAN, JAN JOACHIM, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1777. He studied successively with W. Kock, C. H. Hodges, and L. A. Claessens. He resided most of his life at Paris, where he acquired distinction for many excellent works after Rembrandt, Gerard Douw, van Ostade, and other eminent Dutch masters. He also engraved some plates after Titian, Giulio Romano, Caravaggio, and Valentino, as well as others of the more modern French painters.

OOST, JACOB VAN, the Elder, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Bruges about 1600. It is not known under whom he first studied, but in 1621 he painted an altar-piece for one of the churches in his native city, which excited the surprise and admiration of cotemporary artists. Being ambitious of further improvement, he went to Rome, where he attentively studied the works of the great masters, and made those of Annibale Caracci the particular objects of his imitation. During his residence in that metropolis, he produced several works of his own composition, so much in the style of that great artist that they astonished the best connoisseurs at Rome, and gained him great reputation. After a residence of five years in Italy, the love of country induced him to return to Bruges, though he had flattering prospects before him to remain. His talents had excited the most sanguine expectations of his fellow citizens before he went abroad; they were impatient to witness the improvement he had made in his travels, and they immediately loaded him with commissions. Van Oost is justly ranked among the ablest artists of the Flemish school. His first studies were the works of Rubens and Vandyck, and from them he acquired that freshness and purity of coloring for which his works are distinguished. Following the example of the greatest masters, his compositions are simple and studied, and he avoided crowding them with figures not essential to his subject. In his design, and in the expression of his heads, he seems always to have had in view the great style of Annibale Caracci. The back-grounds of his pictures are generally enriched with noble architecture, of which he was a perfect master. He had a ready invention, and wrought with extraordinary facility of pencil, though his works are well finished.—During a long life he continued to exercise his talents with undiminished reputation, and always abounded with commissions. He executed an incredible number of works for the churches and public edifices, as well as for the private collections of his country, particularly of Bruges. He also excelled in portraits, and painted many distinguished personages. His most famous works are the Nativity, in the church of S. Saviour; the Resurrection, in the Cathedral—a grand composition; and the Descent from the Cross, in the church of the Jesuits at Bruges, which last is considered his master-piece. Most of his pictures are of large size. He died at Bruges in 1671.

OOST, JACOB VAN, called the Younger, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Bruges in 1637. At twenty years of age, his father sent him to Italy to complete his education, where he resided several years, and then returned to Flanders an able and accomplished designer. After painting some pictures for the churches at Bruges, he settled permanently at Lisle, where he acquired a distinguished reputation, and where are the greater part of his works. His historical pictures, like those of his father, are admirably composed, partaking more of the Roman than the Flemish school. Among his best works are the Martyrdom of St. Barbara, in the church of St. Stephen; and the Transfiguration, in the church of St. Saviour at Lisle. He was less eminent than his father as an historical painter, but excelled him in portraits, which some have not hesitated to rank with those of Vandyck. He died in 1713.

OOSTEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter of whom little is known. He painted small landscapes, with figures and animals, in the manner of Velvet Breughel. They are pleasing and spirited little pieces, and when they appear in sales, without his signature, they are invariably ascribed to Breughel.

OOSTERHOUDT, THIERRY VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Tiel in Guelderland, in 1756. He went to Dusseldorf, where he studied under R. van Eynder. He frequented the Electoral Academy, and carefully studied the works of Raffaele, Carlo Dolce, Rubens, Vandyck, and other masters in that famous collection. He afterwards returned to his native city, where he acquired considerable reputation as an historical and portrait painter, and executed numerous works, particularly domestic scenes, which are to be found at Tiel and Utrecht. He wrought much in water-colors, and his works in this line are highly esteemed. He died in 1830.

OOSTERWYCK, MARIA VAN, a celebrated paintress of fruit and flowers, born at Nootdorp, a small town near Delft, in 1630. She was the daughter of a clergyman, who, perceiving in her an early disposition for the art, placed her under the tuition of David de Heem, the most celebrated flower painter of his time, under whose able instruction she made rapid progress, and in time produced works that nearly approached the beauty and delicacy of her master. Her pictures of fruit, flowers, and still-life found their way into the choicest collections, and she not only found abundant employment, but received commissions from many of the sovereigns and princes of Europe. She painted a picture for the Emperor Leopold, with which he was so much pleased that he sent her his miniature, with that of the Empress, set in diamonds, as a mark of his approbation. William III. and Louis XIV. were among the most munificent patrons of this celebrated lady. She is ranked among the most successful imitators of nature in the particular branch to which she devoted her talents. She grouped her flowers with great taste, and finished her pictures with extraordinary neatness and delicacy. Her coloring is clear and transparent, and her touch is admirably adapted to the various objects she represented. She imitated the freshness and bloom of flowers, and the luscious richness of fruit, with a truth and harmony that rivalled nature. Her works are extremely scarce and valuable, and are held in the highest estimation. She died in 1693.

OPIE, JOHN, an eminent English historical and portrait painter, born at St. Agnes, a small town in Cornwall, in 1761. The life of this artist is no less instructive than interesting. He was the son of a master carpenter, who designed to bring him up to his own business, to which his aspiring genius could not submit. Prince Hoare, who wrote an excellent sketch of his life, says "he was very early remarkable for the strength of his understanding; at ten years of age he was able to solve many difficult problems in Euclid; at twelve, he kept an evening school, and taught arithmetic and writing to some pupils twice his age." At this time he "could write many various hands with admirable ease and accuracy." He had an unconquerable passion for painting, and sought every opportunity to indulge in it, which his father thought would prove his ruin, and endeavored to restrain. It happened, on one occasion, that his father was employed to repair a gentleman's house, at Truro, and the youth accompanied him. In the parlor hung a picture representing a farm-yard scene, which so captivated young Opie that he stole in to contemplate it, which his father perceiving, severely corrected him; but this had little effect, and he was soon at the door again. By the intercession and kindness of the lady of the house, he was permitted to view the picture without further molestation. On his return home in the evening, he began to copy it from memory. The next day he returned to the house, and in the evening again resumed his task; in this manner, in the course of a few days, he transmitted to his own canvass a very tolerable copy. In the same way he copied a picture of several hunting figures, which he saw exposed for sale in a window. The love of painting had now so thoroughly established its dominion over his mind, that nothing could divert him from engaging in it as a profession, and at the earnest solicitation of his uncle, a man of sound mind, and an excellent arithmetician, with whom he was a great favorite, and who used to call him the little Sir Isaac, in consideration of his talent for mathematics, his father was induced to allow him to follow the bent of his genius. He therefore prosecuted his new studies with ardor, and soon obtained considerable skill in portrait painting. He soon decorated his father's house with all the family portraits, as well as some of his youthful companions. His talents attracted the attention of Dr. Wolcott, so celebrated under the title of Peter Pindar, then residing at Truro, who kindly aided him with his advice, allowed him to copy some pictures in his possession, and recommended him to the patronage of the public. Thus assisted, his fame found its way through the surrounding country, and he commenced his career as a portrait painter, visiting many of the neighboring towns, with letters of introduction to all the principal families. "One of these expeditions," says Prince Hoare, "was to Padstow, whither he set forward, dressed as usual in a boy's plain short jacket, and carrying with him all the necessary apparatus for portrait painting. Here, among others, he painted the whole household of the ancient family of Prideaux, even to the dogs and cats. He remained so long absent from home, that some uneasiness began to arise on his account; but it was dissipated by his returning dressed in a handsome coat, with very long skirts, laced ruffles, and silk stockings. On seeing his mother, he ran to her and kissed her, and then taking out of his pocket twenty guineas which he had earned by his pencil, he desired her to keep them, adding that in future he should maintain himself." Young Opie's fame soon spread abroad, and about 1777 he was introduced to Lord Bateman, by whom he was much employed in painting pictures of old men, women, beggars, &c., which he designed with uncommon vigor, colored well, and gave great truthfulness of expression. In 1780, at the age of nineteen, he went to London under the auspices of Dr. Wolcott, where his merits, and the extraordinary circumstances of his career, excited universal admiration. His partisans were zealous in their praise of the "Cornish Wonder," as he was called, and commissions poured in upon him from many persons of distinction. The powers of Opie, however, were not calculated to flatter the frivolities of fashion. He lacked the polish of the courtier, and his portraits were rather distinguished by identity and truth than by dignity of character; his female portraits lacked elegance and grace, as well as that softening down of harsh features so essential to success. Some artists, too, were jealous of his fame. It was not long before the curiosity excited by his arrival in the metropolis began to subside; but as his talents were not confined to portraiture, he continued to meet with considerable employment in painting portraits and rural subjects, in which last he was particularly successful. Opie now aspired to the highest branch of the art, historical painting, and bent all his energies to this object. The great artistical undertakings, viz.: Boydell's Shakspeare Gallery, Macklin's Poets' and Biblical Galleries, Boyer's Illustrations of English History, and the other enterprises of the day, opened a new field for the exercise of his abilities. In all these he was much employed, and the pictures he executed on these occasions are among the most admired productions of the British school. Among the most esteemed of these were the Murder of James I. of Scotland, the Death of Rizzio, Jephtha's Vow, the Presentation in the Temple, Arthur supplicating Hubert, Juliet discovered in her Bed-chamber, the Countess of Auvergne and Lord Talbot, &c.

The works of Opie are distinguished by great simplicity in the composition, masterly boldness of effect, and uncommon strength of character, though sometimes defective in dignity, and faithful expression of individual nature. His best works possess, in an eminent degree, what artists term breadth. Few painters have shown so perfect an eye to the purity of color, and in some of his works he appears to have emulated the rich and harmonious tones of Rembrandt and Titian; and even Fuseli says that nature had endowed him with an exquisite eye for color, and pronounces his coloring in the Murder of James I. unrivalled among the productions of his cotemporaries, and approaching the excellence of Titian. His conduct of the chiaro-scuro was intelligent and masterly. His faults resulted from the lack of academic tuition. He was a self-made man; and, self-instructed, he had to find out everything appertaining to his art, which is next to invention. Narrowed in his acquaintance of design, he was constrained to copy with precision the model before him. There is little of the ideal, also, in his works, and Fuseli observes of him that he rather bent his subject to the figure, than his figure to the subject. Although his works are deficient in grace of attitude and elevation of character, they invariably exhibit an appearance of reality and truth, which almost compensates for the absence of the more refined characteristics of elegance and grace. He has also been censured for laying on his color too thick, as though it were spread on with a palette-knife, rather than a brush; but this, as with Reynolds and others, was only an occasional experiment—a practice that is always to be condemned in oil paintings, unless they are viewed at a great height, as such parts are liable to crack, and produce unsightly seams. In fact, all unscientific experiments in vehicles, varnishes, and colors, especially vegetable colors, to produce a striking and brilliant effect, cannot be too highly condemned, as they are subject to chemical reaction, producing changes that destroy the harmony, and injure the reputation of the master.

Opie was a man of a strong mind, ambitious to distinguish himself; kind and generous, but bold and resolute, scorning all sycophancy or flattery; indefatigable in the pursuit of knowledge and excellence in his profession. Prince Hoare says, "wherever eminence appeared, he felt and eagerly showed himself its rival. He was forward to claim the honors which he was still more diligent to deserve. He regarded every honorable acquisition as a victory, and openly expressed the delight he experienced in success. On the Professorship of Painting becoming vacant by the dismissal of Barry, he offered himself as a candidate, and being told that he had a competition with an artist whose learning and talents preëminently entitled him to the office, he replied that he abstained from farther interference, but that the person who had been proposed was the only one in whose favor he would willingly resign his pretensions; consistently with this declaration, on Mr. Fuseli's appointment to the office of Keeper, he renewed his claim, and was elected." He delivered two courses of lectures before the Royal Academicians, and one before the Royal British Institution, which showed a profound knowledge of his subject. He also contributed several articles, intended to promote the advancement of the fine arts in Great Britain, to the various periodicals of the day. He died in the prime of life in 1807, deeply lamented for his talents, and his many excellent qualities. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral, near those of Sir Joshua Reynolds. His widow, Mrs. Amelia Opie, well known as an authoress, wrote an impartial and excellent life of her husband.

OPPENORD, GILLES MARIE, a French architect, born at Paris in 1672. He studied under Jules Hardouin Mansard, and afterwards visited Rome with the royal pension, where he remained eight years. On returning to France, he first gained reputation by the grand altar in the church of S. Germain des Pres; and by the altar in S. Sulpice, which is highly praised by Milizia. The Duke of Orleans, Regent, was so much pleased with the abilities of Oppenord, that he appointed him director-general of the royal buildings and gardens. Among his principal works were the decorations of the Gallery of the Palais Royal, the interior of the house of the grand prior of France, the choir and altar of the church of S. Victoire, and the southern façade of S. Sulpice. In the decorative branch of the art he possessed great abilities, but had little merit otherwise; and to him has been attributed, perhaps with some degree of truth, the decadence of the art in the time of Louis XV. Oppenord was the instructor of Jacques François Blondel. He left a number of designs of considerable merit, some of which were published by M. Huquieres. He died in 1742.

OPSTAL, GASPAR JAMES VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1660. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted history, landscapes, and portraits, with considerable reputation. He executed several works for the churches in Flanders and Brabant, in which his design is correct, his composition good, his coloring agreeable, and his touch brilliant and free. He copied the famous Descent from the Cross by Rubens, in the Cathedral at Antwerp, for the Marshal Villeroy, in which he imitated in a perfect manner the admirable coloring and the freedom of touch which distinguish the original painting. In the Cathedral of St. Omer is a grand picture by him, representing several Fathers of that church. He excelled in portraits, many of which are to be found at Antwerp, where they are highly esteemed. In the Hall of the Royal Academy is a noble portrait of one of the Directors of that institution. He also frequently inserted the figures in the works of the cotemporary artists. He died in 1714.

ORAM, WILLIAM, an English architect and painter, who flourished about 1740. He was bred an architect, but finding little encouragement in that profession, he devoted his attention to landscape painting, and produced some works possessing considerable merit. Through the influence of Sir Edward Walpole, his principal patron, he was made Superintendent of the Board of Works.

ORAZZI, NICCOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1760. Among other works, he engraved a part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published by the authority of the King of the two Sicilies.

ORBETTO, L'. See ALESSANDRO TURCHI.

ORCAGNA, ANDREA. This eminent Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was a native of Florence. According to some authors he was born about 1315 or 1320; although Vasari places his birth in 1329. His real name was Andrea di Cione; but according to Rinnohr, he acquired the surname of L'Archagnuolo, which was afterwards contracted, Lo Archagnuolo, Lo'rehagnio, L'Orchagno. Vasari calls him Orgagna. He was probably first instructed by his father Cione, a celebrated goldsmith; after which he entered the school of Andrea Pisano. He studied painting under his elder brother Bernardo Orcagna, and executed several works in the hard, dry style of the time, inferior to Giotto both in design and coloring. In concert with his brother he painted the frescos in the Strozzi chapel in the church of S. Maria Novella at Florence, representing Paradise and the Infernal Regions. Lanzi says "the two brothers imitated Dante; and that style was more happily repeated by Andrea in the church of Santa Croce, where he inserted portraits of his enemies among the damned, and of his friends among the blessed. Andrea discovers fertility of imagination, diligence, and spirit, equal to any of his cotemporaries. In composition he was less judicious, in attitudes less exact, than the followers of Giotto; and he yields to them in drawing and coloring." In the Campo Santo at Pisa, is a painting by Andrea Orcagna, representing the Last Judgment. Bernardo also painted a representation of the Infernal Regions in the same edifice; and both these paintings were engraved by Lasinio on a single plate, in his Pitture del Campo Santo di Pisa. Andrea was accustomed to sign his pictures Fece Andrea di Cione, Scultore.

As a sculptor and architect, Orcagna attained, according to Vasari, much greater eminence than as a painter. According to the prevailing custom, he practised both arts in connection with the same works. He designed the celebrated tabernacle of the Virgin in Or San Michele, which is a high Gothic pyramidal altar of white marble, free on all sides, and richly ornamented with figures and other sculptures. It is inscribed on the base Andreas Cionis pictor Florentinus Oratorii archimagister exstitit hujus. MCCCLIX. It is engraved in Richa's Notizie delle Chiese di Firenze, after a drawing by Andrea himself. In sculpture he was a worthy follower of the Pisani; and in architecture he attained great eminence. He erected the church of Or San Michele at Florence, and the elegant Loggia de' Lanzi in the Piazza Granduca, which is in a perfect condition. It was built entirely of stone, with great care; and, according to Milizia, had elegant semicircular arches, instead of the pointed ones, which had before been universal. Between the arches of the front façade were seven figures in half-relief, in allusion to the cardinal virtues. Michael Angelo was so highly pleased with this loggia, that, when asked by Cosmo I. for a design for the Senate-House, he answered that he should only continue the loggia of Orcagna round the square, as he never could produce anything superior. This great work, with the sculptures which adorn it, was engraved by Lasinio in Miaserini's Piazza della Granduca di Firenze, con i suoi Monumenti, Florence, 1830. The portrait of Orcagna, published in Vasari's work, was taken from one of the figures of the Apostles in the above mentioned Tabernacle of the Virgin, which was understood to be his own. Orcagna died at Florence, according to Vasari, in 1389; though Manni says in 1375.

ORDONES, GASPARO, a reputable Spanish architect, who flourished about 1600, and erected, among other works, the church of S. Martino at Madrid.

ORIENT, JOSEPH, an eminent German landscape painter, born towards the close of the 17th century, at Buebach, near Eisenstadt, in Lower Hungary. He studied under Faistenberger, and became one of the most eminent landscape painters of his time. He passed much time in the study of nature, and gained great improvement from the works of art in the gallery of the Prince of Lichtenstein. He was accustomed to represent nature in her various appearances, as among the wild mountains of the Tyrol, or on the flowery banks of the Rhine; but his favorite subjects were storms of wind, and tempests. He sometimes imitated the styles of Breughel, Savery, Sachtleven, and Griffier. He wrought with great facility; his works are characterized by great fertility of invention, and a faithful imitation of nature. The figures in his landscapes were usually painted by Ferg, Janneck, Querfurt, or Canton. Orient settled at Vienna, and executed most of his works in that city. He was the instructor of a number of excellent artists, among whom were Ferg, Lauterer, and Thurner. His portrait has been painted in large and small by Ganneck. He died at Vienna in 1747.

ORIOLE, BARTOLOMEO, a painter who flourished at Trevigi about 1616. He executed numerous works for the churches in his native city, which are commended by Federici. He was also a good portrait painter, and frequently introduced portraits into his pictures, instead of ideal forms. There is a picture of this class in the church of S. Croce, representing a numerous procession of the people of Trevigi. Lanzi says he painted more pictures for public exhibitions at Trevigi, than any other artist, and that he belonged to that "numerous tribe of painters, who in Italy, were ambitious of uniting in themselves, the power of poetry and painting; but who, not having received sufficient polish, either in precept or in art, gave vent to their inspirations in their native place, by covering the columns with sonnets, and the churches with pictures, but without exciting the envy of the adjacent districts."

ORIZZONTE. See FRANCIS VAN BLOEMEN.

ORLANDI, ODOARDO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1660, and died in 1736. He was a scholar of Pasinelli. He executed a few works for the churches, but did not acquire much distinction.

ORLANDI, STEFANO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1681, and died in 1760. He studied under Pompeo Aldrovandini. According to Crespi, he excelled in architectural and perspective painting, and in conjunction with Gioseffo Orsoni, painted many able frescos in the churches of Bologna and other Italian cities, besides decorating several theatres in the same places. In these Orlandi painted the architectural parts, and Orsoni the figures.

ORLANDINI, GIULIO, a painter of Parma, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He executed some works for the churches which are commended by Orlandi, but Lanzi says he was better qualified to show the succession of the Parmese school, than that of eminent painters.

ORLANDO, BERNARDO, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished at Turin in the first part of the 17th century. At this time, the rich collections of pictures and drawings in the royal galleries at that court were made subservient to the instruction of young artists, which was intrusted to a painter of the court. Orlando was invested with this charge, and appointed painter to the Duke in 1617. He also painted some pictures for the churches.

ORLEY, BERNARD VAN, called BERNARD OF BRUSSELS, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Brussels, according to the best authorities, about 1490, and died in 1560; though there is considerable contradiction on these points. Michiels says he was born in 1471, and died in 1541; and Zani, differing from all others, places his birth in 1500, and his death in 1550. All however, are agreed that he went to Rome at an early age, and studied under Raffaele, under whose instruction he made extraordinary progress, and soon acquired distinction. He designed in the manner of Raffaele, and it is said that he not only assisted him in his works, but that "he was employed in finishing many of the grand compositions of that inimitable master"! Michiels says that he was sent by Raffaele to superintend the execution of the tapestries manufactured at Arras from the cartoons designed by him in 1513 and 1514, for pope Leo X., which work was completed in 1519. At all events, he returned to Brussels with a distinguished reputation. He was employed by the Emperor Charles V., and appointed his court painter. He painted history, landscape, and animals. He was much employed in painting cartoons for tapestries for the court. In these he represented hunting pictures of Charles and his nobles in the forest of Soignes, which were composed and designed in a grand style. He also painted several altar-pieces for the churches, and some sacred and historical pictures for the collections. He painted sixteen cartoons for the Prince of Nassau, intended to decorate the palaces of Breda: each consisted of only two figures.—a knight and a lady on horseback,—being representations of the Nassau family. The design was exceedingly correct and grand, worthy of the school of Raffaele; they were afterwards copied by Jordaens in oil. To give brilliancy and transparency to his colors, he frequently painted on a gold ground. A celebrated picture of this kind is his Last Judgment, formerly in the cathedral at Antwerp. As many pictures are falsely attributed to him, the following list of his works considered genuine by connoisseurs, will prove interesting:

The Sabians carrying off Job's Cattle; the King of Holland. Job's Children feasting; do. Job in his Affliction; do. The Death of the Just; do. A Lady of Rank; do. The Restoration of Job; do. The Virgin and infant Jesus; do. Portrait of a Woman; do. The Holy Trinity; do. Neptune and Amphitrite; the Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick. Venus and Adonis; at Berlin. Bust of Lucretia; at Prague. Antiochus erecting an idol in the Temple of Jerusalem, the right wing of a picture; at Vienna. The Marriage of the Virgin; in the Louvre. The Annunciation, and several circumstances in the life of Christ; in the Museum at Berlin. Connoisseurs are not agreed on its authenticity. The Nativity; formerly in the church of S. Gery, at Brussels. The Adoration of the Magi; formerly in the refectory of the abbey of Premontres, at Dileghem. The Presentation of Mary in the Temple; at Chatsworth. This picture, till recently, was attributed to Jan van Eyck. St. Anne blessing the Virgin, an imitation of Raffaele; at Berlin. Mary with the infant Jesus, Sts. John, Joseph, and Elisabeth; Lord Scarsdale, at Kedleston.—Mary with the infant Jesus, under a baldachin, St. Joseph gathering dates from a Palm Tree; Liverpool Institution. A riposo during the flight into Egypt, in a rich landscape with pilgrims; at Vienna. Christ curing a Sick Person, eighteen figures: a drawing in black lead. (Mentioned by Thore, Alliance des Arts) Christ on the Cross, between the two Thieves; in the church of St. Catherine at Brussels. The dead body of Christ on the knees of the Virgin, attended by the Magdalene, St. John, and five other figures; formerly in the church of S. Gudule, at Brussels. Mentioned by Descamps in Voyage pittoresque. Dead Christ mourned by his friends; Museum at Brussels. De-scant of the Holy Spirit, left wing of a picture; at Vienna. The Last Judgment, a central panel; in the hospital of St. Elizabeth, at Antwerp. In Karel van Mander's time it belonged to the Almoners; and when Descamps wrote, it was in their chapel in the cathedral. The Works of Mercy; wings of the preceding. The Last Judgment, central panel; in the church of St. Jacques, at Antwerp. The Trinity, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Teresa, and the Magdalene; exterior wings of the preceding. The Last Judgment; at Berlin. Connoisseurs not agreed. Death of the Virgin; in the hospital of St. John, at Brussels. St. Jerome; at Berlin. St. Luke painting the Virgin and Child; the central panel of a sumptuous architectural monument, the wings of which are painted by Michael Coxie; in the church of St. Viet, at Prague. St. Norbert refusing the heresy of Tanchelin; in the Pinacothek. Lithographed by Bergman. Two wings of a Triptique; mentioned by Descamps as being formerly in the church of St. Martin, at Alost. Anne of Cleves, the bust only; Lord Spencer, at Althorp. The left wing of a Triptique, in the church of St. James at Antwerp, representing the donor and his three sons, under the protection of St. George. The right wing of the same, in the same church, representing the wife and her eleven daughters under the protection of St. Catherine. Portrait of a Female; Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick. A young Girl reading near a Golden Vase; at Prague. In his style. A Woman holding a Serpent to her Breast, and supposed to represent Cleopatra; Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick. Six Men and a Dog under Trees; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna. Sportsmen on horseback and foot, with a Dog, under Trees; do. Paintings in the Piccolomini Palace; at Vienna. Cartoons for tapestry, designed for Charles V., Marguerite of Austria, and for the house of Nassau.

ORLEY, RICHARD VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Brussels in 1652. He was the son of Peter van Orley, an indifferent landscape painter, who first instructed him in the art. He possessed great talents, and first applied himself to miniature painting with considerable success, but being ambitious to distinguish himself in a higher branch of the art, he applied himself to the study of design and nature with great assiduity, and became a celebrated painter of historical subjects of a small size, which he designed and executed so much in the Italian style, that one might imagine he had studied in that country, though it is not known that he was ever in Italy. He painted a prodigious number of works, portraits, historical subjects, and landscapes, which are correctly designed, agreeably colored, and well executed. He enriched his backgrounds with elegant architecture and fine perspectives, and his figures are elegantly and appropriately grouped. Some of his works are said to bear a strong resemblance to those of Albano; others to Cortona, and his landscapes to Poussin. He also distinguished himself as an engraver, and etched a number of plates from his own designs, and after other masters, executed in a free and painter-like manner, among which are the following. He died in 1732.

The Fall of the Rebel Angels; after Rubens. Bacchus inebriated, supported by Satyrs; do. The Marriage of the Virgin and St. Joseph; after L. Giordano. Vertumnus and Pomona; from his own design. Twelve Pastoral subjects, from Guarini's Pastor Fido; do. Part of a set of twenty-eight plates of subjects from the New Testament; after the designs of John van Orley, who etched the remainder himself.

ORLEY, JOHN VAN, was a younger brother of the preceding, born at Brussels in 1656. He first studied with his father, but afterwards devoted himself to historical painting, with considerable success, and was much employed in painting for the churches in the Netherlands. In the church of St. Nicholas at Brussels, is a picture by him, representing St. Peter delivered from Prison, and in the parochial church of Asch, a picture of the Resurrection, which are highly commended. His master-piece is a large picture of the Adoration of the Magi in the Refectory of the abbey of Dillighem. He etched a part of the plates from his own designs, for the New Testament, mentioned in the list of the preceding artist. He died in 1740.

ORNERIO, GERARDO, a native of Frisio, who, according to Orlandi, was one of the most famous painters of his time on glass. He especially commends his windows in the church of S. Pietro at Bologna, executed about 1575.

ORRENTE, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Montealegre, in Murcia, in 1560. It is not known under whom he studied in his own country, but he went to Italy and became the pupil of Giacomo da Ponte (Bassano), whose manner of coloring he adopted, though his style of composition and design was very different. Some authors say that he was not a pupil of Bassano, and that he never went to Italy, supposing that he was a pupil of El Greco, and afterwards imitated the manner of Bassano, from seeing his works in Spain; but Lanzi conclusively shows that he visited Italy, where he painted some works which Conca pronounced superior to those of Bassano. On his return to Spain he was favored with the protection of the Duke of Olivarez, who employed him to paint several pictures for the palace of Bueno Retiro. He painted many works for the churches and convents at Valencia, Cordova, and Toledo. His works are numerous, and are to be found in most of the principal cities of Spain, where they are held in high estimation. In the cathedral at Toledo, is an admired picture by him representing Santa Leocadia, coming out of the Sepulchre, and in the chapel of Los Reyes Nuevos, in the same church, was a picture of the Nativity, since removed to the Royal collection at Madrid; it is a grand composition, admirably executed. In the same church are some superb landscapes, and a picture of Orpheus charming the brute creation, one of his most celebrated works. He died at Toledo in 1644, and was interred in the same church as El Greco.

ORSI, BENEDETTO, a native of Pescia, who flourished about 1660. Lanzi says he was an eminent pupil of Baldassare Franceschini, called Il Volterrano. There is a fine picture of St. John attributed to him in the church of S. Stefano at Pescia. He also painted the Seven Works of Mercy for La Compagnia de Nobili, which were shown to strangers as among the curiosities of the city till the suppression of the Order, when they were dispersed. There still exists a large circular picture in the church of S. Maria del Letto at Pistoia, which was enumerated by good judges among the finest works of Volterrano, till an authentic document proved the real painter to be Benedetto Orsi.

ORSI, BERNARDINO, a painter of Reggio, who flourished there in the latter part of the 15th century. According to Tiraboschi, he was an eminent artist in his time. Most of his works have perished. Lanzi says that Reggio still boasts a Madonna of Loretto, painted by him in the cathedral, in 1501.

his native city for some unknown reason, he established himself at Novellara, where he acquired great distinction, whence his acquired name. Notwithstanding he was one of the ablest artists of his time, and his works have been the admiration of succeeding times, very little is known of his life with any certainty, and his history is mostly founded on supposition. The Cav. Tiraboschi wrote his life, compiled from a variety of sources. The Italian writers say that he was "in pittura grande, in architettura ottimo, e in disegno massimo"; in painting grand, in architecture excellent, and in design pre-eminent. Tiraboschi conjectures on the authority of a MS., that he imbibed his taste of design at Rome; others suppose he was a pupil of Michael Angelo, or that he studied the designs and models of that master; and others again, that he was a pupil of Giulio Romano. There is great similarity in his style to that of Correggio, though of a far more robust character; his works having the same grace in his chiaro-scuro—in the spreading of his colors, and in the beauty and delicacy of his youthful heads; hence some suppose, with great probability, that he was a pupil of that master. At all events, it is certain that he was on friendly terms with Correggio, that civilities passed between them, and that he attentively studied his works, some of which he copied, as is evident from his fine copy of the celebrated Notte, now in the possession of the noble house of Gazzola at Verona. Tiraboschi says he painted several works for the churches at Rome. It would therefore seem probable, as Tiraboschi asserts, that he first studied at Rome, and afterwards improved his style, by contemplating the works of Correggio; for Lanzi says, "his design is evidently not of the Lombard school, and hence the difficulty of supposing him one of the scholars of Correggio, in which case his earlier works at least, would have partaken of a less robust character." He painted many noble frescos in the churches at Reggio and Novellara, most of which have perished. Lanzi says, "we are indebted to Francesco III., of glorious memory, for such of his works as are now to be seen at Modena, who had them transferred from the fortress of Novellara, to the ducal palace, for their preservation. Few of his altar-pieces now remain in public, at either Novellara or Reggio, the most having perished or been removed, one of which last, representing Sts. Rocco and Sebastiano along with S. Giobbe, I happened to meet in the studio of Signor Armanno at Bologna." There are a few others of doubtful authenticity, claimed to be genuine by him, at Parma, Ancona, and Mantua. He died in 1587.

ORSI, PROSPERO, a Roman painter, born in 1560, who, according to Baglioni, was employed by pope Sixtus V. in the palace of St. John of Lateran, where he painted two ceilings, one representing the children of Israel passing through the Red Sea, and the other, Isaac blessing Jacob. He was the particular friend of the Cav. Giuseppe Cesari d'Arpino, whose manner he imitated. He afterwards abandoned historical subjects for grotesques, for which he had extraordinary talents, and for this reason was called Prosperino dalle Grottesche. He died in 1635, in the pontificate of Urban VIII.

ORSONI, GIOSEFFO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1691, and died in 1755. According to Crespi, he was a disciple of Pompeo Aldrovandini, and a fellow pupil of Stefano Orlandi, with whom he formed an intimate friendship, and afterwards wrought in conjunction with him. See Orlandi.

ORSOLINI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about 1724. He carried on a considerable commerce in prints, and engraved some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino.

ORTEGA, ST. JUAN DE, a Spanish architect, who flourished during the eleventh century. According to Milizia, he was the son of Vela Velasquez, and a native of Fontana d'Ortunno, near Burges. He is said to have made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and to have erected at Montesdesa a church, a monastery, and a hospital, still existing. De Ortega also built a great many bridges in Spain, among which was one on the Ebro, near Longronno, and one near St. Domingo.

ORTOLANO, L'. See GIO. BATTISTA BENVENUTE.

ORVIETANO, ANDREA and BARTOLOMEO, two painters, probably brothers, mentioned by Della Valle, who flourished at Orvieto about 1405, and were there employed in painting for the churches.

ORVIETANO, UGOLINO, an old painter of Orvieto, who, in 1321, according to Della Valle, was employed in conjunction with Gio. Bonini di Assisi, Lello Perugino, and Fra. Giacomo da Camerino, in decorating the cathedral of that city. He was an artist of distinction in his time.

OS, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Middelbarnis in 1744, and died in 1808. He settled at the Hague, where he acquired great distinction for his fruit and flower pieces, in which he imitated the manner of John van Huysum with great success, though he had not the tenderness and delicacy of touch, of that great master. His works are highly esteemed, and are to be found in the best collections in his own country. He also painted marines, but not with equal success. His son, George Jacob John van Os, still living, is preëminent for his flower pieces. There are two magnificent flower pieces by him in the Museum at the Hague, which are said never to have been surpassed in artistic execution, brilliancy of coloring, and powerful effect.

OS, PETER GERARD VAN, was a son of the preceding, born at the Hague in 1776. He studied with his father, but he afterwards formed a style of his own, by studying and imitating the works of Paul Potter and Karel du Jardin. He acquired distinction, and his works are found in the choicest collections in Holland. He also executed quite a number of spirited etchings from his own designs, and others after Potter, Berghem, and Ruysdael, which are held in high estimation. His prints are sometimes marked P. G. van Os fec. et exc., and sometimes with his initials P. G. V. O. f. He died at the Hague in 1839.

OSORIO, FRANCISCO MENESES, a Spanish painter, a native of Seville, flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He studied under Murillo, and became one of the most successful imitators of that great artist. In concert with Juan Garzon, one of his fellow disciples, he painted several pictures in the churches and convents of Seville. In 1668, Osorio was chosen Majordomo of the Academy of that city, and presented his picture of the Conception, which was greatly admired. At the death of Murillo, in 1685, he was employed to finish the works at Cadiz, left incomplete by that master. He copied the works of Murillo to perfection, particularly his pictures of children. Among his principal works are, Elijah fed in the Desert, in the church of San Martino at Madrid; and the picture of St. Catherine, in the Capuchin monastery at Cadiz—his finest production. Osorio died at Seville about 1700.

OSSENBECK, JOHN or JOSSE, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Rotterdam in 1627. After studying in his own country, he went to Rome, where he passed the greater part of his life, and acquired distinction for his pictures of landscapes and animals, fairs and huntings, in the style of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio, whose works were then greatly admired at Rome. Though his works are greatly inferior to those of de Laer, they are ingeniously composed; and he designed his figures, horses, and other animals, with abundance of nature and truth. The back grounds of his pictures are generally embellished with fragments of antiquity, such as ruins of ancient edifices, vestiges of superb monuments, caves, or waterfalls, so exactly designed from scenes in and about Rome, that Sandrart says, "he seems in his works to have transplanted Rome to his own country." His works have the elegance and correctness of design of the Roman school, combined with the coloring and high finish of the Flemish school, executed with a delicate, but spirited pencil. He also distinguished himself as an engraver, and executed some free and spirited etchings after his own designs and others. He also engraved a part of the plates for the collection called the Gallery of Teniers, among which are the following. He died at Regensburg in 1678.

The Children of Niobe; after Palma. The Children of Israel gathering the Manna in the Desert; after Tintoretto. Orpheus playing to the Animals; after Bassano. The Four Seasons; do. A set of twelve plates of different Animals; from his own designs. A set of four different subjects; do. Two Views in and near Rome; do. A Boar-hunt; after Peter de Laer. Six large prints; after Salvator Rosa, Peter de Laer, and S. de Vlieger; scarce. A grand Festival given at Vienna, with a great number of figures on horseback and on foot; A. Lartucci, inv. J. Os senbeck, sc.; fine and scarce.

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN, a preëminent Dutch painter, born at Lubeck in 1610. He went very young to Haerlem, and studied under Francis Hals, whose works were then in high repute. He was a fellow student of Adrian Brower, with whom he contracted an ardent friendship. He had great talents and a lively genius, and adopted a style peculiar to himself, in which he equalled the best masters of his own country, and acquired a brilliant reputation for his admirable representations of subjects, which, in less skillful hands, would only have excited our disgust. His subjects are always taken from low life, and usually represent interiors of kitchens or ale-houses, with Dutch peasants smoking, dancing and regaling themselves, drunken frolics or quarrels; but he has treated these grotesque subjects with such infinite humor and spirit, and has given such a lively and natural expression to the various characters of his heads, that we forget the low vulgarity of his subjects, in admiring the truth and finesse with which he animates the uncouth actors in the scene. His coloring is rich, clear, and glowing, and he was a perfect master of the principles of chiaro-scuro.

His pencil is uncommonly light and delicate, and though his pictures have the most polished finishing, his touch is free and spirited, and wonderfully neat. There is an uncommon transparency in all his works, and there is such a harmony in the tone of coloring, as captivates the beholder. His figures were so much admired that the eminent cotemporary artists often solicited him to insert the figures in their works, which adds greatly to their value.

Ostade, after leaving his master, resided many years at Haerlem, where his works were so much admired and sought after, that he could scarcely supply the demand, at his own prices. The approach of the French troops, in 1662, excited the greatest alarm at Haerlem, and Ostade sold all his pictures and effects, and set out for his native city. On his arrival at Amsterdam with the intention of embarking for Lubeck, he was prevailed upon to abandon his fears and settle in that city, where he continued to practise his profession with great distinction till his death, in 1685. Notwithstanding he received high prices for his works, they have continued to increase ever since, and now are only to be found in the choicest collections, and whenever one is offered for sale, no price is accounted too exorbitant. In Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish masters, vol. I., and the Supplement, may be found a full description of about three hundred and eighty paintings by Adrian van Ostade, together with the prices they have brought at various sales at different periods, the names of the purchasers in many instances, the present possessors, or the collections and galleries in which they are to be found. In addition to the large number of oil paintings, he made a considerable number of drawings, in semi-opaque color, which in richness and harmonious effect, are little inferior to his oil pictures, and are so highly esteemed by connoisseurs, that they command very high prices. The commercial value of his works has increased to an astonishing degree within the last fifty years, as may be seen by one or two examples taken from the Catalogue above referred to. In the year 1800, the picture described as No. 57, was sold in the famous Geeldermeister Collection, for £229; in Penrice's sale in 1844, it brought £1375 10s. No. 104, was sold in 1802 for £340; in 1844 it brought in Mr. Harman's sale £1386.

Adrian van Ostade also executed upwards of fifty plates of charming etchings from his own designs, which are justly admired, and held by connoisseurs in high estimation. Some of them are etched in a bold and spirited manner, and printed without the assistance of the graver; others are very neatly etched and finished with the graver in the manner of Rembrandt. He sometimes signed his prints with his name, and sometimes marked them with one of the following monograms of his initials A. V. O. The most accurate account of his prints will be found in Bartsch's Peintre Graveur, tom. i. page 351. The following are his most esteemed prints:

AV, or N<sup>o</sup>., or AV., or AV

The Painter seated at his Easel. The first impressions of this plate are with the high cap considerably above the eyes; in the second impression, a lower bonnet nearly touches the eyes. An Assemblage of Peasants, occupied in killing a Pig; a night-piece, producing a fine effect of the chiaro-scuro. A Family of Peasants at table, saying grace. 1647. A Mountebank surrounded by several figures. Several Peasants at the door of a Cottage, with a fair in the back-ground. Several Peasants fighting with Knives. The Cottage Dinner. 1653. The Cobbler's Shop. 1671. A Man standing on a Bridge angling. The Interior of a Dutch Ale-house, with figures drinking and dancing. The Inside of a Cottage, with a Woman suckling a Child. The Spectacle-seller. A Man, Woman, and Child at the Door of a Cottage. 1652. Several Peasants at a Window; one of them is singing a ballad, and another holds the candle. A Man blowing a Horn, leaning over a batch. A village Festival, with a great number of figures diverting themselves at the door of an ale-house. His largest plate.

OSTADE, ISAAC VAN, was the brother of the preceding, born at Lubeck about 1617; some say in 1613, but it was probably even later than 1617, as he was the scholar of his brother, and is said to have died young, before he reached the full maturity of his powers. He probably died about 1654, as there are none of his works bearing a later date, though Houbraken says he died at Amsterdam in 1671, which is rendered improbable by the above facts, and the comparative scarcity of his works.

He at first imitated the manner and subjects of his brother, and, though they are every way inferior to the works of that great master, some of his own compositions, as well as the copies he made of his brother's works, have frequently been imposed upon the inexperienced as the genuine productions of the elder Ostade. But he afterwards adopted a style of his own, which led him to excellence and renown, in painting out-door scenes, such as travelers halting at an inn, winter-scenes of Dutch villages, frozen rivers and canals, with figures skating and otherwise amusing themselves on the ice. To these subjects he confined himself, but varied his scene and treatment so much that his pictures have no appearance of self-imitation or repetition. They are faithful representations of nature, and somewhat resemble the bold and admirable productions of Albert Cuyp. They are held in the highest estimation, and are found only in the choicest collections. Smith, in his catalogue, gives a descriptive account of 112 of his works. One of these, in the collection of M. Robit, was sold in 1801 for £361. The same picture, in the Duchess de Berri's collection, sold in 1837 for £1306. Many others have equally progressed in value.

OTTAVIANI, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, born at Rome in 1735; died in 1808. He visited Venice, where he studied under Wagner, and engraved several prints. On returning to Rome, he soon gained reputation, and became highly esteemed. His principal work was his collection of engravings after the pictures by Raffaele in the Loggia of the Vatican, of which the first part appeared in twelve numbers, folio, at Rome, 1769—1770; the second in thirteen numbers, in 1776. Among his other prints are the following:

St. Jerome with a Crucifix; after Guercino. St. Cecilia; do. Angelica and Medora; do. Mars and Venus; do. Three Women bathing surprised by a young Man; do. Diana and Acteon; do. Twenty-three plates, from the paintings by Raffaele, in the Vatican. Four plates from the pictures by Raffaele, in La Farnesia, represent ing Jupiter and Ganymede, Juno on her Car, Neptune on the Ocean, and Pluto and Proserpine.

OTTAVIANI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, the brother of the preceding. He engraved ten of the thirty-three plates published under the following title: Le pitture della capella pontificia Quirinale, opera di Guido Reni, disegnate da Pietro Angeletti ed incise da Gior. e Carlo fratelli Ottaviani.

OTTENS, FRANCIS, a Dutch engraver of little note, who flourished about 1760. He engraved some book plates and a few portraits.

OTTINI, FELICE, a Roman painter, who, according to Pascoli, was a pupil of Giacinto Brandi. He possessed excellent talents, a fine taste, and was employed, almost in his youth, to decorate the chapel of P. P. di Gesù e Maria, at Rome. He died young, in 1695.

OTTINI, PASQUALE, sometimes called PASQUALOTTO, was born at Verona in 1570. He studied with Felice Riccio, called Brusasorci, whose manner he imitated so happily that he was employed to finish some works by his master, left incomplete at his death. Lanzi says "he was a good artist in regard to forms, and of no common expression, particularly in the works he conducted after having seen Raffaello's. Of this we have a striking example in his Murder of the Innocents at S. Stefano, and his picture of St. Niccolo with other saints, at S. Giorgio, in the best style of Venetian coloring. In other instances, his coloring is somewhat languid—a defect most probably arising from time and unfavorable situation." He was in high repute in his native city, and the learned Alessandro Carli, in his History of Verona, says that he approached nearer to Paul Veronese than any other artist of that city. He died of the great plague, in 1630. He is said to have executed some beautiful etchings. Bartsch has given a description of only one known print by him, which he commends in the highest terms. It represents the Burial of Christ, and is signed, Pasq. Otti; Vers. int.

OTTMER, CARL THEODORE, an eminent German architect, born at Brunswick in 1800. After acquiring the elements of design and perspective in his native place, he went to Berlin in 1822, where he executed designs for the new Königstadt Theatre, which were so highly valued that the work was entrusted to him. He next erected the Musical Academy at Berlin, which was completed in 1827. He then visited Italy, where he remained, studying and copying the antique, for two years, when he was summoned to Dresden, to prepare designs for the new Opera House in that city; but, for some cause, the structure was not erected. In 1830 he published the first part of his work on architecture, entitled Architektonischen Mittheilungen. In 1833, he commenced the erection of the new palace at Brunswick, which was three years in completing, and is regarded as one of the most magnificent and imposing edifices of the kind in Europe. Ottmer also erected at Brunswick several other excellent works, but the Palace is regarded as his master-piece. He died at Berlin in 1843.

OTTO, H. F., a German engraver, said to have been a native of Berlin. He resided at Frankfort, and was chiefly employed by the booksellers. He engraved a part of the heads for the Notitia Universitates Francofurtanæ, published in 1707. They are indifferently executed.

OUENDYK, EVERT, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Haerlem about 1650. He painted landscapes, stag-hunts, and similar subjects, with considerable reputation.

OUENDYK, ADRIAN, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Haerlem about 1648. He painted landscapes and views of towns, in some of which the figures were inserted by Dirk Maas. His chief skill lay in copying, or perhaps pillaging the works of Adrian Vandervelde and Thomas Wyck, for which reason he was surnamed Rapiamus. He was living in 1696.

UDINET, MARC ANTOINE, a French medalist, born at Rheims in 1643. He at first studied law in his native city, but subsequently relinquished his profession to go to Paris with his relative Rainssant, as keeper of the medals in the King's cabinet. The skill with which he arranged this valuable collection obtained for him a pension, and the honor of a seat in the Academy of Belles-Lettres. He wrote three dissertations upon medals, of great merit. He died in 1712.

UDRY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1686. He studied under Nicholas Largilliere. He was an able designer and a respectable colorist, and for some time practised historical painting with considerable ability, as is shown by his picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Leu, and the Adoration of the Magi in the chapter of S. Martin des Champs. He afterwards adopted a different branch of the art, in which he acquired distinction. These were hunting pieces, cavalcades, and other similar subjects in which the figures, horses, and other animals are designed with great correctness and spirit, and touched with a facile and vigorous pencil. There are many of his works of this class in the royal palaces, and the collections in France, where they are highly esteemed. He also painted portraits, landscapes, architecture, fruit, and flower-pieces. He also executed some etchings, from his own designs, in a bold, free, and masterly style. Bartsch gives a descriptive list of 66 prints by him. There are some others, of doubtful authenticity, attributed to him. He died at Beauvais, in 1755.

OUGRUMOFF, G., a Russian painter, born in 1764. He studied in the Academy of Fine Arts at Petersburg, and, in 1785, gained a prize in painting. He is said to have attained a high rank among the artists of his country. Among the principal works of Ougrumoff, are his Conquest of Kasan by the Czar Iwan IV.; and the Coronation of Michael Romanoff. In 1797 he was chosen a member of the Academy, and attained the rank of Director in 1820. He died in 1833.

OUVRIER, JEAN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1725. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and engraved a variety of landscapes, vignettes, and other subjects, neatly executed with the graver, though somewhat too dark in the shadows. He died in 1754. The following are among his best prints:

The Villagers of the Appenines; after Pierre. A View of the Alps; after Vernet. A View of the Appenines; do. The Magic Lantern; after Schenau. The Flemish School; after Eisen the elder. The Dutch School; do. The Genius of Design, an emblematical subject; after Cochin.

OUWATER, or OUTWATER, ALBERT VAN, an old Dutch painter, born at Haerlem, according to van Mander, in 1444, and died in 1515; though this is disputed by others. Zani says he was born in 1370; Balkema places his birth in 1366, and death in 1424. There is great uncertainty as to the time in which he flourished; nor is this of much importance, as little remains by him that is authentic. Van Mander and Sandrart extol an altar-piece by him in the principal church at Haerlem, representing St. Peter and St. Paul, in which the figures are carefully and correctly designed, and richly colored, though stiff and labored in the finishing; and they describe another of his works, representing the Resurrection of Lazarus, with several figures, designed in a style superior to what was usually practised at that early period. Very old pictures of the Dutch school, which do not accord with the van Eycks and Hugo vander Goes, are often attributed to Ouwater.

OUWATER, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1747. He painted views of the chief cities in Holland, especially of Amsterdam, Haerlem, and Utrecht, ornamented with numerous figures, somewhat in the style of vander Heyden. In his larger pictures, in addition to pedestrians he introduced carriages and horsemen. His representations are accurate, his perspective of streets fine, and the shadows and reflections of buildings and vessels in the water produce a fine effect. His penciling is minute and neat, his coloring rich and harmonious; and, though his works are far inferior to those of vander Heyden, they possess much merit, and are held in considerable estimation.

OUWATER, JACOB, a Dutch painter of fruit and flowers, of whom little is known except his works, which denote a painter of very high order in this branch of the art. His pictures are admirably composed, correctly designed, finely colored, and highly finished. It is conjectured that he flourished about 1750.

OVENS, JURIAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1600, according to Nagler, who cites his portrait, dated 1666, anno ætatis 66. He studied in the school of Rembrandt, and acquired from him an excellent knowledge of coloring, and of the principles of chiaro-scuro. He excelled in painting night-pieces and subjects by torch-light. His portraits are particularly esteemed for their uncommon truth, and expression of character, as well as for the beauty and harmony of their coloring. He also painted history with considerable reputation. In the Stadt-House at Amsterdam are several of his pictures, representing subjects from ancient history, painted in the vigorous style of his master. One of these represents Julius Civilis in the consecrated grove, exhorting and animating the Batavians to shake off the Roman yoke and fight for their liberties. As the consultation of the Batavians was held at night, it afforded the painter an opportunity of exhibiting his genius in his favorite style of painting, in representing the transaction by the light of flambeaux and fires. This performance alone is accounted sufficient to establish his reputation as a great master. In 1665, he was invited to the court of the Duke of Holstein, in whose service he continued until his death, in 1678.

OVERBECK, BONAVENTURA VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1660. His parents were in affluent circumstances, and gave him a liberal education. While at college, he distinguished himself by the rapid advancement he made in his studies. On leaving the University, having a strong predilection for painting, he placed himself under Gerard de Lairese. He afterwards went to Rome, where he applied himself with great assiduity in studying and drawing after the works of the best masters, and the remains of antiquity. He formed a rich collection of drawings and casts during his residence of several years at Rome, with which he returned to his native city, where he was warmly received by his friend and instructor Lairese, and was visited and caressed by all the artists of Amsterdam. He executed some historical works, which were greatly admired. He possessed superior talents, with a thorough knowledge of art, and might have become one of the most distinguished artists of his time, had he not given way to an unfortunate disposition to dissipation and excess. His attention was also diverted, and his time greatly occupied in the preparation of a work he designed to publish, with plates engraved by himself, from the designs he had made and collected at Rome. He died of a fever brought on by a debauch, in 1706. Before his death, he engaged his nephew to undertake the publication of the work, which he desired to be dedicated to Queen Anne of England. It was published in 1709, in French, under the title Les restes de l'ancienne Rome.

OVERBECK, FRIEDRICH, one of the great leaders of the present German school, was born at Lubeck in 1789. In 1809 he went to Rome, where he remained till 1831, when he made a journey to Munich, to exhibit some of his beautiful designs at the Academy of the Fine Arts in that city, the grandeur of which caused a great sensation among the artists and connoisseurs. He was among the first to give impulse to the present aspiring state of painting in Germany, by reverting to the almost forgotten principles which guided the old masters. He has produced many works which prove him an artist truly inspired with a love of the grand and the beautiful. He was not in a hurry to distinguish himself, but spent many years in acquiring a profound knowledge of art. After ascertaining his strength, he commenced his picture of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, now in the principal church of the city of Lubeck, which at once established his reputation. He next painted the Adoration of the Magi for the Queen of Bavaria, and Christ visiting Mary and Martha, for his friend Vogel the painter, of Zurich. He afterwards returned to Rome, where he still resides. He gained immense reputation at Rome for his fresco works, and was selected by Canova to ornament a part of the walls of the Vatican. He represented there the Coliseum, and placed the Virgin in the centre, appearing to a pilgrim, thus ingeniously contrasting the different states and feelings of the people of ancient and modern Rome. Among his most admired productions in fresco are the Joseph sold by his Brethren, and the Seven Years of Famine, which decorate La Salle Bartoldi, at Rome; a series of subjects from Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, in the Villa Massimi; the Vision of St. Francis di Assisi, in the church of S. Maria degli Angeli, which last is considered one of the greatest works of the present epoch. His later productions of Christ in the Garden, Judith, and some frescos at Frankfort, have tended to increase his reputation. His drawings are numerous, of rare merit, and have widely spread his excellence and fame. His works have been criticised as deficient in knowledge of coloring, and his carnations are said to want life and energy; but Overbeck, like Niccolo Poussin, is of opinion that talent and tendency that way are more injurious than favorable to the perfection of art. Though critics will allow this in the classical productions of the latter, they will hardly grant it in the different class of subjects adopted by the former. Overbeck married the daughter of Schlegel, the great German critic. The school of which he may be considered the founder, is ably supported by several living German artists, among whom are Cornelius, Schadow, Bendeman, Weit, Schnorr, and Hess, all of whom are emulous of sharing the glory of their chief, and handing down their own names to posterity.

OVERBECK, LEENDERT, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem in 1752, and a pupil of H. Meyer. At first he devoted himself mostly to painting designs for tapestry. He afterwards abandoned painting for engraving. He etched a number of landscapes, a list of which may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. He died at Haerlem, in 1815.

OWEN, WILLIAM, an eminent English painter of portraits and fancy subjects, born at Ludlow, in Shropshire, in 1769. About 1786, he went to London, and studied under Catton, and afterwards had the benefit of the advice and instruction of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Though he was not a fashionable painter, he acquired distinction, and painted the portraits of many eminent persons, among whom were William Pitt, Lord Grenville, the Marquis of Stafford, Sir William Scott, Cyril Jackson, Vicary Gibbs, Chief Justice Abbot, the Earl of Bridgewater, Viscount Exmouth, John Soane, &c. These he executed in a bold, vigorous style, with good coloring; and he gave a striking likeness. He was less successful in his female portraits. He also painted many fancy pictures, which are ranked among the finest of that class of works by the English artists of that time. Among these are the Beggar's Daughter, the Sleeping Girl, the School Mistress, the Girl at the Spring, the Road-Side, the Cottage Door, Children in the Wood, Cupid, the Fortune-Teller, &c., some of which have been engraved. In 1806 he was elected a Royal Academician; in 1810 he was appointed portrait painter to the Prince of Wales, and afterwards "principal portrait painter to the Prince Regent," who offered to knight him, which honor he declined, as it promised to be more expensive than advantageous. His professional income, when at the height of his career, was about £3,000 per annum. During the last five years of his life his health gradually declined. He died on the 11th of February, 1825, by poison, taken by mistake for an aperient draught, through the carelessness of an apothecary's boy, who wrongly labelled the bottle. He was a man of estimable character, and his death was deeply lamented.

OZANNE, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1724. He engraved a number of plates of landscapes, marines, and sea-ports, from his own designs, executed with the graver in a neat, finished style. His vessels, in particular, are designed with great precision. Among the others by him, are a set of four landscapes, two views of the port of Brest, and a set of four marines, signed Ozanne. fec.

OZANNE, JANE FRANCES and MARY JANE, were sisters of the preceding artist, and learned engraving of Aliamet. They engraved, in a neat style, some plates of marines, sea-ports, pastoral subjects, and landscapes, after Vernet, Hackert, Wouwerman, and others. They are marked J. F. Ozanne, or M. J. Ozanne.

P.

PACCELLI, MATTEO, called DELLA BASILICATA, a Neapolitan painter, born about 1660. According to Dominici, he was the favorite disciple of Luca Giordano, and one of his most successful imitators. He executed some works for the churches, more distinguished for brilliant coloring and facility of execution, than for correctness of design. When Giordano was invited to Spain in 1692, by Charles II., he selected Matteo Paccelli and Aniello Rossi, his two favorite pupils, to accompany him as his assistants. They continued with him during his ten years sojourn at that court, and rendered him such valuable assistance in the execution of his numerous works, that, on their return to Naples with their master, the King settled upon them handsome pensions, which enabled them to pass the rest of their days in independence. Paccelli died in 1731.

PACCHIAROTTI, JACOPO, a painter of Siena, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century. It is not known under whom he first studied, but he formed his style by an attentive study of the works of Pietro Perugino, whom he at first closely imitated. Lanzi says, "Siena possesses several cabinet pictures and altar-pieces by him, in the style of Perugino," and that he so closely imitated that master that many of his works have passed under his name, or that of his school. He afterwards greatly improved himself by studying the works of Raffaello. His best works are his frescos in the churches of S. Caterina and S. Bernardino, in which Lanzi says he emulated the ablest artists of Siena; the chief of these is a picture in the church of S. Caterina, representing that Saint visiting the Body of St. Agnes di Montepulciano—a grand composition, in which the airs of the heads are said to approach those of Raffaello. There is much contradiction about the real merits of this artist. Speth, a German critic, says the works last referred to, can be justly compared to those of Raffaello alone, and that great injustice is done to him by classing him in the school of Perugino; but no Italian author gives him any such rank, and Vasari only mentions him incidentally in his life of Razzi, under the name of Girolamo del Pacchia, "a rival of Razzi himself." In 1535, he headed an insurrection against the government, and only escaped an ignominious death by seeking refuge in the monastery of the Osservanti, where he was concealed till an opportunity was found for him to flee into France, where he is supposed to have died. It is probable that he never saw the best works of Raffaello, as Lanzi thinks it doubtful if he had ever been out of Siena before 1535.

PACE, DEL. See PACI.

PACECCO, or PACICCO. See FRANCESCO DI ROSA.

PACHICO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born, according to Cean Bermudez, at Seville, in 1571. He studied under Luis Fernandez, a painter of serges and flags, to which occupation, and that of painting and gilding statues or images, he first devoted himself. In 1611 he visited Toledo and Madrid. He attentively studied the works of the great masters in the Escorial, and greatly improved himself. On his return to Seville, he opened an academy for the instruction of young artists, and had the honor of instructing Alonso Cano and Don Diego Velasquez, the last of whom married his daughter. His works are not worthy of much notice. Palomino says he was a correct and rigid designer, his compositions are studied and appropriate, and the airs of his heads noble and dignified; but his execution was feeble, his coloring indifferent, and his manner crude and dry—the last part of which criticism effectually destroys the first. He painted some pictures for the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, in competition with Alonso Vasquez, in which he was greatly surpassed by his rival. In 1623 he again visited Madrid, in company with his scholar and son-in-law, Velasquez, where he resided two years, and “dressed, gilded, and painted a statue of the Virgin by Juan Gomez de Mora, for the Duchess of Olivarez”; a work that was greatly admired, the decoration of which cost 500 ducats! He wrote an elementary treatise on painting, which is considered in Spain indispensable for the instruction of students, and the best in the language. He died at Seville in 1654.

PACHICO, CRISTOFORO, a Spanish portrait painter, of the school of Madrid, flourished in 1568. He was patronized by the Duke of Alba, and executed a number of works for his palace, which were destroyed in the conflagration of that edifice. His portraits are characterized by a good style of design and beautiful coloring; and the draperies are painted with a faithful adherence to the style of dress prevailing in his time.

PACI, RANJERI, called DEL PACE, a native of Pisa, who studied under Antonio Domenico Gabbiani, whose manner he adopted. According to Morrona, he executed some works for the churches of his native city in a reputable manner; but Lanzi says that by carelessness and inattention, he degenerated into a complete mannerist. He flourished in 1719.

PACOT, a French engraver, who flourished about 1690. He engraved some plates of battles and sea-fights, etched in a spirited style, and neatly finished with the graver.

PADERNA, GIOVANNI, a Bolognese painter, born, according to Malvasia, about 1600, and died in 1640. Lanzi says he died at the age of 40, but does not give the date; and Zani says he was living in 1647. He studied under Dentone (Giro-lamo Curti), under whose instruction he became an eminent painter of perspective and architecture, and after the death of that master he was much employed in decorating the churches, and the public and private edifices of that city. Lanzi says he was an accomplished imitator of Agostino Mitelli, one of the most eminent painters of perspective and architecture of his time. Yet this master was accounted inferior to Dentone, and he was born in 1609, nine years later than Paderna, as above stated. Others say that his success excited the jealousy of Mitelli. Lanzi also says that he associated himself with Baldassare Bianchi, who on the death of Paderna married the daughter of Mitelli. Of his numerous works at Bologna, the decorations of the Capella Zagoni, in the church la Madonna della Liberta, are considered among the best.

PADERNA, PAOLO ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1649. He first studied under Guercino, but on the death of that master he entered the school of Carlo Cignani. Although he was a reputable painter of history, he chiefly excelled in landscapes, in which Lanzi says “he was an admirable imitator of the manner of Guercino.” He was much employed in painting for the collections. His pictures are designed and executed in a bold and vigorous style, his scenery is grand, his coloring clear and harmonious, and his chiaro-scuro excellent. He died in 1708.

PADOVA, GIROLAMO DA, called also GIROLAMO DAL SANTO, a painter born at Padua, where he died about 1550, aged 70. He was celebrated in his day for his small pictures of historical subjects, which he decorated with bassi-relievi, sarcophagi, and other antique ornaments, with inscriptions copied for the most part from the Paduan marbles. On the death of Bernardo Parentino in 1531, he was commissioned to continue the admirable works executed by that master in a cloister of the monastery of Santa Giustina. In these Lanzi says he showed himself greatly inferior to Parentino in his design and expression, but he commends his elegant accessories, designed from the antique.

PADOVA, MAESTRO ANGELO, a painter of Padua, who painted about 1489, in the Refectory of the monastery of Santa Giustina, a picture of the Crucifixion, which Lanzi says is designed in a grand style, and executed with great spirit. He was a close imitator of the style of Andrea Mantegna.

PADOVANINO. See ALESSANDRO VAROTARI.

PADOVANINO, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Padua in 1552. It is not known with whom he studied, but he painted history with considerable reputation. He possessed inventive genius, and was a correct and graceful designer. He painted some works for the churches, one of the best of which is a picture in the church of la Madonna del Carmine at Venice, representing a Saint interceding for two criminals condemned to death. He excelled in portraits, which were admired for their truth, dignity, and excellent coloring. He was much employed in this branch of the art, and painted the portraits of many distinguished persons. He died in 1617.

PADOVANINO, OTTAVIO, was the son of the preceding, born at Padua in 1582. After studying with his father, he went to Rome for improvement. He acquired some celebrity for his historical works, but more for his admirable portraits. He died in 1634.

PADOVANO, or PATAVINUS. See AVIBUS.

PADOVANO, GIUSTO, an old painter who lived at Padua, and died there in 1397, at an advanced age. He was a native of Florence, and his name was Giusto Menabuoi; but he was called Padovano from having been naturally a citizen of Padua, where he chiefly resided. Vasari says he was a disciple of Giotto, and attributes to him the very extensive works which adorn the church of S. Giovanni Battista in that city. In the picture over the altar are represented various histories of St. John the Baptist; on the walls are represented various scriptural events and Mysteries of the Apocalypse; and in the cupola, is a choir of Angels, where we behold, as in a grand consistory, the Blessed, seated upon the ground, arrayed in various garments. Lanzi says the composition of these works is very simple, but they are executed with an incredible degree of diligence and felicity.

PADOVANO, GIOVANNI and ANTONIO, two old painters, probably brothers, to whom Morelli attributes the works in the church of S. Giovanni Battista, mentioned in the preceding article. In his Notizia, he says that formerly there was the following inscription on one of the gates, Opus Johannis et Antonii de Padua, for which reason he conjectures that they were the painters of the whole temple.

PADOVANO, LAURO. In the Venezia Descritta by Sansovino, this painter is said to have been a native of Padua, and a scholar of Francesco Squarcione. He was one of the most successful imitators of the manner of Andrea Mantegna. There are some of his works in the church of La Carità, at Venice, representing subjects from the life of St. John, which rank among the best productions of his time. He also painted at Padua. He flourished about 1460. Lanzi calls him Lauro da Padova, and applies the same history to him. Others call him Lauro or Lauri da Padova. Zani says he painted from 1470 to 1500, but he is often inaccurate in his dates, and evidently often guesses at them. Many of the old Italian artists are called after the places of their nativity or chief residence, and this is always the case when the real name is not known; thus Lauro da Padova, or Padovano, or Padovanino, means Lauro of Padua, or Lauro the Paduan, or Lauro, the admired Paduan. In the latter case, the word is a diminutive, having a signification of eminence, and endearment. Thus, Francesco Mazzuoli, is generally called by the Italians, Parmiggiano, from Parma, his native place, but his fellow citizens endearingly call him Parmiggianino.

PADTBRUGGE, H. L., a Swedish engraver, who flourished at Stockholm about 1700. He engraved a part of the plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna, containing 350 plates. The first edition was published at Stockholm in 3 vols. fol. in 1693, and the second in 1714.

PAELINCK, an eminent Belgian painter, born at Oostacker, near Ghent, in 1781. He first studied under Verhaegen, then professor of painting in the Academy at Ghent. He next went to Paris, and entered the school of David. On his return to Ghent, he contended for the prize offered by the Academy, which he obtained for his Judgment of Paris, and he was appointed Professor of Design in that institution. He shortly afterwards resigned his professorship, and went to Rome, where he remained eight years, diligently studying the antique and the works of the great masters. While at Rome, he distinguished himself, and painted a large picture representing the embellishments of Rome by Augustus, by the commission of the Pope, for his palace at Monte Cavallo. On his return to his own country, he executed many works for the churches and public edifices, as well as for individuals, which justly rank him among the most eminent of the modern Belgian painters. Among his most esteemed works were, The Finding of the Cross, in the church of S. Michael at Ghent; The Adoration of the Shepherds, in the convent of La Trappe, near Antwerp; The Flight into Egypt, at Malines; The Departure of Tobit, at Opbrackel; The Return of Tobit, for Maria Oudenhove; The Assumption of the Virgin, at Muysen; The Disciples at Emmaus, at Everghem; The Calvary, at Oostacker, &c. These works are designed in a grand and elevated style, and display a profound knowledge of art. He is accused of over-fondness of academic display, and this blemish is more apparent in his profane subjects, although those of a sacred character, are not entirely free from it. Among his other most beautiful productions are, The Dance of the Muses; The Judgment of Midas; The Abdication of the Emperor Charles V., and the Toilet of Psyche, in the Museum at the Hague. He died at Brussels in 1839.

PAESI, DA', a name given to several painters of landscapes and rural subjects. See Francesco Bassi, Antonio dal Sole, Girolamo Muziano, and Girolamo Vernigo.

PAGANELLI, NICCOLO, a painter born at Faenza in 1538, and died in 1620. It is not known under whom he studied, but according to Oretti, he was an excellent artist of the Roman school. Lanzi says that some attribute to him a fine picture of S. Martino, in the cathedral, supposed to be the work of Luca Longhi, and that his genuine works are recognised by the initials N. X. P.

PAGANI, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Florence in 1531. According to Baldinucci, after learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Rome, where he studied the works of Polidoro da Caravaggio and Maturino, but Lanzi says he imitated the works of Polidoro and Michael Angelo, and that he painted several such admirable imitations of those masters for individuals of Florence, while he was at Rome, that they could scarcely be distinguished from the genuine works. On his return to Florence, he executed several works which gained him great reputation. He died in 1561, in the flower of his life, greatly lamented, as one of the most promising artists of his time.

PAGANI, GREGORIO, was the son of Francesco P., born at Florence in 1558. He first studied under Sauto di Titi, and afterwards with Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli, whose style he adopted. Lanzi says he was praised by strangers as a second Cigoli, and that he was much employed by them; hence there are few of his pictures at Florence. His most celebrated work, the Finding of the Cross, in the Carmine, which has been engraved, was destroyed with that edifice by fire. He painted a few frescos, all of which have perished, except one in the cloister of S. Maria Novella, commended by Lanzi, though injured by time. He died in 1605.

PAGANI, GASPARO, a painter of Modena, who flourished there in 1543. It is not known under whom he studied, but he adopted the manner of Raffaello, for which reason Lanzi supposes he was instructed by Munari or the Taraschi, who succeeded in the school of that master. Few of his historical works now remain. He was also an excellent portrait painter.

PAGANI, PAOLO, a painter born at Valsolda, in the Milanese territory, in 1661. He went to Venice, where he formed a style of his own, founded on the works of the best Venetian masters, which gained him considerable reputation in that city, where he executed several fine works for the churches and opened an academy for the instruction of young artists. After a residence of some years at Venice, he returned to Milan, and was employed in the churches and public edifices, and painted much for private collections. There are several of his best works in the Dresden gallery. He died in 1716.

PAGANI, VINCENZIO, a native of Monte Rubbiano, in the Picenum, of whom there are notices from 1529 to 1553. Colucci, in his "Memorie de Monte Rubbiano," says he was a scholar of Raffaele. He executed many works for the churches in the Roman territory, particularly in his native place, at Fallerone, and at Sarnano. One of his most beautiful works is the Assumption of the Virgin, in the collegiate church at Monte Rubbiano, designed and executed entirely in the manner of Raffaele. The Padre Civalli highly extols two of his works in the church of his order at Sarnano. In 1553 he was employed to paint the altar-piece of the Capella degli Oddi, in the church of the Conventuals at Perugia, which is highly commended. Little is known of this artist except his works, which are of a high character; probably arising from his secluded life. Lanzi, and others, doubt whether he was really a scholar of Raffaele, but rather think he formed his style by contemplating his works.

PAGANI, LATTANZIO. See MARCA.

PAGANINI. See CAV. GUIDO MAZZONI.

PAGANINI, GUGLIELMO CAPODORO, a painter born at Mantua, according to Orlandi, in 1670, and a scholar of Antonio Calza. His genius leading him to paint battle-pieces, skirmishes of cavalry, encampments, &c., he went to Florence, where he carefully studied the works of Borgognone, whose manner he imitated with much success. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and executed with great freedom and spirit. The time of his death is not known.

PAGGI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an eminent painter, born at Genoa in 1554. He was a patrician by birth, and having a passion for painting, he indulged in it from his earliest years, in spite of the opposition of his father. He was highly accomplished in letters, and his various attainments in history, poetry, philosophy, all served to assist him in the composition of his pictures. He studied painting under Luca Cambiasi, and improved himself by copying the antique statues and bas-reliefs. He had already acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, when he was obliged to flee from Genoa, in consequence of a duel, in which he slew his antagonist. He sought refuge at Florence, where he was protected and employed by the court for twenty years. Florence at that time abounded with men of genius, whom the liberality of the Grand Duke Francis I. had drawn to his court. Among them were Lodovico Cardi, and several other artists of distinction, who contributed to reform the Florentine school from the languid state into which it had fallen, by the introduction of the more rich and vigorous style of the Lombard school. Paggi's first productions were rather distinguished by elegance and grace, than energy, in which he seems to have imitated the suavity of Baroccio. Such is his Holy Family, in the church degli Angeli. Lanzi says, "the great merit of Paggi at this time was not vigor, but a certain nobleness of air, which always continued to be his characteristic, and a delicacy and grace which have led some to compare him with Baroccio and Correggio; as is seen in his History of St. Catherine, in the cloister of S. Maria Novella, a grand composition, ornamented with beautiful buildings, and so pleasingly executed, that I have heard it preferred to all others in that court." As he advanced, he adopted a more vigorous style, which gained him immense reputation. Lanzi pronounces his Transfiguration in the church of S. Marco, "a stupendous work, which seems almost beyond his powers." He afterwards painted for the Certosa at Pavia, three pictures from the Passion of our Saviour, in the same grand style, which are considered among his best works. About 1600, his great reputation induced the republic of Genoa to recall him; at the same time, he was invited to the courts of Pavia and Madrid, but his love of country prevented him from accepting these honorable appointments, and he returned to his native city, where he passed the rest of his days, and executed many of his best works. Perhaps his master-piece is the Murder of the Innocents, in the Palazzo Doria, painted in 1606, in competition with Rubens. He contributed greatly to the revival of the art at Genoa, wrote some excellent treatises on the art, and instructed several pupils who distinguished themselves. He died in 1627.

PAGGIO, IL. See FRANCESCO MERANO.

PAGLIA, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Brescia in 1636. He was a scholar of Guercino, whose manner he imitated. Lanzi says he was excellent in laying on his colors, admirable in his chiaro-scuro, but he displayed little spirit, and his proportions were frequently too long and slender. His best work is an altar-piece in the church of La Carità. He excelled in portraits, which are distinguished for dignity and truth of character, great purity of color, and uncommon relief. Orlandi says he was living in 1700; others, that he died about 1700; and Zani, that he died in 1713.

PAGLIA, ANTONIO and ANGIOLO, were sons and scholars of the preceding, and were reputable artists. Antonio was born in 1680, and died in 1747. Angiolo was born in 1681, and died in 1763.

PAGNI, BENEDETTO, was a native of Pescia, and studied in the school of Giulio Romano at Rome. He accompanied that master to Mantua, where he assisted him in his works. He acquired considerable distinction as an historical painter, and executed some works for the churches. Lanzi says his picture of the Martyrdom of S. Lorenzo in the church of S. Andrea, at Mantua, is worthy of the school of his master. Many pictures are claimed to have been executed by him in his native city, but Lanzi thinks that the Marriage at Cana, in the collegiate church, and the façade of the house of the Pagni family, are the only genuine ones. Zani says he painted from 1525 to 1570.

PAIGEOLINE, an Italian engraver of whom nothing is known. There is a slight, but spirited etching, bearing his name, after the picture by Paul Veronese, representing the Mother of Moses brought to Pharaoh's Daughter, as a nurse for her son. Zani spells his name Paigeloine.

PAIOT, a French engraver of little note, who flourished about 1627. He was chiefly employed in engraving frontispieces, vignettes, and other book plates for the booksellers. They are indifferently executed.

PAJOU, AUGUSTIN, a distinguished French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1730. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was placed in the school of Lemoine, where he made such rapid advances that, at the age of eighteen, he gained the grand prize of the French Academy, and went to Rome with the royal pension. After pursuing his studies in that city for twelve years, he returned to Paris, and was admitted to the Academy, on the presentation of his group of Pluto holding Cerberus chained. This production gained for Pajou a great reputation, and he was soon extensively employed. His style was natural and masterly, and he far surpassed the sculptors of the preceding generation. In 1767 he was appointed Professor of Sculpture in the French Academy; and during the rule of Napoleon he was a member of the Institute. In 1768 he exhibited a sketch of the tomb of Stanislaus, King of Poland, father-in-law of Louis XV.; a leaden statue of life size, representing Love as the Ruler of the Elements; and four colossal figures in stone, for the garden of the Palais Royal, representing Prudence, Liberality, Mars, and Apollo. Among his principal works are the statues of Bossuet, and Descartes; Psyche abandoned, in the Luxembourg; the sculptures for the façade of the Palais Royal, ordered by Louis XVI.; the sculptures of the Opera House at Versailles; the ornaments of the Bourbon Palace, and of the cathedral of Orleans; and the Naiads of the south and west sides of the Fountain of the Innocents. Pajou died at Paris in 1809.

PALADINI, FILIPPO, a painter commended by Hackert, who flourished about 1600, and executed several works for the churches in Syracuse, Palermo, Catania, and other places. Lanzi thinks this artist the same as Filippo Palladino, which see.

PALADINI, FILIPPO, a painter born at Pisa about 1570. He was a reputable painter of history, but chiefly excelled in portraits.

PALADINI, ARCANGELA, was the daughter of the preceding, born at Pisa in 1599. She was instructed by her father, and acquired much distinction in her time, for the excellence of her portraits, and her beautiful embroidery. She excelled also in music. Maria Magdalena, Archduchess of Austria, took her under her protection, and she resided at the court of Florence many years, universally esteemed. She was also much employed by the nobility. Her portrait, painted by herself, is in the Florentine gallery.

PALADINI, CAV. GIUSEPPE, a Sicilian painter, who flourished at Palermo about the middle of the 17th century. Little is known of him, as the lives of the Sicilian artists have never been properly written. Hackert makes honorable mention of two of his works in the church of S. Joseph at Castel Termini, representing the Madonna and an Altar-piece of the titular Saint.

PALADINI, LITTERIO, a Sicilian painter, born, according to Hackert, in 1591. He studied at Rome under Sebastiano Conca, and afterwards improved himself by a diligent study of the antique models. On his return to Messina, he was employed on several considerable fresco works for the churches, the chief of which is the ceiling of the church of Monte Vergine. This work is on a grand scale, and is highly commended for correctness of design. He died of the great plague which ravaged Messina in 1743.

PALAMEDES. See STAEVAERTS.

PALENIER, JOACHIM, a Flemish painter, born at Dinant in 1490. He excelled in landscapes with small figures. He settled at Antwerp, where he acquired distinction, and was elected a member of the Academy in that city, in 1515. He died there in 1548.

PALING, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, who, according to Houbraken, flourished about 1670. He was a scholar of Abraham vander Tempel, and painted portraits and conversation pieces in the style of that master. He went to London in the reign of Charles II., where he practised portrait painting some years, and returned to his own country in 1682.

PALLADINO, ADRIANO, a painter, born at Cortona in 1610. According to Orlandi, he was the scholar of Pietro Berretini, whose style he imitated with success. He executed several works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, which are commended. He died at Cortona in 1680.

PALLADINO, FILIPPO, a painter born at Florence about 1544. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but Lanzi says he seems to have studied the Lombard more than the native artists, and to have been acquainted with Baroccio. After acquiring considerable reputation by his picture of the Decollation of St. John in the church of that saint, at Florence, and an altar-piece at S. Jacopo a'Corbolini at Milan, he was obliged to fly from that city on account of some disturbance. He sought refuge at Rome, where he was received by the Prince Colonna; but being pursued, he went to Sicily, and resided at Mazzarino, on an estate belonging to the Colonna family. There, as well as at Syracuse, Palermo, Catania, and other places, he executed works for the churches, which Lanzi says are elegantly designed and finely colored, though they are not free from mannerism. He died at Mazzarino in 1614.

PALLADIO, ANDREA, a celebrated Italian architect, born at Vicenza, in the Venetian territory, in 1518. Little is certainly known of his family, or his first studies; but, according to Milizia, he acquired a knowledge of literature, and afterwards devoted himself with great diligence to the study of Vitruvius and Alberti. He found an encouraging patron in his countryman Gio. Giorgio Trissino, who took Palladio three times to Rome, where the young architect made the greatest possible use of his advantages, measuring and taking drawings of all the ancient edifices of Rome and the vicinity. He appears to have returned from the last of these journeys in 1547, in his twenty-ninth year, when he settled at Vicenza, and was employed on the Palazzo Pubblico at Udine, commenced by Gio. Fontana, an architect of Vicenza. His first important work, however, was the grand Portico surrounding the ancient Basilica on three sides. It is all of fine stone; the first floor is Doric; the second Ionic, both ornamented with arches and columns, with entablatures of exquisite symmetry. The principal excellence of this work consists in making the new agree with the old, as the columns of the new exterior necessarily come in contact with the Gothic pilasters of the interior, requisite for its support. Notwithstanding this difficulty Palladio produced such an elegant and well proportioned edifice, that his reputation immediately rose to a great height, and he was invited to Rome by Paul III., who wished to consult him in regard to the works in progress at St. Peter's. On returning to Vicenza, he seems to have been overwhelmed with commissions for mansions and villas, of which class of subjects his works chiefly consist. Among the numerous private mansions designed or erected by him at Vicenza, are the Palazzi Tiene, Valmarana, Chieracati, Porti, Capitanale, Barbarino, &c.; also the celebrated Villa Capra or Rotonda near the city, and a great many villas along the Brenta.

The increasing fame of Palladio caused him to be invited to Venice, as Sansovino was then growing infirm. His first work there was the monastery of the Lateran Canons della Carità, of which the entrance was through a beautiful Corinthian portico. He afterwards erected two churches at Venice,—S. Giorgio Maggiore, and Il Redentore. The first is built on the plan of a Latin cross, with three naves, elevated from the ground on seven steps. The façade is adorned with a Composite order on a pedestal, which runs entirely around, terminated by a proportionate pediment, under which are two half pediments, indicating the lateral naves. This edifice is characterized by unity and simplicity in the ornaments, producing a majestic effect. The church of the Capuchins, called Il Redentore (the Redeemer), is entirely Corinthian, with a single nave, ninety two feet long, and forty-six wide. Palladio was invited to the court of Duke Emanuel Philibert of Savoy, who received him with distinguished honors. His designs were in great request throughout Italy. Besides the works by him already mentioned, there are the following: the façade of the church della Vigna, at Venice; the magnificent Palazzo Barbaro, at Maser in the Trevigiano; and a noble Palace at Montagnana for Francesco Pisani. His last work was the Olympic Theatre at Vicenza, which he did not live to complete. He died in 1580, aged 62.

The merits of Palladio have been extravagantly extolled by Göethe, Quatremère de Quincy, Forsyth, Hope, Beckford, and others; but these authorities do not attempt to show wherein his excellencies consist. It cannot be denied that his works abound in imperfections, chiefly relating to details. Among them may be mentioned such errors as windows cutting into architraves, windows within friezes, doors lower than windows, ornamented and unornamented windows in the same composition, extremely wide intercolumniations, heavy pediments, and a certain dryness, mannerism, and monotony of detail. It is very probable, however, that most of these defects arose in the execution, as Palladio designed many works which were executed by others; also, Milizia instances a number of edifices attributed to Palladio, which were probably not of his execution. He says, "It is in the beauty of architecture that he merits particular attention. Having always before him the noble style of the ancients, he acquired simplicity and majesty. He never used recesses or reliefs on the pedestals; he seldom sculptured the architraves; and carried his upper ornaments straight, and without projections. His doors, windows, and niches, were simple, and their pediments never broken. He preserved the exact character of each order, never loaded the members of the cornice, nor without reason introduced any new ones. He was extremely accurate in the setting out or measurement of his entablatures. He varied the proportions of the orders according to the nature of his buildings, and also the internal proportions of his rooms, halls, and temples, using the arithmetical, geometrical, and harmonic proportions. Amid the various proportions found among the ruins of antiquity, he well knew how to select the most perfect. His outlines are bold and easy; none of his buildings want character; and in them the serious, the grand, and the elegant, are all used with equal success. He made use of the five orders as they might be required, but appears most attached to the Ionic, and in it most closely followed Vitruvius. He always placed two faces on the capitals. In the Corinthian capital he attached the leaves to the drum, which makes it appear rather heavy. Instead of pediments to the first story, he sometimes placed three courses of quadrangular stone, diminishing towards the top, and producing a very fine effect. All his cupolas are hemispherical. Palladio was the Raffaele of architecture, and most justly deserves to be studied over every other authority. Had a proper opportunity been afforded him for displaying his genius upon sumptuous and magnificent structures, his simple and majestic style would have triumphed over every other."

Palladio's Treatise on Architecture, in four books, folio, was first published at Venice in 1570, and has often been reprinted. A magnificent edition in 3 vols. fol. was published at London in 1715, in Italian, French and English. Another splendid edition has since been published at Venice in 4 vols. fol., with the edition of his inedited buildings. Lord Burlington published at London in 1730, I Disegni delle Terme Antiche di Andrea Palladio. Palladio also composed a small work entitled Le Antichità di Roma, published after his death.

PALLAJUOLO. See POLLAJUOLO.

PALLAVICINI, LEO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Milan, according to several writers of authority, about 1604; Zani says about 1616; Professor Christ says about 1664, and that his prints are marked L. P. f. These prints are supposed to be of an earlier date, and to have been engraved by Luca Penni. There is no certainty, however, about this, as there are many prints bearing these initials, L. P. or L. P. f., sometimes on a tablet, all of which were evidently not executed by the same engraver. See Luca Penni.

PALLIERE, LOUIS VINCENT LEON, a French painter, born at Bordeaux in 1787. He went to Paris, and studied under Vincent, under whom he made great progress, and showed uncommon talents. In 1812 he gained the first prize of the Academy, for his picture of Ulysses slaying the suitors of Penelope, which entitled him to go to Rome, on a pension from the government. At Rome he painted Argus slain by Mercury, Prometheus chained to the Rock, Juno borrowing the Girdle of Venus, and the Flagellation of Christ, which were commended. After a residence of several years at Rome, he returned to Paris, and in 1819 exhibited in the Louvre, St. Peter curing the Lame Man, Tobit restoring sight to his Father, a Shepherd in repose, a Nymph coming from the Bath, Preaching at night in Rome, and other subjects, and obtained the gold medal of the first class. He died in 1820, in the flower of his life, deeply regretted as an artist of great promise.

PALLONI, or POLLONI, MICHAEL ANGELO, a native of Campi nel Fiorentino, and a scholar of Volterrano. Orlandi calls his name Palloni, and Baldinucci Polloni. After acquiring considerable reputation at Florence, he was invited to the court of the King of Poland, in 1674, where he is said to have found abundant employment.

PALMA. JACOPO, called IL VECCHIO (the elder), to distinguish him from his great nephew, called il Giovine (the younger), was a native of Serinalta, in the Valle Brembana in the Bergamese Territory. There is a perfect chaos of contradiction, not only among English, French, and German writers, but also the Italian, as to the time this artist flourished, and the real merits of his works, owing to his having been confounded with the younger Palma, and his works extensively imitated. Lanzi, in his last edition, puts the question in the true light. He says, "Jacopo Palma, called il Vecchio, was invariably considered the companion and rival of Lorenzo Lotto, who was born about 1490, and died in 1560, until M. La Combe in his Dictionnaire Portatif confused the historical dates relating to him. By Ridolfi, we are told that Palma was employed in completing a picture left unfinished by Titian at his death, in 1576. Upon this and other similar authorities, Combe takes occasion to postpone the birth of Palma until 1540, adding to which the forty-eight years assigned him by Vasari, he places the time of his decease in 1588. Others place his death in 1596 and 1623. In such arrangements, the critics seem neither to have paid attention to the style of Jacopo, still retaining some traces of the antique, nor to the authority of Ridolfi, who makes him the master of Bonifazio Veneziano, who died in 1553; nor to the testimony of Vasari, who, in his work published in 1568, declares that he died at Venice several years before that period, aged 48. He does even consider, what he might more easily have ascertained, that there was another Jacopo Palma, great nephew of the elder, who, according to the authority of Boschini, was a pupil of Titian as long as he lived, and that on the occasion referred to, Ridolfi called him Palma, without the addition of the younger, without thinking that any could confound him with the elder Palma." Lanzi still further settles the matter by the date 1514, which he read on one of his pictures at Milan, representing the Saviour with several Saints, which he pronounces a juvenile production.

His manner, at first, according to Ridolfi, partook of the formality and dryness of Giovanni Bellini. He afterwards attached himself to the method of Giorgione, and aimed at attaining his clearness of expression, and rich and harmonious coloring, visible in his celebrated picture of St. Barbara, in the church of S. Maria Formosa, at Venice. In some of his other pieces he more nearly approaches Titian in the tenderness and impasto of his carnations, and a peculiar grace which he acquired from studying the earlier productions of that great master. Of this kind is his Last Supper, in the church of S. Maria Mater Domini at Venice, and a Holy Family in S. Stefano at Vicenza, esteemed one of his happiest productions. Lanzi says "the distinguishing character of his pieces is diligence and a harmony of tints so great as to leave no traces of his pencil; and it has been observed by one of his historians, that he long occupied himself in the production of each piece, and frequently retouched it. In the mixture of his colors, as well as in other respects, he often resembles Lotto, and if he is less animated and sublime, he is, perhaps, generally more beautiful in the forms of his heads, especially of those of women and boys. It is the opinion of some, that in several of his countenances he expressed the likeness of his daughter Violante, very nearly related to Titian, a portrait of whom, by the hand of her father, was to be seen in the Gallery of Sera, a Florentine gentleman. A variety of pictures intended for private rooms, met with in different places in Italy, are attributed to Palma; besides portraits, one of which was commended by Vasari as truly astonishing for its beauty; and Madonnas, chiefly drawn along with other Saints, on oblong canvass, a practice in common use by many artists of that age." The genuine pictures of Palma are exceedingly scarce and highly prized. They are found in all the principal collections on the continent, particularly at Paris, Dresden, Munich, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. But, above all, England is richest in works considered genuine by him, and they are not only to be found in the royal collections, but in many of those belonging to the nobility. It is evident that many of these are spurious, for he never could have executed half so many, even had his process been less tedious.—Lanzi explains this. "The least informed among people of taste, being ignorant of his cotemporary artists, the moment they behold a picture between the dryness of Giovanni Bellini and the softness of Titian, pronounce it to be a Palma; and this is more particularly the case when they find the countenances well rounded and colored, landscape exhibited with care, and roseate hues in the drapery occurring more frequently than those of a more sanguine dye. In this way Palma is in the mouths of all, while other artists, also very numerous, are only mentioned when their names are attached to their productions." Vasari describes, in high terms of commendation, a picture of his in the church of S. Marco at Venice, representing the ship in which the body of St. Mark was brought from Alexandria to Venice, exposed to a frightful tempest. "The picture is designed with great judgment; the vessel is seen struggling against the impetuous tempest; the waves burst with violence against the sides of the ship; the horrid gloom is only enlivened by flashes of lightning, and every part of the scene is filled up with images of terror, so strongly and naturally represented that it seems impossible for the power of art to rise to a higher pitch of truth and perfection."

Lanzi says his most beautiful work is a picture preserved at the Servi. It represents the Virgin, with a group of beatified spirits and a choir of angels, and other angels at her feet, engaged in playing in concert upon their harps. "It is an exceedingly graceful production, delightfully ornamented with landscape and figures in the distance, very tasteful in the tints, which are blended in an admirable manner, equal to the most studied productions of the cotemporary artists of Bergamo (Lorenzo Lotto and Giovanni Cariani), thus forming a triumvirate calculated to reflect honor upon any country." Another admirable picture is his Adoration of the Magi, formerly in the Isola di S. Elena, now in the I. R. Pinacoteca of Milan.

P or R. PALMA, JACOPO, called IL GIOVINE, to distinguish him from the preceding artist, his great uncle, was born at Venice, according to Ridolfi, in 1544. There is a good deal of contradiction and discrepancy about this artist, as well as the elder Palma, and we shall therefore take Lanzi for our guide. He was the son of Antonio Palma, an artist of confined genius, who instructed him in the rudiments of the art. He early exercised himself in copying the works of Titian and other Venetian painters. Ridolfi says he studied with Titian, and others say that he was the scholar of Tintoretto; the last assertion is highly improbable. At the age of fifteen he was taken under the protection of the Duke of Urbino, and accompanied him to his capital. He afterwards sent him to Rome, where he resided eight years, and laid a good foundation by designing from the antique, copying the works of Michael Angelo and Raffaello, and particularly by studying the chiaro-scuro of Polidoro da Caravaggio. The last was his great model, and next to him came Tintoretto, he being naturally induced, like them, to animate his figures with a certain freedom of action, and a spirit peculiarly his own. His abilities were noticed by the Pope, and he was employed to decorate an apartment in the Vatican. On his return to Venice, he distinguished himself by several works conducted with extraordinary care and diligence, which gained him much reputation. Lanzi says, "there are not wanting professors who have bestowed upon him a very high degree of praise, for displaying the excellent maxims of the Roman school, united to what was best of the Venetian." Though he made the greatest exertions to bring himself into notice, he was little employed; the post was already occupied by two men of consummate ability—Tintoretto and Paul Veronese—and they monopolized all the most lucrative business. Palma, however, obtained the third rank, chiefly through the means of Vittoria, a distinguished sculptor and architect, who was considered the principal judge and arbiter of works of art. The indignation which an able artist feels at having his works submitted to the capricious tribunal of a professor, who did not even practise painting, had caused some animosity between Vittoria and the two distinguished painters before mentioned, so that he began to encourage Palma, assist him with his advice, and to trumpet abroad his fame. Palma now came rapidly into notice, and on the death of his antagonists, he was overwhelmed with commissions. Lanzi observes of Palma that he was an artist who might equally be entitled the last of the good age and the first of the bad. When he found his reputation established, and himself almost without a competitor, he began to relax his diligence for such rapidity of execution that Lanzi says many of his works may be pronounced rough drafts, a title bestowed upon them in ridicule by the Cav. d'Arpino. "In order to prevail upon him to produce a piece worthy of his name, it became requisite not only to allow him the full time he pleased, but the full price he chose to ask. Upon such terms he executed the fine picture of S. Benedetto, for the church of SS. Cosmo and Damiano, for the noble family of Moro. Such are his Santa Apollonia at Cremona; his St. Ubaldo and his Annunciation at Pesaro; his Finding of the Cross at Urbino; and other valuable specimens scattered elsewhere. In these his tints are fresh, sweet, and clear—less splendid than those of Veronese, but more pleasing than in Tintoretto; and though they are scantily applied, they are more durable than those of certain other painters more heavily laid on." In short, the merits of his best works may thus be briefly summed up. His compositions are more copious than judicious, and his design more bold than correct; his coloring distinguished by suavity and freshness, and though less brilliant than that of Veronese, it approaches nearer to the truth and tenderness of Titian.—Among his best works at Venice, are the Deposition from the Cross, in the church of S. Niccolo dei Frari; the Martyrdom of St. James, in S. Giacomo del Orio; Christ taken in the Garden, in La Trinità; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in S. Elizabetta; and the Plague of the Serpents, at S. Bartolomeo. The last, though a revolting subject, which strikes horror to the beholder, is one of his most masterly productions, and equal to Tintoretto. He died in 1628. We have quite a number of etchings by this eminent artist, executed in a spirited and masterly style. Bartsch gives a list of twenty-seven. They are sometimes marked with his name in full, and sometimes with a monogram composed of a P. crossed with a palm branch. The following are the principal:

Samson and Dalilah. Judith putting the Head of Holofernes into a sack, held by an attendant. The Nativity. The Holy Family, with St. Jerome and St. Francis. St. John in the Wilderness. The Decollation of St. John. The Tribute Money. The Adulteress before Christ. Christ answering the Pharisees who disputed his authority. The Incredulity of St. Thomas. An emblematical subject of Pallas presenting Victory. St. Jerome in conference with the Pope Damasius; scarce. An Ecclesiastic and a naked Figure, with two boys.

PALMA, LODOVICO, a portrait painter and engraver, who, according to Zani, was living at Volterra in 1650. There are some etchings by this master, among which are eight prints and a frontispiece, in a work published at Avignon, entitled, "La voye de Lait, ou le chemin des Heros au palais de gloire à l'entre triomphante de Louis XIII. en la Cité d'Avignon, 1622." They are inscribed Palma Ludovicus Lusitanus f.

PALMAROLI, P. (PIETRO?) an Italian painter, who has rendered his name famous, and conferred a great benefit on art, by transferring to canvas, and thus preserving, some of the frescos of the great Italian masters which were in a perishing condition. In 1811, he thus transferred from the wall the famous Descent from the Cross by Daniele da Volterra, erroneously said to be the first effort of the kind, which gained him immense reputation, and he was employed in transferring and restoring quite a number of great works at Rome, as well as in other places. He freed the frescos of the Sibyls, by Raffaele, in the church of S. Maria della Pace, from the destructive restorations in oil made by order of Alexander VII., and brought them back to something like their pristine beauty, though before, the objects were so obscured as to be scarcely distinguishable. He was also employed in Germany, and among others transferred and restored the famous Madonna di San Sisto by Raffaele in the Dresden Gallery. As to his claims of the invention and the process, see Antonio Contri. He died at Rome in 1828.

PALMEGIANI, MARCO, called MARCO DA FORLI, a painter of much merit, scarcely known till the researches of Lanzi brought him before the world. He was a native of Forli, and the favorite disciple of Francesco Melozzo. He had two manners; the first dry and formal, extremely simple in composition, with gilt ornaments, as was the custom of the quattrocentisti, or artists of the 14th century. In his second, his composition is more copious and of greater proportions, his outline bolder, and he dispensed with the gilded ornaments. He was accustomed to add to his principal subject, some others unconnected with it, as in his picture of the Crucifixion in the church of S. Agostino di Forli, in which he inserted two or three groups on different grounds, one of which represents St. Paul visited by St. Anthony, and another representing St. Augustine convinced by the Angel on the subject of the incomprehensibility of the Supreme Triad. Lanzi says that "in these diminutive figures, which he inserted either in the altar-piece or on the steps, he displayed an art extremely refined and pleasing." He often enriched his back-grounds with animated landscapes and beautiful architecture. His works are numerous in Romagna, and are to be found in the Venetian states. In the Palazzo Vicentini, at Vicenza, is one of his most beautiful pictures, representing a Dead Christ, between Nicodemus and Joseph. He excelled in painting Madonnas and similar subjects. Lanzi says he generally signed his name Marcus Pictor Foroliviensis, or Marcus Palmasanus P. Foroliviensis Pinsebat. He seldom adds the date, but there are two pictures in the collection of Prince Ercolani dated 1513 and 1537. Vasari calls this artist Parinegiano. Others call him Palmezzano. Zani says he signed his pictures Marcus Palmasanus. Palmisanus, or Palmezanus, Foroliviensis. &c. Kùgler says there are several pictures by Marco Palmezzano in the Museum at Berlin.

PALMEGIANI, FILIPPO, an eminent portrait painter, a native of Forli, who flourished about 1550. It is supposed that he was the son of the preceding.

PALMERINI, DA URBINO, a painter of Urbino, of whom little is known. Lanzi says he was a contemporary of Raffaele, and probably his fellow scholar under Pietro Perugino. There is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Antonio at Urbino, which Lanzi pronounces truly beautiful, approaching to a more modern style.

PALMERUCCI, GUIDO, a painter of Gubbio, who flourished about 1345. According to the Abbe Ranghiasci, he was an eminent artist in his time. He was employed in the churches, and in the palace of his native city. Lanzi says, "there remains one of his frescos in the hall of the palace, much injured by time; but some figures of saints are still preserved which do not yield to the best style of Giotto."

PALMIERI, GIUSEPPE, a Genoese painter, born in 1674. He studied at Florence, but it is not known under whom. Orlandi extols him as one of the first painters of his age. He excelled in painting pictures of animals, in which he found much employment, and received several commissions from the King of Portugal. Lanzi thinks Orlandi too extravagant in his praise, unless he refers to his merit in the subjects above mentioned. He adds, "still, in the human figure he is a painter of spirit, and of a magical and beautiful style of color, very harmonious and pleasing when the shades do not predominate; he is however, frequently incorrect in his drawing; yet he was capable of better things; for in his picture of the Resurrection, in the church of S. Domenico at Genoa, and in other works more carefully painted, judges of the art find little to reprove." He died in 1740.

PALOMBO, BARTOLOMEO, a painter born at Rome about 1610, and a pupil of Pietro da Cortona. He is highly commended by Orlandi; and Lanzi says he was one of the best scholars of that master. There are only two pictures by him at Rome, an altar-piece in the church of S. Giuseppe, and another of S. Maria Madalena de' Pazzi, now placed in the church of S. Martino a' Monti. These works are well designed, strong in coloring, excellent in chiaro-scuro; and the figures are extremely graceful. He probably painted much for the collections. He was living in 1666.

PALOMINO, DON ANTONIO. See VELASCO.

PALTHE, GERARD JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Degenkamp, in Overijssel, in 1681, and a scholar of Juriaan Pool. He painted portraits, familiar subjects, and interiors by candle or torch-light, in the manner of G. Schalken. He died about 1750.

PALTHE, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Deventer in 1719. He is supposed to have been a son of the preceding, and painted similar subjects. He settled at Leyden, where he gained considerable reputation, and died there in 1769. There were two other artists of little note, of the name of Palthe.

PALTRONIERI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, a native of Carpi, and a celebrated worker in scagliola. He introduced the art into Romagna, where it still continues to flourish. He was living in 1737. See del Conte.

PALTRONIERI, PIETRO, called IL MIRANDOLESE DALLE PROSPETTIVE, a painter born at Bologna in 1673. According to Oretti, he founded his style on that of Marc' Antonio Chiarini, and doubtless was his pupil. He was the Viviano of his age; his architectural pieces are numerous, and are to be found not only at Bologna, where he resided, but at Rome, and in many other cities. They consist of ancient temples, ruins, arches, fountains, aqueducts, tinged with a certain reddish color, which serves to distinguish his works from those of many others. To these he adds skies, fields, and waters, which appear real. He frequently employed other artists to insert his figures, among whom was Ercole Graziani. He acquired great reputation, and his works are highly esteemed. He is universally called by the Italians Il Mirandolese dalle Prospettive, The wonderful painter of perspectives. He died at Bologna in 1741. This eminent artist must not be confounded with Giuseppe Perraccini, also called Il Mirandolese, which see.

PAMPHILUS, a celebrated Grecian painter, a native of Amphipolis, flourished from B. C. 388. to about B. C. 348. He studied under Eupompus of Sicyon, and succeeded in establishing the school founded by that master, which he elevated to the height of the most famous school of painting in Greece. Pamphilus seems to have been principally occupied with the theory of his art, and with teaching, as the notices of his works are very scanty. His pictures were usually of large dimensions. Aristophanes mentions one—the Heraclidæ; Pliny mentions three—the Battle of Phlius and victory of the Athenians, Ulysses on the Raft, and a "Cognatio," probably a family portrait. According to Quintilian, he and his pupil Melanthus were the most renowned among the Greeks for composition. Pliny says he was the first painter who was skilled in all the sciences, particularly arithmetic and geometry, without which he denied that the art could be perfect. By this it must doubtless be understood that Pamphilus reduced the art to rules; and that he particularly excelled in the sciences of optics and perspective. Flaxman well remarks, "How geometry and arithmetic were applied to the study of the human figure. Vitruvius informs us from the writings of Greek artists, perhaps from those of Pamphilus himself—'a man,' says that author, may be so placed with his arms and legs extended, that, his navel being made the centre, a circle may be drawn around, touching the extremities of his fingers and toes. In like manner, a man standing upright, with his arms extended, is enclosed in a square, the extreme extent of his arms being equal to his height.'" Flaxman also observes, "it is impossible to see the numerous figures springing, jumping, dancing, and falling, in the Herculean paintings on the painted vases, without being assured that the ancient painters and sculptors must have employed geometrical figures to determine the degrees of curvature in the body, the angular and rectilinear extent of the limbs, and to fix the centre of gravity."

Pamphilus raised the art to so high a position, that, chiefly through his influence, noble youth were taught the art of drawing before all others; it was considered the first among the liberal arts, and was practised exclusively by the free born. His school was characterized by a stricter attention to dramatic truth of composition, and a finer and more systematic style of design. The progressive courses of study occupied the period of ten years, comprehending instructions in drawing, geometry, and the different branches of painting. Daily practice was required; hence the maxim acquired there by Apelles, Nulla dies sine linea. According to Pliny, the fee of admission was an Attic talent, (about $1000); and he says that Apelles and Melanthus both paid this fee. Pamphilus left writings upon painting and famous painters; but they have unfortunately been lost.

PAMPURINI, ALESSANDRO, a painter of Cremona, who, according to Zaist, was employed in the cathedral of that city in 1511. He was at least a reputable painter, and executed some frescos for the churches, which have perished.

PANÆNUS, an eminent Greek painter, a native of Athens, flourished about B. C. 450. According to Pausanias and Pliny, he was the brother of Phidias, although Strabo says he was the nephew of that sculptor. Panænus has been termed the Cimabue of the Greeks; but although among the first artists who attained great eminence in painting, he was many years the junior of Polygnotus, Micon, and Dionysius of Colophon. He assisted Phidias in decorating the Temple of the Olympian Jupiter, where he painted Atlas supporting the World, with Hercules near him, about to relieve him of his burden; Theseus and Pirithous; Figures representing Greece and Salamis, the latter bearing in her hands the rostrum of a ship; the Combat of Hercules with the Nemean Lion; Ajax and Cassandra; Hippodamia, with her mother Cœnomaus; Prometheus chained, and Hercules preparing to destroy the Vulture which preyed upon him; Penthesilea dying, supported by Achilles, with Hesperian nymphs bearing fruit.

The most famous work of Panænus, however, was his grand painting in the Pœcile at Athens, representing the Battle of Marathon. It was in four great divisions; the first representing the position of the two armies before the battle; the second and third the principal incidents during the conflict; and the fourth the Overthrow of the Persians. The portraits of the Athenian generals Miltiades, Callimachus, and Cynægryrus, were introduced, as were also those of Datis and Artaphernes among the Persians. It has been asserted that these were painted from the life; but this is impossible, as the Battle of Marathon was fought about sixty years before the time of Panænus; Callimachus and Cynægryrus were both killed in the conflict, and Datis and Artaphernes had returned to Persia. If these Iconics or portrait figures are to be taken as portraits in the fullest sense of the term, then they must have been drawn from portraits painted during the life time of the generals.

PANCOTTO, PIETRO, a Bolognese painter, brought up in the school of the Caracci, who flourished about 1590. According to Malvasia, he was an eccentric genius. His principal work is a grand fresco representing the Last Judgment, in the church of la Madonna di S. Colombano at Bologna, in which he attempted to revenge himself on the parish priest by introducing his portrait, in caricature, which excited the indignation of the clergy, and probably lost him any further employment from them. Lanzi places him in the third rank, among the Bolognese painters, Domenichino and Guido holding the first.

PANDEREN, EGBERT VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Haarlem, according to Nagler, in 1575, though others say in 1606. Nagler gives a list of thirty-three prints by him. They are executed with the graver in a formal style, with little effect, and the drawing is incorrect. Some of them are interesting from the subjects. The following are the best:

The Virgin interceding with Christ for the salvation of mankind; after Rubens. The Four Evangelists; after Peter de Jode. St. Louis, with a border, representing his Miracles; do. Three circular plates of Minerva, Juno, and Venus; after Spranger. The Portrait of Maurice, Prince of Orange, on horseback, with a battle in the background; after Tempesta. Four plates of the Sick Man and the Doctor; after Goltzius; scarce. Part of the Plates for the Academie de l'Espée; by G. Thibault.

PANDERIT, a painter mentioned by Balkema, as one of the best scholars of Rembrandt. He says he was a native of Saxony, born in 1601, and died in 1662. He afterwards notices John Paudits, also a scholar of Rembrandt, who, he says, was born in Saxony in 1618, and died in 1659, and was an excellent portrait painter. Both are doubtless the same as Christopher Paudits, which see.

PANDOLFI GIOVANNI GIACOMO, a painter of Pesaro, who flourished about 1630. He was a scholar of Federigo Zuccaro. Lanzi says, "his works are celebrated in his native city, and do not yield the palm to those of Zuccaro, as seen in his pictures of S. Giorgio and S. Carlo in the cathedral." He also decorated the whole chapel in the Nome di Dio, with various subjects in fresco from the Old and New Testament.

PANDOLFO. See RESCHI.

PANETTI DOMENICO, a painter of Ferrara, born in 1460. It is not known under whom he studied, but, according to Baruffaldi, he painted in the dry, formal style of the time, till his pupil, Benvenuto da Garofolo, returned from Rome after acquiring the new style under Raffaele. The instructor now became the pupil of his former disciple, and although somewhat advanced in years, entirely changed his manner, and became one of the ablest artists of his time. He executed many works for the churches of Ferrara, which Lanzi says are worthy of competition with the best masters of the fourteenth century. Among his best works is the Descent from the Cross, in the church of S. Niccolo; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in S. Francesco; and a picture of St. Andrea, at the Agostiniani. There is one of his pictures in the Dresden gallery, and Kùgler mentions by him a beautiful picture of the Entombment in the Museum at Berlin. He usually inscribed his name in full upon his pictures, which Lanzi says bear evidence of change in pictoric character without an example. He died in 1530.

PANFILO. See NUVOLONE.

PANICALE MASOLINO DA, an eminent sculptor and painter, born at Panicale, in the Florentine Territory, in 1378. He first studied modeling and sculpture, under Lorenzo Ghiberti, who at that time was unrivalled in composition, in design, and in giving animation to his figures. Being already a distinguished artist, he studied coloring under Gherardo Starnina. Thus uniting in himself the excellence of two schools, and diligently cultivating the art of chiaro-scuro, he produced a new style, not wholly exempt from dryness, but grand, determined, and harmonious beyond any former example; but which was carried to higher perfection by his scholar, Masaccio. The chapel of S. Pietro al Carinone is a monument of his genius. He there painted the Four Evangelists, the Vocation of St. Peter to the Apostleship, the Denial of Christ, Curing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple, and the Preaching to the Multitude. He died in 1415, before the completion of the chapel, and the rest of the acts of St. Peter, as the Tribute Money, Baptism conferred on the Multitude, and the Healing of the Sick, were afterwards painted by Masaccio. Some of his works have been engraved.

PANICCIAGI. See PANNICCIATI.

PANICO, ANTONIO MARIA, a Bolognese painter, who, according to Bellori, was a disciple of Annibale Caracci, whom he accompanied to Rome at an early age, and whose manner he emulated. He was much employed by Mario Farnese in decorating his country seats at Castro and Latera. His most celebrated work is a picture of the Mass, in the cathedral of Farnese, in which Lanzi says he was assisted by Annibale, who even conducted some of the figures. This, however, seems doubtful, as Caracci died in 1609, and Panico in 1652. It is not probable that he would have been entrusted with so important a commission almost in his youth, which must have been the case were it true.

PANICO, CONTE UGO DA. See UGO DA CARPI.

PANNEELS, WILLIAM, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about 1600. Little is known of him as a painter, but it appears that he was a disciple of Rubens, from the inscriptions on some of his prints. He etched quite a number of plates after Rubens, and from his own designs. They are executed in a spirited and masterly style, but his drawing is frequently incorrect, particularly in the naked. The following, after Rubens, are his most esteemed prints:

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

The Portrait of Rubens, in an octagon border. Esther before Ahasuerus. The Nativity. The Adoration of the Magi. Mary washing the Feet of Christ. The Assumption of the Virgin. The Holy Family, with the infant Christ and St. John playing with a Lamb. St. John baptizing Christ. Samson killing the Lion, with a companion, David killing the Lion and the Bear. St. Sebastian. Jupiter and Juno. Jupiter and Antiope. Bacchus drunk, supported by a Faun and a Satyr. Bacchus supported by Satyrs and Bacchante. Meleager presenting the Head of the Boar to Atalanta.

PANNEELS, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, probably a brother of the preceding. Nagler describes only one print by him, after Annibale Caracci.

PANNICCIATI, JACOPO, a painter of Ferrara, who, according to Baruffaldi, was of noble birth and studied under Dosso Dossi, whose style he imitated very closely. He died in the flower of his life, in 1540.

PANNINI, CAV. GIOVANNI PAOLO, an eminent painter of perspective and architecture, born at Piacenza in 1691. He went early to Rome, where he studied under Pietro Lucatelli. He had an early passion for painting, and applied himself with great assiduity in designing the remaining monuments of antiquity, wherever he found them, especially at Rome. He formed his style, not on that of Lucatelli, but of Giovanni Ghisolfi. He was a perfect master of the art of perspective, in which he surpassed all his cotemporaries. He designed every vestige of ancient magnificence—the ruins of superb edifices, cenotaphs, columns, arches, obelisks, and some of the most ancient buildings which ornament modern Rome. His composition is rich, and his perspective critically correct. His works are universally admired for the grandeur of his architecture, the clearness of his coloring, the neatness and freedom of his touch, the beauty of his figures, and the elegant taste with which he disposed them, although he sometimes designed his figures of too large a size for his architecture.

which injures the effect that would otherwise be produced by the immensity of the buildings. This was contrary to the practice of Ghisolfi, whose works always afford a pleasing deception to the eye, by the exact proportions observed between the figures, buildings, and distances. This fault, however, is only occasional in Pannini's works. He generally painted his pictures of a large easel size, but sometimes he wrought on a grander scale. Lanzi highly commends a picture of this class in the church of the Signori della Missione, representing Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple, in which the architecture is truly magnificent, and the figures designed with great spirit and variety of character, and of much larger size than he usually painted. His works are numerous, and are not only to be found in the principal collections of Italy, but in other countries of Europe. At Rivoli, in the pleasure house of the king of Sardinia, and in the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, are some of his choicest works. Many of his pictures have been engraved by Lempereur, le Bas, J. S. Müller, Vivares, Benasech, Bartolozzi, and other eminent engravers. He died in 1758.

PANSERON, PIERRE, a French architect, a native of Brie, flourished in the latter part of the 18th century. He studied at Paris, under J. F. Blondel; was appointed professor in the military school; and was chosen by the Prince de Conti as inspector of his buildings. He is chiefly known by his treatises on the art, which gained him considerable reputation. Among them are Elements d'Architecture, Paris, 1772, 4to.; Nouveaux Elements d'Architecture, Paris, 1775—80, 3 vols., 8vo., with plates.

PANTOJA, DE LA CRUZ, JUAN, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1551. He studied under Alfonso Sanchez Coello, and acquired so much distinction as a portrait and historical painter, that Philip II. named him one of his painters. He painted many portraits of the Royal Family, some of which are to be found in the Escorial, the Retiro, and in the tower of the Parada. He also painted the decorations for the funeral ceremony of Charles V., the original designs of which were in the possession of Palomino. On the death of Philip II., he continued in favor with his successor, Philip III., whose portrait he painted, and that of his Queen, which are dated 1606, and still preserved in the palace of the Dukes d'Uceda at Montalvan. He also painted an equestrian portrait of the king, as a model for the famous sculptor Giovanni di Bologna, then residing at Florence, who executed an equestrian group in bronze, placed in the garden of La Casa del Campo. It is difficult to form any correct opinion of the style of this eminent artist, from the accounts of the Spanish writers. Palomino says he was greatly distinguished in the school of Coello. Bermudez describes his picture of the Adoration of the Shepherds, in which he introduced the portraits of Philip II. and his family, as blending the qualities of Lucas Cranach and Bronzino, two very opposite masters. Again, he is said to strongly resemble Anthony More in his portraits. Many of his works were destroyed in the conflagration of the Prado. He died at Madrid, in 1610.

PANVINUS, ONULPH, an engraver who lived at Antwerp, and published a set of 27 portraits from his own designs, entitled Elogia et Imagines Pont. Max. ad viv. delin. 1568. Zani mentions Onofrio Panvinus, a designer and engraver of Verona, who flourished about the same period.

PANZACCHI, MARIA ELENA, a paintress, of noble family, born at Bologna in 1668. According to Orlandi, she was instructed by Emilio Taruffi, and acquired great reputation, particularly for her landscapes, and was much employed in painting for the collections. Lanzi says her landscapes are now scarcely known at Bologna, and Crespi mentions only two. She died in 1737.

PAOLETTI, NICCOLO GASPARO, an Italian architect, who flourished, according to Milizia, in the latter part of the 18th century. He was principally distinguished for the restoration of the imperial villa of Poggio, near Florence, in 1773. In the course of completing this work, it was necessary to dismantle an arched roof, twenty-two feet long and twelve feet wide; but the Grand Duke Peter Leopold, of Austria, would not consent to its destruction, because it was decorated with paintings by Matteo Rosselli. Paoletti conceived an ingenious plan, by means of which he removed the roof entire, greatly to the satisfaction of the Grand Duke, who presented him with one hundred sequins in token of his approval.

PAOLETTI, PAOLO, a painter born at Padua, who excelled in painting fruit, flowers, dead game, fish, and other objects of still-life. He passed much of his life at Udine, and was employed many years in the house of the Conti Caiselli, which family possesses many specimens of his works. His pictures are quite numerous throughout the Friuli, and are held in considerable estimation. He died at Udine in 1735.

PAOLI, FRANCESCO DA, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Rome about 1640. There is a large plate engraved by him, representing a View of the City of Rome.

PAOLILLO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about 1530. According to Dominici, he was the ablest scholar of Andrea Sabbatini, whose style he imitated so closely that all his works were attributed to that master, until Dominici discovered his name on one of his pictures, and restored them to the right master. He says "he would have been a great ornament of this school, had he not died young."

PAOLINI, PIETRO, a painter born at Lucca in 1603. He went early to Rome, where he entered the school of Angelo Caroselli, by education a follower of the school of Caravaggio, but exceedingly expert in copying and imitating other masters. Under him, Paolini acquired a manner that shows correct drawing, and a style of coloring more resembling that of the Venetian than the Roman school, uniting the richness and harmony of Titian and Pordenone. Lanzi says his Martyrdom of St. Andrea in the church of S. Michele at Lucca, and the grand picture sixteen cubits long in the Library of S. Frediano, would be alone sufficient to immortalize a painter. The latter work represents the pontiff St. Gregory entertaining some pilgrims. "It is a magnificent picture, ornamented in the style of Veronese, with a grand architectural perspective, full of figures, and possessing a variety, harmony, and beauty that have induced many poets to extol it." He also excelled in cabinet pictures of conversations and rural festivals, which are numerous at Lucca. Baldinucci especially commends two pictures of the Massacre of Valdestain, in the possession of the Orsetti family, and remarks that he had a peculiar talent for tragic themes. He was accused of being too energetic, and censured for making the action of his females too strong. To prove the contrary, and to show that he pursued his method from choice, and that he was not inferior to his rival Biancucci in his own style, he painted his large work in the church of the Trinity, in the graceful style.

PAOLINI, PIO FABIO, a painter born at Udine. He went to Rome, where he studied under Pietro da Cortona, and acquired considerable reputation, for some historical works, especially for his fine fresco of San Carlo, which adorns the Corso. In 1678, he was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke. He afterwards returned to his native city, where he executed several altar-pieces and other works for the churches, which Lanzi says entitle him to a high rank among the followers of Cortona. He also painted much for the collections.

PAOLINI. See PAULINI.

PAOLO, MAESTRO, and his sons JACOPO and GIOVANNI. Lanzi says that Maestro Paolo is the earliest painter in the national manner (i.e. different from the Greek artists of the time), of whom there exists a work with the indisputable name of its author. It is to be seen in the church of S. Marco at Venice, consisting of a tablet, or, as it is otherwise called, ancona, divided into several compartments, representing the figure of a dead Christ, with some of the Apostles, and historic incidents from the Holy Evangelist. There is inscribed underneath, Magister Paulus cum Jacobo et Johanne filiis fecit hoc opus. There is no date upon it, but Zanetti found his name recorded in an ancient parchment, bearing the date 1346. Sig. Morelli also discovered a painting in the Sacristy of the Conventuali at Vicenza, inscribed Paulus de Venetiis pinxit hoc opus. 1333.

PAON, DU, a French painter, the son of a peasant, was born in the vicinity of Paris about 1740. He early enlisted in the army, and passed through several campaigns; but, having at length obtained his discharge, he went to Paris, intending to devote himself to art. He showed his designs to Carlo Vanloo, then first painter to the King, and to Boucher, both of whom encouraged his resolution. He entered the school of Casanova, and, according to the Biographie Universelle, subsequently became the rival of that master. Inferior to Casanova in coloring and spirit, he surpassed him in correctness of design, and faithful imitation of nature. He executed a number of works for the Bourbon palace, and the Salle du Conseil of the Royal Military School. He died in 1785.

PAPA, SIMONE, called IL VECCHIO (the elder), a Neapolitan painter, born about 1430. He studied under Antonio Solario, called il Zingaro, whose works were then held in high estimation. He excelled in painting altar-pieces with few figures, grouped in a pleasing style, and finished with exquisite care, in which he sometimes equalled Zingaro himself. His chief works are the Triumph of St. Michael over the Apostate Spirits, in the church of S. Maria Nuova—his greatest effort; the Annunciation, in S. Niccolo alla Dogana; the Virgin and infant Saviour, with several Saints, in S. Lorenzo. He died in 1488.

PAPA, SIMONE, called IL GIOVINE, (the younger), a Neapolitan painter, born in 1506. He was the son of a goldsmith, who desired to bring him up to his own business, but showing an early passion for painting, he was placed under the instruction of Gio. Antonio d'Amato. He acquired distinction, and executed several works for the churches, the principal of which are the Annunciation, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in S. Maria la Nuova. He died in 1569.

PAPARELLO, or PAPACELLO, TOMMASO, a painter of Cortona, who was living in 1553. He was a scholar of Giulio Romano, whom he assisted in his works. Little further is known of him.

PAPE, ADRIAN DE, a Dutch painter, who, according to Balkema, was a scholar of Gerard Douw. He mentions several of his works, one of which is an Interior, in the Museum at the Hague, which he says is worthy of the school of Douw, but he gives no particulars of his life.

PAPILLON, JEAN, THE ELDER, a French wood engraver, born at Rouen in Normandy, in 1639. He studied under du Bellay. His prints evince good natural talents, and are well executed, with clear and firm strokes; but in consequence of his incorrect design, he never attained distinction.—His works are marked J. P. He died at Paris in 1710.

PAPILLON, JEAN, THE YOUNGER, a French wood engraver, the son of the preceding, was born at St. Quentin, in 1661. After receiving some instruction from his father, he visited Paris, and studied engraving under Noel Cochin, who gave him every advantage for improvement. He was the first who ever engraved on wood without using the pen. His prints are correctly designed, and executed in a harmonious style. Among them are a great variety of vignettes and other book ornaments; also portraits of the popes Paul III., Julius III., Pius IV., and that of James II. of England. Papillon is said to have invented, about 1688, the art of printing papers in imitation of tapestry, commonly called Paper Hangings. He died at Paris in 1723. He had a younger brother, named Jean Nicolas P., born in 1663; died in 1714. He attained but little distinction in the art.

PAPILLON, JEAN BAPTISTE MICHEL, a French wood engraver, the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Paris in 1698. He gained considerable distinction in the art, particularly for his cuts executed in concert with N. le Sueur, from the designs of J. J. Bachelier, for the fine edition of Les Fables de la Fontaine. 4 vols. fol. Several of his cuts represent ornamented foliage, flowers, and shells, executed with great delicacy and skill. Papillon published a work relating to wood engraving, in two volumes, entitled Traité Historique et pratique de la Gravure en bois. The first volume treats of the history of the art, in which his researches were extensive; and though there are many errors, yet it should be remembered that the author had little light or assistance in his labors. Doubtless his work proved of great assistance to Heineken, and other later writers, who condemn it. The second volume treats of the practical department of the art, and contains much interesting and important matter, besides many beautiful wood engravings, some of which are executed with single strokes, without cross-hatchings, producing a clear and pleasing effect. Among them are two specimens of figures in chiaro-scuro, executed with four blocks each, one of which, between the pages 154 and 155 of the second volume, he gives proofs of, from the separate blocks, followed by the figure complete. Bryan says, "there is, perhaps, no method by which the sketches and tinted drawings of the great masters can be more successfully represented." Up to the year 1722, Papillon marked his prints with the same initials as those of his father, but afterwards with his name in full. He died in 1776.

PAPINI, or DE PAPINI, GIUSEPPE BENEDETTI, an Italian engraver, born, according to Zani, in 1707, and died in 1782. He engraved several plates of ceilings and other decorations, for the Tuscan Gallery, published by Ignazio Orsini; and others for the Museum Capitolinum; and for the Museo Etrusco, published by Gori.

PAPPANELLI, CAV. NICCOLÒ, a painter of Faenza, born in 1537. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Rome, where, such was his enthusiasm for improvement, that he attended all the most distinguished masters in that metropolis. On his return to Faenza, he executed some works for the churches of an exquisite character. Such is his picture of S. Martino in the Cathedral, which Lanzi says is "so well executed in point of design, force of coloring, and expression, as to be truly admirable." He was a very unequal painter, and some of his works are of a mediocre character. He died in 1620.

PARADISI, NICCOLO, an old Venetian painter, by whom there is a picture of the Crucifixion, with the Symbols of the Four Evangelists, in the monastery of the Agostiniani, in the territory of Verucchio. It is inscribed Nicholaus Paradisi miles de Venetiis pinxit, 1404.

PARADISO, ORAZIO DAL. See CASTELFRANCO.

PARADOSSO, IL. See GIULIO TROGLI.

PARASACCHI, DOMENICO, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished at Rome about 1630. He engraved a set of plates of the Fountains of Rome published in 1618. This collection, with additions, was republished at Rome in 1636, under the title, Raccolta delle principale Fontane delle Città di Roma, diseguate e intagliate da Domenico Parasacchi.

PARASOLE, LEONARDO, called NORSINI, from Norcia, the place of his nativity, was an engraver on wood, who flourished at Rome about 1570. He distinguished himself by a set of cuts of the plants for the Herbal of Castor Durante, physician to Pope Sixtus V., engraved by order of that pontiff. He also engraved some cuts after the designs of Antonio Tempesta and others.

PARASOLE, ISABELLA. This ingenious lady was the wife of the preceding. She executed a part of the cuts for an Herbal published under the direction of Prince Cesi of Aquasparta. She also wrote and published a book on the method of working lace and embroidering, illustrated with cuts engraved by herself, from her own designs.

PARASOLE, BERNARDINO, was the son of Leonardo P. He studied painting under Giuseppe Cesari. He had great natural talents, and had begun to distinguish himself as an historical painter when he died in the flower of his life. He executed a few wooden cuts, mostly after his own designs.

PARASOLE, HIERONIMA. This lady was of the same family as the preceding. She executed some engravings on wood, among which is one of the Battle of the Centaurs, after Tempesta.

PARCELLES, JOHN, called the OLD, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1597. He studied under Henry Cornelius de Vroom, and acquired distinction for his marines, in which he excelled. His best pictures are those representing storms and tempests with lightning, violent agitation of the water, with all the horrors of shipwreck, and vessels in the utmost peril and distress, which he touched with extraordinary fidelity and effect. His pictures of calms also have considerable merit; they generally represent views on the coast of Holland, with fishing smacks and fishermen drawing their nets, and groups of figures on the strand. The pictures of Parcelles are delicately and carefully finished, and his figures are correctly drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. He signed his pictures with his initials, J. P. He also executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, among which are a set of twelve sea-pieces, with the figure of a Dutch boor on each, and a set of twelve plates of the different shipping used in Holland, with a Latin inscription. Balkema says he died at Leyerdorp in 1641, but others think his death happened at a later date, as he is known to have instructed his son Julius.

PARCELLES, JULIUS, called the YOUNG, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Leyerdorp in 1628. He painted the same subjects as his father, whose manner he imitated so closely that most of his works are attributed to him, and the inexperienced are more liable to be deceived from the fact that both used the same mark. Although his pictures are inferior to those of John Parcelles in delicacy of touch and in clearness and transparency of coloring, yet they are correctly designed, and have great vigor and truthfulness.

PAREJA, JUAN DE. This painter was the slave of Don Diego Velasquez. The accounts of him are quite contradictory. According to Palomino and others, he was born a Mestizo, in Mexico, a name given by the Spaniards to people born of a Spanish father and an Indian mother. But Ceán Bermudez says with more probability, that he was born at Seville in 1606, at which time there were many slaves in Spain. He accompanied Velasquez to Madrid, when he was called to that court in 1623. From being employed in his master's studio to attend on him, grind his colors, clean his palette, brushes, &c., he imbibed a passion for painting, and sought every opportunity to practice during his master's absence. He spent whole nights in drawing and in endeavoring to imitate him, for he durst not let him know of his aspiring dreams. At length he had made such proficiency, that he resolved to lay his case before the King, Philip IV., who was not only an excellent judge, but a true lover, of art. It was the King's custom to resort frequently to the apartments of Velasquez, and to order those pictures which were placed with the painted side to the wall, to be turned to his view. Pareja placed one of his own productions in that position, which the King's curiosity caused to be turned, when the slave fell on his knees and besought the monarch to obtain his pardon from his master, for having presumed to practice painting without his approbation. Philip, agreeably surprised at his address, and well pleased with the work, bid Pareja to rest contented. He interceded in his behalf, and Velasquez not only forgave him, but emancipated him from servitude; yet such was his attachment and gratitude to his master, that he would never leave him till his death, and afterwards continued to serve his daughter with the same fidelity. He is said to have painted portraits so much in the style of Velasquez, that they could not easily be distinguished from his works. He also painted some historical works, as the Calling of St. Matthew, at Aranjuez; the Baptism of Christ, at Toledo, and some saints at Madrid. Bermudez says he was not emancipated till 1651. He died at Madrid in 1670.

PARENTANI, ANTONIO, a painter of Turin, who flourished about 1550. It is not known under whom he studied, but he received or completed his education at Rome, and was a follower of the Roman school. There is a grand picture of Paradise with numerous Angels, by him, in the Chapter-house of the Consolata at Turin.

PARENTINO, BERNARDO, called also FRA LORENZO, a painter born at Parenzo, in Istria, in 1437. He was a pupil of Andrea Mantegna. Lanzi says that he approached so near to Mantegna, that his works might easily be mistaken for those of that master. In the Cloister of Santa Giustina, at Padua, are ten Acts from the life of St. Benedetto, with several little histories in chiaro-scuro, which are highly commended by Lanzi. He became a monk of the order of the Augustines at Vicenza, where he died in 1531.

PARIA. See PERRIER.

PARICOLA, MASOLINO DA, a Florentine painter, born in 1403, and died in 1440. It is not known under whom he studied, but he was accounted a good painter of history in his time, especially in fresco.

PARIGI, GIULIO, a Florentine architect and engraver, flourished during the first part of the 17th century, and died in 1635. He was the son of Alphonso Parigi, an architect of ordinary merit; who, after the death of Vasari, completed the building of the Uffizi Nuovi at Florence, and died in 1590. Giulio Parigi was a disciple of Buontalenti, and became a civil and military architect of considerable eminence. He was selected by the wife of the Grand Duke Ferdinand II., to instruct the four princes in design and architecture. On the occasions of the marriage of Cosmo II., and the reception of Queen Maria, in 1612, Parigi was entrusted with the direction of the festivals. He established a successful school at Florence, where were taught mechanics, architecture and perspective. Among his scholars were Ottavio Piccolomini, Duke d'Amalfi, and the three brothers, Remigio, Antonio, and Gio. Francesco Cantagallina. He gained great reputation for the Imperial Villa at Poggio, the convent of the Padri Agostini, at Florence, that of La Pace, belonging to the Padri di S. Bernardo, and the Marucelli palace, at Florence.

As an engraver, Bartsch and Nagler mention three prints by Parigi; the Garden of Love, the Temple of Peace, and a Landscape, after Cantagallina, his pupil. In the Biographie Universelle, are mentioned five plates by him, of the Interludes of the Comedy of Flora, with a great many figures, similar to the plates of Callot, who acquired a knowledge of engraving under this master. Giulio Parigi died in 1635. He had seven sons, of whom only one followed architecture.

PARIGI, ALPHONSO, a reputable Florentine architect, was the son and scholar of Giulio P. He entered the army as an engineer, where he remained several years; but subsequently devoted himself entirely to architecture. He completed a number of edifices left unfinished by that master, and particularly distinguished himself by his ingenuity in restoring the principal façade of the Palazzo Pitti, which had inclined eight and half inches from the perpendicular. He made several holes through the inclined wall, through which he passed chains, and fastened them externally with bolts; then by means of screws turned by levers, inside the apartments, he drew the wall back to a perpendicular position. Among his other works, is the Scarlati palace at Florence, with three well divided stories. He died in 1656.

PARIS, DOMENICO and ORAZIO DI. See ALFANI.

PARIS, PIERRE ADRIEN, a French architect, born at Besançon in 1747. He acquired the elements of design from his father (also an architect), and afterwards visited Paris for improvement. He studied under Trouard, architect to the King, and followed for several years the course prescribed by the Academy. In 1767 he visited Rome with the Royal pension, and studied and designed the most remarkable remains of antiquity. On returning to France, he soon gained reputation, and in 1778 was appointed designer to the King's Cabinet. He was charged with the management of the fêtes at Versailles, Marli and Trianon, and soon after succeeded Soufflot in the Academy of Architecture. About this time Paris made a second trip to Italy, whence he brought many designs. While absent he was appointed to superintend the decorations of the Opera House, and about 1783 erected the beautiful gate of the Orleans Cathedral. In 1788 Louis XVI. appointed him Chevalier of the order of St. Michael. During the stormy scenes which followed this period, Paris remained in retirement. In 1806 he visited Italy for his health, and on arriving at Rome, was appointed director of the French school in that city; an honor never since accorded to any architect. He was commissioned by the French government to treat for the acquisition of the antiques in the Villa Borghese; which he satisfactorily accomplished. In 1811, Paris superintended the excavations of the Coliseum; and made many drawings of that celebrated edifice. In 1817 he returned to France and retired to Besançon, where he died in 1819. He left a manuscript work entitled, Examen des edifices antiques et modernes de la ville de Rome. Paris translated several works into French, and gained considerable reputation for his Recueil des dessins et etudes d'architecture de Paris, 9 vols. fol.; also for his L'Amphitheatre Flavian, vulgairement nommé le Coliseum, restauré d'après les details encore visibles de la construction, etc., 45 plates fol.

PARISET, D. P., a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1740. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Martean. He went to London in 1766, where he executed quite a number of plates in the chalk style. He executed some of the plates for the collection of prints after the drawings of the great masters, published by Rogers. He also engraved several portraits of English artists and others from the designs of Falconet, among which are the following :

Sir Joshua Reynolds ; P. Falconet, del. 1763. Benjamin West, with his family ; after West. Francis Cotes. William Ryland. Paul Sandby. Ozias Humphrey. J. Meyer. Oliver Cromwell ; after Cooper. The Death of Admiral Coligny. The Death of the Duke of Guise.

 PARISINI, AGOSTINO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Bologna in the first part of the 17th century. In conjunction with J. B. Coriolano and Olivieri Gatti, he engraved a book of emblems from the designs of Paolo Macchi, published at Bologna in 1628. He also engraved a variety of other book plates, which are executed with the graver in an indifferent style. His prints are sometimes signed with his name Latinized (Augustinus Parisinus), but generally with one of the above monograms.

PARIZEAU, PHILIPPE LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. He engraved a number of plates after Salvator Rosa, and other masters, executed with the graver in a neat and spirited style, among which are the following. He died in 1801.

An Assembly of Roman Soldiers ; after Sal. Rosa. Marius seated on the Ruins of Carthage ; do. The Martyrdom of St. Andrew ; after Deshayes. The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew ; do. Psyche refusing the Honors of Divinity ; after Boucher.

PARKER, JAMES, an English engraver, born in London about 1750. He studied with Bartolozzi, in whose style he engraved quite a number of plates after the eminent English artists of his time. He died in 1805.

PARKER, JOHN, an English painter of whom little is known. He went to Rome, where he resided several years, and was employed to paint an altar-piece for the church of S. Gregorio in Monte Celio, the subject of which was the history of St. Silvia. He returned to England about 1762. In 1763 he exhibited at the Rooms of the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts, &c., two pictures ; one of the Death of Rizzio, and the other, his own portrait. He died soon afterwards, at Paddington.

PARKER, JOHN, another English painter of the same name, who first studied in the Duke of Richmond's Gallery, and afterwards received some instructions from the Smiths of Chichester. He went to Rome in 1774, but returned to London the following year, where he practised landscape painting with some success.

PARMA, LODOVICO DA, a painter of Parma, who, according to Malvasia, was a scholar of Francesco Francia, but the Padre Affò says he studied under Lorenzo Costa, the pupil of Francia. Lanzi says his pictures of Madonnas, executed in the style of Francia, are common at Parma.

PARMA, CRISTOFORO DA. See CASELLI.

PARMENSIS, BATTISTA. See PENSIERI.

PARMENSIS, JACOBUS, an Italian engraver, whose real name is not known. There are a few prints after Parmiggiano, and other masters, executed with the graver in a slight style, somewhat resembling those of Gio. Giacomo Caraglio, to whom they are attributed by some writers, but Caraglio signed his prints Jacobus Veronensis. See Caraglio.

PARMENTIER, JACQUES, a French painter, born at Paris in 1658. He was a relative of Sebastian Bourdon, by whom he was instructed in the art. After the death of Bourdon he went to England, in 1676, where he was employed by Charles de la Fosse to assist him in his works at the Montague House. He was sent to Holland by William III., to assist in decorating his palace at Loo, but quarreling with Marot, the superintendent of the works, he returned to London. Not meeting with much employment, he went to Yorkshire, where he painted some historical subjects, as well as portraits. He died in London in 1730.

PARMENTIER, L., an engraver of little note. He engraved a title for the works of Philip Wouwerman, with the portrait of that painter at the bottom, from a design by J. de la Jove.

PARMIGGIANO. See FRANCESCO MAZZUOLI.

PARMIGGIANO, FABRIZIO, called also FABRIZIO DA PARMA, a landscape painter, born at Parma in 1555. Baglioni commends him among the landscape painters of his time. Lanzi says he was much employed in painting for the collections, in which he was assisted by his wife Ippolita, and that he visited various places before his arrival at Rome, where he was employed in adorning a few of the churches with his wood scenes, and views with hermits, &c., in which there is more of the ideal than the natural. In the church of St. Cecilia at Trastevere, are eight large pictures by him, painted in fresco. His subjects are designed in a grand style, and executed with a spirited pencil. He died at Rome in 1600.

PARMIGGIANINO. See FRANCESCO MAZZUOLI, GIROLAMO SCAGLIA, and MICHELE ROCCA.

PAROCEL. See PARROCEL.

PARODI, FILIPPO, an Italian sculptor, born at Genoa about 1640. He attained the reputation of one of the most able artists of his age. There is a beautiful statue of the Virgin by him, in the church of S. Carlo at Genoa ; also a statue of St. John the Baptist, executed in concert with the celebrated Puget. He executed for the Italian church of Loretto at Lisbon, a number of statues which surpass all others in that edifice. There are also several of his works at Venice and Padua. He died at Genoa about 1708.

PARODI, DOMENICO, a sculptor, architect, and painter, was the son of Filippo P., born at Genoa in 1668. His father, discerning in him an uncommon genius for the fine arts, gave him an excellent classical education, and instructed him in his own profession ; but having a partiality for painting, he went to Venice and entered the school of Bombelli, improving his coloring by studying and copying the works of the best Venetian masters. Lanzi says there are several excellent copies of the Venetian pictures by him in the Casa Durazzo. He next went to Rome, where he resided many years, diligently studying design, but he did not forsake the Venetian style of coloring. He attached himself more to Carlo Maratti's manner of design than of any other master. "He painted," says Lanzi, "in a good Marattesque style, the noble picture of S. Francesco di Sales, at the Filipini, and other works; but of him, as well as of the Caracci, we find works partaking in an extraordinary manner of the style of Tintoretto and Veronese." His most celebrated performance is in the Palazzo Negroni at Genoa, where he decorated the walls in a style peculiarly his own, in which he displays a correct design, great vigor and harmony of color, a remarkably poetic invention, and a beautiful disposition and grouping of the figures. The whole is devoted to the glory of that noble family, whose escutcheon is crowned by the several symbols of Prudence, Continnence, and other virtues; there are also fables of Hercules slaying the Lion, and Achilles instructed by Chiron, which indicate the honors acquired by this family in letters and in arms. Portraits are added to these decorations, and every part is so well connected, so well varied, and so enriched by vestures, draperies, and other ornaments, that Lanzi says "some professors have not hesitated to declare it the first performance in Genoa, and Mengs' attention was there arrested for several hours, by a painter he had never heard of before." He also decorated other noble houses at Genoa with his frescos. He embellished the Gallery of the Sig. Marcello Durazzo with stories, fables, and chiaro-scuro, much in the style of the one just described. The chiaro-scuro in particular are so admirably executed as to produce illusion, and appear like real bassi-relievi. He painted many altar pieces for the churches and chapels in other cities of Italy as well as Genoa. He also painted the portraits of the Duke and other distinguished personages, which added to his fame. Parodi was likewise a good sculptor. He executed the statues of the king of Poland and other members of the royal family, and several of the nobility, which were greatly admired. He also etched a few plates from his own designs. He died in 1740.

PARODI, BATTISTA, was the brother of the preceding, born at Genoa in 1674. He studied at Venice, and his style partakes much of the Venetian school, both in design and coloring. He possessed a fertile invention, was expeditious, free, and brilliant in his coloring, but he was not sufficiently select in his forms. He executed some works for the churches at Milan and Bergamo, but wrought more for individuals. He died in 1730.

PARODI, PELLEGRINO, an eminent Italian portrait painter, was the son of Domenico P. To the merit of correct resemblance he added beautiful coloring, and easy and elegant attitudes. There are many of his works in England, Germany, and Spain. In 1741, he executed the portrait of Spinola, the Doge of Genoa, which has been engraved by Gregori. He resided some time at Lisbon, and was living, according to Lanzi, in 1769.

PARODI, ORTAVIO, a painter born at Pavia in 1659. He first studied under Andrea Lanzano, and afterwards went to Rome, where he resided many years. On his return to Pavia he executed some works for the churches, which are highly commended by Orlandi. Lanzi also says he was one of the ablest scholars of his master. He was living in 1718.

ra. According to Baruffaldi, who wrote his life, his father dying when he was five years old, his maternal uncle took him under his protection, and, perceiving in him a genius for painting, placed him with the Cav. Peruzzini at Turin, with whom he remained till he was eighteen, when he entered the school of Carlo Cignani. On his return to Ferrara, he finished some pictures left incomplete at the death of Aurelio Scannavini, who had been his fellow-student under Cignani. He did this out of regard to his friend, for the relief of his orphan family. He executed many works for the churches, and a multitude for the collections.— Though inferior to Cignani in the grandeur of his conceptions, and the masterly conduct of his chiaro-scuro, yet he sustained the credit of his school by the elegance of his design and the suavity of his coloring, particularly in his flesh tints, in which he excelled, for which reason he was fond of introducing into his compositions the naked figure. He was unusually successful in the design of his female figures, children, and cherubs. Lanzi says his pictures of Bacchanals, festive dances, and Capricci, partake much of the playful and elegant style of Albano, and are found in almost every collection at Ferrara. His principal works for the churches are three altar-pieces in the Cathedral, and a grand fresco, representing St. Sebastian mounting into Glory, amid a group of Angels, in the church of that Saint at Verona. Lanzi pronounces this work a grand production, well executed, which greatly raised his reputation. He died in 1733, and "with him (says Lanzi), was buried for a season the reputation of the Ferrarese school in Italy." Zani, differing from all others, calls him Giacomo Filippo, and says he was born in 1667 and died in 1737.

PAROLINI, PIO, a painter of Udine, who, according to the Ab. Titi, resided chiefly at Rome, and was admitted a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1678. He painted the ceiling of one of the chapels of S. Carlo al Corso, representing an allegorical subject, which was ingeniously composed and well colored.

PARONE, FRANCESCO, a Milanese painter, born about 1600. According to Baglioni, he was the son of an obscure artist, who taught him the rudiments of the art. At an early age he went to Rome, where he had the good fortune of being taken under the protection of the Marquis Giustiniani, for whom he painted several pictures. He studied the works of the best masters with great assiduity, and had already begun to distinguish himself, when he died, in 1634, in the flower of his life. His principal work is an altar-piece in the church of the monastery of S. Romualdo at Rome, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint—a grand composition, of many figures, executed in the style of Caravaggio.

PAROY, JACQUES DE, a French painter on glass, born at St. Pourçain-sur-Allier, towards the close of the 16th century. After acquiring the elements of design and painting, he visited Rome for improvement, and studied under Domenichino. It is probable that he gained his knowledge of glass-painting in his native country, as that art had already been practised in the south of France in great perfection, by Frère Guillaume, or Guglielmo de Marcilla. Paroy executed several fine works in Venice, and then returned to France. At Paris, he painted the windows in the choir of the church of S. Merry; and designed the Judgment of Susanna for a chapel of the same church, executed on glass by Jean Nogare. There are four beautiful paintings by Paroy in the parish church of S. Croix, at Gannat, representing St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory.

PARR, REMI, or REMIGIUS, an English designer and engraver, born at Rochester in 1723. He engraved a few plates for the booksellers, which are indifferently executed.

PARRASIO, ANGELO, an eminent painter of Siena, who was employed at the court of the Marchese d'Este in 1449. He also painted the Nine Muses in the Palazzo Belfiore, near Ferrara.

PARRHASIUS, a celebrated Greek painter, the son and scholar of Evenor, was a native of Ephesus, but afterwards became a citizen of Athens; flourished about B. C. 390. He raised the art to a much higher degree of perfection than it had before attained. Comparing his three great predecessors with each other, he rejected that which was exceptionable in them, and adopted that which was admirable. The classic invention of Polygnotus, the magic tones of Apollodorus, and the exquisite design of Zeuxis, were all united in the works of Parrhasius. Plutarch instances Parrhasius' picture of Ulysses feigning insanity, as an improper subject for the pencil, yet reconciled to our taste through the spirit of the conception, and the truth of the execution. Pliny says he gave his figures more relief and roundness, with an air of life and motion unknown before him. According to Quintilian, he so circumscribed and defined all the powers and objects of art, that he was termed the Legislator; he reduced to theory the practice of former artists, and all cotemporary and subsequent painters adopted his standard of heroic and divine proportions. Parrhasius gave to the divine and heroic character in painting, what Polyclethus had given to the human in sculpture, by his Doryphorus, namely, a canon of proportion. The branch of the art in which he chiefly excelled was elegance of outline; his figures of children were greatly admired for their simplicity, and his young men and women for their beauty and grace. When Euphranor remarked that the Theseus of Parrhasius had fed upon roses, and his own upon beef, he seems to have alluded particularly to the style of design, rather than to the coloring; for, as Winckelmann remarks, the word used by Plutarch, γλαφυρως or elegantly, relates expressly to form. It will be observed that, according to the taste of Euphranor, the figure of Parrhasius was too elegant and delicate for heroic beauty. Pliny praises him for the beauty of his figures; the "sweetness and lovely grace about the mouth and lips"; the softness and fullness of the hair; and the blended tints that melted away in the outline. He quotes two ancient writers on painting, Antigonus and Xenocrates, now lost, who praised Parrhasius, especially for the delicacy with which he painted the extremities of the fingers. They cited many portraits on panel, and drawings on parchment, which served as examples to other painters, and as proofs of his wonderful skill in this part of the art.

One of the most celebrated works of Parrhasius was his Demos, or allegorical figure of the Athenian People. Pliny says that it represented, and expressed equally, all the good and bad qualities of the Athenians at the same time; one might trace the changeable, the irritable, the kind, the unjust, the forgiving, the vain-glorious, the proud, the humble, the fierce, the timid. Supposing it to have been a single figure, this description of Pliny is scarcely creditable. His Theseus, after the general spoliation of Athens, was removed to Rome. Among the other works of Parrhasius, Pliny enumerates a Naval Commander in his Armor; a picture of Melceger, Heracles, and Perseus; Ulysses feigning insanity; Castor and Pollux; Bacchus and Virtue; a Cretan Nurse, with an Infant in her Arms; a Priest officiating, with an attendant Youth bearing incense; two Boys, in which were admirably depicted the innocent simplicity of the age, and its happy security from all care; a Philiscus; a Telephus; an Achilles; an Agamemnon; an Æneas; and two famous pictures of Hoplites, or heavily armed warriors, one in action, the other in repose. Parrhasius was also distinguished for his small libidinous subjects. The Archigallus mentioned by Pliny was most probably of this description, both from the particular favor of Tiberius with which it was honored, and from the peculiar nature of the rites of Cybele, whose chief priest was called Archigallus. To this class may be added the picture of Meleager and Atalanta, mentioned by Suetonius. This picture was bequeathed to Tiberius on the condition that, if he were offended with the subject, he should receive in its stead 1,000,000 sesterces (about $40,000). The emperor not only preferred the picture, but had it fixed up in his own chamber, where the Archigallus was also preserved, which was valued at 60,000 sesterces. These productions entitle Parrhasius to the epithet of Pornograph, and prove that this style of painting was in vogue long before the decay of Grecian art.

The story told by Seneca, of Parrhasius having crucified an old Olynthian captive, when about to paint a picture of Prometheus chained, cannot relate to this artist, and is probably a fiction, as it is found nowhere but in the Controversies. Olynthus was taken by Philip, in the year B. C. 347; which is nearly half a century later than the latest accounts of Parrhasius. This great artist was well aware of his powers, but he became extravagantly carried away with pride and vanity. He assumed the title of The Elegant; styled himself the Prince of Painters; wrote an epigram upon himself, in which he proclaimed his birthplace, celebrated his father Evenor, and pretended that he himself had carried the art to perfection. He also declared himself descended from Apollo, and even went so far as to dedicate his own portrait as Mercury in a temple, and thus received the adoration of the multitude. From these considerations, it would appear that Pliny justly terms him the most insolent and most arrogant of artists. That author also mentions a contest between Parrhasius and Timanthes of Cythnos, in which the former was beaten; the subject of the picture was the contest between Ulysses and Ajax. The proud painter, indignant at the decision of the judges, is said to have remarked that the unfortunate son of Telamon was for a second time, in the same cause, defeated by an unworthy rival. Another anecdote is well known, respecting his contest with Zeuxis. The latter painted grapes, in the hands of a boy, so true to nature that the birds endeavored to peck them—no great compli-

PARROCEL, BARTHELEMI, a French painter, was born at Montbrison, in the first part of the 17th century. He was at first intended for the church, but on account of a strong inclination for art, was permitted to study painting. After acquiring a knowledge of design in his own country, he set out for Italy; but, during his journey, he became acquainted with a Spanish grandee, who was greatly pleased with his talents, and invited him to visit Spain. The proposal was accepted, and Parrocel spent several years in that country; after which he again started for Italy, but was captured by Algerian corsairs. Happily, his confinement was of short duration; and upon being released he went to Rome. He passed several years in that city, and then settled at Brignoles, in France, where he died in 1660. The French writers do not state what subjects he usually painted, or what reputation he attained. He left three sons, who studied painting; the eldest died very young; the second, Louis Parrocel, practised the art with some distinction in Provence and at Paris. He afterwards settled in Languedoc. The third son, Joseph P., is the subject of the following article.

PARROCEL, JOSEPH, an eminent French painter, born at Brignoles in Provence, in 1648. He was the son of the preceding painter, who instructed him in the rudiments of the art, but died when he was twelve years of age. Without any further assistance, he went to Paris, where he greatly improved himself by studying the works of the best French masters. His talents and lively disposition recommended him to the notice of some of the most distinguished artists in that city, who aided him with their advice, and recommended him to go to Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he found the works of Borgognone in the highest estimation, and he had the good fortune to be admitted into the school of that distinguished master. He applied himself with great assiduity to acquire his principles. After a residence of several years at Rome, he went to Venice, where he improved his coloring, which at that time partook of the dark, cold style of Borgognone, by studying the works of the great Venetian masters. He had already acquired distinction at Venice, and such was the encouragement he received, and such the homage paid to his talents, that he resolved to establish himself in that city; but, in 1675, an extraordinary circumstance made it prudent for him to return to his own country. As he was returning to his apartments one night, he was assailed by assassins, on the Rialto, posted there, as is believed, by persons jealous of his merit and success, and he escaped death only by his personal valor. He therefore returned to Paris, where he immediately met with public favor and encouragement. He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1676, on which occasion he painted for his reception piece the Siege of Maestricht, which greatly increased his reputation. He was soon afterwards commissioned by the Marquis de Louvois, minister of state, to decorate one of the four refectories of the Invalides with the conquests of Louis XIV., in which he succeeded so admirably that he was employed in some of the works in the royal galleries at Versailles. Louis XIV. appointed him his state painter, with a liberal pension, and he continued in his service till his death. The fame of Parrocel rests mostly on his battle-pieces, which are designed in the grand style of Borgognone, and although they cannot stand in competition with that great master, they possess so much merit as to rank him with any other artist of his time. His battle-pieces are ingeniously and copiously composed, designed with great correctness and skill, and executed with a spirited pencil, admirably adapted to the subjects he represented; his figures and horses have attitudes perfectly natural and full of fire, and the variety of passions are properly expressed. His talents were not limited to these subjects; he painted history and portraits with such excellence as plainly shows that he would have excelled equally in these branches, had he devoted his talents to them. He executed several works for the churches and public edifices, which display an excellent genius for historical composition. They are elegantly designed, his tints are unusually clear, his touch is free and clean, and there is a happy disposition of the lights which produces a pleasing effect. Such are his St. John in the Wilderness, in the church of Notre Dame at Paris; and several historical works in the Hotel de Toulouse. Parrocel also executed a large number of spirited etchings from his own designs. Dumesnil gives a list of ninety prints by him, among which are a set of forty-eight prints of the Life of Christ; the Four Times of the Day; and four battle-pieces. They are marked J. Parrocel inv. et fec. He died in 1704.

PARROCEL, CHARLES, the son of Joseph P., was born at Paris in 1689. He studied the elements of design under his father, but as the latter died when Charles was only sixteen years of age, he entered the school of Charles de la Fosse. On leaving that master, he visited Italy, and painted a picture of the Finding of Moses, which he sent to Paris, and thereby gained the royal pension. During his residence in Italy he continued to cultivate the historical branch of the art, but on returning to France, he determined to become a painter of battles. In order to acquire a better knowledge of his favorite subjects, he entered a regiment of cavalry, and served for several years; but without relinquishing the practice of his profession. In 1721, by order of the King, he painted two pictures twenty-two feet in length, representing the Entrance of the Turkish Ambassador to the Gardens of the Tuileries, and the Exit of the same distinguished personage, after an audience, at the Pont Tournant. These fine works gained for Parrocel, a suite of apartments in the Gobelins, and a pension of 600 livres. In 1744 and 1745, he was appointed to accompany Louis XV. in his campaigns in Flanders, to paint the successful battles of the French forces. His pictures are inferior to those of his father in brilliancy, though superior in truth, of coloring. He was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. There are a number of spirited etchings by him, after his own designs, representing horse and foot soldiers. He died in 1752.

PARROCEL, IGNACE, a French painter, the son of Louis P., and the nephew of Joseph P., was born at Avignon, according to Zani, in 1664; according to Nagler, in 1688. He studied under his uncle, and painted huntings and battle pieces in the admirable style of that master. He traveled through Italy and Austria, and was commissioned by the Emperor and Prince Eugene to paint a number of battle pieces. The Duke d'Arenberg invited him to the Low Countries, whither he went, and died at Mons. in 1722. Seven of his pictures were taken from the Imperial Gallery at Vienna, and placed in the Louvre; but they were restored in 1815.

PARROCEL, PIERRE, a French painter and engraver, the younger brother of the preceding, was born at Avignon in 1664. He was first instructed by his uncle Joseph P., after which he visited Rome, and entered the school of Carlo Maratti. After returning to France, he traveled through Languedoc and Provence, and the Comtat of Avignon, leaving in the various cities through which he passed, numerous proofs of his abilities, among which were the Resurrection and the Ascension of Christ, in the chapel of the White Penitents at Avignon. His reputation soon extended to Paris, and gained him an invitation to that city, where he executed a number of fine works. His pictures are distinguished for graceful design, beautiful coloring, vigorous execution, and harmonious effect. Among his principal works are sixteen pictures of subjects from the History of Tobit, in the Gallery of the Hotel de Noailles, at St. Germain en Laie; and the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria at Marseilles, which is considered his master-piece. As an engraver, he etched a number of plates, with rare dexterity and infinite spirit, in a style analogous to that of A. Rivalz. He was not equally successful with the graver. Dumesnil describes eighteen prints of his execution.

PARROCEL, ETIENNE, a French painter, the son of Pierre P., was born at Paris about 1720. He painted subjects of history, but attained little reputation. He exhibited several works, among which were Cephalus and Procris, and Christ on the Mount of Olives. There are several etchings by him, in a free, bold style, among which are a Bacchanalian Subject, from his own design; the Triumph of Mordecai, after de Troy; Bacchus and Ariadne, after Subleyras.

PARROCEL, JOSEPH IGNACE, was a native of Avignon and a son of Pierre P. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and the last painter of the Parrocel family. According to Nagler, he died in 1781. He left several daughters, of whom the eldest, Madame de Valranseaux, was distinguished for painting flowers and animals.

PARRY, WILLIAM, an English painter, born at London, in 1742. He first learned the rudiments of design in Shipley's drawing school; he next studied in the Duke of Richmond's Gallery, and afterwards with Sir Joshua Reynolds. He obtained several prizes from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. On leaving Reynolds, he was favored with the patronage of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, by whose liberality he was enabled to visit Italy in 1770, where he resided four years, and painted for his patron, among other things, a copy of the Transfiguration by Raffaele. He returned to London in 1775, and was chosen an associate of the Royal Academy in 1776. Not meeting with much encouragement, he returned to Rome in 1778, where he resided till 1791, when the state of his health compelled him to return to his native country, where he died soon after his arrival. At Rome he was principally employed in executing commissions for his countrymen, who happened to stop at that city.

PARS, WILLIAM, an English designer and painter, born at London about 1742. He learned the rudiments of art in Shipley's drawing school, and afterwards frequented the Academy in St. Martin's Lane, from which institution, in 1764, he drew the third premium of twenty guineas, for historical painting. Soon afterwards the Dilettanti Society sent him to Greece to make further researches into the remains of antiquity, on which expedition he was absent three years. On his return he was employed by Lord Palmerston to accompany him in a tour through Switzerland and Italy, to make drawings of the most remarkable views and antiquities. In 1770, he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. In 1775 the Dilettanti Society sent him to Rome, on a pension, to study painting, where he resided till his death, in 1782. Some of his views made in Greece were engraved by Byrne, and some of those in Switzerland and Italy were executed in aquatinta by Paul Sandby.

PARSONS, FRANCIS, an English portrait painter, who flourished at London about 1763. He was an indifferent artist, and afterwards turned his attention to restoring and dealing in old pictures.

PARSONS, WILLIAM, an English painter, but more distinguished comedian, born at London in 1736. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to an architect, and so much distinguished himself by his architectural drawings and designs, that he obtained several premiums from the Society of Arts, &c. On obtaining his majority, he took to the stage, and became one of the most popular comedians of his time. He is said however, never to have relinquished his pencil, but painted a variety of landscapes, architectural subjects, and fruit pieces, which he gave to his friends. He died in 1795.

PASCH, JOHN, a Swedish painter, born at Stockholm in 1706. He acquired the elements of design in his native country, and subsequently visited Holland, France, and Italy, for improvement. During his travels, he made a valuable collection of drawings and pictures. On returning to Sweden, he settled at Stockholm, and practised the art in that city for many years. He painted flower-pieces, landscapes, and marine views. Among his most important works, is the cupola of the Royal Chapel at Stockholm. His knowledge and taste were of great service to the Academy of Fine Arts, founded at Stockholm in 1734. He died in 1769.

PASCH, LAWRENCE, a Swedish painter, flourished at Stockholm in the first part of the 18th century. He was distinguished in portrait; and was appointed to the office of Director of the Academy of Fine Arts, which he filled for many years. His daughter, Ulrica Frederika Pasch, was born in 1735. She evinced remarkable talents, and in 1773 was admitted to the Academy. She died in 1796.

PASINELLI, LORENZO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1629. He first studied under Simone Cantarini, and next with Flaminio Torre. He afterwards went to Venice, where he became enamoured of the ornamental and brilliant style of Paul Veronese, and he made the works of that master his model, though he did not servilely imitate him.

Lanzi says, "he borrowed from Veronese his effective and magnificent composition, but the airs of his heads and the distribution of his colors he obtained from another source; and, though he never acquired the correctness of design which distinguishes the works of Torre, yet in this respect he surpassed Paolo." On his return to Bologna, he found abundant employment in painting for the churches and the collections. He was naturally inclined to create surprise by the display of copious, rich, and spirited compositions; such are his two pictures at the Certosa, representing Christ's Entrance into Jerusalem, and his Return into Limbo; and such, too, is his History of Coriolanus, in the Casa Ranuzzi—a piece found repeated in many collections. No one can behold these paintings without granting to Pasinelli a true painter's fire, great novelty of ideas, and an elevated character. With these gifts, he was sometimes too extravagant in his imitation of the attitudes, pompous spectacles, strange and novel draperies of Veronese, which he is thought to have carried to the extreme, as in his Preaching of John the Baptist in the Wilderness, which gave occasion to his rival Taruffi sarcastically to remark that, instead of the desert of Judea, he discovered in it the piazza of St. Mark at Venice. He, nevertheless, knew how to moderate his fire according to his theme, as in his Holy Family, in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, which partakes of the elegance and grace of Albano. He painted more for private collections than for the public edifices, though there are several other works by him in the churches at Bologna, the most esteemed of which are the Resurrection, in S. Francesco; and the Martyrdom of St. Ursula and her companions, in the Palazzo Zambeccari. Lanzi says, "his private pictures are uniform in spirit, rich and varied in the composition, and they boast such a delicacy of handling and peculiar brilliancy of coloring, that they might be taken for the works of the Venetians or the Lombards; in particular some of his Venuses, which are supposed to be the portraits of one of his three wives. He died in 1700. Basan erroneously says that Pasinelli etched some plates, and mentions two—St. John preaching in the Wilderness, and the Martyrdom of St. Ursula and other Saints; but these plates were engraved by Lorenzini, a scholar of Pasinelli. See Bartsch's P. G., tom. XIX., pp. 415--417, Nos. 6 and 8.

PASITELES, a Grecian statuary, mentioned by Pliny as flourishing in the time of Pompey the Great. He executed a statue of Jupiter for the first temple erected at Rome by Metellus Macedonicus, and wrote an account of the finest monuments of art extant in his time.

PASQUALI, FILIPPO, a painter of Forli, who studied under Carlo Cignani at Bologna. He afterwards associated himself with Marc' Antonio Franceschini, in conjunction with whom he painted many works at Bologna, Rimini, and other places, in which he executed the ornamental parts. Some of his earlier works are to be seen in the portico of the Serviti at Bologna. Lanzi highly commends his altar-piece in the church of S. Vitore at Ravenna, which he executed alone, at a more advanced age. He is supposed to have died about 1690.

PASQUALINI, FELICE, a Bolognese painter, who flourished about 1575. According to Malvasia, he was the scholar of Lorenzo Sabbatini, whose style he adopted. He executed some works for the churches, which Lanzi thinks might be justly attributed to Sabbatini, such was the part he took in their execution.

PASQUALINI, or PASCALINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Cento, near Bologna, in the latter part of the 16th century. His earliest print is dated 1619, and the latest 1630. He studied painting under Ciro Ferri, but he does not seem to have acquired much eminence in that art. He executed many etchings, mostly after Guercino, in which he endeavored to imitate with the point the masterly pen-drawings of that master, but he did not possess a sufficient command of his instrument to accomplish it with much success. He frequently signed his plates J. B. Centensis. Nagler gives a list of forty prints by him, of which the following are the principal:

SUBJECTS AFTER GUERCINO.

Christ dictating the Gospel to St. John. The Resurrection of Lazarus. Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter. Christ taken in the Garden. Angels showing Mary Magdalene the Instruments of the Passion. Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. The Incredulity of Thomas. The Virgin and Infant, with an Angel presenting Fruit. The Virgin and Infant, to whom St. John presents an Apple. St. Charles Borromens. St. Felix resuscitating a Dead Child. Tancred and Erminia. Tithonus and Aurora.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

St. Felix kneeling before the Virgin and Infant; after L. Caracci. St. Diego working a Miracle; after Ann. Caracci. The Death of St. Cecilia; after Domenichino. The Aurora; after Guido.

PASQUALINO. See PASQUALE ROSSI.

PASQUALOTTO, CONSTANTINO, a painter of Vicenza, who flourished about 1700. He studied at Venice, and on returning to his native city he executed some works for the churches, but more for individuals, in which Lanzi says he was more distinguished for the richness of his draperies and the brilliancy of his coloring, than for the correctness of his design.

PASQUIER, JEAN JACQUES, a French engraver, born at Paris, and a pupil of Lawrence Cars. He engraved a variety of book plates and others, after the French masters, among which are two Pastoral Subjects, and Arion upon the Dolphin, after Boucher; the Graces, after C. Vanloo; and a set of twelve Academical Figures, after Natoire. He died in 1784.

 PASS, or PASSE, CRISPIN DE, called THE ELDER, an eminent Dutch engraver, born at Utrecht in 1560, according to the best authorities, though there is great discrepancy as to the place and time of his nativity. He is said to have studied under Theodore Cuernbert. He was a man of letters, and not only a lover of his art, but fond of promoting it, as is evident from his Drawing Book, published at Amsterdam in 1643, when he was an octogenarian, in Italian, French, and Dutch, entitled Della Luce del dipingere e disegnare. In this work, he mentions his intimacy with the most eminent artists of his time, as Rubens, A. Bloemaert, Freminet, P. Moreelze, and P. vander Berg. This also farther appears from his having incurred the expense of publishing Holland's Herologia, in which it is expressly stated Impensis Crispini Passe. His talents recommended him to the notice of Prince Maurice, who sent him to Paris, where he taught drawing in the Academy of M. Pluvinet, riding master to Louis XIII., at which time he designed and engraved his celebrated set of prints entitled, Instruction du Roi en l'exercice de monter à cheval, par Messire Antoine de Pluvinet. These plates represent the different exercises of the horse, the manner of tilting at the barriers, &c.; and into them he introduced the portrait of Louis XIII., the Duke de Bellgarde, and many of the great personages of the court. He went to London, where he resided a long time, and executed many plates. It is supposed that he returned to his own country about 1635, as there are none of his plates engraved in England, bearing a later date. The plates of Crispin de Passe are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear, and original style, and though there is occasionally an appearance of stiffness and formality, his prints possess great merit, and are highly esteemed. Many of them are designed from the life, and the greater part of his historical and other subjects are engraved from his own designs. His portraits are his best prints. Nagler and Bartsch give copious lists of his works, which are very numerous, and show a life of extraordinary industry. The following are his most esteemed prints. They are generally marked with a monogram composed of an S., V., and a P., united as above.

ENGLISH PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth, sumptuously attired, with the Crown, Sceptre, and Globe; after Isaac Oliver. A Head of the same Queen; oval. James I. with the Sceptre in his hand. James I. with a Hat and Ruff; oval. Anne of Denmark, his consort; do. Henry, Prince of Wales; do. Charles, his brother, afterwards Charles I.; do. Frederick, Count Palatine, consort of Princess Elizabeth. Elizabeth, daughter of James I., his wife. Sir Philip Sidney. The Earl of Essex on horseback. Thomas Percy, the conspirator; scarce.

FOREIGN PORTRAITS.

Henry IV., King of France. Mary of Medicis, his Queen. Philip II., King of Spain. Henry Frederick, Prince of Nassau. Albert, Archduke of Austria, and Maurice, Prince of Nassau, on horseback. Louisa Juliana, Countess of Nassau; circular. Andrea Doria, Genoese Admiral. Adolphus, Baron of Schwartzenberg. Alexander Farnese. A set of fourteen Portraits of Women, with a frontispiece, entitled Speculum illustrium feninarum.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Adam and Eve. Susanna and the Elders. Three small circular plates of Busts, representing Faith, Hope and Charity; fine. Cleopatra. The Inside of a Tavern, with Men and Women quarrelling; C. van Pass inv. 1589; one of his earliest prints. The Seven Liberal Arts. The Nine Muses.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The History of Tobit, in six plates; after M. de Vos. The Twelve Months, in twelve circular plates; do. The Four Evangelists, in four plates; after Goltzius Geldorp; very fine. The Angels appearing to the Shepherds; after A. Bloemaert. The Crucifixion; after Jod. de Winghe. The Judgment of Paris; after C. vander Broeck. The Siege of Troy; do. A set of four Landscapes, with figures; after J. Breughel.

PASS, or PASSE, CRISPIN DE, called THE YOUNGER, was the eldest son of the preceding, born at Utrecht about 1585. Little is known with certainty of him, and there is much discrepancy as to the time of his birth. He studied design and engraving with his father. Zani says he was living in 1659, and quotes one of his prints bearing that date. There are only a few prints by him among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick, Elector Palatine; inscribed Crispin Passeus, jun., fig. et sculps.; oval. Johannes Angelius Werdenhaugen; C. de Passe filius, fec. 1600.

SUBJECTS.

Three, of a set of four plates of the History of the Rich Man and Lazarus; the fourth was engraved by his father.

 PASS, or PASSE, WILLIAM DE, was the second son of Crispin de Passe, born at Utrecht, about 1590. He was instructed by his father, whom he very nearly equalled. It is supposed that he accompanied his father to England, where he resided the greater part of his life, and engraved a great number and variety of plates, which are highly esteemed. His best prints are his portraits. The times of his birth and death are altogether uncertain. His birth is variously placed in 1572, 1580, and 1590. Zani says he operated in 1640. There is a portrait of Oliver Cromwell, attributed to him, dated 1660. He sometimes marked his plates with his name, and at others with a monogram of his initials. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

James I. and his Family, inscribed Triumphus Jacobi Regis Augustæ que ipsius prolis; scarce. James I., with Henry Prince of Wales. After the death of that prince the face was erased, and that of Charles his brother substituted in its place. Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; oval, with the cipher. George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, on horseback, with shipping in the background; scarce. Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, on horseback; scarce. Frances, Duchess of Richmond and Lenox; very highly finished; inscribed Anno. 1625. insculptum Guliel. Passeo Londinum. Sir John Haywood; W. Pass, f. Sir Henry Rich; very fine. Darcy Wentworth. 1624. The King and Queen of Bohemia, with four of their Children; inscribed Will. Pass, fecit, ad vivum figurator. 1621. The Palatine Family, in which the youngest child is playing with a rabbit; without the name of the engraver.

 PASS, or PASSE, SIMON DE, was the youngest son of Crispin de Passe the Elder, who instructed him in the art. He resided in England about ten years, and engraved quite a number of portraits and other subjects, which are highly esteemed. He was also employed by Hilliard to engrave counters of the English Royal Family. The earliest prints he engraved in England are dated 1613, and the latest 1623. On leaving England, he entered the service of the King of Denmark. Nagler mentions two Danish portraits, dated 1644. He marked his prints variously, with his name and the above monogram. His portraits are his best prints. The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth; whole length. James I. crowned, sitting in a chair. The same, with a hat. Queen Anne on horseback, with a View of Windsor; scarce. The same; dated 1617. Prince Henry with a lance. Philip III. King of Spain. Maria of Austria, his daughter, the intended bride of Charles I.; scarce. The same, as sister of Philip IV.; very fine. General Edward Cecyll, son to the Earl of Exeter; very scarce. George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. 1617, when Earl. The same, when Marquis. 1620. Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset. Frances Howard, Countess of Somerset. Francis Manners, Earl of Rutland. Thomas, Earl of Arundel; after Mirevelt. Sir Walter Raleigh. Sir Thos. Smith, Ambassador to Russia. William, Earl of Pembroke; after Van Somer. Richard, Earl of Dorset. Archbishop Abbot, with a View of Lambeth. R. Sidney, Viscount Lisle; scarce. Charles, Earl of Nottingham. Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke; scarce. Henry Wriothesly, Earl of Southampton. Edward Somerset, Earl of Worcester. Count Gondomar, Ambassador from Spain; very fine. Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, inscribed Liberum Belgium; very fine. Four whole-length portraits of the Dukes of Burgundy—John the Intrepid, Philip the Bold, Philip the Good, and Charles the Rash; etchings; scarce.

PASS, or PASSE, MAGDALENA DE, was the daughter of the elder Crispin de Passe, born about 1583. She learned engraving of her father, and engraved some small plates of portraits and other subjects, in a neat, finished style, which possess considerable merit. The following are by her, marked with one of the accompanying monograms:

PORTRAITS.

Her own Head; scarce. Catherine, Duchess of Buckingham, with a feather in her hand.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Wise and the Foolish Virgins; after Elsheimer; fine and scarce. The Four Seasons; after the designs of her father. Cephalus and Procris. Salmacis and Hermaphroditus. Latona changing the Lycian Peasants into Frogs. Alpheus and Arethusa. A pair of Landscapes; after Roland Savery. A pair, one a Storm with a Shipwreck, and the other a Landscape with a Windmill; after A. Willeres; fine.

PASS, or PASSE, SIMON DE. It is said that C. de Passe the younger had a son of this name, and that he went to Copenhagen, where he engraved some plates, among which were a portrait of Frederick III. King of Denmark; an Ecce Homo, dated 1639; and a Woman with three Children, dated 1643; but it seems more than probable that he is no other than Simon de P., the son of the elder Crispin de P.

PASSANTE, BARTOLOMEO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, was a scholar of Spagnoletto, whose style and subjects he imitated with great success, but with a more finished design and expression. Lanzi justly remarks that "those masters who are mannerists form scholars who confine their powers to the sole imitation of their master, and thus produce pictures that deceive the most experienced." He painted mostly for the collections, and flourished about the middle of the 17th century.

PASSAROTTI. See PASSEROTTI.

PASSARI. See PASSERI.

PASSERI, ANDREA, a painter of Como, who flourished about 1505. In the cathedral of his native city is a picture of the Virgin surrounded by the Apostles, in which the composition and expression of the heads are good, but Lanzi says there is a dryness in the hands, with the use of gilding unworthy of the age in which he painted.

PASSERI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Rome about 1610. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Domenichino; at all events, in the early part of his life, he lived on terms of intimacy with that master at Frescati, and adhered much to his style in his historical works. Lanzi says there are few of his works in public, as he wrought mostly for the collections. In the church of S. Giovanni della Malva at Rome, is a picture by him of the Crucifixion. In the Palazzo Mattei are some of his pictures, representing butcher's meat, birds, and game, touched with a masterly pencil; to these are added some half-length figures and some sparrows (passeri), in allusion to his name. There is also by his hand, in the Academy of St. Luke, the portrait of Domenichino. He was a man of letters, possessed a profound knowledge of art, and wrote the lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects who were employed at Rome, now deceased, from 1641 to 1673, published at Rome in 1772. Lanzi pronounces him one of the most learned and authentic writers on Italian art. He was President of the Academy of St. Luke in 1641, when Domenichino died, and pronounced his funeral oration. Malvasia erroneously states that it was Passerino. Towards the close of his life he entered the priesthood, and in 1675 obtained a benefice in the College of S. Maria in Via Lata. He died in 1679.

PASSERI, GIUSEPPE, was a nephew of the preceding, born at Rome in 1654. According to Pascoli, he was a scholar of Carlo Maratti, and one of the most successful followers of his style. He painted many works for the churches at Rome, and at different places in the Roman territory. In the church of the Vatican, he painted a pendant to the Baptism of Maratti, representing St. Peter baptizing the Centurion. This work, after being copied in mosaic, was sent to the church of the Conventuals at Urbino. It was executed under the direction of Maratti himself, and is admirably colored; but in his other works at Rome, such as the Conception, in the church of S. Tommaso in Parione, the coloring is comparatively feeble. At Pesaro is one of his most esteemed works, representing St. Jerome meditating on the Last Judgment. He painted much for the collections, and was also an excellent portrait painter. Passeri lived in general esteem, and his house was much frequented by persons of the first rank for taste and literature. He died at Rome in 1714.

P PASSERI, PASSARO, or PASSARI, BERNARDINO, an Italian painter and engraver, who flourished at Rome about 1580. There is a great deal of contradiction and confusion about this artist, from his having flourished nearly at the same time with Bartolomeo Passerotti, and using the same mark. It is said that he studied painting under Taddeo Zuccaro, whose style he adopted; but there is no certainty of this, though it seems probable. He is more distinguished as an engraver, and he executed a large number of plates, mostly of devout subjects, from his own designs, which prove him to have possessed a fertile and ready invention. They are sometimes marked with his name, and sometimes with a monogram of his initials, the B. being reversed. Bartsch says he was not a painter, but a designer and engraver, and he gives a list of seventy-eight etchings by him; but many of the prints heretofore attributed to him he gives to Passerotti, which see.

P PASSEROTTI, BARTOLOMEO, a Bolognese painter, born about 1540, and died according to the register of the church of S. Martino Maggiore, where he was interred, in 1592. He studied under Taddeo Zuccaro at Rome, and is mentioned by Vasari as one of the assistants of that master. He is also commended by Borghini and Lomazzo. He resided in the early part of his life at Rome, where he executed some works for the churches, the most esteemed of which is the Martyrdom of St. Paul, in S. Paolo alle Tre Fontane. On his return to Bologna, he painted many altar-pieces for the churches, the most celebrated of which are the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Pietro; the Annunciation, in S. Martino Maggiore; the Virgin on a Throne, surrounded by St. John the Baptist and other Saints, in S. Giacomo Maggiore, which last work was avowedly painted in competition with the Caracci, and elicited their praise. The exquisite degree of diligence and refinement which he displayed in this work he rarely used; but he generally painted in a bold, free style, with remarkable facility of execution. He also excelled in portraits, and in this branch Guido ranked him next to Titian, preferring him before the Caracci themselves. Lanzi says the name of the Caracci, in several galleries, is attached to the portraits of Passerotti. The most commendable of all his portraits are those he executed for the noble family Legnani, which are full-lengths, extremely varied in costume, action, and attitudes, and, though correct likenesses, they appear like true ideal pictures. He opened a school at Bologna, which was attended by many distinguished masters. Lanzi says "he was the first at Bologna to make a grander display, and began to vary Scripture histories by drawing from the naked torsi. He possessed remarkable skill in designing with his pen; a gift which drew to his school Agostino Caracci, and which assisted the latter as a guide in the art of engraving; he likewise wrote a book, from which he taught the symmetry and anatomy of the human body essential to the artist." The pictures of Passerotti are distinguished by a sparrow, in allusion to his name—a custom derived from the ancients, and practised by many modern artists. It is a well known fact relating to the two ancient sculptors Batrarchus and Sauris, that they indicated their proper names, the former by a frog and the latter by a lizard. Zani describes Passerotti as a designer and engraver. He says, also, that he is called Il maestro al Passero (the Master of the Sparrow), from his having used a sparrow between the letters B. and P., as his rebus; but this is not mentioned by any other writer. Bartsch commends him highly for his ability as a designer, and for the freedom and boldness of his manner of engraving. He enumerates and describes fifteen prints by him; also two mentioned by Gori and Rost. and one doubtful, but he does not consider the catalogue complete. He says that his prints have at all times been sought for by artists and connoisseurs, and that they have become extremely scarce, the richest collections possessing one or two at most.

1. The Chastity of Joseph; after Parmiggiانو. 2. The Visitation; after F. Salviati. 3. The Virgin, with the infant and St. John, marked P. F. 4. A similar subject, with the letters B. P. 5. The Virgin sitting on the ground, with the infant Jesus on her knees; signed B. PASAROT. 6. Jesus Christ holding a Banner; B. PASAROT. This and the five following are supposed to be part of a suite of thirteen, representing Christ and his Apostles. 7. St. Peter; the letters B. P. on the left at bottom. 8. St. Andrew; B. PASAROT at bottom. 9. St. John the Evangelist; do. 10. St. Bartholomew; do. 11. St. Paul; the letters B. P. on the right at bottom. 12. Religion, represented by a Woman seated, and surrounded by the sun; the letter B. on the right at bottom. 13. Painting, represented by a young Female with Wings. The letters B. P. on the right at bottom. 14. A young Woman in Bed. B. PASSAROTO written backwards, the letter B. reversed and joined to the P. 15. The Sacrifice, in which there are eight figures.—The letters B. P. on the left at bottom. A Charity, mentioned by Gori. The Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca; after Perugino; mentioned by Rost. A Holy Family, doubtful. St. Peter delivered from Prison by an Angel. St. Peter is seated, and the Angel, without wings, has placed the left hand on Peter's shoulder, and directs the way with the right. At the bottom in the corner are the letters B. P.

PASSEROTTI, TIBURZIO, was the eldest son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1575. He was instructed by his father, whose manner he adopted, though he wrought with a less bold, free, and rapid pencil. He executed some works for the churches, which were admired for their beautiful composition, and which Lanzi says possess real merit. The principal are the Assumption, in S. Maria Mascarella; the Virgin, with St. Francis and St. Jerome, in S. Cecilia; the Annunciation, in S. Cristina; and the Martyrdom of St. Catherine, in S. Giacomo Maggiore, which last is his most celebrated performance. He was also an excellent portrait painter. He died in the prime of life, in 1612.

PASSEROTTI, AURELIO, was the second son of Bartolomeo. He acquired distinction for his small pictures of historical subjects. He died at Rome about 1605. The third son, Passarotto P., died in his youth.

PASSEROTTI, VENTURA, was the fourth son of Bartolomeo, born at Bologna in 1586. He was instructed by his brother Tiburzio, whom he assisted in his works, but did not acquire any distinction as an historical painter. He however, painted portraits equal to any of his cotemporaries. His greatest delight was in drawing with a pen or crayons, such subjects as occurred to his imagination, in which he aspired to express the proportions of the naked figure, and the muscular action, in the grand and terrible manner of Michael Angelo. He died in 1630.

PASSIGNANO. See CAV. DOMENICO CRESTI.

PASTERINI, JACOPO, an excellent mosaic painter, who wrought for the churches at Venice, in the latter part of the 16th century. There are notices of him up to 1618.

PASTI, MATTEO, an old artist of Verona, who, according to Maffei, was a painter, sculptor in marble and bronze, gem and wood engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 15th century. He is supposed to have executed the wood cuts for a folio volume published at Verona in 1472, entitled, Roberti Valturii opus de re Militare. They possess considerable accuracy and spirit, and show a considerable improvement in the art. This was the second book illustrated with engravings published in Italy, the first being the Meditations of Cardinal Turrecremata, published at Rome in 1467, by Hans Ulric, or as he is called by the Italians, Ulderico Han.

PASTILL, J. DE, a French engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He seems to have employed himself mostly in copying the prints of other masters, which he did in an indifferent manner. Among other plates of this description, is one of the Murder of the Innocents, after the engraving of Louis Audran, from the picture of le Brun.

PASTORINI, B., an Italian engraver, who resided at London about 1770. He engraved some plates in imitation of the style of Bartolozzi, among which are the following :

L'Allegro; Angel. Kauffman, pinx. B. Pastorini, fec. Il Penseroso; the companion. A View of London; from his own design. Guntherus and Griselda; J. F. Rigaud, pinx. B. Pastorini, fec. Griselda returning to her Father; the companion.

PASTORINO, DA SIENA, an eminent painter on glass, who flourished at Rome about 1547. His greatest works were the windows in the State Saloon of the Vatican, and of the cathedral of Siena.

PATAROL, LAWRENCE, an engraver who flourished at Venice in 1702. He engraved some book plates, among which was a frontispiece for a book on coins, published there in that year.

PATAS, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1748. He engraved several of the plates for the Galerie de Florence, Galerie d'Orleans, Musée Français, Cabinet Poulain, and other works of importance. His prints are executed with the graver, in a neat, pleasing style. He died in 1817.

PATAVINUS. See AVIBUS.

PATCH, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about 1770. He passed much of his time in Italy, and it is supposed that he died there. He engraved a set of twenty-six plates, after pictures by Masaccio. He also engraved some plates after Giotto, Frà Bartolomeo, and other old Italian masters.

PATEL, PIERRE, an eminent French landscape painter, was born in 1654. His instructor is unknown, but he probably visited Rome, as his pictures generally represent views in the vicinity of that city. His style is formed on that of Claude Lorraine, and in many of his works he imitated that master with success. His verdure is fresh and agreeable; his distances retire with a pleasing gradation; his scenery is grand and striking; his skies clear and brilliant. His landscapes are usually embellished with ruins of ancient architecture, and decorated with figures correctly drawn, touched in a very spirited style. Although the works of Patel are inferior to those of his great model in purity of aerial tints, and grandeur of composition, yet they entitle him to a high rank among the artists of his country. According to Dumesnil, he usually signed his pictures with a monogram composed of the letters A. P. T., followed by his name and the date. He etched two plates; a Landscape, with architectural ruins, and Travelers in a Forest, marked A. P. PATEL, in. et fecit. He died 1703. In the Louvre collection there was one of his works, representing a landscape with a river and waterfall, the ruins of a superb Corinthian Temple in the foreground, and adorned with figures and animals. There were also three of his pictures in the gallery of the great Trianon.

PATEL, BERNARD, called by the French Patel le jeune, was the son and scholar of the preceding, whose manner he imitated. Although his works possess considerable merit, they are very inferior to those of his father. Some of his pictures have been engraved by Daullé, Vivares, Benasech, and others.

PATENIER, JOACHIM, a Flemish painter, born at Dinant, in the principality of Liege, in 1480. It is not known under whom he studied, but he settled at Antwerp, where he acquired distinction for his landscapes, and was admitted into the Academy in that city in 1515. His pictures are usually of small size, so exquisitely finished as to appear labored. He introduced into them a great number of small figures, which are correctly designed and neatly touched. His distances are charmingly preserved, and the foliage of his trees, the trunks and the branches, appear like nature. He also painted battles and huntings, which were highly esteemed. When Albert Durer was at Antwerp, he was so charmed with the works of this artist, that he painted his portrait. His works were greatly admired, and much sought after, yet they are very scarce, as he bestowed much labor upon them, and was a man of low dissipated habits, spending most of his time in the ale houses. There is also much discrepancy as to his merits, which has doubtless arisen from spurious imitations of his works, as his genuine pictures in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna and other places, fully justify the above account. Van Mander mentions one of his pictures, representing a battle, in the possession of Melchior Wijntges at Middelburg, so delicately wrought that no miniature could surpass it. He is said to have died in 1548, though there is no certainty as to the exact time of either his birth or death, there being much discrepancy among authors on these points.

PATER, or PATERRE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter, born at Valenciennes in 1695. He went to Paris early in life, and became the pupil of Anthony Watteau, whose subjects and manner he imitated with considerable success, though his works are greatly inferior to those of that master. He was an excellent colorist, but a negligent and incorrect designer, and his heads lack expression. He died in 1736.

PATERNO, IGNAZIO VINCENZIO CASTELLO, Prince of Biscari. This distinguished Sicilian nobleman flourished in the latter part of the 18th century, and deserves honorable notice in a work relating to architecture, for designing and erecting at his own expense, the great bridge of thirty-one arches, 1450 feet in length, over the Simeto, not far from Catania. Besides serving for the transit of freight and passengers, this bridge supports an aqueduct. The government of Sicily confided to Paterno the superintendence of the bridges, streets, and other public works.

PATICCHI, ANTONIO, an Italian painter, born at Rome in 1762. He acquired the elements of design from his father, and made such rapid progress that, at the age of twenty, he was commissioned to execute the paintings in the Refectory of the Carmes at Veletri. On one of the walls he painted the Last Supper; on another, the Virgin, surrounded by Saints; and in the vault, Elijah ascending to Heaven in a Chariot of Fire. This great work gained for Paticchi so high a reputation, that Count Toruzzi of Veletri immediately commissioned him to paint the gallery of his palace, where he represented the Car of Night, and several fabulous subjects. He wrought with wonderful rapidity; and, perceiving that his facility of execution had led him to neglect excellence of coloring, he devoted his energies patiently to this branch of the art. Undoubtedly he would have attained great eminence, but he died in 1788, at the age of twenty-six. Paticchi possessed a great talent for imitating the designs of the great masters, and he executed very many in the style of Polidoro da Caravaggio, which, according to the Biographie Universelle, are attributed to that master by the best judges, and have a place in many fine collections.

PATIGNY, JEAN or GIOVANNI, a French engraver, who flourished from 1650 to about 1670. He went to Italy, and appears to have imitated Agostino Caracci, but with little success. He executed some prints after Annibale Caracci and other Italian masters.

PATIN, JACQUES, a French painter and engraver, who flourished about 1581. According to Dumesnil, he was employed by Louise de Lorraine, queen of Henry III. of France, to paint the decorations necessary for a masque, or ballet, given by her on the marriage of her sister Marguerite de Vaudemont with the Duc de Joyeuse, in 1581. Patin executed twenty-seven spirited etchings, to illustrate a book describing the same ballet, published in 1582.

PATON, RICHARD, an eminent English painter of marines and sea-fights, born in 1720, and died in 1795. He painted the principal naval battles of his time, which were very popular, and many of them were engraved by Woollett, Fittler, Lerpiniere, and Canot. He also executed a few spirited etchings of similar subjects, among which are the following:

The Victory gained by the English over the French, 21 September, 1757. The Engagement of the Monmouth with the Foudroyant, in which the French ship was taken, 28 February, 1758. The Engagement between the Buckingham and Florissant, supported by two Frigates, 3 Nov. 1758.

PATOUR, JEAN AUGUSTIN, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1730. He studied under Hallé and Flipart, and engraved some plates in a neat, pleasing style, among which are the following:

The little Lyar; after Albert Durer. Le doux Sommeil; after Hallé. Le doux Repos; do. Hercules and Omphale; do. Two Views of La Rochelle; after Lallemand.

PATTE, PIERRE, a French architect and engraver, born at Paris in 1723. After acquiring the elements of design in his own country, he visited Italy for improvement. During the principal part of his life, he was devoted rather to the theory than to the practice of the art; and during the stormy scenes of the Revolution, he lived in retirement. The Duke des Deux Ponts, appointed Patte his architect, and he designed for him the Chateau de Jarresbourg. The Hotel Charost at Paris, is also by him. His writings are quite voluminous. Among the principal are Memoires sur les objets les plus importants de l'architecture, 4to; Traité de la construction des Batiments, 3 vols. 8vo., intended as a supplement to Blondel's Cours d'architecture; and Etudes d'architecture, 1755. fol., illustrated with twenty plates. As an engraver, he executed the plates in the latter work; also several plates for Blondel's Architecture Francaise; Perspective Views, after Piranesi; and the Temple of Venus, after Claude. He died at Nantes in 1814.

PAUDITZ, or PAUDITS, CHRISTOPHER, a German painter, born in Lower Saxony about 1620. After receiving some instructions from an obscure German painter, he went to Amsterdam and entered the school of Rembrandt. He applied himself with great assiduity, and became one of the ablest disciples of that master. On leaving the school of Rembrandt, he was employed by the Bishop of Ratisbon, for whom he painted some historical works as well as portraits, which gained him considerable reputation. He was next taken into the employment of the Duke of Bavaria, in whose service he continued several years, and for whom he painted some of his finest works. His subjects are well composed, his coloring is vigorous, and his heads, especially of old men, are marked with dignity and expression. He was particularly excellent in portraits, in which he was much employed. Sandrart relates, that his death was occasioned by the unfortunate issue of a contest, with one Roster, a painter of Nuremberg, who challenged him to paint a picture of the Wolf and the Lamb, in competition with him. Pauditz showed in his work great superiority in design, force, truth, and expression, which gained him the approbation of the best judges. But the majority gave the preference to the picture of Roster, because it was so highly finished that they could count the hairs of the wolf, and appreciate the delicacy of the wool. This decision so mortified Paudits and depressed his spirits, that he died soon afterwards. His works are to be found at Munich, Vienna, and other principal German cities. He marked his pictures C. P.; the latest date known is 1665, about which time he is supposed to have died.

PAUL, or DE PAULIS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about 1640. Nagler says he was born in Holland in 1598. He engraved some prints after the Flemish masters, among which are Peter Denying Christ, after Gerard Segers; Titian and his Mistress, after the etching by Vandyck; the Tooth Drawer, after Theodore Roelants.

PAUL, I. S., an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished at London about 1760. He scraped some portraits, among which are Mrs. Barry the actress, after Kettle; Lady Georgiana Spenser and her daughter, after Reynolds.

PAUL, ROBERT, a Scotch engraver, who flourished at Glasgow about 1762. He engraved some views of that city, which are neatly executed, and bear the above date.

PAULUZZI, STEFANO, a painter who flourished at Venice, and executed some works for the churches, which are highly commended by Boschini.—Lanzi says his works have deteriorated so much, perhaps from the badness of his grounds, that it is impossible to form a correct opinion of his merits. He was living in 1660.

PAULINI. See PAOLINI.

PAULINI, or PAOLINI, GIACOMO, a Neapolitan engraver, who flourished about 1600. He engraved some plates from his own designs, and others, which he marked with his name.

PAULUTZ, ZACHARIAH, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1600, and died there in 1657. He was a good portrait painter.

PAULY, NICHOLAS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1660. He distinguished himself as a miniature painter, and settled at Brussels, where he died in 1748.

PAULYN, HORATIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam, according to Descamps, about 1643, though probably at an earlier period. Balkema says he died there in 1686. It is not known under whom he studied, but he excelled in painting conversations and gallant subjects, in which he occasionally gave way to a culpable breach of decorum and decency. Some of his pictures are gross enough to cause the avowed libertine to blush. His pictures are exquisitely colored, his touch exceedingly neat and delicate, with a sweetness of tone that is capable of deluding any lover of the art to admire, what modesty must compel him to detest. In some of his works he imitated the manner of Rembrandt. Though his indecent subjects lessened him in public estimation, they brought large prices from the class for whom he pandered.

PAULYN, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam about 1630. He studied under Abraham vander Tempel, and became an eminent portrait painter, in which capacity he visited England, where he resided several years. In 1682, he returned to Holland, and settled at the Hague, where he practised his profession with great encouragement.

PAUSIAS, an eminent Greek painter, the son of Brietes, was a native of Sicyon, and flourished about B. C. 450. After acquiring the elements of the art from his father, he studied encaustic painting in the school of Pamphilus, where he was the fellow disciple of Apelles and Melanthus. He was the first painter who acquired a great name for encaustic with the cestrum. He particularly excelled in managing the shadows. His favorite subjects were small pictures, usually of children; but he also painted large compositions. Some of his rival artists pretended that he made choice of these subjects as best suited to the slow and labored style of his execution. To contradict the calumny, and to prove that he was capable of greater exertions, he finished in a single day a large picture of the infant Hercules. Pausias was the first who introduced the custom of painting the walls and ceilings of private apartments with historical and dramatic subjects, although the practice of decorating the ceilings of temples with stars and arabesque figures, was of very ancient date.

Pausias undertook the restoration of the paintings of Polygnotus at Thespiae, which had been greatly injured by the hand of Time. In this work he was judged inferior to the original artist, perhaps unfairly, since he contended with foreign weapons, being accustomed to using the cestrum, instead of the pencil, as he doubtless did in this instance. His most famous work was a picture of the Sacrifice of an Ox, which, in the time of Pliny, was in the Hall of Pompey. The figure of the animal was foreshortened; but, to show the ox to full advantage, the artist judiciously threw its shadow upon a part of the surrounding crowd; and he added to the effect by painting a dark ox upon a light ground. In this manner he doubtless produced a very powerful contrast of shadows; and some of the modern masters have followed in the same track.

During the younger days of Pausias, he loved a native of his own city, called Glycera, who gained a livelihood by making garlands of flowers and wreaths of roses. Her skill in this art induced Pausias, probably in a loving rivalry, to compete with her; and he eventually became an admirable flower painter. A portrait of Glycera with a garland of flowers, called the Stephanopolis, was reckoned his master-piece; a copy of it was purchased at Athens, by Lucius Lucullus, at the price of two talents, about $2000. Pausanias mentions two of his paintings at Epidaurus, the one a Cupid with a lyre in his hand, the other the figure of Methe, or Drunkenness, drinking out of a glass, through which his face is seen. The Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures which they possessed of so distinguished an artist, to free themselves from a heavy debt. They were purchased by M. Scaurus when ædile, and were taken to Rome to adorn the new theatre which he erected. From the observation of Horace (Sat. II. 7. 95), we may collect that the works of Pausias were well known at Rome.

PAUSON, a Greek painter, who flourished about B. C. 420. He seems to have been an artist of little merit, being unfavorably compared by Aristotle with Polygnotus and Dionysius. "Polygnotus," said Aristotle, "drew men more perfect than they were, Dionysius such as they really were, and Pauson worse than they were." It may be inferred, then, that Pauson degraded nature by a selection of her most vulgar and ignoble forms. His abilities seem to have been properly rated, for he was reduced to beggary, so that his poverty passed into a proverb.

PAUTRE, JEAN LE, a distinguished French engraver, born at Paris in 1617; died in 1682.—While young, he was placed under an architect, with whom he learned to draw plans and ornamental designs, in which he manifested excellent powers of invention, and astonishing facility of execution. He subsequently devoted his talents to engraving, both with the point and graver, and met with great success. His plates principally consist of architectural decorations, friezes, ceilings, vases, and other ornaments; also several historical and devout subjects. In 1677 he was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. His plates are so very numerous, that Mariette estimates them at fourteen or fifteen hundred; yet, with the exception of a few prints from the designs of Paolo Farinati, they are all after his own designs—a striking proof of his industry and facility. They are usually marked with his initials I. P. or I. le P. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

John le Pautre, with a border of flowers, supported by Genii. 1674. Louis XIV. in Roman attire. 1684. John Robert.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

A set of ten plates of the History of Moses. Twenty-two of Mythological Subjects. Twelve of Landscapes, Views of Gardens and Grottos. Six plates of Italian Fountains. Six of Friezes, Mythological Subjects. Twelve of Antique Vases. Six plates of Sea-ports and Vessels. The Sacre of Louis XIV., in the Cathedral at Rheims; in three sheets. The Baptism of the Dauphin. Two perspective Views of the Canal of Fontainebleau.

PAUTRE, ANTOINE LE, a French architect, born at Paris in 1614. He was appointed architect to Louis XIV., and designed a number of edifices, among which are the Pont Neuf; the church of the Port Royal, in the Fauxbourg St. Jacques; the Hotel de Beauvais; and the wings of the palace of St. Cloud. In 1671, at the formation of the Academy of Architecture, he was chosen a member. His taste lay in the decorative branch of the art, which he carried to excess. In 1652, he published a work on architecture, which is still held in high estimation. He died in 1691, of chagrin, because Lenotre preferred Mansard to himself as architect of the Chateau de Clagny, designed to be erected for Madame de Montespan.

PAUTRE, PIERRE LE, a French sculptor, the son of Antoine P., born at Paris in 1660. He gained the grand prize of the Academy, and then visited Rome, where he remained fifteen years. His best work is the marble group of Æneas and Anchises, executed in 1716, which was in the gardens of the Tuileries. There are also a number of other works by him, as a marble group of the Death of Lucretia. Most of his sculptures are in bad taste. He died in 1744.

PAVIA, GIACOMO, a painter born at Bologna, Feb. 18th, 1655, according to authentic documents. There is much discrepancy as to the time of his birth, and about his instruction. He is said to have studied under Antonio Crespi, who was twenty-six years his junior. Lanzi says he was the pupil of Cav. Giuseppe Maria Crespi, ten years his junior; and the Canon Luigi Crespi, the son of Giuseppe, states, in the 3d volume of the Felsina Pittrice, that he was instructed by Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole, four years his junior. He acquired considerable reputation at Bologna, and executed several works for the churches, which were admired for the fine taste displayed in their composition. The most esteemed of these is a picture of St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read, in S. Silvestro; and the Nativity, in S. Giuseppe. He went to Spain, where he distinguished himself, and executed many works for the churches. He died in 1740.

PAVIA, DONATO BARDO DA, a native of Pavia, who flourished in Savona about 1500. He was a reputable artist. There are some of his works in that city, on which he inscribed himself, Donatus Comes Bardus Papiensis.

PAVIA, LORENZO DA, a native of Pavia, who flourished at Savona about 1513. There are some of his works in that city, inscribed Laurentius Papiensis.

PAVIA, GIOVANNI DI, a native of Pavia, who, according to Malvasia, was a pupil of Lorenzo Costa, and executed some works for the churches in his native city and elsewhere. He flourished about 1530.

PAVON, IGNATIUS, an excellent engraver, who studied under Raphael Morghen. His works are well known, though little is known of him, as his life has not been written, and he may yet be living. His master died in 1833. He has copied some of the best prints of Morghen, and engraved quite a number of plates after the Italian masters. They are executed in the manner of his master, and though greatly inferior to them, they possess much merit. The following are among his best works:

Mater Amabilis; after Sasso Ferrato. The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John, in a landscape; after Raffaello; but copied from the engraving by R. Morghen. La Madonna del Trono; after Raffaello. La Madonna del Feligno; do. La Vierge au Papillon; do. La Vierge a l'Oiseau; do.; copied after R. Morghen. The Transfiguration; do.; do. The Communion of St.

Jerome; after Domenichino. St. John writing; do.—The Magdalene; after Schidone. Leda; after Correggio; and several others after Caracci, N. Poussin, &c.

PAVONA, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Udine, according to Renaldi, in 1692. He first studied under Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole. He afterwards studied at Milan, and thence proceeded to Genoa. He next went to Spain, Portugal, and Germany, at all which courts he was well received and executed many works. He resided some time at Dresden, where he married and had a family. He subsequently returned to Bologna, where he resided some time, and executed some works for the churches. Lanzi says he was an excellent painter in oil, and better in crayons. He painted many large altar-pieces, well designed and colored. He also excelled in portraits. He died at Venice in 1777.

PAYNE, JOHN, an English engraver, born about 1606. He studied under Simon de Passe the Elder, when that artist was in England, and was the first English engraver who distinguished himself. Had his application been equal to his genius, he would have ranked among the first of his profession. But he was indolent and dissipated; and, though recommended to Charles I., he neglected his fortunes and his fame, and died in poverty, in 1647 or 1648. He engraved portraits, frontispieces, and other book plates, as well as a variety of other subjects, such as landscapes, fruit, flowers, birds, animals, &c. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a free, open style, that produces a pleasing effect. His greatest work was an engraving of the Royal Sovereign, a ship of the line, built in 1637; it was engraved on two plates, and when joined together was three feet long, by two feet two inches high. His portraits are his best prints, of which the following are the most esteemed:

Henry VII., prefixed to his Life by Lord Bacon. Henry VIII. Robert Deverenx, Earl of Essex, with a hat and feather. Sir Benjamin Rudyard; after Mytens. Doctor Alabaster; after Cornelius Jansen; scarce. Hugh Broughton. Alderman Leate; after C. Jansen; scarce. Roger Bolton. 1632. Arthur Lake, Bishop of Chichester. Sir Edward Coke. 1629. Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland. George Withers, the Poet, with a hat on (for his Emblems, published in 1635). William-Shakspeare. Ferdinand of Austria; after Vandyck. Count Ernest de Mansfield. Elizabeth, Countess of Huntingdon.

PAZZI, PIETRO ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1706. It is not known under whom he studied, but he executed many plates of portraits and other subjects, after the Italian masters, which are held in estimation. His works are to be found in the Museo Fiorentino, Museo Capitolino, and the Museo Etrusco. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after L. Cambiasi. The Assumption of the Virgin; after Raffaello. The Virgin and infant Christ; after Vandyck. St. Zanobi resuscitating a dead Person; after Betti. St. Philip refusing the Popedom; do. A Sibyl; after Crespi.

PEACHAM, HENRY, an English amateur artist, who is said to have "distinguished himself by his skill in music, painting, and engraving." He was born at South Mimms, in Hertfordshire, and studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of Master of Arts. He was the author of a book entitled The Gentleman's Exercise; or an Exquisite Practice, as well for drawing all manner of Beasts in the true Portraiture, as also the making of Colors for Limning, Painting, Tricking, and Blazoning Coats of Arms; 1630, 4to. The only work mentioned by him, was a plate of Sir Thomas Cromwell, after Holbein. He died about 1650.

PEACKE, EDWARD, an English engraver, who flourished about 1640. In conjunction with Robert Peacke, probably his brother, he executed a set of plates of friezes, and other architectural ornaments, published in that year.

PEACKE, WILLIAM, an English artist, mentioned by Strutt as the engraver of two portraits, one of the Earl of Holland, and the other of the Earl of Warwick.

PEAK, JAMES, an English engraver, born in 1732, and died in 1782. He engraved some plates of landscapes, and a few prints from his own designs, among which are the following:

A View of Waltham Abbey, in Essex. Two Landscapes; after Pillement. Two Views of Warwick Hall, in Cumberland, and Ferry Bridge, in Yorkshire; after Bellers. A Landscape, with Mercury and Battus; after Claude. Morning, a Landscape; do. A Landscape, with Ruins; after G. Smith. A Landscape, with a Waterfall; the companion; do. Four Views; after R. Wilson. Banditti in a rocky landscape; after Borgognone. The Beggars; the companion; do.

PEARSON, MARGARET, an English lady, whose maiden name was Paterson. She married an artist by the name of Pearson, a painter on glass. She devoted herself to this business, and acquired distinction. Among other fine specimens of her skill were two sets of the Cartoons of Raffaele, one of which was purchased by the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the other by Sir Gregory Page Turner. She died in 1823, and her husband in 1805.

PECCHIO, DOMENICO, a painter of Verona, born about 1700. He studied at Venice, in the school of Antonio Balestra. He afterwards devoted himself to landscapes, which he executed in a style of excellence. He died about 1760.

PECHWELL, CARL VON, a German engraver, who flourished at Vienna in the latter part of the 18th century. He engraved the portrait of the Emperor Joseph II., after P. Batoni; and the portraits of several German princes and distinguished personages. The following subjects are particularly noticed as among his best works:

La vieille Ameureuse; after J. Toornliet. The Judgment of Paris; after A. vander Werff, with a dedication to the Graces of Europe. Venus uncovered by a Satyr. The Magdalene in a Grotto; after P. Batoni's picture at Dresden. The angry Mother and her Daughter; after P. della Vecchia.

PECORI, DOMENICO ARETINO, a painter of Arezzo, who studied under Don Bartolomeo della Gatta, and afterwards improved himself by studying the works of other masters. In the parochial church of his native city is a picture by him, of the Virgin receiving under her mantle the people of Arezzo, who are recommended to her protection by their patron saint. Lanzi says it is a judicious composition, enriched with good architecture, the airs of the heads resembling those of Francia.

He used less gilding than was usual at the time. He flourished about 1450.

PEDRALI, GIACOMO, a painter of Brescia, born about 1590. It is not known under whom he studied, but he associated himself with Domenico Bruni, in conjunction with whom he executed some perspective pieces for the churches in his native city, and also at Venice, which are highly commended by Orlandi. He died about 1660.

PEDRETTI, GIUSEPPE, a Bolognese painter, born in 1694. He studied under Marc' Antonio Franceschini, whose manner he adopted. Soon after leaving his master, he passed through Germany to Poland, where he resided many years, in the employment of the court. He afterwards returned to his native city, and painted a great many pictures and altar-pieces for the churches, the most esteemed of which are the Martyrdom of St. Peter, in S. Petronio; Christ bearing the Cross, in S. Giuseppe; and St. Margaret, in the Annunziata. He died in 1778.

PEDRINI, GIOVANNI, a Milanese painter, stated by the Padre Resta to have studied under Leonardo da Vinci. Little is known of him or his works.

PEDRONI, PIETRO, a painter born at Pontremoli, in the Florentine territory. He first studied at Florence, and afterwards at Parma and Rome. He executed a few excellent works for the churches at Florence, and in his native place; but, in consequence of ill health, he opened an academy under the protection of the Senator Martelli, which produced many able artists. "If not a rare painter," says Lanzi, "he was at least an able master; profound in theory, and eloquent in conveying knowledge to his pupils, of whom history will treat in the ensuing age. Their success, their affection and esteem for Pedroni, is the best eulogium on him which I can transmit to posterity." He died in 1803.

PEE, ENGELHART VAN, a Dutch painter, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. He was an excellent portrait painter, and was patronized by the court at Munich, where he died about 1605.

There were several other artists of this name, but of little account. Emanuel van Pee painted subjects from low-life, and copied the works of other masters with considerable success. John van Pee was the son of the preceding, born at Brussels in 1640. He painted the same subjects as his father, and is said to have copied the works of the Italian masters for the picture-dealers.

Theodore van Pee was the son of Justus van P. He is said to have painted ceilings, portraits, and various subjects, with no great success. He went to England, where he dealt largely in Dutch and Flemish pictures, and realized a snug little fortune, with which he returned to the Hague, where he died, in 1747.

PEHAM, GEORGE, a German engraver, and probably a painter, who flourished at Munich from 1592 to 1604, by the dates on his prints. There are a few etchings by him, executed in a bold, free, painter-like style, from his own designs, which are variously signed, with his initials G. P., or Georges Peham, or Georges Peham Monachi. Among them is one of Neptune rising from the Sea, and one of Hercules and Anteus.

PEINS. See PENZ.

PEIROLERI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, born at Turin about 1738. Little is known of him except his prints. Nagler gives a list of twenty prints by him, of which the following are the principal. He was living in 1777.

Portrait of the Fornarina; after Raffaele. Portrait of Raffaele; do. Philip de Champagne; copied from Ede-linck. The Holy Family; after Scarsellino. The Finding of Moses; after Lazzurini. The Roman Charity; do. Abraham's Offering; after Bellucci. Jupiter and Calisto; after Amicani. Zephyrus and Flora; do.; and others, after Rembrandt, Mieris, Nogari, Beaumont, and C. Ruthart.

MP fec. PELAIS, MICHAEL, an engraver of whom little is known. There are some prints signed Palais, fec., and others after the younger Palma and Federigo Zuccaro, marked with a monogram of his initials, M. P. fec., which are attributed to him. His manner approaches that of Cornelius Cort, and he is supposed to have flourished at Rome about 1625, as some of his prints are dated at that city. He also engraved the portraits of Cardinal d'Ossat, and J. de Gastebois.

PELÉE, PETER, a Swiss engraver, born at Courtedoux, in the canton of Berne, and studied under von Schenker. Nagler mentions the following prints by him: The Evangelist St. John, after Domenichino; the President Duranti, after Dela-roche; several Portraits and Vignettes for the works of Voltaire and Rousseau, after Desenne and Deveria. He was living in 1838.

PELEGRET, THOMAS, an eminent Spanish historical painter, born at Toledo at an uncertain time. After learning the elements of the art in his native place, according to Palomino, he went to Italy, and studied successively with Baldassare da Siena, and Polidoro da Caravaggio; from the last he derived his admirable chiaro-scuro, and he imitated his manner. He returned to Spain in the time of Charles V., established himself at Saragossa, and acquired considerable reputation for his frescos, but more for his black crayon drawings (en grisaille). He had a fertile invention, was well versed in perspective, and, above all, was an excellent designer; which, together with the novelty of his works, made them highly prized by artists and amateurs. His drawings were purchased with avidity by painters, sculptors, decorators, and goldsmiths. He is said to have been an excellent fresco painter, but the only examples remaining are some pictures in the monastery of Santa Engracia, at Saragossa, executed in the manner of Caravaggio. His other works have perished. He instructed many pupils, and among them was Pedro de las Cuevas, who assisted him in painting the sacristy of the Cathedral of Huesca, and some other works. He died at the age of 84 years, but neither the time of his birth or death are known; but from the facts above mentioned, he must have been born about 1516, and died about 1600, as Caravaggio died in 1543, and Cuevas was born in 1548. "With him," says the historian, "died the art of painting in chiaro-scuro in Spain."

PELHAM, PETER, an English engraver, born about 1684, and died about 1738. He executed quite a number of portraits in mezzotinto, among which are the following:

King George I.; after Kneller. King George II.; do. Anne, consort of the Prince of Orange; do. Oliver Cromwell; after Walker. Thomas Holles, Duke of Newcastle. Robert, Viscount Molesworth; after Gibson. John, Lord Carteret; after Kneller. James Gibbs, Architect; after Hysing. Peter Paul Rubens; after Rubens. Edward Cooper; after vander Vaart. Dr. Edmund, Bishop of London; after Murray.

PELHAM, J. C., was the son of the preceding, born in 1721. He painted history and portraits with so little reputation, that his works are scarcely known.

PELKIN, CORNELIUS, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Middleburg about 1663. He engraved some plates for the booksellers in a very indifferent style.

PELLEGRINI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Venice in 1674. He studied under Sebastiano Ricci. He was one of those fortunate men who acquire a greater reputation than their merits deserve. On leaving Ricci, it is said that he received some instructions from Paolo Pagani; at all events, that artist recommended him to Angelo Cornaro, for whom he executed some frescos, which gained him considerable applause, and laid the foundation of his fame. At the invitation of the Duke of Manchester, he went to England, where he decorated the palace of that nobleman, and others of the English nobility, for which he was roundly paid. In 1719 he went to Paris, where he was employed in embellishing the celebrated Hall of the Mississippi, and was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. He was next employed at the courts of the Electors Palatine and Brunswick. He afterwards returned to Venice, where he followed his profession with great success till his death in 1741. His wife was Angelica Carriera, sister to the celebrated Rosalba. Lanzi says, "the surprising success he met with in some of the most civilized kingdoms in Europe, is to be attributed to the decline of the art, and to the lively and mannered style he assumed, which procured him a welcome reception every where. He may be pronounced an artist of some ingenuity, facility, and sprightly conception, but he was not well grounded in the art, and he expressed his ideas with so little decision, that the objects appear to float in a kind of half existence, between visible and invisible. He was so superficial a colorist, that even in his own time, it was said his works would not continue half a century." His best works are the ceiling of the church of the Capuchins, and that of San Moisè, at Venice. In the first he represented the Israelites gathering Manna, and in the second, the Brazen Serpent. He executed many works in oil, in the same feeble and languid manner of coloring.

PELLEGRINI, FRANCESCO, a Ferrarese painter mentioned by Barotti, who flourished about 1740. He studied under Gio. Battista Cozza, and executed a number of works for the churches of Ferrara, among which is a picture of the Last Supper, in S. Paolo; and another of St. Bernardo, in the Cathedral.

PELLEGRINI, FELICE, a painter born at Perugia in 1567. He studied under Federigo Baroccio, under whose able instruction he became a correct and skilful designer. He was invited to Rome by Clement VIII. to assist in the works going on in the Vatican. On his return to his native city, he executed some good works for the churches. He died in 1630.

PELLEGRINI, VINCENZIO, was the brother of Felice P., born at Perugia in 1575. He also studied in the school of Baroccio, and painted several pictures for the churches of Perugia, which Lanzi says appear dry and dead, and do not partake much of the style of his master. He was called Il Pittor Bello, for the beauty of his person, not that of his paintings. He died in 1612.

PELLEGRINI, GIROLAMO, a painter of Rome, who flourished there, according to Zanetti, in 1674. None of his works are mentioned at Rome, but he was employed at Venice, where he executed several frescos on a large scale for the churches, which Lanzi says indicates a painter sufficiently elevated, though not very select, varied, or spirited in his forms.

PELLEGRINI, ANDREA, a Milanese painter, who flourished in the last part of the 16th century. He is commended by Lomazzo, and executed some works for the churches, particularly the choir of S. Girolamo.

PELLEGRINI, PELLEGRINO, an eminent Milanese painter and architect, the cousin of the preceding, born about 1570. After acquiring considerable reputation, he was invited to the court of Madrid, where he was employed both as painter and architect. He executed some works in the Escorial which are highly commended by Palomino. He died in 1634.

PELLEGRINI, LODOVICA, a Milanese lady, who, according to Morigia, was very celebrated for her works in embroidery. She wrought not only fruit and flowers, but scripture histories. Lanzi says "she was the Minerva of her time. She devoted herself wholly to her needle, and embroidered the great pallium (vestment), and other sacred furniture, preserved in the sacristy of the cathedral, and still exhibited to strangers with other curious specimens of ancient learning and the arts. In the new Guide of Milan, she is called Antonia P." She was living in 1626.

PELLEGRINO, DA BOLOGNA. See PELLEGRINO TIBALDI.

PELLEGRINO, DA MODENA. See PELLEGRINO MUNARI.

PELLEGRINO, DI SAN DANIELO. See UDINE.

PELLET, DAVID, a French engraver, whose name is affixed to a plate representing Louis XIII. when young, on horseback, with the portrait of Henry IV., and Mary de Medicis, in small ovals at the top. It is executed with the graver in a neat, but formal style.

PELLETIER, JEAN, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1736. He engraved quite a number of plates after the Dutch, Flemish, and French masters. They are executed with the graver in a neat, clear, and pleasing style. Among them are the following. His wife also engraved some plates, two of which are after A. Ostade, and one after Wouwerman.

The Watering-place; after Berghem. Ruins and Figures; do. The Fish Market; after Pierre. The Green Market; do. Diana reposing; after Boucher. The Rape of Europa; do. Two Pastoral subjects; do. The Union of Design and Painting; after Natoire. Young Bacchus; after C. Vanloo. The Travelers; after Wouwerman. Ladies going to the Chase; do. The Tipplers; after Ostade.

PELLI, MARCO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about 1696. There are no particulars concerning him. He engraved some plates of saints, a few portraits, and some other subjects, among which are a Charge of Cavalry, after Borgognone, and a Landscape, after D. B. Zilotti, marked M. Pelli, exc.

PELLIER, NICOLAS FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, born at Besançon in 1782.— There are some plates of landscapes by him, engraved with the point in a spirited and pleasing manner, from his own designs, marked with the above monogram. He died in 1804.

PELLINI, ANDREA, a painter born at Cremona, of whom little is known, except some works at Milan. He is supposed to have been a scholar of Bernardino Campi. Lanzi says that "Pellini, though unknown in his native city of Cremona, is celebrated at Milan for his Descent from the Cross, in the church of S. Eustorgio." This is a grand composition, correctly designed and well colored, dated 1595.

PELLINI, MARC' ANTONIO, a painter of Pavia, born, according to Orlandi, in 1664. He first studied under Tommaso Gatti, at Pavia, and afterwards visited Bologna and Venice for improvement. He executed a few works for the churches in his native city, but did not rise above mediocrity. He died in 1760, at the great age of 96 years.

PEMBROKE, THOMAS, an English historical painter of little note, born in 1702, and died in 1730. He was a protégé of the Earl of Bath, for whom Walpole says he painted several pictures.

PEN, or PENN, HISPEL, a supposed German engraver, to whom the Padre Orlandi erroneously attributes some prints, marked with the monogram of Hans Sebald Beham. Strutt, and others, have been led into the same error. It is satisfactorily ascertained that the prints in question were executed by Beham; and they are included in the lists of his works.

PEN, JACOB, a Dutch painter, mentioned by Balkema, who went to England, and was employed by Charles II. He says that he composed with intelligence, and to correct drawing added beautiful coloring. He died in 1674.

PENALOSA, JUAN DE, a Spanish historical painter, born at Baeza in 1581. He was one of the ablest scholars of Pablo de Cespedes at Cordova, and assiduously imitated his style. He painted some works for the churches and convents, but more for the collections. His picture of St. Barbe, in the cathedral at Cordova, is said to be a magnificent performance, executed entirely in the style of his master. He died in 1636.

PENCHARD, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Leyden about 1678. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. He engraved the anatomical plates for the works of Reg. de Graaf, with the portrait of the author, published at Leyden in 1678.

PENCHAUD, MICHEL ROBERT, an eminent French architect, born at Poitiers in 1782. He studied under his father, who was distinguished in the art, and assisted him in the chateau de Verrière, belonging to the Duc de Mortemart; and the chateau de Dissais, erected for M. de Sainte Aulaire, Bishop of Poitiers. Penchaud afterwards visited Paris, and studied under Percier and Fontaine with such assiduity, that in 1799 he was appointed designer to the Council of Civil Buildings. In 1803, he was made director of the public works at Marseilles; and was afterwards appointed head of the Department of the Mouths of the Rhone. He was employed for many years in embellishing the city of Marseilles with promenades, fountains, and public monuments, which gained him great reputation. During his engrossing cares, he found time to write a number of excellent memorials relating to art, which he furnished to the Academy of Inscriptions. The Institute awarded him a gold medal for a memorial on the Antiquités du Midi. Among his principal edifices, were the grand hospital on the Island of Ratonneau; a triumphal arch at the entrance of Marseilles, with a number of buildings in that city; the Palais de Justice at Aix; and a beautiful church at St. Remy. Penchaud died at Paris in 1832.

PENNACCHI, PIETRO MARIA, a painter of Treviso, who, according to Zanetti, flourished at Venice about 1520. He painted some works for the churches at Venice and Murano, which Lanzi says are more excellent in coloring than design.

PENNEMAKERS, THE RECOLLET, a Flemish artist of whom little is known. Balkema says he was a scholar of Rubens. In the Museum of Antwerp, there is a picture of the Ascension, attributed to him.

PENNENSUS, F., an engraver, probably an Italian, by whom there are some spirited etchings of devout subjects after the Italian masters, and from his own designs, marked with his name, among which are the Holy Family, with St. Catherine, and an Angel in the air, after Parmigiano; and the Marriage of St. Catherine, from his own design. There is a fine expression in his heads, but he was negligent and incorrect in designing the extremities.

PENNEY, N., a French engraver, by whom there are some plates of devout subjects, from his own designs, executed with the graver in a very neat style, but without much effect, among which is one of the Virgin appearing to St. Bartholomew. They are marked N. Penney, fecit.

PENNI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, called IL FATTORE. This eminent painter was born at Florence in 1488. He went to Rome when a boy, and entered the studio of Raffaello, in the capacity of a servant, as some say, but more probably, as an apprentice, which Il Fattore signifies. At all events, his talents, assiduity, integrity, and urbane deportment, gained for him the confidence and affection of his master, who made him his most intimate disciple, took especial pains to instruct him, and confided to him the management of his household affairs. Had he derived his appellation from this last circumstance, it would have been Il Maggiordomo, the Steward. He became one of his principal scholars, and assisted him more than any other in his cartoons and his tapestries. The first work on which he was employed by Raffaello was in decorating the Loggie of the Vatican, from his designs, where Giovanni da Udine, Pierino del Vaga, and other excellent artists were associated with him. There he executed the histories of Abraham and Isaac in such an admirable manner, as gave entire satisfaction to his master. Raffaello conceived such an affection for him that he made him joint heir with Giulio Romano, to his estate.

After the death of Raffaello, he was employed conjointly with Giulio Romano, in finishing the frescos of the Histories of Constantine, in the saloon afterwards called after the name of that Emperor. Among other works left incomplete by his master, which he assisted in finishing, is the Assumption of Monte Luci in Perugia, the lower part of which, with the apostles, was painted by Giulio, and the upper part, which abounds with the graces of Raffaello, by Penni. He had also the principal share in the history of Cupid and Psyche, in the Farnesina. Of his own compositions, those executed in fresco at Rome, have mostly perished, and he painted so few pictures in oil that they are seldom to be met with. Soon after the death of Raffaello, some coldness between him and his co-heir, Giulio, caused them to separate. After this, he decorated the Chigi Palace in a manner so nearly resembling Raffaello, that they might easily have been mistaken for the works of that master. He went to Naples at the invitation of the Marquis del Vasto, taking with him his admirable copy in oil of the Transfiguration of Raffaello, which he sold to that nobleman, and he executed for him some considerable works. He died there in the prime of life in 1528. He possessed an admirable taste of design, which he imbibed from his instructor, and his execution was facile and graceful. He particularly excelled in landscape and architecture, with the advantages of which, in embellishing historical painting, he was well acquainted. Kùgler says that Penni could work well, only when under the instruction of Raffaello; and that when left alone he was weak and ineffective. This is contrary to the concurrent testimony of the best Italian authors, and it is unfair to judge from the few remains of his works. Lanzi says that, notwithstanding the shortness of his career at Naples, he greatly contributed to the improvement of art in that city. Kùgler and Passavant conjecture that the celebrated Madonna del Passeggio in the Bridge-water Collection, attributed to Raffaello, was executed by Penni.

PENNI, LUCA, was the brother of the preceding, born at Florence about 1500. Orlandi says he studied in the school of Raffaello, which Lanzi thinks highly probable. According to Vasari, he united himself to Pierino del Vaga, and worked with him in the churches at Lucca, Genoa, and other cities; that he afterwards accompanied Il Rosso into France, and ultimately passed into England, where he was employed for some time by Henry VIII. On his return to Italy, he is said to have quitted painting for engraving. There are quite a number of prints, attributed to him.—They are mostly after the works of Il Rosso and Primaticcio, and usually marked with one of the accompanying monograms. Among them are the following:

Two Satyrs presenting Wine to Bacchus; after Il Rosso. Leda drawing out the Arrow from Cupid's Quiver; do. Susanna and the Elders; do. Abraham sacrificing Isaac; after Primaticcio. The Marriage of St. Catherine; do. Penelope at work, surrounded by her Women; do.

PENNING, NICHOLAS LOUIS, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1764. He was a scholar of Thierry vander Aa, and painted landscapes, marines, and interiors of stables, with horses, with some success. He also executed finished drawings, which are held in considerable estimation. He died at the Hague in 1818.

PENNONE, Rocco, a distinguished Lombard architect, who flourished at Genoa in the 16th century. Milizia does not mention his instructor, but he warmly commends his abilities, as evinced in the enlargement of the government palace at Genoa, particularly in the arrangement of a grand portico, flanked by two courts, which, although differing in size, satisfy the eye by their perfect symmetry. These courts are surrounded by two orders of galleries; the first supported by Doric, the second by Ionic columns. Among the other works of Pennone, was a part of the church of S. Sacramento, which he completed after the designs of Galeazzo Alessi.

PENNY, EDWARD, an English painter, born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, in 1714. He went early in life to London, and studied under Hudson, on leaving whom, he went to Rome, and became the pupil of Marco Benefiali. On his return to England, he joined the Society of Artists, of which he was for some time Vice President. At the foundation of the Royal Academy, he was one of the original members, and was appointed the first Professor of Painting. This situation he continued to fill with great respectability, and he delivered an annual course of lectures, till 1783, when ill health compelled him to resign the office. About this time he went to reside at Chiswick, where, having previously married a lady of fortune, he lived in quiet retirement till his death in 1791. He was principally employed in painting small portraits in oil, which were admired. He also painted a few historical works and fancy pictures, some of which have been engraved; the principal of these is the Death of General Wolfe.

PENOZZI, B., an engraver on wood, mentioned by Papillon, who does not specify any of his works.

PENSABEN, FRÀ MARCO, and FRÀ MARCO MARAVEIA, his assistant, two old painters of the order of the Dominicans at Venice, who exercised their talent at Treviso in 1520 and 1521. Lanzi says Pensaben was an artist of singular merit, wholly unknown in the history of art till the P. M. Federici discovered some documents relating to him in the convent of the Dominicans at Treviso, whither he had been invited from Venice. "In this style, partaking of the ancient and modern taste, is a large picture of St. Nicholas, in a church of the Dominicans at Treviso; in which the cupola, the columns, and the perspective, with a throne, on which is seated the Virgin, with the Infant Jesus, surrounded by saints standing, the steps ornamented by a harping seraph, all discover the composition of Bellini. It was painted by P. Marco Pensaben, assisted by P. Marco Maraveia, both Dominican priests, engaged for this purpose from Venice." Nothing further is known of their works. Pensaben was born about 1485, and died in 1530.

PENSIERI, BATTISTA, an Italian engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He was a native of Parma, and is usually called Battista Parmensis, from his signature. Zani calls his name Battista Pensieri da Parma. He says he was a designer, engraver, and a seller of books and prints; he gives four inscriptions from his prints, as follows: Romæ Battista da Parma, 1583,—Battista Pensieri Parmensis fecit Romæ 1590.—Baptista pensier parmensis formis,—Baptista pauzera formis. 1601. He chiefly resided at Rome, where he engraved several plates after various masters, and others from his own designs, executed in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort. Among others are the following: The Portrait of Philip II. King of Spain. 1589. The Virgin and Infant appearing to St. John, after Baroccio. Battista Parmensis, fec. 1588. The Baptism of Christ. Bapt. Parmensis, del. The Chastity of Joseph. 1593. The Crucifixion, in two sheets, Bapt. Parmensis, formis. 1584.

P or P PENTZ, or PEINS, GEORGE GREGORY, an eminent German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1500.

His name is variously written George, or Gregory, Pentz, Peins, Pencz, and Pens. On the plate of the portraits of himself and wife he signs himself Gregori Peins, and on that of the Taking of Carthage, Georgius Pentz. He studied painting and engraving under Albert Durer. On leaving that master he went to Italy, where he acquired a correct and tasteful design, which distinguishes him from the cotemporary artists of his country. Little is known of his works as a painter. Huber says there are some of his pictures in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna, where they are greatly admired. His prints are numerous and highly esteemed.—His plates are executed with the utmost neatness and delicacy, and though they are wrought with great care and precision, they have nothing of the stiffness and formality which distinguish the productions of the artists of his time. His drawing is correct, and the character of his heads is finely expressed. The greater part of his plates are of small size; hence he is reckoned among the little masters, as such artists are termed by connoisseurs, although perfectly competent to execute plates on a large scale, as is seen in his print of the Taking of Carthage, after Giulio Romano. While in Italy, in conjunction with Marc' Antonio, he engraved several plates after the works of Raffaele. His style of engraving resembles the best manner of Ramondi, though his plates are more delicately wrought and finished. He usually marked them with a monogram of his initials, G. and P., joined together as above.

PORTRAITS.

The Artist and his Wife, on the same plate, inscribed Imago Gregori Peins. Imago Duxore Gregori Peins. John Frederiek, Elector of Saxony, inscribed Spes meus in Deo est. 1543; scarce.

BIBLE SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Two small prints—Job tempted, and Esther before Ahasuerus. Two, Judith in the Tent of Holofernes, and Judith with his Head. Two, the Judgment of Solomon, and Solomon's Idolatry. Two, Lot and his Daughters, and Susanna and the Elders. Four, of the History of Joseph. 1544. Seven, of the History of Tobit. 1543. (Considered among his best.) Two, the Merciful Samaritan, and the Conversion of St. Paul. 1545. The Four Evangelists. The seven works of Mercy; circular. Twenty-five plates of the Life and Miracles of Christ; very fine.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Two, Tarquin and Lucretia, and the Death of Lucretia. Cephalus and Procris. Medea and Jason. The Death of Dido. Thomyris causing the Head of Cyrus to be put in a vessel of blood. The Death of Virginia. Mutius Scaevola putting his hand into the Brasier. Marcus Curtius precipitating himself into the Gulf. The Death of Regulus. Sophonisba drinking the Poison.—Artemisia drinking the Ashes of her Husband. (Both highly esteemed by amateurs.) The Triumph of Bacchus. A set of six plates of the Triumphs of Human Life. The Five Senses. The Seven Liberal Arts. The Seven Mortal Sins. The Taking of Carthage; after Giulio Romano, inscribed Georgius Pentz Pictor Nuremberg faciebat, anno 1549; an admirable specimen of his great ability.

PENZEL, JOHN GEORGE, a German painter and engraver, born at Hersbruck, near Nuremberg, in 1754, and died at Leipsic in 1809. He first studied under Schellenberg at Winterthur, and afterwards at Dresden. Nothing further is said of him as a painter, and he soon devoted himself entirely to engraving. He executed many plates for the publishers at Dresden. He also engraved many of Chodowiecki's designs.

PEONIUS. See DAPHNIS.

PEPIN, or PEPYN, MARTIN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1574, as appears from the inscription on his portrait hereafter mentioned. It is not known under whom he studied, but after learning the principles of the art, he went to Italy, where he is said to have so much distinguished himself by his grandeur of composition, correctness of design, and vigorous tone of coloring, that Rubens himself regarded him with jealousy, and dreaded his return to Antwerp, fearing his reputation would suffer from his rivalry. The absurdity of this story is evident. Pepin resided most of his life at Rome, yet his name is unknown in Italy. In the church of the hospital at Antwerp, are two of his works, which are highly extolled; they are altar-pieces, with folding doors, as was customary with some of the old Flemish masters; the centre picture of one represents the Baptism of St. Augustine, and the laterals on the doors, that saint giving alms to the poor, and curing the sick; the other is a similar work, representing St. Elizabeth giving alms to a group of miserable objects, who are struggling to approach her. His portrait, by Vandyck, in the private collection of the King of Holland, is described by C. J. Nieuwenhuys, in his Catalogue; it is inscribed Me Pictorem Pictor pinxit D. Ant. Vandyck Eques illustris. A. D. 1632. ET ME LVIII. Nieuwenhuys, who saw several of his pictures, says that his talents were but second rate, that his first manner partook of the school of Otho Venius, but that the works he executed in Italy are in a more elevated style. He died at Rome in 1641.

SP or S.P.F. PERAC, ETIENNE DU, a French painter, engraver, and architect, born at Paris about 1540. He went to Italy when he was young, and resided some years at Rome, where he made many designs from the vestiges of ancient architecture, and views of Tivoli and Frascati, which he engraved and published at Rome in 1569, 1573, and 1575. On his return to France he was appointed architect to Henry IV., and painted some architectural pieces for the palace at Fontainebleau. He also executed some etchings after Michael Angelo, Raffaele, and other Italian masters, as well as from his own designs. Nagler gives a list of twenty-nine prints by him; the latest is dated 1583. Zani says he died in 1601.

PERANDA, SANTO, a Venetian painter, born in 1566. According to Ridolfi, he first studied under the younger Palma, and afterwards with Leonardo Corona, of Murano. In his first performances, he followed the prompt and hasty manner of Palma; but he afterwards went to Rome, where, by diligently studying the antique and the works of the great masters, he formed a style of his own, more finished and correct. On his return to Venice he improved his coloring, by contemplating the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Veronese, so that he became as accomplished in coloring, as he was before in design. He executed many works for the churches and public edifices, and was employed in decorating the ducal palaces at Venice, Mirandola, and Modena, with various subjects from history. "His usual manner," says Lanzi, "very much resembles Palma, while in the large histories, which he produced at Venice and Mirandola, he appears in a more practical character of his own. Yet he was of a more slow and reflective turn, and more studious of art, qualities that, in the decline of age, led him to adopt a very delicate and labored manner. He was not ambitious of equaling his cotemporaries in the number of his works, but his aim was to surpass them in correctness, nor did he any where succeed better in his object than in his Christ taken down from the Cross, in the church of San Procolo, at Venice." He had several disciples, among whom was Matteo Ponzone. He died at Venice in 1638.

PERCELLES. See PARCELLES.

PERCIER, CHARLES, an eminent French architect, was the son of a colonel of dragoons, born at Paris in 1764. His name and works are so intimately associated with those of his friend and colleague, Pierre Louis François Fontaine, that the reputation of the one is inseparable from that of the other. Percier was first instructed in the elements of the art by an obscure designer named Poirson. In 1783 he entered the school of the architect Peyre, and afterwards studied under the elder Gisors, an architect of considerable reputation. In 1786, he gained the grand prize of the French Academy, and went with the royal pension to Rome, where his friendship with Fontaine first commenced. He also became acquainted with Flaxman, Canova, and other artists who subsequently rose to eminence. During their residence at Rome, Percier and Fontaine made the drawings which form the subject of their first publication; Palais, Maisons, et autres Edifices modernes, dessinés à Rome, Paris, 1798, folio; illustrated with 100 plates, beautifully delineated and engraved in outline. Previous to the publication of this work, however, and for some time after their return to Paris, they were obliged to contend with difficulties; the agitated state of public affairs being exceedingly unfavorable for their success.— With laudable energy and perseverance they commenced making designs for various articles of ornamental furniture and manufacture; and their careful study and superior taste soon brought their talents into notice. Various decorations, executed by them at Malmaison for the First Consul and Madame Bonaparte, secured for them the powerful patronage of Napoleon; and soon after his gaining the Imperial Crown, they were employed to restore, complete, and embellish, the two palaces of the Tuileries and the Louvre. The latter work was exceedingly extensive and complicated, occupying their attention for a number of years, until some time after the restoration of the Bourbons. They enjoyed imperial and royal patronage, with a very high reputation, for many years, but executed only a few original works; and their fame as practical architects, is consequently merged, to a great extent, in that of the original authors of the works which they restored. They erected, however, a few edifices, as the arch in the Place du Carrousel, before the east façade of the Tuileries; the Chapelle Expiatoire in memory of Louis XVI.; and the regular and handsome line of houses termed the Ruc Rivoli.

Percier and Fontaine gained great reputation from their publications, among which was the Recueil de Decorations Interieures, contenant tout ce qui a rapport à l'Ameublement, Paris, 1812, fol. This was a collection of designs for rooms and various articles of furniture, in the prevailing style, which Percier outlived. About the same time, they published a series of views of Roman villas with their gardens, entitled Choix des plus belles Maisons de Plaisance de Rome et ses environs; also two magnificent works, one representing the ceremonies of the Coronation of Napoleon, and the other those which took place upon his marriage with Maria Louisa. There is another work attributed to Percier, which seems not to be generally circulated, entitled, Parallèle entre plusieurs Residences des Soverains de France, d'Allemagne, de Suede, de Russie, et d'Italie, Paris, 1833, illustrated with thirty-eight plates. Charles Percier died in 1838.

PEREDA. ANTONIO, an eminent Spanish painter, born at Valladolid in 1599. He first studied under Pedro de las Cuevas, and showed so much ability that he was taken under the protection of Don Francisco de Texada, who sent him to Madrid, where he had an opportunity of studying the works of the great masters in the Royal collections. At the age of eighteen he produced a picture of the Immaculate Conception, in which the Virgin appeared on a Throne of Clouds supported by Angels, executed so admirably that no one could believe it the work of so young an artist. The reputation he acquired by this performance induced the Duke de Olivarez, who had the direction of the works going on in the palace of the Retiro, to employ him and place him among the artists of the highest rank. He performed his part to the satisfaction of his patron, and was munificently rewarded. He acquired great reputation, and is said to have executed many works for the churches at Madrid, Toledo, Alcala, Cuenca, and Valladolid. He also painted much for individuals, and no collection was considered complete without a specimen of Pereda. It is also said that he was a universal artist, painting history, familiar life, vases, tapestry, musical instruments, and other objects of still-life. His pictures were well designed, his drawing correct, and his coloring rich and glowing, in the Venetian style, with an admirable impasto. Few of his works are known to remain at the present day. There are two in the Royal Gallery at Madrid, one of which represents St. Jerome meditating on the Last Judgment; one of Christ asleep on the Cross, with flowers and skulls, in the collection of Marshal Soult; one of St. Anthony and Christ, in the Esterhazy gallery at Vienna, and three or four in the gallery at Munich. He died at Madrid in 1669.

PEREGRINI, DA CESENA, or PELLEGRINO DA CESIO, an Italian goldsmith, engraver, and worker in niello, who flourished in the latter part of the fifteenth and first part of the sixteenth centuries. He is one of those artists about whom and whose works there is a great deal of conjecture, and very little that is certain. Bartsch gives a descriptive account of ten prints by him, (Peintre Graveur, tom. xiii.) five of which are marked with the monogram as above, three defective in the part where the monogram should be, and two have the additional letters O. P. D. C. These letters are interpreted by Duchesne Opera Peregrini da Cesina, and Zani says he read on some prints by him Opus Peregrini de Ces. Duchesne discovered his name on some admirable works by him in niello, which he describes (Essai sur les Nielles). Ottley describes ten prints, which he supposes to be by the artist who used the above marks, but he does not mention Peregrini. Nagler, from these and various other authorities, gives a list of sixty-four pieces, which he attributes to him, as follows:

List of Peregrini's Prints, from Nagler.

[Where it is stated that the print is marked with the letter P., it is to be understood in the form indicated above; a P. crossed in the middle, as an abbreviation.]

1. Abraham loading an Ass for his journey to Mount Moriah.
2. Abraham, Isaac, and two servants, on their way to the Mount.
3. Abraham and Isaac on the Mount, the servants sitting below.
4. Abraham with a knife and torch, Isaac bearing a bundle of wood.
5. Abraham about to immolate Isaac, is prevented by an Angel; the head of a Ram is seen at the right hand corner.
6. David conquering Goliath; a very fine plate. According to Duchesne, it is probably by Peregrini.
7. Judith with the head of Holofernes in her left hand. This print has not Peregrini's mark, but the words vide te on a scrap of paper.
8. The Holy Virgin with the Infant on a throne, attended by Sts. Paul and Francis d'Assisi. Peregrini's mark in the centre.
9. The Baptism of Christ. In the foreground to the right and left, are St. Stephen and St. Francis.
10. The Resurrection of our Lord, signed DE—OPVS—PEREGRINI—CE<sup>s</sup>. An impression of the unfinished plate, in which some parts of the figure of Christ are white, was sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale, in 1824, for about £20 sterling.
11. The Annunciation, in two small medallions.
12. John the Baptist with the Cross, on which is a medallion with the Lamb, and the words ECE AGNUS. Duchesne is of opinion that this is the work of Peregrini.
13. St. Sebastian standing by a Tree, his hands tied above his head.
14. St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix, the lion behind him. Peregrini's mark in the margin.
15. St. Roch. On the right hand the first person of the Trinity blessing him. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.
16. St. Margaret seated on a large winged Dragon, holding in one hand a cornucopia, and in the other a cake. In the dark back-ground are four trees, and the mark P. Bartsch calls the subject Providence.
17. The Triumph of Neptune; marked O. P. D. C. (Opera Peregrini da Cesena.)
18. Minerva, with Lance and Shield; on the latter the head of Medusa. Duchesne considers this a work of Peregrini, though it has not his mark.
19. The Triumph of Mars. On a globe, surmounted by a figure of Cupid, is the letter P. Nagler notices that on an early impression of this subject it is difficult to distinguish the figure on the shield of Mars; on a later, it is seen plainly. The back-ground is very dark. A second impression sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale for £31.
20. A Sacrifice in honor of Mars. Bartsch describes this among the prints of the old Italian masters, P. G. tom. xiii. p. 139, No. 69; but Duchesne considers it to be the work of Peregrini. An impression sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale for 17 guineas.
- 20b. A Muse playing on a Flute; around her are other instruments. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.
21. A Muse playing on the Lyre, with other musical instruments lying around her. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.

ing on a Vase, which is ornamented with four figures of Children; attributed to Peregrini. 23. Two Cupids by a Monument. Duchesne thinks it is by Mare' Antonio. 24. Psyche at the foot of a Tree, Cupid behind her; in the back-ground, on the sea, is a monster about to devour her. At the bottom is a mark which resembles that of Peregrini. 25. Leda and the Swan. According to Duchesne, by Peregrini; in the centre is a mark resembling Peregrini's. 26. A Nymph bound to a Tree by a Satyr and a Faun. 27. A Triton caressing a Nymph. The workmanship of this niello is fine, and resembles that of Peregrini. 28. A Woman with three Men and a Satyr. Duchesne considers it to be by Peregrini. 29. Hercules strangling Anteus. Attributed to Peregrini. 30. Hercules and Dejanira. HERCULE—DEJANIRA—with Peregrini's mark. 29b. Hercules combating the Hydra. With Peregrini's mark. 30b. Hercules killing the Hydra. Duchesne says certainly by Peregrini. 31. Orpheus with a Guitar, surrounded by Animals. On the margin the letters O. P. D. C. 32. Arion on the Dolphin; in the back-ground the ship from which he was cast. Duchesne is certain that it is by Peregrini. 33. Arion on the Dolphin, with a violin in his left hand, arriving at Piræus. 34. Diomedes naked, armed with helmet and shield, holding the Palladium in his left hand. O. P. D. C. in the margin. 35. Mutius Scævola before Porsenna, holding his hand over the fire. The letter P. by the throne. 36. An Apotheosis. On the right hand a naked Man with a Helmet before an Altar, on which is an Eagle, and a Woman on the left preparing a libation. In the centre of the margin the letter P. 37. A Standard bearer, with Peregrini's mark, P. by the trunk of a tree. Ottley thinks this piece was copied from the drawing of a German master. 38. Two Knights fighting. Duchesne thinks it is by Peregrini. 39. Two naked Men fighting with Boughs of Trees. Attributed to Peregrini. 40. Three Women dancing. In the margin below, the mark P. 41. Three Children dancing. At the bottom the mark P. 42. An Allegory of War; three naked Men with helmets on their heads, &c. The mark P. in the margin. 43. An Allegory of Union. A king on a throne; a young man and two soldiers before him. On the throne is written VN. FO. DI. F. Duchesne interprets these Un fondamento di Fraternalità. 44. An Allegory of Fame. Considered by Duchesne the work of Peregrini. 45. An Allegory of Seamanship. In the margin O P D. C. 46. An Allegory of Plenty; same mark. 47. A Woman with a Sword and an Apple. Bartsch, tom. xiii. p. 206. No. 2. 48. A naked Man sitting under a Tree, a Snake in each Hand. The mark in the margin. 49. Half-length figure of a Man with a fur Cap; ornaments on both sides. 50. Half-length figure of a young Man with a Cap. No mark. 51. Arabesque, with Acanthus and Grapes; do. 52. Arabesque, with winged Sphynx under two Satyrs. The mark P. 53. Arabesque, with flying Chimæra carrying a Veil. Do., on the shield. 54. Arabesque, with two Boys riding on Chimæric Birds; do. 55. Arabesque, with Helmet and Cuirass in the centre, above a winged Sphynx. Do., and the initials S. C. 56. Arabesque, with the Symbols of Seamanship; in the lower part two marine deities on dolphins; between them a Ship. 57. Arabesque, with two Goats. In the margin a mark which may be taken for a P. 58. Arabesque, with a female Satyr suckling two Children. 59. Arabesque, with the mark of a river Deity. Duchesne thinks this niello is by Peregrini, although without the mark. 60. Arabesque, with two Dolphins; in the centre above a winged head. 61. Arabesque, with two Trophies, chimæric birds, a faun sitting on a basket and playing a flute. On a tablet the letters SCOF. 62. A Coat of Arms with three Nails. On the right hand the letter C., on the left Z. or S. Therefore only probably by Peregrini. 63. Two Knife-handles with Arabesques. On one a head of Medusa in a medallion, and at the end two Satyrs, with the initials. P. C. 64. A Knife-handle, with two Guitars and two Rings. The letters S. C. in tablets, identify this piece as the work of Peregrini, in the opinion of Duchesne.

PERELLE, GABRIEL, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Paris, according to Nagler, in 1610. It is not known under whom he studied, but he executed a prodigious number of plates, from his own designs, as well as other masters, which prove much fertility of invention and extraordinary facility of execution, rather than an attentive study of nature, though his views are well composed, and enriched with architecture, ruins, and other objects, which give a pleasing variety to the scenery. His plates are executed with neatness and taste, though there is a defect in the management of his masses, and his lights are scattered and spotty, which injure the effect of the prints. He wrought both with the point and the graver. He is considered the Hollar of France, both in his style of engraving, and in the estimation of his works. His large views of public buildings and gardens in France, Spain, and Italy, were published with those of Silvestre in 1680, and there is a smaller set of the same by these artists. In addition to the prints from his own designs, he executed many after Paul Brill, Gaspar Poussin, Asselyn, Poelenberg, Silvestre, and other masters. He died, according to Nagler, in 1675, and to Zani, in 1680. The following are among his principal prints after the works of other masters:

A set of four Views, the church of St. Michael at Dijon, the Palace in that city, the Bridge of Grenoble, and the Porte Royale at Marseilles; after Silvestre. Four Views in Paris, the Arsenal du Mail, the Pontneuf, the Louvre, the Mail and the surrounding country; do. A set of four Views, the Baths of Bourbon d'Archambaud, the Castle of Bourbon Laney, with the Baths of Julius Cæsar, and the great Chartreuse near Grenoble; do. Six Views of the Garden de Ruel; after Israel Silvestre. Two Mountainous Landscapes, with biblical subjects; after P. Brill.—Six Views of the Vestiges of Rome and its Environs; after J. Asselyn. A View of Ruins, with the Adoration of the Magi; after Poelenberg.

PERELLE, ADAM and NICOLAS, were the sons and scholars of the preceding, whom they assisted in his numerous works; and, after his death, engraved a great number of plates of landscapes, architectural views, &c. Their works are inferior to those of their father. According to Nagler, Adam was born in 1638, and died in 1695; but Zani applies these dates to Nicolas.

PERERLETTE, an engraver whose name is attached to a coarse etching of the Holy Family, after Paul Veronese.

PEREYRA, DIEGO, a Portuguese painter, born about 1570. His instructor is not mentioned, and little is known concerning his life; but, according to the Biographie Universelle, he was one of the most distinguished painters of his country. His usual subjects were landscapes; but he had a rare talent for painting conflagrations and infernal scenes. He often painted the Burning of Troy, and the Overthrow of Sodom, but always in a different manner. He excelled in painting pictures of fruit and flowers; also rural scenes, illuminated by the radiance of torches or the lightning's flash. His landscapes are painted in a spirited style, ornamented with small figures in excellent taste. They are said to be much in the style of Teniers, with the silvery tones of that master. Notwithstanding the merits of Pereyra, he met with little encouragement, and was finally received into the mansion of a nobleman, where he died in 1640. Soon after his death, his works rose into general esteem. There are many at Lisbon; the cabinet of the Duke d'Almeida contains about sixty.

PEREYRA, MANUEL, a Portuguese sculptor, was born in 1614. He settled at Madrid, where he attained great distinction, and is regarded as one of the most able artists that Portugal has produced. He was commissioned to execute a great number of works. His masterpiece is a statue of our Saviour, in the church of the Rosario at Madrid. It is said that, in his old age, having become blind, he made the model of a statue of St. John the Divine, and directed its execution. This statue is one of his finest works. He died in 1667.

PEREZ, BARTOLOMÉ, a distinguished Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1634. He studied in the school of Don Juan de Arellano, and attained great excellence in flower-painting. His pictures of this kind are composed in a tasteful and delicate style, with a brilliancy and harmony of coloring deserving of high praise. He also succeeded in the figure, following the style of Don Juan de Carreno. There were many of his flower-pieces at the Retiro, which were subsequently removed to the Rosario; and one of his best productions is mentioned, which combines his talents in both branches of the art, representing St. Rosa de Lima kneeling before the Virgin and infant Jesus, with two Angels, one of whom is crowning the Saviour, while the other is presenting him a vase of flowers. Perez was also distinguished for the excellence of his theatrical decorations, and he was employed by the King to paint the scenery in the Royal Theatre. The Duke de Monteleone commissioned him to paint a grand ceiling in fresco in his palace at Madrid; but, while occupied upon the work, he unfortunately fell from the scaffold and was killed, in 1693.

PEREZ, FRANCISCO DE PINEDA, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville about 1660. He studied under Murillo, and followed his style with considerable success. Among other works, he painted several pictures for the churches and convents of Seville, which show that he was an able disciple of that great master. Perez was a member of the Society of Professors who established the Academy of Fine Arts at Seville.

PEREZ, ANTONES, a Spanish painter, the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Seville, in 1660. He painted historical subjects; also flower-pieces, in which he was more successful. Among his principal works were three sacred subjects in the sanctuary of S. Lucia at Seville, signed Antones Perez, 1707; and in the sacristy of the Capuchins of the same city, a picture by him of the Last Judgment, dated 1713. He died in 1727.

PEREZ, PIETRO, an old Spanish architect, who flourished in the thirteenth century, and died in 1290. He is chiefly known as the architect of the Cathedral of Toledo, which measures 404 feet in length, and 202 feet in breadth. It has five naves, surrounded by chapels of white stone; the principal nave is 116 feet high.

PERICLES. This celebrated Athenian deserves mention in a work relating to art, for the liberal patronage he extended to painters, sculptors, and architects. Having obtained almost regal power in Athens, about B. C. 450, he endeavored to inspire the people with a taste for the Fine Arts. By means of the wonderful talents of Phidias, and other famous artists, he embellished the city of Athens with those magnificent works which have been the admiration of all succeeding ages. (For a description of several of these, see the articles Phidias and Ictinus.) Pericles also designed the Odeum, a building constructed so as to give the greatest possible effect to sound, where the musicians used to assemble to rehearse their rival performances. It was of an elliptical figure, surrounded by a colonnade, except upon the southern side. After a period of several hundred years, it had suffered much from the ravages of time, but was restored by the munificent Herodes Atticus to its ancient beauty and magnificence.

PERIGNON, NICOLAS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris, according to Zani, in 1727; died in 1782. He painted flowers and landscapes in distemper; and also etched several plates, after his own designs, among which are a set of pleasing Landscapes, in the style of a painter; also four large Landscapes, inscribed Perignon, fecit, 1771.

PERIN, LIÉ LOUIS, a French miniature painter, born at Rheims in 1753. He entered the free school of design in that city, taught by Clermont; and, though opposed by many obstacles, he triumphed over them all. At the age of twenty-five he visited Paris, and commenced practising his profession. He was employed by Rosslyn, a Swedish artist, to copy a number of his works in miniature; and he gained such improvement by studying the works of Grenze, and other masters, that his practice greatly increased. He exhibited a number of fine miniatures; and painted, among others, the portraits of the duchesses d'Orleans and de la Rochefoucauld. During the stormy scenes of the Revolution, Perin was constantly employed by the friends of condemned persons to visit the prisons and paint their portraits. In 1799 he quitted Paris, and retired to his native city, where he practised the art with success for many years, occasionally visiting Paris. He also painted a number of miniatures at Lyons. He died at Rheims in 1817.

PERINI, GIUSEPPE SFORZA, an Italian engraver, born at Rome about 1748. He engraved some of the statues in the Clementine Gallery, and also some of the plates for the Scuola Italica of Gavin Hamilton. He was living in 1795. Among others, the following are by him:

The Frontispiece to the Scuola Italica, with two figures by M. Angelo. Jupiter and Antiope; after Jacopo Palma. Charity; after Bartolomeo Schidone. Christ bearing his Cross; after Lanfranco.

PERINI, LODOVICO, an Italian engraver of little note, by whom there are a few prints, very indifferently executed with the graver, and possessing little interest of subject.

PERINO, DEL VAGA. See VAGA.

PERINO, DA PERUGIA. See PIETRO CESAREI.

PERISIN, PERSINUS, or PERRISIM, JACQUES, an old French engraver; born, according to Nagler, in 1530. In concert with Jean Tortorel, he designed and engraved, partly on wood, and partly on copper, a set of twenty-four large prints, to illustrate a History of the Wars of the Huguenots, 1559 to 1570. This book is exceedingly rare. The copper-plates are etched in a coarse, incorrect style; the wooden cuts are executed with more attention. When Perisin and Tortorel engraved in concert, they marked their prints with the second monogram at the head of this article; when Perisin engraved alone, he used the first monogram. Malpé attributes to the latter a series of Tritons and Marine Monsters, small pieces lengthways, marked with his monogram reversed.

PERJECOUTER, S., a real or supposed artist, said to have been a native of Italy, residing there about 1535, to whom were formerly attributed some prints bearing the above monogram, executed with the graver, in the style of Marco da Ravenna. Strutt and Bryan have fallen into the same error. The prints referred to were executed by some unknown Italian engraver, who flourished about that time. (See Bartsch P. G., vol. xv., p. 496. See also Serwouter.)

PERLA, FRANCESCO, a painter of Mantua, supposed by Volta to have studied under Giulio Romano. There are two fine frescos in the dome of the chapel of S. Lorenzo, in that city, attributed to him. Little besides is known of this artist. He flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century.

PERMOSER, BALTHASAR, a German sculptor, was born at Cammer, in Bavaria, in 1650. He acquired the elements of the art at Saltzburg, and then went to Italy for improvement, where he remained fourteen years. His works are principally at Dresden and Vienna. He had so high an idea of his art that he was never satisfied with any of his works, and often destroyed them in disgust. They are consequently extremely rare. He was much employed by Prince Eugene, for whom he executed a statue of Charity, and a group of Painting and Sculpture. He also made the fine statue at Vienna of Prince Eugene, represented in the act of preventing Fame from publishing his exploits, by taking away her Trumpet. Permoser died in 1732.

PERNA, PETER, an engraver who flourished towards the close of the 16th century. There are no particulars of him. There are some wood cuts, marked P. P. which Strutt and others attribute to him.

PERNET, an obscure engraver, who lived about 1620. He engraved a few plates of portraits, very indifferently executed with the graver.

PEROLA, JUAN and FRANCISCO, two brothers, Spanish painters, sculptors, and architects, were natives of Almagro, and flourished about 1600. They visited Italy; studied under Michael Angelo; and finished their artistic education in Spain, under Gaspar Becerra. After leaving that master, they gained considerable distinction, and were commissioned by the Marquis de Santa Cruz to erect his palace at Viso, near the Sierra Morena, and to decorate it with paintings and sculptures of their own execution. They painted history, landscapes, portraits, battle-pieces, and marines, in a style of excellence, evincing a thorough acquaintance with the principles of art. Of their works in sculpture, the Biographie Universelle mentions the busts decorating the above mentioned palace, and the mausoleum of the Marquis of Santa Cruz, in the church of the Franciscans at Vico. They also painted the grand altar-piece in the same church: and, in concert with Moledano, they painted several frescos in the sanctuary of Cordova and the convent of Seville. There was an architect, named Esteban Perola, a native of Almagro, and cotemporary with the preceding. He designed, and probably erected, the convent of S. Francisco at Seville, commenced in 1623.

PERONI, GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Parma, about 1700 (Zani says 1710). According to the Abate Affò, he first studied under Felice Torelli, at Bologna; next with Donato Creti; and afterwards went to Rome, where he became the pupil of Agostino Masucci. According to Lanzi, he designed much in the style of Carlo Maratti, but his coloring partakes much of the verds, and other false coloring of Conca and Giaquinto, who were then very popular at Rome. Such are his picture of St. Philip, in the church of S. Satiro, at Milan, and the Conception, in the possession of the Padri dell' Oratorio, at Turin. Lanzi also says that his best works are his frescos in the church of S. Antonio Abate, at Parma, which rank him among the good painters of his age. There he also painted an altar-piece of the Crucifixion, in competition with Pompeo Battoni. He executed several other works for the churches of his native city; adorned its Academy; and wrought much for the collections. He died at Parma in 1776, at an advanced age. Lanzi calls him the Abate Giuseppe Peroni, a title probably conferring some favor upon him.

PERONI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian sculptor, born at Rome in 1627. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and entered the school of Algardi, who soon perceived in him more than ordinary talents. Peroni met with every encouragement; but his unrestrained passions involved him in many private intrigues, so that his professional improvement was sadly neglected. Finally, he became so irregular as to disgust Algardi, and soon after left his academy. He went to Sweden, and was patronized by Queen Christina, for whom he executed a bust in marble; but returned before long to Rome, married, visited Naples, and executed there a statue of Neptune, life-size, intended by the viceroy for a fountain at Madrid. He subsequently settled at Rome, where the Prince Camillo Pamfili patronized him extensively. The path to honor was open before him, but he chose to adhere to vicious habits, and died in 1663, aged 36.

PEROXINO, GIOVANNI, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished about 1517. According to Della Valle, he was a good artist; and Lanzi says "he is well known for the pictures he left in the church of the Conventuals at Alba."

PERRACCINI, GIUSEPPE, called IL MIRANDOLESE, a painter born at Mirandola, in 1672. According to Crespi, he studied under Marc' Antonio Franceschini, whose style he adopted. He executed some works for the churches at Bologna. He must not be confounded with Pietro Paltronieri, called Mirandolese dalle prospettive. (See Paltronieri.) He died in 1754.

PERRACHE, MICHEL, a French sculptor, born at Lyons in 1685. At the age of sixteen he visited Italy for improvement, and also went to Flanders, where he executed a number of sculptures for a church at Malines, and was honored with the freedom of the city. In 1717 he returned to France, and settled at Lyons, where he practised the art for many years, and executed a variety of sculptures for the churches and gardens. He died in 1750, leaving a son, who was also a sculptor.

PERRAULT, CLAUDE, an eminent French architect, born at Paris in 1613. He was the son of an advocate, and was bred to the medical profession, but extended his studies to other branches of science, particularly mathematics and architecture. His attention became more especially directed to this art, upon being engaged by Colbert to undertake a translation of Vitruvius, the first edition of which appeared in 1673, in a folio volume, with plates after his own drawings. Before the completion of this work, Perrault gave indisputable proof of his practical ability and superior taste in architecture, in his designs for the east façade and colonnades of the Louvre. On a very beautiful basement, containing a range of apartments, the windows of which are without much decoration, and with circular heads, rests the famous colonnade, 525 feet long, of coupled Corinthian columns, and fluted, three feet seven inches in diameter, supporting bold architraves, twelve feet long. This colonnade has three breaks—one at each of the extremities, and one in the centre. Over this is a pediment, embracing eight of the coupled columns; and the two inclined planes forming the pediment are remarkable, each being fifty-four feet long, eight feet wide, and fourteen inches high. The whole edifice is surmounted by a balustrade. This superb façade fronts the church of S. Germain. Its excellence was a matter of surprise to Bernini, and Milizia says it may be ranked among the finest pieces of architecture in Europe.—Among the other works of Perrault, are the Observatory, and the grand triumphal arch at the entrance of the Faubourg St. Antoine. The foundations of the latter work were laid, but it was unfortunately only executed in stucco. It was 146 feet long in front, and 150 feet high; dimensions far superior to the arches of Constantine or Septimius Severus. The order was Corinthian; the columns ten and a half diameters instead of ten—an addition which appeared necessary, to give a greater degree of elegance, and to harmonize with the light sculpture which adorned the work. The ornaments were admirably selected, and none but such a master as Perrault could have used so many without overloading the architecture; every part displayed excellent taste. Milizia says that, had it been executed in marble, it would have conferred immortal honor on the French nation. Perrault was a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. He published an abridged edition of his Vitruvius in 1674; an enlarged edition appeared in 1684; his work on the Five Orders, folio, was published in 1683; Essais de Physique, 2 vols. 4to., 1680, and a work on natural history; to which may be added a posthumous work, published in 1700, giving an account of several machines of his own invention. Perrault died at Paris in 1688.

PERRET, PETER, an engraver born about 1550. It is uncertain whether he was a native of France or the Low Countries. His Christian name is variously written Pierre, Pedro, and Pieter, and at Rome he signs himself Pieter Perret, which seems to confirm Basan's assertion that he was a Fleming. He went to Rome, where he studied under Cornelius Cort. On his return to his own country, he was appointed engraver to the Duke of Bavaria and the Elector of Cologne. He engraved the plates of the monastery of San Lorenzo in the Escorial, from the designs of Juan de Herrera, which gave so much satisfaction to Philip II. that he invited him to Madrid in 1595, and appointed him his engraver, which office he retained under Philip III. and Philip IV., till his death, which happened at Madrid in 1637. His chief works are a set of portraits of the Kings of Spain, signed Pedro Perret sculptor Regis, fecit.

PERRIER, FRANÇOIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Macon, in Burgundy, about 1590. His father was a goldsmith, and instructed him in the elements of design, but was unwilling that he should become a painter. Opposed in his wishes, young Perrier left his native place; and, being without the means of a livelihood, he became the conductor of a blind mendicant, who was traveling to Italy, and in this manner succeeded in reaching Rome. On arriving there, he was employed by a picture dealer to copy several paintings, and some of his work was shown to Lanfranco, who encouraged him to persevere, and admitted him to his school. After several years' residence at Rome, Perrier returned to France, and passed some time at Lyons, where he painted the Decollation of St. John, a Holy Family, and other works for the cloister of the Carthusians. Not content with a provincial field for the exercise of his abilities, Perrier went to Paris, and, associating himself with Vouet, was employed by him to paint, from his design, the chapel of the chateau de Chilly. Meeting with little encouragement, he revisited Italy in 1635, and applied himself to engraving the principal antique statues and bas-reliefs; also a number of plates after the Italian masters. After the death of Simon Vouet, he returned to Paris in 1645, and was commissioned to paint the Hotel de la Vrilliere (now the Bank of France), where he represented Apollo in his Chariot; the Four Elements; Jupiter and Semele; the Rape of Proserpine; Neptune and Thetis; and Jupiter demanding of Eolus the destruction of the Trojan Fleet. He also painted landscapes, in the taste of the Caracci, but defective in perspective. His pictures evince great warmth of imagination, but the design is often incorrect; the airs of his heads lack elegance and dignity, and his coloring is too dark. Perrier was a member of the Academy, and died at Paris, according to D'Argenville, in 1650. There are a number of etchings by him, incorrectly and negligently designed, and executed in a slight, hasty style, usually marked Paria, or with his monogram. Among them are the following:

A set of one hundred prints from the antique statues, published at Rome. A set of fifty, taken from the ancient bas-reliefs. Ten plates of the Angels in the Farnesina; after Raffaele. Two plates of the Assembly of the Gods, and the Marriage of Cupid and Psyche; from the paintings by Raffaele in the Farnesina. The Communion of St. Jerome; after Agos. Caracci. The Flight into Egypt; do. The Nativity; after S. Vouet. The Portrait of Simon Vouet; F. Perrier, fecit. 1632.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Holy Family, with St. John playing with a Lamb. The Crucifixion; inscribed Franciscus Perrier, Burgundus, pinx. et scul. St. Roch curing the People afflicted with the Plague. The Body of St. Sebastian, supported by two Saints. Venus and the Graces. Time clipping the Wings of Love, engraved in chiaro-scuro; fine.

PERRIER, GUILLAUME, a painter and engraver, the nephew and scholar of François P., flourished about the middle of the 17th century, and died in 1655. His works are executed in the style of his uncle. Among the principal are several pictures in the sacristy des Minimes at Lyons, where he had taken refuge, having killed his antagonist in a duel. There are a few etchings by him, in the style of François Perrier, among which are an emblematical subject; the Portrait of Lazarus Meyssonier; the Death of the Magdalen; and the Holy Family.

PERRIN, JEAN, an obscure French engraver, who, in conjunction with Jean Munier, executed a set of one hundred wooden cuts, for a work entitled La Morosophie de Guillaume de la Perriere Tolsain, contenant cent Emblemes, published at Lyons in 1553.

PERRISSIM. See PERISIN.

PERRONEAU, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter in crayons, and an engraver, born in 1731. He studied under Lawrence Cars. Little is known of him as a painter. Stanley says he was in England for a short time, and exhibited some portraits drawn in crayons. He engraved some plates after Boucher, Vanloo, Bouchardon, and Natoire.

PERRONET, a distinguished French architect and engineer, was born in 1708. He studied under Beausire, and made such rapid progress that, in 1745, he was appointed inspector of the school of engineers, and afterwards became director. He attained great eminence in constructing roads and bridges, and executed several admirable and important works of this kind in France, besides the canal of Burgundy. He wrote a description of his bridges, in 2 vols. 12mo.; and some memoirs on the method of constructing grand arches of stone, from two hundred to five hundred feet. Perronet was honored with the Order of St. Michael, and with a membership in the Academy of Sciences at Paris, the Academy at Stockholm, and the Royal Society of London. He died in 1794.

PERRY, FRANCIS, an English painter and engraver of little note. He engraved some plates for the magazines, and a few of coins and medals.

PERSON, NICHOLAS, a German engraver, who flourished about 1696. He engraved a set of twenty portraits of the Archbishops of Germany, published in that year. They are indifferently executed.

PERSYN, or PERZYN, REGNIER DE, an engraver who flourished at Rome about 1650, and, in conjunction with Cornelius Bloemaert, Theodore Matham, and M. Natalis, engraved the statues in the Palazzo Giustiniani. He also engraved some other plates, among which are the portraits of Ariosto, after Titian; Balthazar, Count Castiglione, after Raffaele. His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat, clear, and pleasing style. There is considerable discrepancy about him, arising from a variety of signatures found on prints attributed to him, as Regnier de Persyn fec., R. a Persyn sculp., and Regnerus a Persyn sculp. Lusit. (Lusitanian), which last signature is found on a plate of Leander taken to the shore by Marine Deities, and would seem to indicate that he was a Spaniard. Nagler says that Regnier de Persyn or Perzyn, surnamed Narcissus, was a native of Amsterdam, born in 1600. Zani says he was born in 1639, and was living in 1690. Zani also mentions another Renato or Reniero Perzyn, whom he calls a Roman, and says he operated in 1642. He quotes two inscriptions from prints, R. a Persyn sculp., R. a Persyn fec. 1642. There can be but little doubt that they all refer to one and the same person, as some artists frequently use various signatures.

PERUCCI, ORAZIO, a painter of Reggio, born in 1548. According to Tiraboschi he was a good artist, executed some works for the churches in his native city, and painted much for the collections. Lanzi says there remain various pictures by him in the private houses, and an altar-piece in the church of S. Giovanni at Reggio; and, judging from his style, he thinks he was a pupil of Lelio Orsi. He died in 1624.

PERUGIA, GIOVANNI NICCOLO DA, a painter of Perugia, born, according to Pascoli, about 1478. He was probably a scholar of Pietro Perugino. Lanzi says "he was a good colorist, and therefore was willingly received by Pietro to assist him in his works, however inferior to that artist in design and perspective. His works are recognized in the Capella del Cambio, near the celebrated Sala of Perugino, where he painted the Life of St. John the Baptist. In the church of S. Tommaso is his picture of that Saint about to touch the wounds of our Saviour, and with the exception of a sameness in the heads, it possesses much of the character of Perugino." He died in 1544.

PERUGIA, MARIANO DA, a painter who, according to Mariotti, was a reputable artist, and executed some works for the churches at Perugia and Ancona. There are notices of him from 1547 to 1576. He commends an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Domenico at Perugia, and another picture by him in the church of S. Agostino at Ancona. He is also called Mariano di Ser Eusterio.

PERUGIA, SINIBALDO DA, a painter of Perugia, highly commended by Mariotti, who flourished in the first part of the sixteenth century. There are notices of him from 1505 to 1528. Lanzi says "he must be esteemed an excellent painter, from his works in his native place, and still more from those in the Cathedral at Gubbio, where he painted a fine picture in 1505, and a gonfalon still more beautiful, which would rank him among the first artists of the ancient school."

PERUGINI, PETRUCCIO. See MONTANINI.

PERUGINI. There are several other painters, natives of Perugia, called by this name. The Cav. Ratti, in his life of Alessandro Magnasco, makes mention of one Perugini, who flourished at Milan at the same time as Magnasco, who inserted the figures in his landscapes. He flourished in the first half of the seventeenth century. Lanzi mentions another of the same name, who died at Milan in 1560.

PERUGINO, SANTE PIETRO. See BARTOLI.

PERUGINO, LUIGI. See SCARAMUCCIA.

PERUGINO, PAOLO. See GISMONDI.

PERUGINO, IL CAVALIERE. See GIO. DOMENICO CERRINI.

PERUGINO, DOMENICO, a painter of Perugia, who, according to Baglioni, flourished in the latter part of the 16th and first part of the 17th centuries. Lanzi says he painted small wood scenes or landscapes, and that he is scarcely known at Perugia; though it is believed that one of his pictures remains in the church of S. Angelo Magno at Ascoli. His name also occurs at Siena, and he is mentioned by authors as the master of Antiveduto Grammatica. He probably painted history, as well as landscapes, and wrought in various cities for individuals.

PERUGINO, LELLO, an old painter of Perugia, who, in conjunction with Ugolino Orvietano and other artists, decorated the Cathedral of Orvieto in 1321. See Orvietano.

PERUGINO, PIETRO. The family name of this eminent artist was Vannucci, but he is universally known in the history of art as Pietro Perugino, and when authors speak of Perugino, they always refer to him. There is a good deal of contradiction about the place of his nativity, and his master. The signatures on several of his earlier works show that he was a native of Città della Pieve, a small place near Perugia, where he was born in 1446. His parents soon afterwards removed to Perugia, and, being extremely poor, placed him under the tuition of an obscure painter in that city. It is generally believed by authors that he afterwards studied under Andrea Verocchio, at Florence. Mariotti raised a doubt whether he went to Florence and became the scholar of Verocchio, as writers report, but thinks he received his principal instruction from Benedetto Bonfiglio, at Perugia; and afterwards improved himself by studying the works of Masaccio. Pascoli, Bottari, and Taja are of opinion that Verocchio was never his master; and the Padre Resta, after reviewing the whole subject, comes to the same conclusion. Notwithstanding all the facts and ingenious arguments advanced by them, Lanzi thinks it highly probable that Perugino, on his arrival at Florence, attached himself to that celebrated artist, was instructed by him in design, and particularly in the plastic art; also in that fine style of painting with which Verocchio imbued both Vinci and Credi. Traditions generally have some foundation in truth. At all events, he first distinguished himself at Florence by his picture of the Deposition from the Cross, with the Virgin, St. John, and other Saints, painted for the church of S. Chiara, which was considered one of the finest productions of the art at that early period, and gained him such immense reputation that he was invited to Rome by Sixtus IV., to decorate the Sistine Chapel, where he executed several works, the most esteemed of which was that of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter. Lanzi gives the following admirable critique on his manner, works and scholars, which places Perugino in the true light, and explains away many adverse opinions.

"The manner of Pietro is somewhat hard and dry, like that of other painters of his time; and he exhibits a poverty in the drapery of his figures, his mantles and garments being curtailed and confined. But he atones for these faults by the grace of his heads, particularly of his boys and women, which have an air of elegance, and a charm of color, unknown to his contemporaries. It is delightful to behold, in his pictures and in his frescos which remain at Perugia and at Rome, the bright azure grounds which afford such relief to his figures; he green, purple, and violet tints so chastely harmonized; the beautiful and well-drawn landscapes and edifices—a thing, as Vasari says, until that time never seen in Florence. In his altar-pieces he is sufficiently varied; there is, in the church of S. Simone at Perugia, a Holy Family, one of the finest specimens of a well composed and well designed altar-piece. In other respects, Pietro did not make great advances in invention; his Crucifixions and his Descents from the Cross are numerous, and of a uniform character. He has represented, with little variation, the Ascension of our Lord, and of the Virgin, in Bologna, in Florence, in Perugia, and in Città di San Sepolero. Reproached with this circumstance in his life-time, he defended himself by saying that no one had a right to complain, as the designs were all his own. There is also another defence for him, which is that compositions, really beautiful, are still beheld with delight when repeated in different places. Whoever saw, in the Sistine chapel, his St. Peter invested with the Keys, will not be displeased at finding at Perugia, the same landscape in a picture of the Virgin; on the contrary, this picture is one of the finest objects that noble city affords, and may be considered as containing an epitome of the various styles of Pietro. In the opinion of some writers, his frescos exhibit a more fertile invention, and greater delicacy and harmony of color. Of these, his master-piece is in his native city (Perugia), in the Sala del Cambio. It is an evangelical subject, with Saints from the Old and New Testaments, in which he inserted his own portrait, to which his grateful fellow-citizens attached an elegant eulogy. He is most eminent, and adopts a sort of Raffaellesque style, in some of his later pictures. I have observed it in a Holy Family in the Carmine, at Perugia. The same may be said of certain small pictures, almost of a miniature class, as in the Grado of St. Peter at Perugia; than which nothing can be more finished and beautiful; and in many other pieces on which he spared no pains, but which are few in comparison to the multitude by his scholars which are attributed to him."

"In treating of the school of Pietro Perugino, it is necessary to advert to what Taja and the authors of the 'Lettere Perugine' notice respecting his scholars—that they were most scrupulous in adhering to the manner of their master; and, as they are numerous, they have filled the world with pictures, which both by painters and connoisseurs are commonly considered as his.' When his works at Perugia are inspected, he generally rises in the estimation of travelers, of whom many have only seen paintings incorrectly ascribed to him. At Florence, there are some of his pictures in the Grand Duke's collection, and in the church of S. Chiara his beautiful Descent from the Cross, with other works; but in private collections, many Holy Families are ascribed to him which were executed by some of his numerous scholars. The Papal States also possess many works by his scholars, who were of higher reputation, and not so wholly attached to his manner."

Pietro Perugino died at Perugia in 1524. His name is illustrious in art, not only for his works, but for his having been the instructor of Raffaele.

PERUNDT, GEORGE. See PERÜNDT.

PERUZZI, BALDASSARE, DA SIENA, a preëminent Italian painter and architect, born at Accajano, in the territory of Siena, according to Della

Valle, in 1481. According to Lanzi, he was the child of poor parents; was nurtured amidst difficulties; but succeeded in obtaining a knowledge of painting from some unknown master in his native city, and then went to Rome for improvement, in the pontificate of Alexander VI. He formed an intimacy with Raffaello, whose style he admired and imitated, particularly in his fresco works. Peruzzi gained great eminence at Rome; was patronized by many of the nobility, particularly by Agostino Chigi, and also by Pope Alexander. In his Judgment of Paris, in the Castello di Belcaro; and in his picture of the Sibyl foretelling to Augustus the Birth of Christ, Peruzzi manifested such a divine enthusiasm, according to Lanzi, as Raffaello himself never surpassed in treating the latter subject, nor Guido, nor Guercino, of whom so many admirable Sibyls are exhibited. Lanzi says that, in great compositions, he also evinced remarkable talents; as in his celebrated fresco of the Presentation in the Temple, in la Madonna della Pace at Rome, in which he showed himself a perfect master of the delineation of the passions, and unequalled in the excellence of his architecture. This magnificent work was a favorite study of Annibale Caracci. His oil paintings are extremely rare; Lanzi mentions one at Torre Babbiana, eighteen miles from Siena, containing three half-length figures, of the Virgin, St. John the Baptist, and St. Jerome.

Peruzzi was preëminently distinguished in perspective and architecture, which he painted with such fidelity and precision, and so judicious a management of chiaro-scuro, as to produce perfect illusion. Lanzi says that if other artists surpassed him in the vastness of their works, they never did in regard to excellence. He was eminently skilled in ornamenting façades—painting sacrifices, bacchanalian scenes, and battles, so as to represent bas-reliefs, and real architecture; which was afterwards so successfully practised by Polidoro da Caravaggio and Maturino. One of his most admired perspectives at Rome, is in the same apartment of the Farnese palace where Raffaello painted his Galatea, and represents the History of Perseus, embellished with ornaments in imitation of stucco, executed in such admirable style that Titian himself was deceived by them, and could only be convinced of his error by changing the point of view. Peruzzi produced a similar ocular deception in a hall of the same palace, by painting a colonnade, the intercolumniations of which make the hall seem much larger than it really is. Of this work Pietro Aretino said that “the palace contained no picture more perfect in its kind.” Lanzi remarks, “had the scenes he painted for the plays, represented in the Apostolical palace for the amusement of Leo. X., survived to our days, the perspective paintings of Peruzzi would have obtained greater fame than the Calandra of Cardinal da Bibiena. It would have been said of him, as of the ancient, that he discovered a new art, and brought it to perfection.”

Peruzzi also attained great excellence in grotesques—a style of painting which, being the offspring of a whimsical fancy, affords abundant play for the imagination. Lanzi says: “Graceful in all his works, he was most elegant in grotesque; and, amid the freedom inspired by a subject entirely of a capricious character, he preserved an art to comprehend its principles. He employed every species of idea—satyrs, masks, children, animals, monsters, edifices, trees, flowers, vases, candelabra, lamps, armor, and thunderbolts; but he bridled his caprice by his judgment, in the actions represented, in the general arrangement, and in every other circumstance. He distorted and connected these images with a surprising symmetry, and adapted them as devices emblematic of the stories which they surround.”

Baldassare Peruzzi is said to have engraved on wood; and a print is attributed to him representing Apollo, Minerva, and the Muses, with Hercules driving before him a female figure loaded with treasure, supposed to represent Avarice. It is executed on three blocks, in a fine, bold style; marked Bal. Sen., and at some distance the word Perugo. According to Papillon, he wrote a treatise upon the Antiquities of Rome, and a Commentary on Vitruvius, which he intended to embellish with engravings upon wood, but died before it was ready for publication.

As an architect, Peruzzi attained great excellence. He is said to have studied under Bramante, and, through the liberal patronage of the celebrated Agostino Chigi, he was enabled to acquire a thorough knowledge of the art. Milizia says he was a learned and talented architect. Serlio commends him for a sound taste, facility, and elegance, both in the general design and the ornaments of his edifices. Lanzi says he ranks among the first architects; that he is even preferred to Bramante; and evinces a lively imagination in all his works. He was employed in the building of St. Peter's, by Pope Leo X., who, thinking the idea of Bramante too vast, employed Peruzzi to make a fresh model. According to the account of Serlio, it was to have been of a Greek cross, with a cupola one hundred and thirty-eight feet in diameter; and was conceived with such judgment, that every part served as a model to the succeeding architects.—He designed many elegant façades at Rome, and gave proof of his superior ability in the Palazzo Massimo, which is one of the most original and tasteful edifices in that city. Instead of being perplexed at the awkwardness of the site, Peruzzi availed himself of it to curve the front of the building, and thereby produced so happy an effect that this particular form seems rather the result of choice. The loggia and small inner court are extremely beautiful, and the whole of this admirable work deserves the attention it has received in a folio work by Suys and Haudebourt, Paris, 1818, containing engravings of all its parts and details. The tomb of Adrian VI., in the church dell' Anima, was also erected by Peruzzi. For Agostino Chigi, at Longara, he erected the famous palace now called La Farnesina, which is highly praised by Milizia. Among his other works were the gate of S. Michele in Bosco, and the Cathedral of Carpi. He left a number of original manuscripts relating to architecture, and bequeathed them to his scholar Serlio, who declares, in his fourth book, that whatever merit his work possesses is due, not to himself, but to Baldassare da Siena. He died in 1536, poisoned by a rival who endeavored to obtain his appointment of architect to St. Peter's. Artists of every denomination assisted at his obsequies, and he was buried in the Pantheon, by the side of Raffaello.

merit must not be measured by their good fortune." His life was an uninterrupted series of misfortune and injustice. Although his surpassing talents gained him the patronage of Agostino Chigi to enable him to pursue his studies, yet he was reckoned inferior to his rivals, because he was as modest and timid as they were arrogant. As architect of St. Peter's, he received two hundred and fifty crowns per annum; and for his labors in the Cathedral of Siena, he had the yearly pittance of thirty crowns! He derived but little benefit from private commissions, for even wealthy nobles took advantage of his modesty, either rewarding him scantily or paying him nothing at all. Despoiled of all his property in the sacking of Rome, he was cut off in the prime of life, just as his merits began to be appreciated. When lying at the point of death, the Pope sent him one hundred crowns, with offers of further assistance. His death demonstrated to the world the greatness of his talents; and his epitaph, comparing him to the ancients, is pronounced by posterity a just tribute to his wonderful genius.

PERUZZINI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, born at Pesaro or Ancona, flourished, according to the dates on the prints attributed to him, from 1640 to 1661. He is supposed to be the elder brother of Gio. Peruzzini, and, like him, to have studied under Simone Cantarini. Lanzi says that in a MS. at Pesaro, it is mentioned that Domenico was a native of that city, and a scholar of Pandolfi. There is much confusion and contradiction about both artists, and still more uncertainty about Domenico; the list of prints given below were formerly attributed to Domenico Piola; but Bartsch repudiates the idea, and adduces several cogent reasons for transferring them to Domenico Peruzzini.—They are etched in a masterly style, resembling those of Cantarini. It would seem that both brothers were natives of Pesaro, but preferred to be called after Ancona, the place of their adoption. The following are the prints attributed to him by Bartsch. For full particulars see Bartsch, P. G., tom. xxi.

1. The Holy Virgin, half-length, with the infant Jesus. D. P. 1661.

2. The Virgin seated, with the Infant on her knees. D. P. 1661.

3. Christ tempted by the Devil, in the form of an old man. D. P. 1642.

4. Christ bearing his Cross, with other figures, half-lengths. D. P. P. F. engraved on the cross. (Circular.)

5. The Holy Family and Saints. Domus Pernus Anconæ 1661. The figures in this print are half-lengths. Heineken, in his Dictionnaire des Artistes, attributes this print to Gio. Dom. Cerrini, known under the name of Il Cavaliere Perugino.

6. St. Anthony of Padua praying, and the infant Jesus appearing to him on a cloud, supported by three cherubim. Dom. P. F. This print has been erroneously attributed to D. Cresti.

7. The Assassination. A man in his shirt on a bed, assailed by three soldiers, one of whom thrusts a lance into his body. D. P. 1640.

8 to 11. Landscapes. The first is signed D. P. f. Anconæ; the others D. P. only.

12. St. Jerome doing Penance in the Desert. The letters D. P. F. are on a plant to the right. Bartsch, however, considers it doubtful whether it belongs to Domenico Peruzzini, as there is a sensible difference in the style from that of the others.

PERUZZINI, CAV. GIOVANNI, a painter of Pesaro or Ancona, born in 1629. The Canon Lazzarini asserts that both Domenico and Giovanni

P. were natives of Pesaro, and that they transferred their services to Ancona, their adopted country. He studied under Simone Cantarini, acquired distinction, and painted several pictures for the churches at Ancona, Bologna, and other places. He was invited to the court of Turin, where he executed several works both in oil and fresco, so much to the satisfaction of his protector, that he made him a knight of the order of St. Maurice. He possessed a lively imagination, a ready invention, and great facility of execution. He formed a style of his own, founded on those of Cantarini, the Caracci, and Guido. He was vain of his facility, as appears on one of the lunettes of the portico de' Servi at Bologna, on which he inscribed Opus 24 Hor. Eq. Jo. P., (the work of twenty-four hours, by Gio. Peruzzini, knight,) which caused many sarcastic remarks from his brother artists. His best works are finished with more care. The principal at Ancona are the Decollation of St. John, at the Spedale, and St. Teresa, at the Carmelitani; at Bologna, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of S. S. Vitale ed Agricola, and an altar-piece of St. Cecilia, in the church dedicated to that Saint. Lanzi says, in his picture of St. Teresa are traces of Baroccio's manner; that of the Beheading of St. John is extremely beautiful, and there he appears a scholar of the Bolognese. He afterwards took to a wandering life, and painted in various churches and theatres, if not with much study, yet with tolerable correctness, a knowledge of perspective, and with a certain facility, grace and spirit, which delight the eye. His paintings are dispersed through various places in the Picenum, even as far as Ascoli, where are a number of his works. There are also some of his works at Rome and Milan. He died at Milan in 1694.

PERUZZINI, PAOLO, was the son and scholar of the preceding. Lanzi says that, in the MS. at Pesaro, from which he had obtained much of the information respecting the father, the son is commended as a good and decided painter. He resided a long time at Rome, where there are some of his works. No further particulars are given of him.

PESARI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter of Modena, who painted there about 1650. Tiraboschi says that he was, either a pupil of Guido, or made that master his example. Lanzi says he resembles Guido very closely in his picture of the Madonna in the church of S. Paolo, at Modena, and in other works. He afterwards went to Venice, where he died, in the flower of his life.

PESARO, SIMONE DA. See CANTARINI.

PESARO, NICCOLO TROMETTO, or NICCOLO DA, a painter of Pesaro, who studied under Federigo Zuccaro, whose style he at first closely followed. He executed some works for the churches at Rome, the principal of which are the Nativity, in the Basilica; a Pieta in S. Francesco; the Nativity and the Circumcision, in S. Maria da Araceli. Lanzi says his best piece is the Last Supper, in the church of the Sacrament at Pesaro. "It is a picture so well conceived and harmonized, and so rich in pictorial effect, that Lazzarini has descanted upon it in his lectures, as one of the finest works in that city." It is said that Baroccio beheld this artist with esteem, and Baglioni commends him for his earlier works. He afterwards fell into a mannered, in-insipid style, which injured his reputation and fortune. He died at Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., aged 70 years.

PESCI, GASPERO, a Bolognese painter who was living in 1776. He painted easel pictures of landscapes with figures, and views of architectural ruins. Little is known of him, further than that Count Algarotti was his friend and patron, with whom he corresponded, and for whom he executed two pictures of ancient architecture, which are described in the Catalogo Algarotti.

PESCIA, MARIANO DA, a painter of Pescia, whose real name was Mariano Gratiadei. He was a scholar of Ridolfo Ghirlandaio, (not, as is said, of Domenico G., who died about 1493), whom he assisted in many of his works. He also painted some pictures from his own compositions, of which the principal are an altar-piece in the Capella della Signoria, in the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence, and a picture of the Virgin and Infant Jesus, with St. Elizabeth and St. John, in the Florentine gallery. It is agreed by all that he died young, but the time of his birth and death is variously stated. Zani says he died in 1520; others that he was born in 1520 and 1525, and died at Florence in 1550. See Ridolfo Corradi.

PESELLO, FRANCESCO, a Florentine painter, born in 1380, and died in 1457. He studied with Filippo Lippi, and was a good imitator of his style. There is a fine picture by him of the Epiphany, in the Ducal Gallery.

PESELLO, PESELLINO, was the son of the preceding, born at Florence in 1426. Lanzi says he imitated Lippi more closely than his father. "He painted the Grado for the apartments of the Novices of S. Croce, where he represented the histories of S. Cosmo, S. Damiano, S. Antonio, and S. Francesco, denominated by Vasari most wonderful productions. Perhaps this is not too much to say when we recollect the period." He died in the flower of life in 1457. There is a great deal of contradiction about these artists, whose history is evidently confounded with another artist of the same name, noticed in the next article.

PESELLO, a Florentine painter, born in 1404, and died in 1481. It is said that he studied under Andrea del Castagno, who was born in 1409. He excelled in painting animals, which he designed from nature, and kept a great variety about him to serve as models. His history is mixed up with the two preceding artists in the most admirable confusion, and their names, dates, and works, are all applied to him by different authors.

PESENTI, GALEAZZO, called IL SABBIONETTA, a painter and sculptor of Cremona, who flourished, according to Zaist, in the first half of the 16th century. He was a cotemporary and friend of Galeazzo Campi, and they probably studied painting under the same master. He seems to have acquired more distinction as a sculptor, than as a painter. There are some of his works in his native city, but they are not particularly specified.

PESENTI, MARTIRE, called IL SABBIONETTA, a painter and architect of Cremona, who flourished in the last half of the 16th century. There are notices of him up to 1582. None of his works are specified, but he must have been an artist of reputation in his native city, as Lanzi says that his fellow citizens always consulted him when a valuable picture began to exhibit marks of decay, or an edifice required repairing, by which means many fine works were preserved.

PESNE, JEAN, a French engraver, born at Rouen in 1623. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Paris, where he acquired distinction by the excellence of his works. His execution is not dexterous nor picturesque, but his outline is correct, and he rendered with remarkable fidelity the precise character of the different painters whose works he engraved, which makes his prints interesting and valuable to the collector. Dumesnil mentions 166 prints by him, the best of which are those he engraved after Niccolo Poussin. The following are his most esteemed prints. He died about 1700.

PORTRAITS.

Two, of Niccolo Poussin; after pictures by himself. Louis le Comte, Sculptor to the King. Francis Langlois; after Vandyck.

SUBJECTS AFTER POUSSIN.

Esther before Ahasuerus. The Adoration of the Shepherds. The dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John. The Entombing. The Death of Ananias. The Holy Family, with a dedication to le Brun. The Vision of St. Paul. The Triumph of Galatea. The Testament of Eudamidas; one of his best prints. The Seven Sacraments, in seven plates, of two sheets each. The Labors of Hercules, in nineteen plates; from the paintings in the Louvre.

SUBJECTS AFTER ITALIAN MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Raffaele. A set of fifteen Landscapes; after Guercino, and other masters; fine.

PESNE, THOMAS, was a younger brother of the preceding, and painted history and portraits, in which latter capacity he acquired at Paris considerable reputation.

PESNE, ANTOINE, a French historical and portrait painter, born at Paris in 1683. He was a son of one of the preceding, but authors differ. Dumesnil says he was a son of Jean P., and others with more probability, of Thomas. After learning the principles of the art under his father, he studied under Charles de la Fosse, and then went to Italy for improvement. On his return to Paris he acquired distinction, both in history and portrait. He was invited to Berlin by Frederick the Great, who appointed him his chief painter, and conferred on him a liberal pension. He painted the portrait of the King and other members of the Royal family, and of many distinguished personages at the court, where he died in 1757. The same history is erroneously applied to another Antoine Pesne, born at Paris in 1710, and died in 1770, who is said to have been a son of Charles Pesne, an engraver.

PEETERS, or PETERS, BONAVENTURA, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1614. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he distinguished himself as one of the most eminent marine painters of his time. His best pictures are his storms and tempests, which he has represented with wonderful truth and effect. The lowering sky, the glare of the lightning, the awful and terrific agitation of the water, the alarm and movements of the mariners, the vessels foundering or dashing to pieces on the craggy shore, are described with a fidelity and feeling that fill the imagination with horror, and show that he must have frequently witnessed these disastrous scenes, to have enabled him to delineate them with such affecting precision. He also painted calms and prospects of towns and castles on the sea shore, with nearly equal success. These represent scenes on the coast of Holland, with fishing boats at anchor, and fishermen drawing their nets; or views on the Scheldt, with vessels sailing under a gentle breeze, in which he exhibits a freshness of atmosphere and a transparency in the water, that is admirable. His vessels and figures are correctly drawn, his pencil is light, his touch is neat and full of spirit, his coloring exceedingly transparent, his water, whether calm or agitated, has great truth and delicacy, and his management of the chiaro-scuro is admirable. His pictures are held in the highest esteem in Flanders, and are to be found only in the choicest collections. His works have been greatly imitated, and passed upon the unlearned in such matters, greatly tending to injure his reputation in foreign countries. This is particularly the case in England, and in the United States; many such, with his signature, well calculated to deceive, have been sold in this country for his genuine works. He died, according to Descamps, in 1652; most other authors, following him, give the same date; but Balkema says he died in 1671, and a picture in the Museum at the Hague, considered genuine, dated 1667, would seem to confirm the latter. He also executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, which are exceedingly scarce.

PEETERS, or PETERS, JOHN, was the brother and scholar of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1625. He painted the same subjects as his brother, and imitated his manner so closely that his works have frequently been sold for those of that admirable master. Though his pictures are well composed, his figures correctly designed, his coloring clear and transparent, his penciling neat and delicate, he is very unequal to him in grandeur of effect, and in judicious management of the chiaro-scuro. He sometimes painted sea-fights, in which he showed great ingenuity in the composition, and his figures are correctly drawn and spiritedly touched. He died in 1677.

PEETERS, or PETERS, FRANCIS LUCAS, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1606. He was the son of an obscure painter, from whom he learned the elements of the art. He afterwards studied with Gerard Segers, but did not follow the style of that eminent master. He subsequently abandoned historical painting, and devoted himself to landscapes, which he executed in a pleasing style, and decorated with small figures correctly drawn and touched with great neatness and spirit. He acquired distinction, and was taken into the service of the Archduke Leopold, in whose employment he passed the greater part of his life. He died at Brussels in 1654.

PEETERS, or PETERS, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1580. He first studied with James Lenards, an eminent painter on glass, who, perceiving in his pupil an uncommon genius for the art, advised him to place himself under a more able master in a different branch of the art. He accordingly became the disciple of Cornelius Cornelisz, with whom he remained five years. He made such progress and showed so much genius, that that eminent master advised him to go to Italy. After a residence of some years at Rome, he returned to Holland, where he distinguished himself, but in a very different branch from what his master had anticipated. Karel van Mander extols him as a correct designer of the figure, and commends some of his historical works; but he is chiefly celebrated for his pictures of conversations and gallant assemblies, which are composed in an elegant and agreeable style, and finished with great neatness and delicacy. He also painted portraits with considerable success. He died in 1626.

PETER, THE LONG. See PETER AERTSEN.

PETER, WENCESLAUS, a German painter and sculptor, born at Carlsbad, in Bohemia, in 1742. Early in life he was apprenticed to an armorer; but having engraved upon steel some beautiful designs, he attracted the notice of the Prince of Kaunitz, who furnished him the means of visiting Rome. Arriving in that metropolis of art, Peter devoted himself to the study of the antique, and executed, not long after, a bas-relief of twenty figures in terra cotta, which was purchased by Lord Bristol, and sent to England. Notwithstanding this success, Peter resolved to gratify his strong inclination for painting; and he devoted his attention principally to representing animals, although by no means neglecting the study of the nude, which is evinced by his pictures of Daniel, Hercules, and Juno. In the branch of animal painting, he attained such excellence as to surpass most artists. His master-piece was a representation of the Terrestrial Paradise, with various animals distributed in pairs, comprising all the varieties which he had ever had the opportunity to design. He was offered large sums for this work, but would never dispose of it. Among the patrons of Peter, was Prince Antonio Borghese. He was honored with a professorship of Painting in the Academy of St. Luke; and died at Rome, in 1829.

PETERS, MATTHIAS, and NICHOLAS, two Dutch engravers who flourished at Amsterdam about 1660. They were brothers, and executed conjointly the plates for the Atlas Major, published by Blaeu, in that city, in 1660.

PETERS, WILLIAM, an English clergyman, who flourished in the last part of the 18th century, and distinguished himself as a painter. He was a man of wit, and possessed a lively imagination and great conversational powers, which made him a great favorite. Having a passion for painting, he practised it at first as an amusement, and by associating much with the eminent artists of the time, he greatly improved his manner, and distinguished himself by the production of many beautiful works, which were greatly admired. He painted for the Shakspeare Gallery, two scenes from the Merry Wives of Windsor, two do. from Henry VIII., and one from Much Ado about Nothing; also several for Macklin's Gallery, as the Resurrection of a Pious Family; the Guardian Angel and the Spirit of a Child; the Cherubs, &c., all of which were very popular. He executed many fancy subjects from his own imagination, which are pleasingly sentimental. He was much patronized by the nobility, and he sometimes painted subjects not strictly in accordance with just notions of propriety, and very different from those of the Cherubs and the Resurrection of the Pious Family. His pictures are well composed and his coloring rich and harmonious, with an admirable impasto, in which he imitated Reynolds. Many of his works were engraved by Bartolozzi, Thew, Simon, Smith, Marquard, and others. He is generally called the Rev.

W. Peters. The Duke of Rutland was his principal patron, and presented him with a valuable living; the Bishop of Lincoln gave him a prebendal stall in his cathedral. He died in 1814.

PETERZANO, or PRETERAZZANO, SIMONE, a Venetian painter, who, according to Lomazzo, was a pupil of Titian, and flourished at Milan in 1591, where he executed some works for the churches, both in oil and fresco. Lanzi says, "On his Pietá, in S. Fedele, he inscribed himself Titiani Discipulus; and his close imitation seems to confirm the truth. He produced several works in fresco, particularly several histories of St. Paul, in S. Barnaba. He there seems to have aimed at uniting the expression, the foreshortening, and the perspective of the Milanese, to the rich coloring of the Venetian artists; noble works, if they were thoroughly correct, and if the author had been as excellent in fresco as in oil painting." There is a fine picture by this master, of the Assumption of the Virgin, in the Chiesa di Brera.

PETHER, ABRAHAM, an English painter, born at Chichester in 1756. He was the son of William Pether, an engraver; and studied painting with George Smith. He painted landscapes and moonlight scenes, with considerable success, though without sufficient attention to nature. He did not confine himself to painting, but was a sort of universal genius, and withal a skillful musician. He died in 1812.

PETHER, SEBASTIAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Chichester in 1790. He was instructed by his father, and painted similar subjects, in a style not beyond mediocrity. He died in 1844.

PETHER, WILLIAM, an English engraver, born at Carlisle in 1731. He was a scholar of Thomas Frye, and was an excellent engraver in mezzotinto. He executed some fine plates after Rembrandt, Teniers, Rubens, and other masters, as well as a few from his own designs. The following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

The three brothers, Smith, Painters of Chichester; W. Pether, pinx. et fec. 1765. Benjamin West; after Lawranson Samuel Chandler, D. D.; after Chamberlin. Francis du Quesnoy, Sculptor; after C. le Brun. Carlo Tessarini, Musician; after Palthe. Rembrandt's Wife, as the Jew Bride; after Rembrandt. Rubens' second Wife; after Rubens.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Rabbi; after Rembrandt. An Officer in Armor; do. An old Man with a beard; do. The Lord of the Vineyard; do. A Village Festival; after Teniers. A Warrior; half-length; after Giorgione. The Descent from the Cross; after the picture in King's College, Cambridge; by Daniello da Volterra. The Philosopher; after Jos. Wright. The Statuary; do. The Academy; do. The Contenance of the Chevalier Bayard; after Penny. The Hermit; do. The Alchemist; do.

PETIT, GILES EDME, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1696. He studied under J. Chereau, and executed many plates in the neat, finished style of his instructor. Nagler gives a list of fifty-two prints by him, among which are the following. He died in 1760.

PORTRAITS.

Francis I. King of France; after Titian; for the Crozat collection. Louis Philip, Regent of France; after Liotard. Louis XV., King of France; after C. Vanloo. Charles Edward Stuart, the Pretender; after Dupra.—Philibert Papillon, Canon of Dijon. Reu , Charles de Maup on, President of the Parliament. Peter Bayle, Author of the Historical and Critical Dictionary. Maria Theresa, Queen of Hungary. Armand Julius, Prince of Rohan; after Rigaud. Henry Charles de Pomponne, Abb  of St. Medard. John Frederick Philippeaux, Count of Maurepas. Joachim Francis Potier, Duke of Gesvres.

SUBJECTS.

The Disciples at Emmaus; after J. Andr . The Visitation; do. The Virgin of the Rosary; do. St. Catherine; do.

PETIT, LOUIS, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1760, was a scholar of N. Ponce. He was much employed in designing and engraving vignettes and other subjects for the booksellers. He also engraved several plates after various masters, which possess considerable merit. The following are the principal. He died in 1812.

The Portrait of Peter Bayle, author of the Dictionary. La belle Jardiniere, jointly with Mansard; after Raffaele. The infant Jesus asleep, finished by Bovinet; do. Aurora; do. A Holy Family; do. St. Romualdus; after A. Sacchi; finished by Dambrune. The dancing Nymphs; after Vanderwerf. And several for Ligni's History of the Life of Christ; among which are the Transfiguration, after Raffaele; and the Last Supper, after Leonardo da Vinci.

PETIT-RADEL, LOUIS FRAN OIS, a French architect, born at Paris in 1740. He studied under de Wailly, and carried off a number of medals at the exhibitions of the Academy. He visited Italy for improvement, and on returning to Paris, established a successful school, devoting his energies principally to the theoretical department of the art. He was a correct designer, and an adept in perspective; executed many excellent architectural designs; held an office in the Academy of Architecture; and was appointed Inspector General of Civil Edifices. In 1799, he published his Projet pour la restauration du Pantheon Francais. He died in 1818. There are a number of plates representing ruins and other architectural subjects, engraved after his designs.

PETITOT, JOHN, THE ELDER, an eminent Swiss painter in enamel, was born at Geneva in 1607. He was the son of a sculptor and architect, who placed him with a gold worker and enameller, to learn that business. Having frequent occasion to make use of enamel, he succeeded in obtaining such beautiful tones of color, that he was advised to apply himself to portrait painting in enamel, in which he succeeded admirably, and afterwards carried it to a perfection before unknown. In company with his friend and associate, Peter Bordier, who afterwards became his brother-in-law, he went to Italy in search of improvement, where, during a residence of several years, he carefully studied the treasures of art, and consulted the best chemists, to discover some desirable colors that would stand the fire without change. Petitot and Bordier wrought together, the former painting the heads and hands, and the latter the hair, drapery, and backgrounds. They next went to England, where they had the good fortune to become acquainted with Sir Theodore Mayerne, physician to Charles I., an excellent chemist, who had bent his attention to the subject of enamels, and had discovered the principal colors to be used in painting, and the manner of vitrifying them, so that they surpassed the boasted enamelling of Venice and Limoges. Mayerne not only communicated his secrets to Petitot, but introduced him to the King, who took him into his service, and gave him apartments at Whitehall.

He painted the portrait of that monarch, and of the royal family, several times. He copied several pictures after Vandyck, who assisted him with his advice; and these are considered his finest works. The beautiful portrait of the Countess of Southampton, now in the collection of the Duke of Devonshire, is considered one of the finest specimens of the art that exists. It is a whole length, nine inches and three quarters high, by five inches and three quarters wide, and was painted from the original in oil by Vandyck. The execution is bold, and the coloring is the most rich and beautiful that can be imagined. It is dated 1642. King Charles, who took great pleasure in his success, often honored him with his presence while at work. The tragical death of his royal patron was a dreadful stroke to Petitot, who would not quit the exiled family, but followed them into France, where he was one of their most faithful adherents.— Prince Charles, afterwards Charles II., took great notice of him, and recommended him to Louis XIV., who took him into his service, appointed him his painter in enamel, and gave him apartments in the Louvre. He painted that monarch several times, Maria Anne of Austria, his mother, and Maria Theresa, his Queen. Petitot being a zealous Protestant, and dreading the consequences of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, which tolerated the Huguenots, he solicited the King's permission to retire to Geneva. Louis, unwilling to part with such a favorite artist, fearing his escape, ordered him to be arrested and imprisoned in the fortress of l'Évêque, and sent the Bishop of Meaux to convert him to the Catholic faith; but neither the eloquence of the Bishop nor the terrors of the dungeon could prevail on him to abjure his faith. His confinement threw him into a fever, on learning which, Louis ordered his release, and Petitot lost no time in escaping with his wife to Geneva, where he settled. There he continued to practice his profession, though wealthy, and at an advanced age. The King and Queen of Poland, desirous of having their portraits copied by him, sent the originals to Paris, believing him to be there; but the messenger, finding he had gone to Geneva, proceeded thither, and Petitot executed them in the most beautiful manner, though he was then above eighty years of age. The concourse of his friends and the curious was now so great, that he was obliged to retire to Vevay, a small town in the canton of Berne, that he might pass the rest of his life in quiet. He wrought to the last day of his life, and died suddenly, while he was engaged on a portrait of his wife, in 1691, aged 84 years.

Petitot may almost be considered the inventor of painting in enamel; at least he was the first artist who brought it to complete perfection. He was much assisted by his friend Bordier, but it is evident that he owed his success entirely to his own ingenuity, for, after they separated, little more is heard of Bordier. He made use of gold and silver plates, and seldom enamelled on copper. His custom was to sketch out his work from the portrait, and then finish after life. When he painted the kings of England and France, he selected their best portraits, and afterwards they gave him a sitting or two to finish his work. He labored with the greatest assiduity, con amore, and never laid down his pencil for any recreation, except with reluctance, saying that he always found more beauties in his art to charm him. When his works first came into vogue, his price was twenty louis-d'ors a head, which he afterwards raised to forty, and then to fifty. His works are exceedingly scarce and valuable. In the Apollo Gallery of the Museum at Paris, are about sixty of his finest works, consisting of portraits of Louis XIV., and several members of his family; ladies of his court, celebrated for their beauty, attachments, or literary acquirements; and some of the statesmen and military commanders of France. The following are the most interesting:

Several of Louis XIV. at different periods. Three of Anne of Austria. Two of Madame de Maintenon. Three of Maria Theresa of Austria. La Duchesse de la Valliere. Ninon de l'Enclos. Madame de Sévigné. Madame Deshoulières. The Duchess of Portsmouth. Madame de Ludre in the character of a Magdalene. Christina of Sweden. The Duchess de Mazarin. The Cardinal de Richelieu. Madame de Montespan. Mademoiselle Montpensier. Maréchal de Villars. Jean Chardin, the Traveler.

PETITOT, JOHN, THE YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding. Nothing is known of the time of his birth or death. He settled at London, where he practised his profession with considerable success till his death, when his family removed to Dublin. His works are said to possess great merit, though very inferior to those of his father.

PETRAZZI, ASTOLFO, a painter of Siena, born about 1590. He studied successively under Francesco Vanni, the younger Salimbeni, and Pietro Sorri. He acquired distinction, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, as well as for the private collections. He also opened an Academy there, which was much frequented by the artists of Siena, and honored by the attendance of Borgognone, who stopped some months with Petrazzi before he proceeded to Rome. Lanzi says he seems to have adhered more to the manner of Vanni than that of any other master. He frequently aims at pleasing, and not unfrequently chose his models from the schools of upper Italy. His Marriage feast at Cana brings Veronese strongly to our recollection. His Communion of St. Jerome, at the Agostiniani, is painted much after the manner of the Caracci. He excelled in painting children, and his pictures are generally adorned with choirs of angels. His cabinet pictures are ingeniously composed, and have a lively and pleasing effect. His pictures of the Four Seasons, at Volte, a seat of the noble family of Chigi, are admired for the playfulness and elegance of the groups of Cupids introduced. He died in 1665.

PETREOLO, ANDREA, a painter of Venzone, who, according to Renaldi, was employed in the cathedral of his native city about 1586, where he "decorated the panels of the organ with very beautiful histories of S. Geronimo and S. Eustachio, together with the parable of the wise and foolish Virgins, surrounded with fine architecture."

PETRI, PIETRO DE', a painter born in Premia, a district of Novara, in 1671. He studied under Carlo Maratti, at Rome, and painted some works for the churches in that metropolis. Lanzi says he formed a style of his own, by engrafting on that of Maratti, a portion of the manner of Cortona. He did not however, obtain the reputation which his merits deserved, on account of his infirm health and extreme modesty. His best works are a picture of the Crucifixion, in the church of S. S. Vincenzo e Anastasio, and some frescos in the tribune of S.

Clemente. He was called at Rome de' Pietri. Orlandi calls him a Roman, others a Spaniard; but Lanzi says he was a native of Premia. He died at Rome in 1716, in the prime of life. There are a few etchings heretofore attributed to him, but Bartsch gives them to another artist of the same name.

PETRI, or PITRI, PIETRO ANTONIO DE, an Italian engraver, to whom Bartsch attributes some etchings, heretofore given to the preceding artist. Zani also makes the distinction, and says he was born at Rome. All this, however, rests upon supposition, and is not worth disquisition here. Those interested are referred to Bartsch, P. G. tom. xxi. p. 289.

PETRINI, CAV. GIUSEPPE, a painter of the Milanese school, born at Carono about 1700. Lanzi says he studied under Prote of Genoa, but he adopted the manner of Francesco Solimena, then much in vogue, not only in Naples, but in other parts of Italy. He acquired distinction, and executed many works for the churches at Milan, and elsewhere. He seems to have been more anxious to captivate the eye than the judgment, by the brilliancy and contrast of his coloring, in which the greenish tints predominate. He died in 1780.

PEUTEMAN, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1650. He excelled in painting objects of still-life, such as vases, books, musical instruments, &c., which he executed with surprising precision, with beautiful coloring, and a judicious management of the chiaro-scuro. He also painted allegorical subjects, emblematic of the shortness and misery of human life. His death happened in an extraordinary manner, in 1692. Receiving a commission to paint a picture emblematic of mortality, representing human bones and skulls, with rich gems and musical instruments to express the vanity of the world, he went to an anatomical lecture room to make some sketches, when an earthquake happening to occur, he was frightened into a fever, of which he died. Balkema says his Christian name was Nicholas, and that he also painted history.

PEYRE, MARIA JOSEPH, a French architect, born at Paris in 1730. At the age of twenty-one he gained the grand prize of the Royal Academy, and visited Rome for improvement, where he made many designs of the ancient architectural monuments, published in 1765, under the title Œuvres d'Architecture. He also published a dissertation on ancient art, compared with that of the moderns, which was highly esteemed. Peyre was appointed architect to the king, and in concert with Wailly, erected the Nouveau Theatre Français, afterwards known as the Odeon, and one of the finest edifices in Paris. In 1767, he was received into the Academy of Architecture. He died in 1785.

PEYRE, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, the Younger, a French architect, the brother and scholar of M. J. Peyre. He made rapid progress in the art, and finally gained the grand prize, which entitled him to a residence at Rome, with the royal pension. Arriving in that capital in 1763, he commenced a diligent study of the antique, and afterwards executed a remarkable design, representing the interior of St. Peter's as it would appear if the front façade were removed. It is now preserved in the Musée Royal. After spending some time in Rome, Peyre returned to Paris, where he was appointed superintendent of the royal buildings at Fontainebleau, and subsequently of those at St. Germain, where he constructed two small churches, remarkable for excellent distribution, and correct proportions. In 1777 he was chosen a member of the Royal Academy of Architecture. In 1779, he was invited by the Elector of Treves to complete the palace of Coblenz; which he accomplished, greatly to the increase of his reputation. On returning to Paris, he received various important commissions from government, but was prevented from fulfilling them by the breaking out of the Revolution, when he retired to Fontainebleau, where he still retained his post of superintendent of the buildings. Manifesting much solicitude to preserve various works of art from the popular fury, particularly portraits and statues of the French kings, he was suspected of royalist tendencies, and was imprisoned for a short time. Under the rule of Napoleon, he was also distinguished in the art, being chosen a member of the Institute, and of several Councils of Architecture. During his latter days, he instructed several eminent architects of the present time. He died in 1823. Peyre composed several works relating to art, among which were his Œuvres d'Architecture, folio, 81 plates. Paris, 1819—1820.

PEYRON, JEAN FRANÇOIS PIERRE, a distinguished French painter, and also an engraver, born at Aix, in Provence, in 1744. After acquiring a knowledge of the elements of design in his native place, he visited Paris in 1767, and entered the school of Lagrenée. He gained great improvement from the works of Poussin, and in 1773 drew the grand prize in the Royal Academy, for his picture of the Death of Seneca, which entitled him to a four years' residence in Rome, with the king's pension. The reform in the French school had already been commenced by Vien; and Peyron, on arriving at Rome, determined to follow those correct principles derived from the Greeks, and the great masters of modern times. He painted at Rome a picture of Cimon taking from prison the dead body of his Father, and sent it to Paris, where it was greatly admired, and was placed in the Musée Royal. After a seven years' residence at Rome he returned to France, in 1781. He soon gained a high reputation, and was received into the Academy in 1783. In 1785, he was appointed Director of the Gobelins, and painted many pictures for that establishment. In 1787, he exhibited his pictures of Curius refusing the Gifts of the Samnites, and the Death of Socrates. A picture of the latter subject, by David, was also exhibited in the same year; and this period is said to have been the commencement of the new era in the French school, so eminently illustrated by the talents of David. The compositions of Peyron are said to be well arranged; his chiaro-scuro is managed with address; his draperies are broad and simple; his touch is firm, yet free and spirited; his coloring vigorous and harmonious, although his latter works have a purplish hue. Besides the pictures already mentioned, Peyron executed many others, among which are Paulus Æmilius; Antigone; the Daughters of Atheus; and Pythagoras with his Disciples. As an engraver, he executed nine plates, of which four are from his own designs--the Death of Seneca; Cimon taking the dead body of his Father from Prison; Socrates and Alcibiades; and the Death of Socrates. Four after Poussin—a Sheep-Fold ; Faustulus presenting Romulus and Remus to his wife Laurentia ; the Rape of the Sabines ; and the Despair of Hecuba. One after Raffaele—a Holy Family. Peyron died in 1815.

PFEFFEL, JOHN ANDREW, a German engraver, born at Vienna in 1674. His works are chiefly confined to architecture, and ornaments for jewelers. In conjunction with C. Engelbrecht, he engraved a set of plates of ornaments for the jewelers. He also engraved a part of the plates for J. H. Fischer's History of Architecture, published at Vienna in 1721. His plates are neatly executed with the graver. He died in 1750. He had a son called by the same name, whom he instructed in the art, and who was similarly employed in engraving for the publishers. He was born at Vienna in 1715, and died in 1768.

PFEIFFER, CARL HERMANN, a German engraver, born at Frankfort in 1769. He studied in the Imperial Academy at Vienna, under Professor Ch. Brand. He wrought with the point, and executed a great many portraits of the nobility, and other distinguished persons. He also engraved a number of plates after Raffaele, Correggio, Rubens, and other masters.

PFENNINGER, HENRY, a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1749. He studied painting under John Balthasar Bullinger, with whom he continued five years. He afterwards went to Dresden, where he improved himself by studying the works of the best masters, in the Electoral Gallery, particularly of Rembrandt and Vandyck. On his return to Switzerland, he painted portraits with reputation, and etched a great number of plates of portraits and views in Switzerland, which are executed with spirit and taste. He designed and engraved a part of the plates for Lavater's Physiognomy, and also some of the portraits for Füessli's Supplement to the Lives of the Swiss Painters. He was a very industrious artist, and, besides his numerous engravings, painted many portraits. He died in 1815. The following are his other principal prints: A set of seventy-five portraits of Illustrious Personages of Switzerland, accompanied with an abridged history of their lives by Leonard Meister. 1781. Thirty-four portraits of the most celebrated German Poets, with their characters, by L. Meister. 1785. A set of six Views in Switzerland.

PFENNINGER, MATTHEW, a Swiss designer and engraver, born at Zurich in 1739; died about 1810. He was of the same family as Henry P. He studied at Augsburg, under Emanuel Eichel, and afterwards visited Paris for improvement. He engraved a number of plates for Charles de Mechel, and several of the compositions of Louthembourg; after which he returned to his own country. Among his principal plates are the portraits of Geis, Kleinjogg, and Shottenseps; a view of the tomb of Virgil, near Naples; and the statue of Marcus Aurelius at Rome.

PFRUNDT, GEORGE, a German sculptor, architect, and engraver, born in Franconia in 1603. Little is known of him as a sculptor or architect, but he executed quite a number of plates of architectural and geographical subjects, from his own designs. He died in 1663.

PHEAX, or PHEACES, a distinguished ancient architect, who flourished about B. C. 500, and constructed a number of edifices in Sicily, particularly at Agrigentum. He built the subterranean conduits; and also embellished the city by several fine edifices. It is probable that he was the architect of the celebrated Temple of Jupiter, near Agrigentum, described by Diodorus Siculus, of which the remains are still visible. It is said to have been 340 feet long, 60 feet wide, and 120 feet high: constructed in admirable style, with square pillars within, and circular without, thirty-two feet in circumference, and the flutings so deep as to admit of a man standing within them.

PHIDIAS, the most celebrated sculptor of antiquity, was the son of Charmidas, born at Athens, probably between the years B. C. 490 and 480. It is said that in early life he studied painting; but it does not appear that he ever practised that art to any extent, although he painted at Athens a picture of Pericles, represented as the Olympian Jupiter. According to the concurrent testimony of most ancient writers, he studied sculpture under Ageladas, one of the most eminent sculptors of the age. The times in which Phidias lived, were peculiarly favorable to the development of his genius; and his talents must have been shown at a very early age, as it appears he was extensively employed upon great public works, even during the administration of Cimon. Subsequently, when Pericles attained the height of his power, Phidias seems to have been consulted in regard to the conduct of all works in sculpture as well as architecture. Plutarch says, "it was Phidias who had the direction of these works, although great architects and skillful sculptors were employed in erecting them." Among the most remarkable objects upon which his talents were exercised, the Parthenon, or Temple of Minerva, claims preëminence. It was built by Callicrates and Ictinus, under the superintendence of Phidias. For a description of this magnificent edifice, see Ictinus. Within the temple, Phidias executed his celebrated statue, in gold and ivory, of Minerva, represented standing erect, holding in one hand a spear, and in the other a statue of Victory. The helmet was highly decorated, and surmounted by a sphinx; the naked parts were of ivory; the eyes of precious stones; and the drapery throughout was of gold. It is said there were forty talents weight of this metal used in the statue. The people, being desirous of having all the glory of the work, prohibited Phidias from inscribing his name upon it; but he contrived to introduce his own portrait as an old bald-headed man throwing a stone, in the representation of the combat between the Athenians and Amazons, which decorated the shield. A likeness of Pericles was also introduced in the same composition. The exterior of the Parthenon was enriched with admirable sculptures, many of which were from the hand of Phidias, and all of them executed under his direction. A portion of these, termed the Elgin marbles from their having been taken to England by the Earl of Elgin, are now in the British Museum. They have been highly commended by the most excellent judges; and the eminent sculptor Canova, after visiting London, declared that "he should have been well repaid for his journey to England, had he seen nothing but the Elgin marbles."

The time of Phidias is justly esteemed the grand and golden age of Sculpture. The artists of the previous centuries are represented as having a dry, hard, and stiff manner. Phidias made a more careful selection of the finest models in nature, and brought to perfection the grand and sublime in sculpture. Quintilian calls him the "Sculptor of the Gods," from the character of grandeur and sublimity which he threw into his works. His skill in optics he probably acquired from his study of painting, and it is admirably attested by a curious circumstance. It was intended to place a statue of Minerva on a column of very great height; and both Phidias and his cotemporary Alcamenes were employed to produce images for the purpose, which were to be chosen by the citizens. When the statues were completed, the universal preference was given to the work of Alcamenes, which appeared elegantly finished, while that of Phidias appeared rude and sketchy, with coarse and ill-proportioned features. At the request of Phidias, the statues were successively exhibited on the elevation for which they were intended; all the minute beauties of his rival's work completely disappeared, together with the seeming defects of his own; and the latter, though previously despised, seemed perfect in its proportions, and was surveyed with wonder and delight. Although he exercised his talents in all the materials generally used in art, yet his works in gold and ivory, called chryselephantine sculpture, appear to have been the most highly esteemed. The enemies of Pericles, with the view of implicating that statesman, accused Phidias of having misapplied part of the gold entrusted to him for the statue of Minerva, and desired that he should be brought to trial.—The sculptor, however, by the prudent advice of Pericles, had executed the work in such a manner that the gold might easily be removed, and it was ordered by Pericles to be carefully weighed before the people. As might have been expected, this test was not required, and the malicious accusation was overthrown. They then declared the sculptor guilty of sacrilege in placing his own portrait upon the shield of Minerva; and some writers state that he was thrown into prison; others, that he was banished. Some assert that there was no sentence passed; but that Phidias, fearing the consequences of the charge, fled from Athens to Elis, where he was employed to execute a costly statue of the Olympian Jupiter, for the temple in Altis. This statue was the most renowned of all the works of Phidias. It was of colossal dimensions, being sixty feet in height; and seated on a throne; the head was crowned with olive; the right hand held a small statue of Victory, in gold and ivory; the left hand grasped a golden sceptre of exquisite workmanship, surmounted by an eagle; the sandals and mantle were also of the same material, the latter sculptured with every description of flowers and animals; the pedestal was also of gold, ornamented with a number of deities in bas relief. In the front of the throne was a representation of the Sphynx carrying off the Theban youths; beneath these, the Fate of Niobe and her Children; and, on the pedestal joining the feet, the Contest of Hercules with the Amazons, embracing twenty-nine figures, among which was one intended to represent Theseus. On the hinder feet of the throne were four Victories, as treading in the dance. On the back of the throne, above the head of the god, were figures of the Hours and Graces;

on the seat, Theseus warring with the Amazons, and Lions of gold. Its base, which was of gold, represented various groups of Divinities, among which were Jupiter and Juno, with the Graces leading on Mercury and Vesta; Cupid receiving Venus from the Sea; Apollo with Diana; Minerva with Hercules; and, below these, Neptune, and the Moon in her Chariot. On the base of the statue, was the inscription Phidias, the son of Charmidas, made me. Quintilian observes that this unparalleled work even added new feelings to the religion of Greece. It was without a rival in ancient times, all writers speaking of it as a production that none would even dare to imitate. There is an interesting tradition connected with this celebrated work. Phidias, after the completion of his design, is said to have prayed Jupiter to favor him with some intimation of his approbation, whereupon a flash of lightning darted into the temple, and struck the pavement before him. This was hailed as a proof of divine favor, and a brazen urn or vase was placed upon the spot, which Pausanias mentions as existing in his time. It is pretended that Phidias was again accused of robbery, by the people of Elis, and that he died in prison; but there are strong reasons, not only for thinking that these accusations against Phidias were false, but that the accounts of his disgrace and death are incorrect. From an expression in Aristophanes it is evident that an unjust feeling had been excited against Phidias; though it is not clear whether he fled or was exiled; and it seems highly probable that he died at Elis. The honor which was paid to his memory, would go far to disprove the assertion that he suffered the death of a criminal. The care of his master-piece was entrusted to his family, under the title of Phaidruntai. His studio, near the temple, was also preserved with great reverence, and an altar was erected therein, consecrated to the gods. Pausanias says that the Phaidruntai still existed in his time—six hundred years after the execution of the statue. Among the other works of Phidias were eight or nine statues of Minerva, of which one was the Minerva Areia of the Plataeans, of wood, gilt; the extremities were of Pentelic marble. Besides these, he executed a number of admirable statues in marble, but chiefly in bronze, of Venus, Apollo, Mercury, an Amazon, etc., mentioned by Pausanias, Pliny, and Lucian.

PHILESIUS, RIGMAN, an old German wood engraver, and carver in wood, who, according to Papillon, flourished at Strasburg about 1508. He executed a set of twenty-five cuts of the Life and Passion of our Saviour, published at Strasburg by John Knoblauch, in 1508. These cuts are said to be very scarce. He is also called Rigman and Phillery, which see.

PHILIPPE, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at the Hague about 1660. He engraved a few plates of portraits and festivals, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Louis Henry, Prince of Nassau; P. Philippe, fec. Henry Charles de la Tremouille, Prince of Tarento; after Vanderbank.

SUBJECTS.

The Assembly of the States-General of Holland; after Tornliet. A grand Festival; do A set of Merry-makings; after vander Venne. 1660.

PHILISCUS, a famous sculptor of Rhodes, who, according to Pliny, executed statues of the Nine Muses in marble. These statues were carried to Rome by Fulvius Nobilior. Some of these, or copies of them, are now in the Vatican.

PHILLERY, an old engraver on wood, said to have been a German, but probably a Fleming, by whom there is a middle-sized print, representing two Soldiers standing before a Woman, who is seated, holding a Dog in her lap. It bears the following inscription in old Flemish characters, Cheprint t'Antwerpen by my Phillery de figursnyder. (printed at Antwerp, by me Phillery, the figure-cutter). Heineken supposes this print to be very ancient, but Nagler quotes the same, and ascribes it to Anton Phillery, who flourished at Antwerp in 1530. There is considerable dispute about this Phillery and Philesius, whose works are not worth any disquisition, either on account of merit or antiquity, and there can be but little doubt that they are one and the same artist, Rigman being the surname, and Phillery the Christian name, which, latinized, is Philesius. Artists, too, are frequently whimsical, and often ignorant, in their signatures; and some use several signatures. See Key to Monograms and Ciphers, p. xix.

PHILLIPS, CHARLES, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about 1765. He engraved some prints after Reynolds and Louthembourg, and a few from the old masters, among which are the following:

A Boy holding a Pigeon; after Mola. A Woman plucking a Fowl; after Rembrandt. The Philosopher; do. The Holy Family; after Parmiggiano. Venus and Cupid; after Saivati. Isaac blessing Jacob; after Spagnoletto.

PHILLIPS, THOMAS, an eminent English portrait painter, born at Dudley, in Warwickshire, in 1770. He first learned the business of a glass stainer at Birmingham. In 1790 he went to London, with a letter of introduction to Benjamin West, who employed him in painting the glass for the windows of St. George's chapel, Windsor. He soon turned his attention to oil painting; but whether he received any instruction from West is not mentioned. For several years he exhibited some of his pictures at the Royal Academy, among which were the Death of Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, at the Battle of Cassillon; Ruth and Naomi; Elijah restoring the Widow's Son; Cupid disarmed by Euphrosyne, &c. He afterwards devoted himself chiefly to portrait painting, in which branch he acquired distinction, notwithstanding he had such powerful competition as Beechey, Hoppner, Owen, Jackson, and Lawrence. He was not a fashionable painter, but he executed the portraits of many persons, distinguished for their intellectual, literary, or other attainments, a circumstance which, in future time, will add great interest to his works. It will be sufficient to mention the names of Lord Byron, Sir Walter Scott, Thomas Moore, Thomas Campbell, Southey, Coleridge, Crabbe, Sir Humphrey Davy, Lord Thurlow, Lord Brongham, Count Platoff, Earl Grey, Sir Joseph Banks, Sir E. Parry, Sir J. Brunell, Sir David Wilkie, Sir F. Burdett, Lord Lyndhurst, Sir Nicholas Tindal, and many more such men. His portraits are distinguished for dignity, truthfulness and excellent coloring. Nicaise de Keyser, a distinguished foreign artist, called him the English Vandyck, for the excellence of his works,—a very great compliment, whether deserved or not. In 1808, he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and in 1824, succeeded Fuseli in the professorship of painting, which office he held till 1832. On his appointment to the professorship, he made a tour on the continent, visiting France, Italy, and Germany. He published his "Lectures on the History and Principles of Painting," in one 8vo. vol. in 1833. He died in 1845.

PHILON, or PHILO, an eminent Grecian architect, who flourished about B. C. 330. According to Vitruvius, he erected various temples, and enlarged the vestibule of the temple of Ceres and Proserpine, built by Ictinus. He also designed and partially erected the white marble theatre at Athens, which was finished by Ariobarzanes, and rebuilt by Adrian. According to Plutarch, Philon was employed by Demetrius Phalereus to enlarge the port and arsenal of the Piræus, which he completed in excellent style. In giving to the Assembly an account of his operations, he expressed himself with such precision, purity, and eloquence, that the Athenian people—excellent judges of those matters—pronounced him equally a fluent orator and an admirable architect.

PHILOXENES, an eminent Greek painter, a native of Eretria, flourished about B. C. 316. He studied under Nicomachus of Thebes, whom he imitated, and probably surpassed in facility of execution. He was the most rapid painter of antiquity, and is said by Pliny to have discovered some more expeditious methods of operation in painting. Philoxenes gained great distinction by a picture painted for Cassander, King of Macedon, representing the Defeat of Darius by Alexander. According to Pliny, this work was not surpassed by any of the productions of ancient art. That author also describes another picture by Philoxenes, representing a lascivious subject, in which were three satyrs feasting. In 1831, there was discovered at Pompeii a large mosaic, apparently representing the Battle of Issus, which is supposed to be a repetition of the work of Philoxenes. It is still preserved in the house "Del Fauno," where it was first found.

PIACENZA, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian architect, born in 1735, at Pollone, near Vercelli. He studied under Count Alfieri di Sostegno, and was afterwards sent to Rome, at government expense. In 1777 he was appointed Architect to the King; in 1788, a magistrate of Turin; and in 1796, First Civil Architect to the Crown. He was employed in various works in the State, and in 1816, was chosen a member of the Academy at Turin. He died in 1818. His adopted son, Giuseppe Giovello, also an architect, completed a work commenced by Gio. Battista P. in 1768, published at Turin in six volumes, containing biographical sketches of artists from the time of Cimabue. It is mainly a reproduction of Baldinucci's work, but embraces many important additions and excellent annotations, which are justly appreciated by Cicognara.

PIAGGIA, TERAMO or ERASMO, also called TERAMO DI ZOAGLI, a painter born at Zoagli, in the Genoese state, and who painted at Genoa in 1547. He was a scholar of Lodovico Brea, and painted in conjunction with Antonio Semini, several pictures for the churches at Genoa, the most esteemed of which is an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of St. Andrea, in the church of that saint. Lanzi highly commends this work, and says "none can witness this very beautiful altar-piece without seeing traces of Brea's style, already enlarged and changed into one more modern." He also painted several works by himself at Genoa and at Chiavari.

PIANE, GIOVANNI MARIA DELLE, called IL MOLINARETTO, a Genoese painter, born at Genoa in 1660. According to Ratti, he studied under Gio. Battista Gaulli, whose style he adopted, and distinguished himself by some excellent works, which he executed for the churches at Genoa, but more by the excellence of his portraits. Lanzi highly extols his Decollation of St. John the Baptist, at Sestri di Ponente. He also says that he was particularly excellent in portraits, and that Genoa is full of his works in this branch. He was also invited to Parma and Piacenza, where he furnished the court with portraits, and executed some works for the churches. He was afterwards invited to Naples by King Charles of Bourbon, who appointed him his painter, with a liberal pension, and he continued in his service till his death in 1745.

PIANORO. See BARTOLOMEO MORELLI.

PIASTRINI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, a painter born at Pistoja about 1700. He studied under Cav. Benedetto Luti at Florence, and afterwards went to Rome, where he distinguished himself by some works in the church of S. Maria in Via Lata, in which Lanzi says he rivaled the best followers of Carlo Maratti. He also painted some works for the churches in his native city, particularly in la Madonna della Umiltà, where he filled two large spaces with pictures illustrating the history of that church.

PIATTI, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, born, according to Füessli, at Teglio, in the Valteline, in 1650. He executed many works for the churches in the neighborhood, and painted much for the collections. He particularly commends a picture of Cleopatra, in the possession of a noble family at Delebio.

PIATTOLI, GAETANO, a Florentine painter, born in 1703. He studied under Francesco Riviera at Leghorn. Lanzi says he is particularly extolled for the excellence of his portraits. He found abundant employment at Florence, in that branch of the art, and was not only patronized by the inhabitants, but was employed to take the portraits of the foreign nobility who visited that city. His portrait is in the ducal gallery. He also painted Conversazioni and Turkish ballets, which were very much prized in the collections for their excellence. He died in 1770.

PIAZZA, CALLISTO, a painter born at Lodi, who flourished from 1524 to 1556, as appears from the dates on his pictures. According to Orlandi, he was one of the most successful imitators of Titian. Lanzi says that his picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, in the Collegiate church of Codogno, is worthy of any of the disciples of Titian. It is a grand composition, containing figures of the apostles and two portraits of the Marchesi Trivulzi. In the church of the Incoronata, at Lodi, he painted three chapels in fresco, each ornamented with four beautiful histories. One contains the Mysteries of the Passion, another the Acts of St. John the Baptist, and the third, the Life of the Virgin. "It is currently believed," says Lanzi, "that Titian, in passing through Lodi, painted several of the heads—a story probably originating from the exceeding beauty that may be observed in them." He sometimes imitated the style of Giorgione, as may be seen in his altar-piece in the church of S. Francesco at Brescia, representing the Virgin among several saints, which is esteemed one of the most beautiful productions in that city. He executed many works for the churches in other cities, particularly at Crema and Alessandria; in the cathedral of the latter city are several of his best works. Lanzi rebukes Ridolfi, who commends him for nothing except his coloring, whereas, "he boasts a very noble design, is tolerably select in his forms, and rich and harmonious in his coloring. His Nuptials at Cana, in the Refectory of the Padri Cisterciensi, at Milan, is truly a surprising production, no less for its boldness of hand, than for the number of its figures, which seem to live and breathe, though the whole of them are not equally well studied, and a few are really careless and incorrect." Lomazzo also, speaking of his Choir of the Muses, in which he introduced the portraits of the president Sacco and his wife, for whom it was painted, says, "I may, without fear of temerity, observe that it is impossible to produce anything more perfectly graceful and pleasing, and more beautiful in point of coloring, among works in fresco."

PIAZZA, PAOLO, commonly called PADRE COSIMO, was born at Castelfranco, in the Venetian territory, in 1557. He studied under the younger Palma, and Baglioni commends him as one of his best pupils. He did not follow the style of his master, but adopted one of his own, which, though not distinguished by great vigor or energy, was graceful and pleasing, and gained him so much reputation, that he was successively employed by Pope Paul V., the Emperor Rodolph II., and the Doge Priuli. He executed many works both in oil and fresco for the churches and public edifices at Rome, Vienna, Venice, and other places. He was employed several years by the Emperor Rodolph. Among his best works are the Descent from the Cross, in the Campidoglio, and the history of Antony and Cleopatra, in the Palazzo Borghese at Rome. After he had acquired distinction, he joined the Capuchin friars, and took the name of Padre Cosimo, by which appellation he is usually known. He died at Venice in 1621.

PIAZZA, CAV. ANDREA, born at Castelfranco about 1600, was the nephew and scholar of the preceding, whom he accompanied to Rome, and whose style he adopted, though somewhat modified by an attentive study of the works of the great masters. He acquired distinction, and was patronized by the Duke of Lorraine, in whose service he continued many years, and received from him the honor of knighthood. He afterwards returned to Venice, where he executed some works for the churches, the best of which is the Marriage at Cana, in the church of S. Maria, a grand composition of many figures, which Lanzi says is one of the best works in the place. He died there in 1670.

PIAZZETTA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Venetian painter, born in 1682. According to Zanetti, he was instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, a reputable sculptor in wood, and afterwards became the scholar of Antonio Molinari. His first style was distinguished for a clear and brilliant tone of coloring, but on visiting Bologna, he employed himself with Spagnoletto, and by diligently studying the works of Guercino, he imitated his strong contrasts of lights and shadows, and boldness of relief, with considerable success. Lanzi says it is supposed that he had long observed the effects of light applied to statues of wood and images in wax, and by this means he was enabled to draw with considerable judgment and exact precision, the several parts that are comprehended in the shadowing; owing to which art, his designs were eagerly sought after, and his works repeatedly engraved by Pitteri, by Pelli, and by Monaco, besides other prints that were executed in Germany and elsewhere. His method of coloring, however, diminished in a great measure the chief merit of his pictures. His shades have increased and changed, his lights sunk, and his tints become yellow, so that there remains an inharmonious and unformed mass. There are a few of his pictures still in good preservation, as the Decollation of St. John the Baptist, in the church of that saint at Padua, placed in competition with those of the first artists of the state, and at that period esteemed the best of all. "Yet if we examine him closely, he will not fail to displease us by that monotonous and mannered coloring, of lakes and yellows, and by that rapidity of hand, by some called spirit, though to the judicious it often appears neglect, as if the artist was desirous of abandoning his labor before it was completed." He executed many chalk drawings which were held in great estimation. He also etched a few plates from his own designs. He died at Venice in 1754.

PICART, JEAN, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1640. He is supposed to have studied under Crispin de Passe, whose style he imitated, though not with much success. He was principally employed in engraving vignettes, frontispieces, and other book ornaments. He also engraved a few portraits.

PICART, ETIENNE, called the ROMAN, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1631. It is not known under whom he studied; but, after learning the art at Paris, he went to Rome, where he resided a long time, on which account some say he was called Picart the Roman; others, that he assumed this appellation to distinguish his works from those of an inferior engraver of the same name, probably the preceding artist. While at Rome, he executed some plates after the Italian masters. On his return to Paris he was employed, with other celebrated artists, to engrave the pictures in the King's Collection. His plates are generally executed with the graver, in the style of the elder Poilly, though he sometimes used both the point and the graver, and in a few of his prints the point predominates. His plates are neatly executed, with a fine expression in the heads, though his drawing is not very correct, and there is frequently a want of harmony in the effect of his engravings. His prints are very numerous; the following are esteemed the best.—He died at Amsterdam in 1721.

PICART, BERNARD, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1663. He was instructed in design and engraving by his father, and at the age of sixteen, gained the prize at the Academy of Paris. He distinguished himself not less as a designer than an engraver, and he executed a multitude of plates, which evince the fertility of his genius, and the excellence of his taste. He used both the point and the graver; his drawing is correct, and his prints have a very pleasing appearance. His works chiefly consist of book illustrations. In 1710 he left Paris, and settled at Amsterdam, where he found abundant employment. He engraved a set of seventy-eight plates, in imitation of the different styles of the old engravers, which were published after his death, in 1738, under the title of Les Impostures Innocentes. He died at Amsterdam in 1733. His prints are said to amount to about 1300. The following are the most esteemed:

PICAULT, PIERRE, a French engraver, born at Blois in 1680. He is supposed to have studied under Gerard Audran, as he imitated the style of that master, and copied, on a smaller scale, the celebrated Battles of Alexander, engraved by Audran after le Brun. He also engraved a few portraits, and the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, after Carlo Maratti. He died in the flower of his life, in 1711. He usually signed his plates, P. Picault Blesensis, sculp.

PICCHI, GIORGIO, a painter born at Castel Durante, who flourished in the latter half of the 16th century. He is supposed to have studied under Baroccio, whose style he adopted; but Lanzi thinks he was only an imitator of that master. He executed many works, both in oil and fresco, for the churches in his native city, at Cremona, and at Rimini. Some of these are painted on a vast scale, embracing whole oratories and churches, more distinguished for facility of execution than for correctness of design. Lanzi found it stated in a MS. at Castel Durante, that he was one of the artists employed at Rome in the pontificate of Sixtus V., in decorating the Library of the Vatican, the Scala Santa, and the Palazzo di S. Giovanni.

PICCHIANI, FRANCESCO, called PICCHETTI, an Italian architect, a native of Ferrara, flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He was the son of Bartolomeo P.—also an architect, and probably his instructor—who had erected the church del Monte della Misericordia at Naples. Francesco settled in that city, and gained a high reputation for his talents, as well as for his courteous and pleasing address. The Viceroy Don Pedro Arragona, had employed an architect named Bonaventura Presti to construct a basin for the royal galleys and other vessels; but while the excavations were in progress, the water flowed in so rapidly that Presti was unable to stop it. Accordingly Picchiani was employed, in concert with one Carfero; they removed the water by means of wheels, similar to those used in the process of irrigation, providing a number of fountains for the convenience of the royal vessels. Picchiani also executed the beautiful and majestic avenue leading from the basin to the piazza of the palace, and adorned it with elegant fountains. Among his other works, were the church and monastery of S. Giovanni della Monache, without the Porta Alba; S. Agostino; La Divino Amore; the church and monastery de' Miracoli; and the Monte de' Poveri, in the Strada di Toledo. He died in 1690.

PICCHIANTI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence about 1670. He was taught the rudiments of drawing by Gio. Battista Foggini, a sculptor of little note. He afterwards learned engraving, and executed some plates both with the point and the graver. In conjunction with Lorenzini, Mogalli, and other artists, he was employed in engraving a set of plates from pictures in the Florentine Gallery. Among others are the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Sebastiano del Piombo; after Titian. Cardinal Benetovoglio; after Vandyck. Pope Leo X., with the Cardinals Rossi and Giulio di Medici; after Raffaele.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Madonna della Seggiola; after Raffaele. The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; after An. Caracci. The Tribute Money; after Titian. The Virgin and Infant; do. Abraham sending away Hagar; after P. da Cortona.

PICCINI, GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice in 1617. It is not known by whom he was instructed. He engraved a set of thirty portraits of the principal painters of the Venetian school, for the account of their Lives by Ridolfi, published in 1648. He also engraved a few plates after the Italian masters, among which are Diogenes with his Lantern, and the Holy Family, after P. Liberi; Judith with the Head of Holofernes at her feet, and the Holy Family, after Titian. His plates are executed in a stiff, disagreeable style. He was living in 1669.

PICCINI, GUGLIELMO, a Venetian engraver, the brother of the preceding. He engraved a few portraits and other subjects, in an indifferent style. He had a daughter named Isabella Piccini, whom he instructed in the art. She engraved a set of portraits of the Illustrious Personages of Italy, for the Conchilia Celeste of G. B. Fabri. She afterwards became a nun.

PICCININO, NICOLAO, a Milanese painter, who flourished about 1500. According to Morigia he was a good artist, and was considerably employed in decorating the palaces of the nobility in the Milanese territory, as well as painting for the collections.

PICCIONI, MATTEO, a painter and engraver, born at Ancona, according to Nagler, in 1615. Little is known of him as a painter, save that he flourished at Rome, and was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1655. Lanzi says he was a fellow-student with Gio. Antonio Galli. Bartsch gives a list of twenty-three prints by him, among which are the following:

St. Luke painting the Virgin; after Raffaele. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after P. Veronese. The Holy Family; do. The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; after A. Camassei. The Exposing of Moses in the Waters of the Nile; do.

PICCOLA, NICCOLA, or NICCOLA LAPICCOLA, a Sicilian painter, born at Crotone, in Calabria Ultra, in 1730. He studied under Francesco Mancini, at Rome; acquired considerable reputation; executed several works for the churches in that city; and decorated the cupola of a chapel in the Vatican, so much esteemed that it was afterwards copied in mosaic. He also painted much for the churches in the State, particularly at Veletri. None of his works are particularly specified. He died in 1790.

PICENARDI, CARLO, called THE ELDER, a painter who, according to Zaist, flourished at Cremona about 1600. He was of a patrician family, and one of the favorite pupils of Lodovico Caracci. He executed some works for the churches in his native city, and painted some burlesque histories which gained him considerable applause. He died young.

PICENARDI, CARLO, called THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but, after studying at Rome, he went to Venice, and formed a style of his own, Roman in design, and Venetian in coloring. On his return to Cremona, he executed some works for the churches and public edifices, but painted more for the collections. Lanzi says he was very successful in burlesque histories, in imitation of the elder Picenardi. Zaist says he died aged 70, but he does not give the date. As one of his pictures is dated 1660, it must have happened about 1680.

PICKAERT, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1688. His name is affixed to a set of coarse etchings, representing the Flight of James II. from England. As the word fecit is added to his name, they are probably from his own designs.

PICOLET, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Rotterdam about 1680. He painted portraits and conversations with reputation, and was the first instructor of Adrian vander Werf.

PICOT, VICTOR MARIA, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1744. He went to London about 1770, where he engraved several plates for Boydell. Nagler gives a list of thirty-six prints by him, among which are the following. He died about 1805.

The Four Evangelists; after Rubens. Diana and her Nymphs; do. The Nurse and Child; after Schidone. A young Man holding a Flute; after B. Luti. Apollo holding a Branch of Laurel; after S. Cantarini. A Landscape and Figures; after Zuccarelli. Two Seapieces; after D. Serres. Two Landscapes, Morning and Evening; after Barralett. Several other Subjects; do.

PICOU, ROBERT, a French engraver, who flourished about 1630. His name is sometimes erroneously written Piquot. According to the Abbé Marolles, he was a native of Tours. He went to Italy, and resided some time at Rome. He had the title of Peintre du Roi, though no paintings by him are mentioned. His prints are so scarce that Marolles could only collect three different specimens. Dumesnil describes seven as follows, which are etched with a firm point, with little dots intermixed, and finished with the graver. They are all evidently from his own designs except the last, which is the best.

1. Love asleep; R. Picou, fe. 2. Two Cupids caressing; R. Picou, fe. Romæ. 3. Two Infants; do. 4. Three Infants; R. Picou, fe. 5. The little Wrestlers; R. Picou, fecit. 6. Two couples of Infants; R. P., &c. 7. Jesus Christ delivered to his Enemies. On the margin to the left inscribed Jacobus de poto Bassan pinxit, R. Picou, sculpsit; and on the right, Ciartres formis Cum Priuilegio. In a second impression Ciartres formis is erased, and Mariette Excudit substituted.

PICQUET, JEAN, a French engraver of little note, by whom there is a print representing Juno, Pallas, and Venus, half-length figures. It is inscribed Joan Picquet, ft.

JP PICQUOT, THOMAS, a French engraver, who flourished about 1637. He executed some plates of ornaments for goldsmiths, designs for embroidery, damasking, and the like; also, a portrait of Marin le Bourgeois, painter and valet de chambre to Henry IV. and Louis XIII. His prints are marked with the above monogram.

PICQUOT, HENRY, a French painter and engraver of little note, who flourished about 1640. He is supposed to be a brother of the preceding. He studied painting under Simon Vouet. None of his works as a painter are mentioned, but Dumesnil describes three prints by him, etched in a style resembling that of Michel Dorigny.

PIEL, LOUIS ALEXANDRE, a French architect, born at Lisieux, in 1808. At the age of twenty-four he entered the school of Debret at Paris; and, in 1835, visited Germany to study the Gothic edifices. Having made the tour of that country, he published the result of his observations in L'Européen, a Parisian periodical, under the title of Voyage en Allemagne. This gained him considerable reputation, and he was commissioned, in 1837, to restore the church of S. Nicolas at Nantes, in the Gothic style. Among his other works, was a church in the environs of Pontarlier, and the choir of the Cathedral at Sens. Piel assumed the Dominican habit in 1841, and died in the same year.

PIELLA, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, a painter of Bologna, born in 1661, and died in 1719. It is said that he excelled in painting landscapes and seaports. There are no further particulars of him or his works.

PIEMONT, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1659. He first studied under Martin Saagmolen, an obscure painter; and afterwards with Nicholas Molenaer. He next went to Italy, and resided several years at Rome, where he diligently studied after nature, and filled his portfolio with many choice designs of the picturesque scenery, views, and ruins, in the vicinity of that city, Tivoli, and other places. On his return to Amsterdam, he obtained a high reputation and abundant patronage for his views in Italy, which he executed in a manner strongly resembling that of John Both; and, though his works are much inferior to those of that celebrated master, they are deservedly admired, and admitted into choice collections. He died in 1709.

PIEMONTESE, CESARE, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished at Rome, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. According to Taia, he was an excellent painter of landscapes, in which he attached himself to the manner of Paul Bril.

PIENE, A. DE, a French engraver of little note, who flourished about 1672. He engraved a few plates of portraits and other subjects, for the booksellers.

PIERCE, EDWARD, an English painter, who flourished at London in the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. He is said to have been eminent in history and landscape, and to have excelled in architecture and perspective. Few of his works now remain, the greater part of them having been destroyed in the great fire in London in 1666—probably not a very great loss. Lord Orford attributes to him eight plates of friezes, published in 1640.

PIERI, STEFANO, a Florentine painter, born, according to Zani, in 1513, and a pupil of Battista Naldini. He seems to have passed much of his life at Rome, where he was patronized by the Cardinal Alessandro Medici, by whom he was employed in the church of S. Prassede, where he painted the Annunciation, and some pictures of the Apostles. He executed other works for some of the churches at Rome and Florence, in which latter city he assisted Vasari in the cupola of S. Maria del Fiore. Lanzi says one of his best works is the Sacrifice of Isaac, in the Palazzo Pitti. Another fine picture is the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria in Via, at Rome.

His works are well designed, but Baglioni censures them as being very dry and hard. He died at Rome, in the pontificate of Clement VIII., at the great age of eighty-seven years; Zani says in 1600.

PIERI, ANTONIO DE', called LO ZOTTO or ZOPPO DA VICENZA, a painter of the Venetian school, and a native of Vicenza, who flourished in the first half of the 18th century; one of his pictures is dated 1738. It is not known under whom he studied, but he executed some works for the churches and public edifices at Vicenza and Rovigo, which, according to Lanzi, are more distinguished for brilliancy of coloring and facility of hand, than for correctness of design.

PIERMARINI, GIUSEPPE, an eminent Italian architect, born at Foligno in 1734. His father was a merchant, and intended his son for the same business, which he followed for a number of years; but, as he manifested a strong inclination for mechanics and scientific pursuits, at the recommendation of the celebrated mathematician, Boscovich, his father was induced to send him to Rome, to pursue his studies under proper instruction. Accordingly, about the age of twenty, Piermarini went to Rome, and devoted himself to the study of mathematics and architecture, which last he studied under Poggi, and subsequently under Vanvitelli, who conceived for him a particular regard. He gave the young architect every means of advancement, particularly in the practical department of the art, which was, of course, the most difficult for him to acquire, while yet a student.—On Vanvitelli's going to Naples to erect the palace of Caserta, he took Piermarini with him as his principal assistant in that extensive work. Subsequently, when Vanvitelli was invited to Milan by the Austrian government, for the purpose of altering and embellishing the palace now called the Imperiale, Piermarini accompanied him, which proved the foundation of his fortunes. Meeting with obstacles, and having other engagements that demanded his attention, Vanvitelli contented himself with making some general designs, and explaining his ideas, recommending his pupil as fully competent to supply his place. The work was accordingly transferred to Piermarini, in 1769; and he thus found himself established at Milan, with the title of Architect to the Archduke, and Inspector-General of Buildings. His abilities fully sustained the high recommendation of Vanvitelli, and for thirty years he was constantly employed at Milan. He introduced a more correct taste than had hitherto been observed in the edifices of that city, and erected a large number of fine buildings, besides altering and improving so many others as greatly to enhance the architectural character of the city. His theatre Della Scala is sufficient to prove his great merit. Among his other works are the Palazzi Greppi, Moriggia, Lasedi, Sannazari, Litta, Cusani; a façade of the archbishop's palace; the extensive and magnificent façade of the Palazzo Belgioioso; the Monte di Pietà; the Monte Napoleone; the Luoghi Pii; the Teatro della Canobbiana; and the Porta Orientale. He also conducted many general improvements, as several new streets, the Piazza del Tagliamento, and almost the whole of the new quarter called the Contrada di S. Redegonda; and the public gardens and their buildings. At Monza, he erected the elegant Imperial Villa; the Villa d'Adda at Casano; and the Villa Cusani at Desio. In the latter part of his life, Piermarini withdrew from active labors, and retired to his native place Foligno, where he lived in quietness until his death, in 1808. The Academy of the Brera at Milan erected a monument to his memory.

PIERRE, JEAN BAPTISTE MARIA, a French painter, born at Paris in 1715. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he went to Rome when young, and resided there some years. On his return to Paris, he distinguished himself as a painter of history, and executed several works for the churches and public edifices, which gained him great reputation. He was appointed painter to the King, and was elected a member of the Academy at Paris. One of his greatest works was the ceiling of the chapel of the Virgin, in the church of S. Sulpice, which has been engraved by Nicholas Dupuis. He also etched a few spirited plates from his own designs and others. He died in 1789.

PIERSON, CHRISTOPHER, a Dutch historical and portrait painter, born at the Hague in 1631. He studied under Bartholomew Meyburg, with whom he traveled into Germany. Happening to visit the Swedish camp, he was engaged by General Wrangel to paint his portrait, and those of the principal officers of the army. These performances were so much admired for their striking resemblance, clearness of coloring, relief, and neatness of pencil, that the general endeavored to persuade him to go to the court of Sweden. He, however, returned to his own country, and settled at Gouda, where he found abundant employment, and acquired both reputation and riches. Observing that the pictures of Leemans, which represented dead game, and sporting apparatus, as guns, pouches, powder-horns, nets, bird-calls, &c., were greatly admired, and brought high prices, he applied himself entirely to that branch, with such success that he not only surpassed Leemans, but has scarcely been equalled by any other master. These subjects he usually painted on a white ground, and gave them such a just degree of light and shadow as produced perfect illusion, and made every object seem to stand out in relief from the canvass. He died at Gouda, in 1714.

PIET, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1608. He engraved the plates for a work entitled, Le Maniement d'Armes de Nassau, &c., by Adam V. Brien, published in 1608. They are indifferently executed.

PIETERS, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1667. After studying the art under Peter Eyckens, he went to England in 1685, and was employed by Sir Godfrey Kneller to paint the back-grounds and draperies of his portraits, in whose service he continued many years. He is said to have painted history with reputation, and to have excelled in copying Rubens; but the above facts render these statements very doubtful. He died in London in 1727.

PIETERS. Under this head are mentioned, for some unknown reason, the three sons of Peter Aertsen, commonly called Peter the Long, viz., Peter, Arnold, and Dirk, or Theodore. They were instructed by their father, and were good portrait painters. Peter was born at Haerlem in 1541, and died at Amsterdam in 1603. Arnold is said to have excelled in this branch; he died at Amsterdam in 1614. Theodore went to France, and died at Fontainebleau in 1602. See Peter Aertsen.

PIGALLE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a celebrated French sculptor, the son of a carpenter, was born at Paris in 1714. He first studied under Robert le Lorrain, and subsequently in the school of Lemoyne. He visited Rome, and studied for three years in that city; after which he returned to Paris. His statue of Mercury first brought him into public notice, being a most admirable work, in the antique style, full of ideal beauty. A statue of the Virgin, which he executed for the Invalides, gained him the patronage of the Minister Argenson, who commissioned him to execute a statue of Louis XV. Pigalle was also much employed by Madame de Pompadour, for whom he executed a statue of herself, one of Silence, and a fine group of Friendship and Love. King Louis ordered of him a large statue of the Mercury, with a Venus to accompany it, and presented the group to King Frederick the Great of Prussia. The latter statue gained the artist admission to the Academy; and the group is now at Sans Souci. Pigalle was considered one of the best sculptors of the last century. His manner in his earlier works is full of ideal beauty; but he subsequently forsook the antique style, and adhered to truth of resemblance. His principal work at Paris, is the tomb of Comte d'Harcourt, in the church of Notre Dame. Among his smaller productions, a figure of a Child holding a Cage from which a bird has escaped, was greatly admired for its animation, innocence, and simplicity. He completed and erected the bronze equestrian statue of Louis XV., commenced by Bouchardon. His master-piece, however, is the grand allegorical monument in memory of Mareschal Saxe, in the church of S. Thomas at Strasburg, commenced by order of Louis XV., in 1765, and finished in 1776. It is a group of five figures against a pyramid, which proclaims the glory of the warrior, who is represented in his own costume, and crowned with laurel, entering a tomb; on one side is Hercules mourning; on the other, Death as a skeleton; an impersonation of France is endeavoring to restrain the Marshal and avert Death; a weeping Genius is also in attendance, with an inverted torch, and many military trophies are introduced as accessories. The figure of the Marshal is very elaborately modelled, and the whole work has been several times engraved. In 1744, Pigalle was chosen an academician; was assistant-professor in 1745; professor in 1752; received the Cordon of St. Michael in 1769; was assistant-rector of the Academy in 1770; rector in 1777; and chancellor in 1785, in which year he died.

PIGNÉ, NICOLAS, a French engraver, born at Chalons in 1690. He was a pupil of Bernard Picart, and is said to have visited England, where he published ninety heads from the Cartoons, in 1722. Among his other plates are, a portrait of Richard Fiddes, D. D., prefixed to his Divinity, dated 1718; the Woman of Canaan kneeling at the feet of Christ, after Ann. Caracci; and the Virgin, with the Infant asleep in a cradle, St. John and four Angels, engraved for the Crozat Collection, after F. Trevisani.

PIGNONE, SIMONE, a painter born at Florence, according to Oretti, in 1614. He first studied with Fabrizio Boschi; next with Passignano, and afterwards with Francesco Furini, whose manner he adopted, though he improved his coloring by visiting Venice and studying the works of the great Venetian masters, particularly those of Titian and Tintoretto. On his return to Florence, he acquired distinction, and executed several works for the churches, which were greatly admired for the delicacy and beauty of the coloring, especially in the naked parts. The most esteemed of these are, St. Michael discomfiting the rebel Angels, in the Nunziata, St. Louis, King of France, distributing his wealth to the Poor, in S. Felicita, and an altar-piece at Monte Oliveto. His most admired works are sacred subjects of small size, to be found in the collections of the nobility. There are also some of his pictures in the Florentine Gallery. He was fond of painting mythological subjects, as their peculiar character gave him a fine chance of displaying his skill in the flesh tints, which are very tender and seductive. He sometimes treated them with unwarrantable licentiousness, and is said to have deeply lamented at his death, that he had prostituted his pencil to unworthy objects. Lanzi says he was the best of all Furini's numerous scholars. Carlo Maratti esteemed Gabbiani and Pignone only, among all the Florentine painters of the time. He died in 1698.

PIKLER, JOHN ANTHONY, a reputable engraver on precious stones, was born at Brixen, in the Tyrol, in 1700. He acquired a knowledge of his art at Naples, and attained a high reputation in that city, being patronized by the King and Queen, as well as distinguished personages of the court. In 1743 he settled at Rome, and executed a number of works, among which were a head of Homer in cornelian, and other copies from the antique, closely resembling ancient gems. He died in 1779.

PIKLER, CAV. GIOVANNI, an engraver on precious stones, was the son of the preceding, born at Naples in 1734. He studied design under Domenico Corvi, and copied the antiques at Rome with great assiduity. At the age of fourteen he executed a gem, representing Hercules vanquishing the Nemean Lion, which was much admired by the connoisseurs, and gained him great reputation and encouragement. In 1769, while the Emperor Joseph II. was at Rome, Pikler took an opportunity to design his portrait, and afterwards executed it in cameo. The monarch was so highly pleased with the work, that he appointed Pikler a cavalier, and invited him to Vienna. For some unknown reason, the artist declined this honor. He was greatly patronized, and could scarcely fulfil his commissions. Among them are many copies of ancient gems, statues, and bas-reliefs. He repeated twelve times his work representing Leander swimming towards a tower where Hero is holding a lamp; and also his Achilles dragging the body of Hector round the walls of Troy. Many of his gems probably pass for genuine antiques; and he is said to have sold for 100 sequins to the Cavaliere d'Azara, a head of Sappho, as an ancient work, which was in reality his own execution. Pikler commenced two works relating to art, but was prevented by death from completing them. He died in 1791.

PILAJA, PAOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Rome from 1727 to 1747. He executed a set of plates for a book entitled Storia di Volsena, by the Abate Adami, with a portrait of the author, published at Rome in 1737. He also engraved a few other subjects, among which are the following:

The Portrait of Pope Benedict XIII.; after Brughi. The Martyrdom of St Fedolo; after S. Conca. A Miracle wrought by S. Thoribio; do. St Liberale, with two Children; do. The Statue of the Prophet Elias; after the sculpture by Ag. Cornachini, in St. Peter's at Rome.

PILES, ROGER DE. a French painter and writer on art, born at Clameci in 1635. He had a thorough knowledge of art, though he seems to have practised painting more for recreation than as a profession. He was tutor to the son of President Amelot, and afterwards accompanied him as secretary in several embassies. He had a good taste in coloring, was a master in chiaro-scuro, and possessed a remarkable talent for imitation. Rubens was his pictorial idol. He painted some portraits, among which were those of Boileau and Madame Dacier. He is better known as the author of several works on the lives of the most eminent painters, reflections on their works, &c. He died in 1709.

PILGRIM, JOHN ULRIC, an old engraver on wood, who is supposed to be the inventor of engraving in chiaroscuro. Little is known of him, except a few prints which are marked with two pilgrims' staves crossed between the initials, Jo. V., as above; but whether these staves were used by him in allusion to his name is not satisfactorily ascertained. The French call him Le Maître aux bourdons Croisés. He must not be confounded with Ulderico Hans, or Hans Ulric of the Italians, who published the first illustrated book in Italy at Rome, in 1467. (See page xiii.) Bartsch (P. G. tom. vii.) describes the following ten prints by him.

1. Christ on the Cross, with the Magdalene kneeling at the foot, and the Virgin and St. John standing, one on each side.
2. The Virgin seated in a Garden, with the Infant on her knees.
3. The Virgin, half-length, with the Infant in her Arms.
4. St. Jerome in the Desert, with a book in one hand, and a stone in the other.
5. St. Sebastian tied to a Tree.
6. A Death's head seen in front, in a niche, with the inscription, Mundanae foelicitatis gloria.
7. Thisbe and the dead body of Pyramus, with an inscription, Quid Venus in venis possit, &c.
8. Orpheus charming the Brutes; inscription, Orpheus vates.
9. Alcon, a famous Archer of Crete, delivering his Son from a monstrous Serpent.
10. A Warrior on horseback, armed cap-à-pie, accompanied by a Halberdier on foot.

PILKINGTON, SIR WM., an English amateur painter, born in 1776. He practised the art with great assiduity, constantly devoting a certain portion of his time to its prosecution. He chiefly excelled in landscapes, forming his style in a great measure on that of Richard Wilson, and his works exhibit breadth and truthfulness of effect, combined with depth and transparency of coloring. He died in 1850.

PILLEMENT, JEAN, a French painter, who went to London about 1760, where he resided many years, and acquired considerable reputation for his drawings of landscapes and other subjects in water or body colors, many of which were engraved by the eminent engravers of the time, as Woollett, Mason, Elliot, Canot, Ravenet, and others. He also painted landscapes in oil, but these were very inferior to his water-color drawings. It is said that he died at Lyons about 1808, at the age of 80 years.

PILLEMENT, VICTOR, a reputable French engraver, the son of Jean P., was born at Vienna in 1767. He was principally distinguished for his plates of landscapes, and in 1801 he gained the first prize of the French Academy. There are many of his engravings in Robillard's Galerie du Musée; Melling's Rives du Bosphore; Denon's Voyage en Egypte; also a larger work entitled Œdipe à Colone, after Valenciennes; and many plates after Bourgeois. Pillement died at Paris in 1814.

PILON, GERMAIN, a celebrated French sculptor of the 16th century, to whom, with Jean Goujon, the French writers ascribe the honor of the restoration of sculpture in France, was born at Loué, a small village near Mans. The date of his birth is not known; it was probably about 1520. There are very few facts ascertained concerning this artist. His father was a sculptor of little note, and instructed Pilon in the elements of the art. He executed a number of works in the vicinity of his native place, which evince his natural abilities; among them are the statues which adorn the convent of Soulesmes, near Sable, in Maine, known as the Saints of Soulesmes; also a statue of St. Bernard, in the church of Epau, near Mans. About the year 1550, he visited Paris, where Goujon was then in reputation. He became the emulator of that artist, and executed many works for the churches of Paris, also various monuments in the province of Normandy. Soon after attaining some reputation, he was commissioned to execute the mausoleum of Guillaume Langei du Bellay, in the cathedral at Mans. The sculptures which adorn this work, are much in the style of the antique. Pilon was the favorite sculptor of Henry II., and there are still many works at Paris, executed by him in that reign. Catherine de Medicis wishing to erect a monument to that monarch, Philibert de Lorme made the designs, and the execution was entrusted to Pilon, who seemed to surpass himself. The statues of Henry the II. and his queen were draped in robes of state; four bas-reliefs representing Faith, Hope, Charity, and Good Works, sufficiently attest his talent. Charity is represented entirely nude, having given all her clothing to the poor; with two infants suckling at her breasts. All the sculptures in this work are deserving of praise, but the reclining statues of Francis II., and Catherine de Medicis, are considered the best. The latter is represented as divested of drapery; both works are said to combine the vigor of Michael Angelo with the grace of Primaticcio: doubtless too high praise. The master-piece of Pilon, is his group of the Three Graces, on a triangular pedestal, supporting on their heads an Urn, which contains the hearts of Henry and Catherine. This admirable work was sculptured from a single block of marble, and is hardly surpassed for the ease and lightness of its draperies, in which Pilon especially excelled; it was formerly in the convent church of the Celestines, but is now at the Louvre, in the Musée des Sculptures de la Renaissance. There are also other works extant by Pilon, in clay, stone, alabaster, bronze, and marble. The date of his death is uncertain. For a long time it was supposed he died about 1606, on account of an epitaph to his memory, by President Maynard, published in that year; but the indefatigable le Noir, after all his researches, has discovered no work by Pilon, after the year 1590.

PILOTTO, GIROLAMO, a Venetian painter, who flourished about 1600. According to Zanotti, he studied under the younger Palma, whose style he closely imitated. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed some works for the churches at Venice and elsewhere. His most celebrated performance, is a large picture in the saloon of the Ducal Palace at Venice, representing the Marriage of the Adriatic, which is highly extolled by Orlandi, though others prefer his San Biagio, at the great altar of the Fraglia, at Rovigo, a picture displaying great sweetness of manner. He lived to an advanced age, and died, according to Zani, in 1649.

PILSEN, FRANCIS, a Flemish painter and engraver, said to have been born at Ghent about 1676, though probably at a later period, as there is a print by him dated 1770. He studied painting and engraving under Robert van Audenarde. Little is known of him as a painter, but there are a few prints by him, among which are the following: the Virgin and infant Jesus, the Conversion of St. Bavon, and the Judgment of Midas; after Rubens. St. Francis; do.; signed F. Pilsen, sculp. G. 1770. The Martyrdom of St. Blaize; after G. de Crayer.

PINACCI, GIOSEFFO, a painter of Siena, born in 1642. He first studied under Livio Mehus at Florence, and afterwards with Borgognone. According to Orlandi, he did not follow the manner of either of his masters. He devoted himself mostly to portraits, in which branch he acquired distinction, and made a considerable fortune. He was employed at the court of Carpio, Viceroy of Naples, and afterwards by the Grand Duke of Florence, where there are several of his works. He had an excellent knowledge of the pencilling of the old masters, which enabled him to imitate them very successfully. He was living in 1718.

PINAGIER, THOMAS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1616, and died there in 1653. Little is known of him; he is said to have been a good painter of landscapes.

PINAIGRIER, ROBERT, a French painter on glass, supposed to have been a native of Tours, born about 1490. He executed many works for various churches of France, among which were those in S. Hilaire at Chartres; and at Paris, in the churches of S. Victor, S. Jacques de la Boucherie, the Hospice des Enfants Rouges, S. Gervais, and S. Mederic. Most of his works have been destroyed; but in the Chapelle de la Vierge, at Paris, is preserved a History of the Virgin by him, characterized by beautiful heads, splendid coloring, and vigorous execution. Some of his works in the church of S. Mederic are also preserved. Pinaigrier left three sons—Nicolas, Jean, and Louis; of whom the first was most distinguished. At Chartres, in the church of S. Aignan, there are by him two glass paintings, representing Christ bearing the Cross, and the Last Judgment. There was a grandson of Robert P., named Nicolas, who adorned several Parisian churches with his works in the same art, from 1618 to 1635.

PINAS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1597, according to Descamps; though Nagler says in 1570. After learning the rudiments of the art at home, he went in company with Peter Lastman to Italy, where he studied some years. On returning to his native country, he became eminent as a painter of history, portraits, and landscapes. The most esteemed of his historical works is a picture in the great church at Haerlem, representing Joseph sold by his Brethren. His style of coloring was vigorous, but rather inclining too much to the deep brown or blackish tints, in which manner he had many admirers, and some imagine that even Rembrandt imitated him in that respect. He died in 1660.

PINAS, JACOB, was a younger brother of the preceding, born at Haerlem in 1599. He had not the advantage of studying in Italy, but after the return of John Pinas, he received considerable advantage from his instruction, and painted landscapes with reputation. He died at Amsterdam in 1659.

PINCHARD, P., an engraver, probably a Frenchman, who resided at Genoa about 1687, where he engraved some book plates.

PINE, JOHN, an English designer and engraver, to whom we are indebted for several splendid and interesting works, the principal of which are the Ceremonies used at the Revival of the Order of the Bath by George I.; the prints from the tapes try in the House of Lords, representing the destruction of the Spanish Armada; a superb edition of Horace, the text engraved, and illustrated with ancient bas-reliefs and gems; the Pastorals and Georgics of Virgil, ornamented in a similar manner, with a printed type. The last were published by his son, after his death, which happened in 1756. He was a man of letters; and designed and engraved many of the plates for the above works. He also engraved a few portraits among which is one of himself, and another of Garrick.

PINE, ROBERT EDGE, was the son of the preceding, born in 1742. It is not known by whom he was instructed, though Pilkington says by his father, who died, according to his statement, when Pine was fourteen years old. Nagler says he was born in 1730, and died in 1795. In 1760 and 1762, he drew the prizes from the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts, &c., for the best historical designs. He painted portraits with some reputation, and in 1782 exhibited a series of pictures of scenes from Shakspeare, some of which were engraved by McArdell, V. Green, C. Watson, and others. He afterwards went to America, where he died in 1790.

PINEDA. See PEREZ.

PINELLI, ANTONIA BERTUCCI, a Bolognese paintress, a favorite scholar of Lodovico Caracci, who admired her, says Lanzi, for her singular modesty and attachment to art. She executed several works for the churches, among which were the Guardian Angel, in S. Tommaso; and two altar-pieces of St. James and St. Philip, in the churches dedicated to those Saints. But her most celebrated performance is a picture of St. John the Evangelist, in the Nunziata, in which she introduced her own portrait with a bonnet, and that of her husband. It was painted from the design of her instructor. She also painted cabinet pictures of sacred subjects, which were admired. Her maiden name was Pinelli, and she married Gio. Battista Bertucci. She died, according to Malvasia and Zani, in 1644, though others say in 1640.

PINELLI, BARTOLOMEO, a modern Italian painter, designer, and engraver, who resided chiefly at Rome, and distinguished himself for his numerous designs and etchings of Roman history, Italian manners and costumes, and views of the environs of Rome, with groups of Banditti, which in all amount to upwards of two hundred prints, besides numerous other subjects. The works by which he is best known to foreigners, are Istoria degli Imperatori inventata ed incisa in cento rami (100 plates); Raccolta di Costumi pittoreschi; Nuova Raccolta di cinquanta Costumi pittoreschi (50 plates); Istoria Greca (100 etchings); Istoria Romana (152 etchings). He also designed and etched many other plates of illustrations to Virgil, Dante, and Tasso. He engraved the frescos painted by Pinturicchio in the dome of S. Maria Maggiore; the Life and Miracles of St. Francis di Paula, after Marco da Faenza and others; the Friezes by Giulio Romano, in the Farnesina; also, Picturesque Views of Tivoli, &c. His plates are etched in a bold and free style, and there is great spirit and vivacity in his figures. His drawings in chalk and water-colors are much esteemed for beauty of design and spirited execution. His life was one of extraordinary industry. He died at Rome in 1835.

PINI, EUGENIO, a painter of Udine, born about 1600. It is not known under whom he studied, but he executed many works for the churches in his native city, and in the Venetian state, which Lanzi says show an artist "extremely diligent and skilled in every office of a painter, if we except, perhaps, his want of a more perfect harmony of tints." The Abate Boni pronounces his Repose in Egypt in the Cathedral of Palma, and his San Antonio in that of Gemona, noble productions, and among his best works. He was living in 1655.

PINI, PAOLO, a painter born at Lucca, who, according to Orlandi, flourished shortly after the Caracci, and excelled in painting perspective and architectural pieces, with small figures, for the collections. Lanzi says he has seen only one of his pieces, representing a history of Rahab, in the church of S. Maria di Campagna at Piacenza; in which the architecture is very fine, the figures light, and touched with a spirited pencil.

PINO, MARCO DA, also called MARCO DA SIENA, an eminent painter and architect, born at Siena about 1520. He seems to have studied under a number of masters. According to Baglioni, he received his first instruction from Domenico Beccafumi, and afterwards studied under Daniello da Volterra. Baldinucci places him among the disciples of Baldassare Peruzzi. It is, however, agreed that he completed his studies at Rome, where Lomazzo states he received instruction from Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. Lanzi says he studied with Pierino del Vaga, and assisted him in his cartoons, and that he was a favorite with Michael Angelo, but not his scholar, as some have asserted; though doubtless he benefitted from his friendly instructions. At all events, he made the works of Angelo his model. Lanzi says: "Of his merits as a painter, I believe I do not err when I say that, among the followers of Michael Angelo, there is none whose design is less extravagant, and whose color is more vigorous." He painted some pictures for the churches at Rome, which gained him considerable reputation, the most esteemed of which is a Dead Christ, in S. Maria di Araceli. But the principal theatre of his fame was Naples, where he settled in 1560, and distinguished himself by many works which he executed for the principal churches and public edifices in that city, and in other parts of the kingdom. The most celebrated of these is the Descent from the Cross, in S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, which he repeated on several occasions, with many variations. In the same church is an admired picture of the Annunciation. Other celebrated works are the Circumcision, in the Gesù Vecchio, into which he is said to have introduced the portraits of himself and wife; and the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Severino. He enriched many of his pictures with noble architecture. He was greatly respected at Naples, and many favors were conferred upon him. He instructed many pupils, the most celebrated of whom was Gio. Angelo Criscuolo.

Marco da Pino practised architecture at Naples. He remodernized the church of La Trinità di Palazzo, and erected the church and college del Gesù Vecchio, which is now used as the university of Naples. It is a well arranged and magnificent edifice, and gained for him the reputation of an able and talented architect. He was also distinguished for his literary labors for the promotion of art, and published a large work upon architecture, as well as a collection of the lives of Neapolitan artists. He died at Naples in 1587.

PINO, PAOLO, a Venetian painter, whose history is generally confounded with that of Paolo Pini, which see. Lanzi says this similarity of names has frequently led authors into errors. He painted a picture of the Virgin with four Saints, for the church of S. Francesco at Padua, in a style between that of the moderns and the Bellini, to which he affixed his name, Paulus Pinus, Ven. 1565. In the castle of Noale, in the territory of Trivigi, he adorned the public hall, both interior and exterior; and that part of it where the judges are accustomed to hear causes and decide differences, with historical subjects adapted to the place. "Whoever is acquainted with the 'Dialogue on Painting,' published by this professor as early as 1548, where in the dedication he professes himself a Venetian, and whoever has seen his works, will be in no danger of confounding him with Paolo Pini of Lucca, who studied under the Caracci."

PINO, DA MESSINA. See MESSINA.

PINSON, NICOLAS. This painter was born at Valence, in the department of Drome, about 1640. He studied at Rome, where he remained some time, and imitated the style of P. da Cortona. Little is known of his history or works. There was a picture by him of Tobit and the Angel, in the collection of Boyer d'Aguilles, engraved by Coelmans. Pinson also etched two prints, now extremely rare, representing a Dead Christ, marked N. P. In. f.

and the Assumption of the Virgin; marked N. Pinson. Inuent. et Sculp.

PINSSIO, SEBASTIAN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1721. Little is known of him, except that he engraved a few portraits and other subjects.

PINTELLI, BACCIO, surnamed URBINAS, a reputable Italian architect, flourished at Rome from 1471 to 1484, during the pontificate of Sixtus IV. He was appointed principal architect to that pontiff, and in 1473 erected the Sistine chapel, which possesses little architectural interest, being principally distinguished for the grand works of art with which it is decorated. The style of Pintelli resembles that of Brunelleschi, and his designs have some characteristics of the previously pointed style of architecture. His works are well constructed, as appears from the cupola of S. Agostino and Ponte Sisto, still in perfect preservation. From 1472 to 1477, he erected the church and convent of S. Maria del Popolo; a beautiful chapel in that edifice for Domenico della Rovere, nephew of Sixtus IV.; a palace for the same at the Borgo Vecchio; and the Old Library of the Vatican. He also built the Hospital of S. Spirito in Sassia; the Ponte Sisto over the Tiber; the churches S. Pietro in Vinculis; S. Agostino; S. Maria della Pace; S. Apostoli (since rebuilt); and probably designed S. Jacopo and S. Pietro in Montorio. In 1480, Pintelli strengthened the celebrated church and convent of S. Francesco di Assisi, by erecting enormous buttresses against the northern walls.

According to the discoveries of Dr. Gaye, Pintelli left Rome after the death of Sixtus IV., in 1484, and went to Urbino, for the purpose of finishing the Ducal palace of Urbino, upon which Lucianus Lauranna had been employed from 1468 to 1483, for Federigo II., Duke of Urbino. It is supposed that he became a citizen of that place, as he assumed the surname of Urbinas. In 1491, he erected the church of S. Maria della Grazie at Urbino, for the Duke Giovanni della Rovere. The time of his death is not recorded.

PINTURICCHIO, BERNARDINO, a painter born at Perugia in 1454. He studied under Pietro Perugino, and assisted him in many of his principal works, both at Rome and Perugia. He was one of the most distinguished artists of his time, as is evident from the fact that he was selected by the Cardinal Francesco Piccolomini, who soon afterwards became Pope Pius III., to decorate the Sacristy of the Cathedral of Siena, and the chapel of his family, "with works of such magnitude," says Lanzi, in his life of Raffaele, "as perhaps had never before entrusted to a single master." Yet never was a painter so unfortunate in his reputation, and every author, from Vasari to Lanzi, sacrifices his just fame to Raffaele, "the god of their idolatry." Vasari calls him "a pretty good painter." Lanzi is disposed to do him justice, and gives him more credit than any other author; therefore we will give his own account. Speaking of the second epoch of the Sieneſe school, he says that the Cardinal Francesco Piccolomini, a native of Siena, was the most distinguished patron and promoter of the Sieneſe school at that period. "For the purpose of decorating the sacristy of the cathedral, and the chapel of his family with various pictures from the Life of Pius II., he invited Pinturicchio to Siena. This artist carried along with him other scholars of Perugino, and even Raffaele himself, who is reported to have designed either wholly, or in a great measure, those historical pictures." Let it be recollected that this was about 1500; Pinturicchio was forty-six years old. "Having painted with so much applause at Rome," says our author in another place, "before Raffaele was born," who was a youth of seventeen, unknown at that time in the history of art. In his life of Pinturicchio he says, "Bernardino Pinturicchio, the pupil and assistant of Perugino in Perugia and in Rome, was a painter little valued by Vasari, who has not allowed him his full share of merit. He has not the style of design of his master, and retains more than is consistent with his age, the ornaments of gold in his draperies; but he is magnificent in his edifices, spirited in his countenances, and extremely natural in everything he introduces into his composition. As he was on familiar footing with Raffaele, with whom he painted at Siena, he has imitated his grace in several figures, as in his picture of S. Lorenzo, in the church of the Francescani di Spello, in which there is a small St. John the Baptist, thought by some to be by Raffaele himself. He was very successful in arabesques and in perspective, in which he was the first to represent cities in the ornaments of his fresco painting, as in an apartment in the Vatican, where, in his landscapes, he introduced views of the principal cities of Italy. In many of his paintings, he retained the ancient custom of making a part of his decorations of stucco, as the arches, a custom observed in the Milanese school till the time of Gaudenzio. Rome possesses some of his works, particularly in the Vatican and in Aracoeli. There are three good pictures by him in the chapel of the Holy Sacrament, in the cathedral of Spello, consisting of three subjects from the Life of Christ—The Annunciation, the Nativity, and Christ disputing with the Doctors, the best of the three. In one of these he introduced his own portrait. But his best works are in the magnificent sacristy of the cathedral of Siena. They consist of ten historical subjects, containing the most memorable passages in the life of Pius II., and on the outside is the eleventh, representing the Coronation of Pius III., by whom this work was ordered." And yet, in his life of Raffaele, Lanzi gives the glory of these works to that inimitable master, as though he had not accomplished enough of himself to immortalize his name.* "Raffaele now became the admiration of his master and his fellow scholars; and about this time Pinturicchio, after having painted with so much applause at Rome before Raffaele was born, aspired to become, as it were, his scholar, in the great works at Siena.† He did not possess a genius sufficient-* Raffaele, at the age of seventeen, had just executed a picture representing the Holy Family, in which the Virgin is lifting a Veil from the infant Jesus, who is sleeping in his cradle; which, says Lanzi, must have been the first attempt of the design which he finished at a more mature age.

† Mark the inconsistency in these assertions. "The Cardinal Piccolomini was the most distinguished patron and promoter of the fine arts at Siena," but only as an instrument of blazoning to the world his own illustrious house. He did not employ the artists of his own city, but sought a foreigner whom he had known at Rome, distinguished before Raffaele was born, and whom he judged most competent to conduct those great works. Raffaele did not acquire any distinction till eight or nine years afterwards, when he was invited to Rome by Julius ly elevated for the sublime composition which the place required; nor had Perugino sufficient fertility or power of conception equal to so novel an undertaking. It was intended to represent the life and actions of Silvius Piccolomini, afterwards Pope Pius II.; the embassies to various princes entrusted to him by the Council of Constance, and by Felix, the anti-pope, to Frederick III, who conferred on him the laurel crown; and also, the various embassies which he undertook for Frederick himself to Pope Eugenius IV., and afterwards to Callistus IV., who created him a cardinal. His subsequent exaltation to the papacy, and the most remarkable events of his reign were also to be represented; the canonization of St. Catherine; his attendance on the Council of Mantua, where he was received in a princely manner by the Duke; and finally, his death, and the removal of his body from Ancona to Rome. Never, perhaps, was an undertaking of such magnitude entrusted to a single master.* The art itself had not yet attempted any great flight. The principal figures generally stood isolated, as Pietro exhibited them at Perugia, without aiming at composition. In consequence of this, the proportions were seldom true, nor did the artists depart much from sacred subjects, the frequent repetition of which had already opened the way to plagiarism. Historical subjects of this nature were new to Raffaele, and to him, unaccustomed to reside in a metropolis, it must have been most difficult in painting so many as eleven pictures to imitate the splendor of the different courts, and the manners of all Europe, varying the composition agreeably to the occasion; nevertheless, being conducted by his friend to Siena, he made the sketches and cartoons of all these subjects, says Vasari, in his life of Pinturicchio; and that he made the whole is the common report at Siena.† In the Life of Raffaele, Vasari states that he made some of the designs and cartoons for these works, and that the reason for his not continuing them was his haste to proceed to Florence, to see the cartoons of da Vinci and Buonarrotti. But I am more inclined to the first statement than the subsequent one. In April, 1503, Raffaele was employed in the Library, as is proved by the will of Cardinal Francesco Piccolomini. While the Library was yet unfinished, Piccolomini was elected Pope, and his coronation following on the 8th of October, Pinturicchio commemorated the event‡ on the outside of the Li-

II., not for any reputation he had then acquired, but at the instigation of Bramante, the famous architect of St. Peter's, who was Raffaele's uncle. There is good reason to believe, too, that Raffaele's education at this time was very defective, and entirely unqualified him for any great historical composition. He had not been even in Florence, nor thought of any other style than that of Perugino. Lanzi himself, speaking of his literary attainments, and of a letter he wrote in 1508, requesting the Duke of Urbino to use his influence with the Gonfaloniere Soderini, to give him a commission in the Palazzo Pubblico at Florence, says, "if we were to judge from his letter just cited, now in the Museo Borgia, we might consider him grossly illiterate."

* Many grand historical works had been painted before the time of Raffaele.

† Vasari had no just authority for making this assertion, further than supposition; common report, too, at Siena, is a very natural one—the pride of possessing works by so great a master.

‡ This work was executed at the express command of Cardinal Piccolomini, then elevated to the papacy under the title of Pius III.

brary, in the part opposite to the duomo. Bottari remarks that in this façade we may detect not only the design, but in many of the heads the coloring of Raffaele. It appears probable, therefore, that he remained to complete the works, the last subject of which, might perhaps be finished in the following year, in 1504, when he departed for Florence.* We may here observe, that this work, which has maintained its color so well, that it appears almost of recent execution, confers great honor on an artist of twenty years of age, as we do not find a composition of such magnitude in the passage from ancient to modern art, conceived by any single painter.† So that, if Raffaele stood not entirely alone in this work, the best part of it must be assigned to him, since Pinturicchio himself was improving at this time, and the works which he afterwards executed at Spello and Siena, incline more to the modern, than any he had before done; which will justify the conclusion that Raffaele had already, at that early age, far outstripped his master; his contours being more full, his composition more rich and free, accompanied by a more ornamental and grander style, and an ability unlimited, capable of embracing every subject presented to him."

It is evident that the kindness of Pinturicchio to Raffaele, and the discernment which he evinced in selecting him as one of his assistants, has acted most injuriously to his reputation. If Raffaele did not altogether paint the picture, he is said to have made the designs, and if authors are compelled to allow Pinturicchio a large share in the execution, they select the most graceful figures and attribute them to Raffaele. As if this absurdity and gross injustice were not sufficient, they must blacken his fair fame, by making him a miser, and confirming his avarice by a ridiculous story of the cause of his death. He was employed, say they, to paint an altar-piece for the Franciscans at Siena, and the monks had taken everything out from an apartment for his better accommodation, except an old chest, which appeared so fragile that they judged it proper not to displace it. But Pinturicchio insisting on its removal, it was broken in pieces in the attempt, when, mirabile dictu, there fell out 500 ducats, which had been secreted in the chest many years. The poor artist was so mortified at missing the opportunity of finding the treasure, and appropriating it to himself, that he fell sick, and died soon afterwards of grief.

PINUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman painter, who

* This is contrary to the express declaration of Vasari, who says Raffaele hastened to Florence before the works were completed, to see "the cartoons of Michael Angelo and Leonardo da Vinci, which had been prepared in competition by those two great artists, in consequence of the prize offered by the city of Florence." These cartoons were then being publicly exhibited in that city, and attracted the greatest interest. If the advocates of Raffaele admit that Pinturicchio painted the last and the most beautiful of the series, they must give the glory of the whole to him.

† Michael Angelo was a great inventor; Raffaele a great composer, and what Fuseli terms a bold adopter. He seized upon the ideas and forms of others, and introduced them into his designs with such matchless skill as made them all his own; whereas the same course, pursued by any other master, would sink his name into plagiarism. Instance his celebrated cartoons, in which he copied the ancient Sacrifice of Masaccio into the cartoon of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra; also his grotesques, adopted from the antique.

flourished in the time of Vespasian, and was employed by him in concert with Accius Priscus, to execute some works in the Temple of Virtue and Honor.

PINZ, or PINTZ, JOHN GEORGE, a German engraver, born at Augsburg in 1697, and died there in 1767. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he executed a variety of prints, in the style of those which ornament the numerous publications of Vander Aa. Among others, he engraved an emblematical plate, after P. Decker, in honor of the King of France, entitled Gallus und Germanus.

PIO, GIOVANNINO DEL. See BONATTI.

PIOLA, GIOVANNI GREGORIO, a Genoese painter, born in 1583. According to Soprani, he excelled in miniatures, or small cabinet pictures. He went to France, and died at Marseilles in 1625.

PIOLA, PIETRO FRANCESCO, a painter of Genoa, born in 1565. He was of the same family as the preceding, and had the reputation of being one of the best imitators of Cambiaso. He died young in 1600.

PIOLA, PELLEGRINO, or PELLEGRINO, a painter born at Genoa in 1617. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he studied diligently the works of the best masters, and selected from them what was most beautiful. Lanzi says, "he then tried a wider flight, and pursued it with great diligence, and a taste which charms us; and whatever style he adopted, he seems to have grown grey in it. A Madonna by him, in the great collection of the Marchese Brignole, was considered by Franceschini an original of Andrea del Sarto; his S. Eligio was by Mengs ascribed to Lodovico Caracci." He possessed wonderful talents, a keen perception of the beautiful, and aspired to the highest ranks of the art; he would have reached a transcendent rank, had he lived to mature his faculties. He was assassinated by an unknown hand, supposed a jealous rival, in 1640, aged twenty-three years.

PIOLA, DOMENICO, was the younger brother of Pellegrino P., born at Genoa in 1628. He is said to have received his first instruction from his brother, which must have been at a very tender age; and he afterwards studied under Gio. Domenico Capellini. He associated himself with Valerio Castelli, and in conjunction with that master, executed some works for the churches and public edifices of Genoa. He next imitated Castiglione, and finally adopted a style of his own, in which he imitated that of Pietro da Cortona, in the lustre of his coloring, the splendor of his composition, and his uncommon facility of hand. Lanzi says, "he had a singular talent for the representation of children, and he refined it by the imitation of Fiammingo. He enlivened every composition by their introduction, and in some places he interwove them in elegant friezes. From this soft and easy manner, examples of which are to be found in every part of the Genoese territories, he occasionally departed, as in the picture of the Miracle of St. Peter, at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple, painted at Carignano, in which the architecture, the flesh tints, and the gestures are highly studied, and there is a force of effect, which seems to emulate a picture by Guercino, placed opposite to it in the same church. He also departs from his ordinary style in the Repose of the Holy Family, at the Gesù." He painted a multitude of pictures for the churches and palaces of Genoa, and in the state. He executed a few etchings from his own designs. Bartsch describes five, two Nativities; the Virgin on a throne, with the Infant Jesus on her knees, and St. John kneeling; the Judgment of Paris; and an Old Man with a beard. Nagler mentions another, St. Anthony of Padua, dated 1640, when he was only twelve years old; these are marked with his name. Other prints marked, D. P. or D. P. F., formerly attributed to him, Bartsch assigns to Domenico Peruzzini. He died in 1703.

PIOLA, ANTONIO, was the son of Domenico P., born at Genoa in 1654, and died in 1715. According to Ratti, he studied with his father, whose style he followed with commendation for some time, but afterwards changed his profession.

PIOLA, PAOLO GIROLAMO, was the second son of Domenico P., born at Genoa in 1666, and died in 1724. He studied with his father, and, according to Ratti, fully sustained his reputation; he executed many works for the churches and palaces at Genoa, and other places in the vicinity. Lanzi also ranks him among the best artists of the Genoese school. He died in 1724.

PIOLA, GIO. BATTISTA, was the third son of Domenico P. He assisted his father and his brother in their works, but did not acquire any distinction. Lanzi says he could copy or follow the designs of others well enough, but he had not sufficient invention to do much beyond.

PIOLA, DOMENICO, was the son of Gio. Battista P., born at Genoa in 1718. He possessed excellent abilities. Lanzi says, "while he was beginning to emulate the glory of his family, he was cut off by death in the flower of his life, and with him was extinguished a family which for the course of nearly two centuries had conferred great honor on the art." He died in 1744.

PIOMBO, FRÀ SEBASTIANO DEL. This eminent painter was born at Venice in 1485. His real name was Sebastiano Luciano; Vasari calls him Sebastiano Veneziano, by which name he was designated till Clement VIII. bestowed upon him the office of Keeper of the Seal of his Chancery, to fill which it was necessary for him to take the religious habit, and he assumed the title of Frà Sebastiano del Piombo (of the Leaden Seal), by which appellation he is universally known in the history of art. He first studied with Giovanni Bellini, then far advanced in years; and afterwards with Giorgione, and became the most distinguished disciple of his school, the most successful imitator of the harmony of his coloring, the breadth of his chiaro-scuro, and the fulness of his forms. He first distinguished himself as a portrait painter, to which his powers were peculiarly adapted. His portraits were admired for the striking resemblance, the sweetness of the coloring, and the roundness and boldness of relief, which made his figures appear to stand out from the canvass. Thus, in taking the portrait of Pietro Aretino, he distinguished five different tints of black in his dress, imitating with exactness those of velvet, satin, and other kinds of stuff. His portrait of Giulia Gonzaga, the mistress of Cardinal Hippolito de Medici, was called a divine performance.

But his powers of invention were contracted, and unfitted him to undertake by himself large historical compositions. His first great work was an altar-piece for the church of S. Gio. Crisostomo at Venice, executed so entirely in the manner of Giorgione that it was often mistaken for the work of that master, and it is supposed that Giorgione furnished the design. Lanzi, speaking of this performance, says: "It may be presumed, indeed, that he was assisted in the design, for it is well known that Sebastiano possessed no surpassing richness of invention; was slow in the composition of most of his figures; irresolute; eager to undertake, difficult to commence, and more difficult in the completion. Hence we rarely meet with any of his histories or his altar-pieces, at all comparable to the Nativity of the Virgin, in the church of S. Agostino in Perugia; or the Flagellation of Christ at the Osservanti of Viterbo, which is esteemed the best picture in the city. Pictures for private rooms and portraits, he painted in great number, and with comparative ease; and we nowhere meet with more beautiful heads, more rosy flesh tints, and more novel accessories than in these."

He had already acquired the reputation at Venice of one of the finest colorists of his time, when Agostino Chigi invited him to Rome, and employed him in conjunction with Baldassare Peruzzi, in decorating his palace, where Raffaello himself had painted his famous Galatea, and furnished the designs for the History of Cupid and Psyche. The rival labors of all these artists are still preserved in the same edifice, now the palace of the Farnesina. In this competition, Sebastiano discovered his inferiority in design, but endeavored to remedy his defects by the study of the antique, and the instruction of Michael Angelo. Vasari relates that "this great artist had felt some uneasiness at the growing fame of Raffaello, and he gladly availed himself of the powers of Sebastiano as a colorist, in the hope that, assisted by his designs, he might be enabled to enter the lists successfully with his illustrious antagonist, if not to drive him from the field. With this view he furnished him with the designs for the Pietà in the church of the Conventuali at Viterbo, and the Transfiguration and Flagellation in S. Pietro in Montorio at Rome, which, as he was very tedious in his process, occupied him six years." The grandeur of the design, and the extraordinary beauty of the coloring, excited universal surprise and applause. Lanzi, though he notices Vasari's statements, is unwilling to believe that Buonarrotti could have been so wicked. It was at this juncture that Cardinal Giulio de Medici commissioned Raffaello to paint his immortal picture of the Transfiguration; and being desirous of presenting an altar-piece to the Cathedral of Narbonne, of which he was archbishop, he engaged Sebastiano to paint a picture of the same dimensions, selecting for the subject the Raising of Lazarus. On this occasion he was again assisted by Buonarrotti, by whom it was composed and designed. Raffaello died before the entire completion of the Transfiguration, and after his death both pictures were publicly exhibited in competition; and, notwithstanding the wonderful composition of Raffaello's chef-d'œuvre, which was pronounced inimitable for design, expression, and grace, yet Sebastiano's performance excited universal admiration. After the death of Raffaello, he was accounted the most distinguished painter in Rome. He was particularly esteemed by Clement VII., whose portrait he drew with amazing resemblance. The Pope rewarded his talents and services with a lucrative benefice, and appointed him to the office of Keeper of the Seals of his Chancery. He was the inventor of the art of painting upon walls with oil colors, which he performed by first covering the wall with a composition of lime, pitch, and mastich. The Resurrection of Lazarus, before mentioned, was purchased by the Regent of France from the Cathedral of Narbonne, for 24,000 francs, and removed into the Orleans Gallery. When that collection was sold in London in 1798, it was purchased by M. Angerstein, for 3,500 guineas. He subsequently refused £15,000 for it. It is said that the French government was desirous of obtaining this picture, to hang beside the Transfiguration of Raffaello, then in the Louvre. It now adorns the English National Gallery; also his own portrait, holding the seals of his office in his hand. Those of the Cardinal Ippolito de Medici and Giulia Gonzaga are in the same institution, though the authenticity of the two last is doubted by some writers. He died at Rome in 1547.

PIORT, V., an obscure Dutch engraver, mentioned by Strutt, who engraved a plate representing an old Woman and Boy with a pot of lighted Coals, after Rubens.

PIPER, FRANCIS, an English amateur artist, born in Kent in 1698. He was a man of fortune, and amused himself in sketching ugly faces and caricatures. He was a wayward and comical genius, and traveled on foot through France, Italy, Germany, and Holland. He drew landscapes, which he etched on tobacco boxes for his friends. He died in 1740.

PIPPI. See GIULIO ROMANO.

PIRANESI, CAV. GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a pre-ëminent architectural designer and engraver, was born at Venice, according to Zani, in 1713; although Milizia and Gandellini place his birth in 1707. At the age of eighteen he was sent by his father to study architecture at Rome; and devoted himself with great enthusiasm to acquire a knowledge of his profession. He studied engraving under Giuseppe Vasi, a Sicilian. On receiving a summons to return to Venice, he refused, replying that Rome with her monuments was the birth-place of his talent, the adopted land of his affections. Upon this, his father withdrew his allowance; but Piranesi was not dismayed, and prosecuted his favorite art with the greatest ardor. In 1741, he published his first work on triumphal arches, bridges, and other antique architectural remains. This admirable work immediately established his reputation, the engravings being executed in such a masterly style, so decidedly superior to any former representations of similar subjects, as to form an era in chalcography, and architectural delineation; which latter had till then, particularly in Italy, been uniformly exceedingly coarse and tasteless.

Piranesi was of a fiery and impetuous genius. He wrought with marvellous facility, usually making his drawing at once upon the plate itself, and completing it almost entirely by etching in aquafortis, with very little assistance from the graver. His plates, therefore, are distinguished for an astonishing freedom and spirit, and great vigor of execution; although the warmth of his imagination at times impelled him to produce an occasional exaggeration of effect. It is difficult to determine whether the fecundity and spirit of his invention and composition, or the ardor and brilliancy of his execution, should be most admired. His skill in associating different objects, and arranging them for pictorial effect, and the vigor which he gave to the most important by his skillful arrangement of light and shade, gained him the designation of the Rembrandt of Architecture. Possessing such a facility of execution, unexampled in the art of engraving, Piranesi has left an astonishing number of plates. They amount to over two thousand, most of them of very large dimensions, and full of detail. Some of them are published on double elephant paper, the plates opening ten feet in length. Their contents afford an inexhaustible collection of the remains of antiquity, both in architecture and sculpture. His Magnificenza, containing many specimens and fragments of ancient architecture till then little known, with the astonishing merit of its execution, would alone have established his fame. He had three sons and three daughters, as well as several pupils, who were all reared to assist him in his labors; but the unmistakable touch of his master genius runs through all his works, and has not been caught by any of his scholars, which is conclusive evidence that they only performed the strictly mechanical parts of the work.

Piranesi was elected an honorary member of the Society of Antiquaries at London; and also a member of the Academy of the Arcadi, under the name of Salcindio Tiseio, according to the custom of that association to give new names to their members. He was also knighted by Clement XIII. In addition to his numerous and extensive labors, he found time, at the particular request of that pontiff, to repair and decorate the church of Santa Maria del Popolo, and the Priory at Malta, where a statue was erected to his memory, executed by Angolini. He died at Rome, November 9th, 1778. His portrait, engraved in 1750, by Polanzani, in the style of a mutilated statue, is prefixed to some of his works. Francesco Piranesi, the son of Cav. Gio. Battista P., settled at Paris after the death of the latter, and transported thither his father's plates. He published a complete edition in that city, in thirty volumes, without the letter-press. The following is a list of the works of this great artist:

Antichità Romane, 4 vols. 1756. Raccolta di Tempi Antichi, viz. di Vesta; della Sibilla; dell' Onore e della Virtù, 1776. Panteon di Mareo Agrippa, detto la Rotonda. Monumenti degli Scipioni, 1785. Romanorum Magnificientia et Architectura, 1761. Opere Varie di Architettura Grottesca. Trofei di Ottaviano Augusto. Carcere. Vedute di Archi Trionfali. Rovine del Castello del Agua Giulia, 1761. Lapides Capitolini, sive Fasti Consulares, &c. Antichità di Cora, 1762. Campus Martius, 1762. Antichità d'Albano e di Castel Gandolfo, 1764-5. Vasi, Candelabri, Cippi, Sarcofagi, Tripodi, Lucerne ed Ornamenti Antichi, 2 vols. 1778. Colonna di Trajano, 1770. Colonna Antonina. Colonna dell' Apoteosi di Antonino Pio. Rovine di Pesto. Vedute di Roma, 2 vols. Teatro d'Ereolano, 1783. Diverse Maniere d'Adornare i Camini, 1769. Statue Antiche, 1781-84. Varie Tabulæ celeberrimorum Pictorum: Raccolta di Disegni del Guercino. Schola Italica Picturæ, cura et impensis Gavini Hamilton, 1773. Stampe Diverse. Peintures de la Villa Lante; Sala Borgia; Jules II.; Farnesina; Villa Altoviti. Anti-

PIRANESI, CAV. FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, the son of Cav. Gio. Battista P., was born at Rome in 1748. He studied design and architecture under his father, whom he assisted in his numerous works, and imitated his style with success. After the death of his father, Francesco transported all his plates to Paris, where he published a complete edition, in thirty volumes. He also engraved several plates of architectural views, and also of antique statues, somewhat in the style of Gio. Marco Pitteri. He died at Paris in 1810. Among others are the following by him:

Jupiter seated; from the statue in the Clementine Gallery; after a drawing by Piroli. The Venus of Mediceis; do. Cupid and Psyche; from the Antique Sculpture in the Gallery of the Capitol. Papirius and his Mother; from the group in the Villa Ludovisi.

PIRANESI, LAURA, the daughter of Cav. Giovanni Battista P., was born at Rome in 1750. She studied under her father, and etched a number of plates in his style. After his death, she assisted her brother Francesco in conducting the business, and is supposed to have retired with him to Paris. She engraved several architectural views in Rome, with great taste and delicacy, among which are, the Capitol; the Ponte Salario; the Temple of Peace; and the Arch of Septimius Severus.

PIRINGER, BENEDICT, a German designer and engraver, born at Vienna in 1780. He engraved numerous plates of landscapes, romantic scenery, views of cities, &c., after various masters and from his own designs. Some of them were published collectively. Nagler gives a list of one hundred and eighty prints by him. He worked in aquatint, and with the graver. He died at Paris in 1826, where he had resided many years.

PIRINI, LOUIS DE, an obscure French engraver, by whom there is a coarsely executed print of the Card-Players, after Cornelius van Tienen.

PIRNRAUM, ALEXIS, an engraver on wood, who, according to Papillon, flourished at Basle about 1545, and whom he supposes was a pupil of Hans Holbein. He does not specify any of his works. Nagler is of opinion that he is the same as Adam Petri, a bookseller of Basle. Zani calls him Pirnbaum, and describes him as an excellent engraver on wood.

PIROLI, TOMMASO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Rome in 1750. He studied under Cav. Gio. Battista Piranesi, and executed numerous prints, etched in outline and in the chalk manner. The following are his most interesting works: the Prophets and Sibyls of Michael Angelo in the Capella Sistina; a copy of Metz's prints of the Last Judgment, in the same chapel; the Story of Cupid and Psyche, from the frescos of Raffaele in the Farnesina; the frescos of Masaccio in the Brancacci chapel, at Florence; and the outlines for the original editions of Flaxman's designs, illustrative of Homer, Hesiod, Æschylus and Dante, published at Rome. He also executed several sets of engravings from the remains of ancient art, part of which were published at Rome and Paris by Francesco and Pietro Piranesi, sons of the celebrated Gio. Battista P. He died in 1824.

PIROLI, PROSPERO, an Italian historical painter and engraver, born in 1761, at Berzonno, in the territory of Novara. He studied at Rome, under an elder brother, a print-seller in that city, and devoted himself to studying the antique, as well as the works of Raffaele and Michael Angelo. In 1794 he settled at Milan, and was occupied for some time in restoring pictures, until recommended to the Russian prince Rozumowski, who invited him to Moscow. Pirolì visited that city, and was employed three years by the Prince. The Emperor invited him to St. Petersburg, and appointed him picture-restorer to the Imperial Gallery, which office he filled eleven years, and acquired a handsome fortune. In 1817 he returned to Italy, and settled at Milan, where he died in 1831. The Biographie Universelle states that Pirolì painted about twenty-four pictures, and engraved them in an old fashioned method, similar to that of Andrea Mantegna. He presented this collection of prints to the Emperor Nicholas, who acknowledged the compliment by presenting him a splendid ring.

PISA, NICCOLA DA. See NICCOLA.

PISA, GIOVANNI DA. See GIOVANNI.

PISANELLI. See VINCENZIO SPISANO.

PISANELLI, LORENZO, a Bolognese painter, who studied under Cesare Baglioni, whose manner he adopted, and acquired considerable reputation as an ornamental and perspective painter. He also painted landscapes in the style of his master. He flourished about 1600.

PISANELLO, VITTORE, an old painter and medalist, a native of St. Vito in the Veronese territory. There is a great deal of contradiction about this artist, as to the time he flourished, and his merits. Vasari says he was a pupil of Castagno, and dates his death about 1480; whereas dal Pozzo asserts that he possessed one of his pictures dated 1406, before Castagno was born. There are several little altar-pieces, containing the History of St. Bernardino, finished in the style of the old miniaturists (painters of histories with small figures), in the sacristy of S. Francesco at Verona, dated 1473, which are attributed to him, but Lanzi says he does not scruple to pronounce them by another hand. Zani quoted several of his works, dated from 1406 to 1447. His admirers have not hesitated to place him on a rank with Masaccio. Most of his great works, so highly commended by Vasari, have perished. He was an eminent artist in his time, and greatly contributed to the advancement of art. He struck many medals of different princes, possessing rare merit, which are to be found in the Museums and rare collections.

PISANO, ANDREA. See ANDREA.

PISANO, GIUNTA, an old painter of Pisa, of whom there are notices from 1210 to 1236. He was the first native painter of Pisa, who distinguished himself. Signor Tempesta wrote a fine eulogium on him about 1800. His works have mostly perished, but there are a few remains at Pisa and Assisi, particularly at the latter city, where he was invited to paint by Frat' Elia di Cortona, Superior of the Minori, about 1230. In the church of the Angioli is a Crucifixion inscribed with his name, IVNTA PISANUS, IVNTINI ME fecit. Lanzi says "this piece shows a knowledge of the naked figure, an expression of pain in the heads, and a disposition of the drapery, greatly superior to the efforts of the Greeks, his cotemporaries.

The handling of his colors is strong, although the flesh inclines to that of bronze; the local tints are judiciously varied; even the chiaro-scuro shows some art, and the whole is not inferior, except in proportions, to Crucifixions usually ascribed to Cimabue." He painted at Assisi another Crucifixion, which has perished; also a portrait of Frat' Elia, still preserved, signed Juncta Pisanus me pinxit, An. D. 1236. He also executed some frescos in the great church of the Franciscans, in which, according to Vasari, he was assisted by certain Greeks. These have mostly perished, except some busts and historical pieces, remaining in the gallery and the contiguous chapels, among which is the Crucifixion of St. Peter. These remaining works are so much injured by time, and have been so often retouched, as is supposed, that no just opinion can be formed of their original merit. Morrona asserts that a Giunta di Giuntino is mentioned in the records of Pisa, who flourished at the same time; but Lanzi gives good reasons to show that he was the same as Giunta Pisano.

PISBOLICA, JACOPO, a Venetian painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. Vasari, in his life of Sansovino, records his name with praise. There is a fine picture by him of the Ascension, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Venice.

PISTOJA, GERINO DA, a painter born at Pistoja, who studied under Pietro Perugino, whom he assisted in his works. He afterwards assisted Pinturicchio at Rome and Siena. He executed some works by himself for the churches at Pistoja, San Sepolcro, and even at Rome. Vasari gives him credit for his diligence; but he was meagre in his composition, and cold in his coloring. He flourished in the first part of the 16th century. There are notices of him down to 1529.

PISTOJA, GIOVANNI DA, a painter who studied under Pietro Cavallini at Rome, and was his best scholar. Vasari only briefly mentions him. He flourished about 1350.

PISTOJA, LEONARDO DA, a painter born at Pistoja, who studied under Gio. Francesco Penni, a distinguished disciple of Raffaele. His real name was Grazia, as appears from his signature on a picture of the Annunciation, in the chapel of the Canons of Lucca, Leonardus Gratia Pistoriensis. In the Notizie di Napoli he is called Guelfo dal Celano, and by others, Malatesta. Lanzi is of opinion that there were two painters of this name: of one of them there are notices in 1516; the other is the one to whom this article is devoted. He is called by the Italians Il Pistoia. He accompanied his master to Naples when he was invited to that court, and assisted him till his death. He was afterwards much employed at Naples and Rome, in painting history and portraits. Lanzi says he was a "respectable painter;" and, in another place, he says the Annunciation before mentioned, his only work in Lucca, "is a picture worthy of a descendant of Raffaele." Zani says he flourished from 1516 to 1540.

PISTOJA, LEONARDO DA. In the Cathedral of Volterra is a fine altar-piece, representing the Virgin seated on a throne, with the titular saint and other saints standing around the throne. It is inscribed Opus Leonardi Pistoriens, an. 1516. The Cavaliere Tolomei first raised the question whether there were not two artists of this name, who flourished nearly at the same time. Lanzi is decidedly of this opinion, and thinks they were of different families. He says, "the painter of the piece at Volterra was not Grazia who went to Naples, since his master Penni, if we are to believe Vasari, was in that year (1516) still the scholar and assistant of Raffaëlle; nor does it seem probable that he educated a pupil of so much merit. This Leonardo, who painted at Volterra, must therefore have been some other, of more proficiency."

PISTOJA, or PISTOJESE, FRA PAOLO DA, was the favorite scholar and assistant of Fra Bartolomeo. Lanzi says he was his colleague, and that he was honored in his own country with a medal, which he saw at Pistoja, with those of many eminent men in that city. Paolo also inherited the rich collection of designs prepared by Fra Bartolomeo, and, according to Vasari, executed many pictures from them at Pistoja, in accordance with the injunction of his master. These designs were afterwards carried to Florence, and deposited in the Dominican convent of St. Catherine, where they were preserved in the time of Vasari. There is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Paolo at Pistoja, and others in that of S. Domenico. He flourished in the first part of the 16th century. See Baccio della Porta, called Fra Bartolomeo.

PITAU, NICHOLAS, THE ELDER, an eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1633. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but it is supposed that he studied under Francis de Poilly at Paris, whose style he followed, though his plates are executed with more vigor and spirit. He engraved a considerable number of portraits and historical subjects, after various masters, which are deservedly esteemed for the correctness of his drawing, the firmness, dexterity, and vigor of his burin, and the beauty and expression in his heads. His print of the Holy Family, after Raffaëlle, is considered a masterpiece of the art. The time of his death is uncertain. Nagler says he died in 1696; Watelet and Zani in 1676, which is probably nearer the truth, as the latest date found on his engravings is 1677. It would be an extraordinary circumstance that an artist possessing such commanding talent should cease to labor in the prime of his life, and twenty years before his death. The following is a list of his most esteemed prints:

The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth and St. John; after Raffaëlle; very fine. The Entombing of Christ; after L. Caracci. The Virgin holding the infant Jesus in her arms and reading; after Guercino. The Dead Christ, with Angels weeping over him; do. The Virgin interceding for St. Bruno and his order; after Champagne. Christ and the Woman of Samaria; do. Mary Magdalene penitent; do. St. Sulpitius in Council; do. The Holy Family, with the infant Jesus embracing St. John; do. The Holy Family, with an Angel presenting a Basket of Flowers; after Villequin.

PITAU, NICHOLAS, THE YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding. Neither the time of his birth or death is known. He engraved a few plates of portraits, in a manner greatly inferior to that of his father. He probably did not practise the art long. A list of his prints may be found in Nagler's Lexicon.

PITOCCHI, MATTEO DA'. This painter, according to Melchiori, was a native of Florence, where he is unknown, from his having resided abroad. He excelled in painting small pictures of beggars, bandits, markets, and burlesque subjects. He also painted on a larger scale for the churches, in several cities, particularly at Rovigo and Padua. Lanzi says "he displayed most talent in representations of mendicants, and burlesque and fanciful subjects, which are to be found in the galleries of many noble houses in Venice, in Verona, in Vicenza, and elsewhere. He painted likewise for the churches, particularly at Padua, where he most probably died." Melchiori says he died at Padua, about 1700, at an advanced age; others say he flourished about 1650.

PITTERI, GIOVANNI MARCO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Venice in 1703. He studied under Gio. Antonio Faldoni, but did not follow the style of his instructor. His plates are executed in a very singular manner, by single strokes, but very different from the method of Claude Mellan. His strokes run from the top to the bottom, and his shadows are produced by strengthening them as the occasion requires. The effect produced by this whimsical operation is rather pleasing, and not inharmonious. He engraved several plates for the Dresden and Florentine Galleries, and others after various masters. He died about 1786. Nagler gives a list of fifty-two prints by him. The following are the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

The Bust of Giovanni Marco Pitteri; after Piazzetta. Giovanni Battista Piazzetta, Painter, of Venice; do. Carlo Goldoni, comic Poet; do. Giuseppe Nogari, Painter; do. Giovanni Mocenigo, noble Venetian; do. Count Schulenburg, Field Marshal of Venice; after Rusca. Cardinal Quirini. Marquis Scipione Maffei. Clara Isabella Fornari.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Pietro Longhi. The Seven Sacraments; do. The Crucifixion; after Piazzetta. The Twelve Apostles; do. Religion overthrowing Heresy; do. St. Peter delivered from Prison; after Spagnoletta. The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew; do. St. Catherine of Siena; after Tiepolo. Mary Magdalene, penitent; do. A set of six Plates of Huntings, in the environs of Venice; after Pietro Longhi. Twelfth-Night; after Teniers. Two Rustic Subjects; do.

PITTONI, BATTISTA, an Italian painter and engraver, born, as is supposed, at Vicenza, about 1508, though there is considerable discrepancy among authors. Nagler says he was born in 1520. He was living in 1585, and his prints bear date from 1561 to 1585. His engravings consist of landscapes, with ancient ruins, fabulous subjects and arabesques, and were published at Venice under the title of Imagini favolosi, &c. intagliati in Rami da M. (Messer) Battista Pittoni, in Vene- tia presso Fran. Ziletti, 1585. There is no account of his paintings.

PITTONI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Vicenza, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He painted small historical pictures and portraits, but did not acquire much distinction.

PITTONI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Vicenza about 1690. He received his first instruction from his uncle, Francesco P., but afterwards went to Venice, where he diligently studied the works of the great Venetian masters, and formed a style of his own, which Lanzi says displays some novelty in the warmth of his coloring, with a certain pictorial amenity and attraction prevailing throughout the whole, which is very pleasing; and, though his forms cannot be termed select, he is generally correct, ingenious, polished, and intelligent. His figures are generally smaller than life, and he was less successful when he drew on a larger scale. He particularly shone in easel pictures of historical subjects, which are abundant in the various galleries at Venice and in the State. He also painted many altarpieces, which Lanzi says appear to increase in beauty as they diminish in size. "This we perceive at the Santo at Padua, where he painted, in competition with the best of his contemporaries, the Martyrdom of S. Bartolomeo, which he colored on a small canvass." Two of his finest works are the Martyrdom of St. Thomas, in the church of S. Eustachio at Venice; and the Multiplication of the Loaves, in S. Cosmo della Guidecca. He also executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, which are sometimes marked with his initials G. B. P., and sometimes Johannes Baptista Pittonus Vicentinum fecit. He died at Venice in 1767.

PITTOR, BELLO, IL. See VINCENZIO PELLEGRINI.

PITTOR, SANTO, IL. See GIO. BERNARDINO RODERIGO.

PITTOR, VILLANO, IL. See TOMMASO MISCIROLI.

PITTORI, LORENZO, a painter born at Macerata, whom Colucci classes among the scholars or imitators of Pietro Perugino. There is a picture of Christ by him, in the church of the Virgin at Macerata, in which the architecture is admirable, but the figures are in the manner termed by the Italians antico-moderno. It is dated 1533.

PITTORI, BARTOLOMEO and POMPEO, were sons of the preceding, and flourished at Fano, where they painted in conjunction a picture of the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the church of S. Michele, dated 1534. Lanzi says it is wonderful to observe in this work how little they regarded the reform which the art had recently undergone. This, however, was an early performance, and Pompeo afterwards improved his manner, acquired considerable reputation, and executed some works which are commended by Civalli. He also instructed some pupils, the chief of whom was Taddeo Zuccaro.

PITTORI, PAOLO, DEL MASACCIO, a painter born at Ascoli, of whom there are notices from 1556 to 1590. He is commended by Colucci, who says he painted many works for the churches and public edifices of his native city and its vicinity.

PIZZARO, ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Toledo in the commencement of the 17th century. According to Bermudez, he was a scholar of El Greco, and became a correct designer and a good colorist. He painted several pictures for the convent of the Trinitarios, representing the history of the Order, and other works for the churches of San Justo and San Pastor at Toledo; also a picture of the Nativity of the Virgin, in the church of Santa Maria at Cassarubios. He designed three subjects, which were engraved by Alardo Pompo, for the life of St. Idelfonso, by Salazar de Mendoza, published in 1618.

PIZZOLI, GIOVACCHINO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1651, and died in 1733. According to Zanotti, he was the pupil of Michael Angelo Colonna, and assisted him in many of his works. He was an excellent painter of perspective, and also excelled in landscapes.

PIZZOLO, NICCOLO, a painter and a native of Padua, who died about 1500. According to Vasari, he was a fellow pupil with Andrea Mantegna, under Squarcione, and an imitator of his style. There is an altar-piece of the Assumption of the Virgin by him, in the chapel of the Eremitani at Padua, signed Opus Niccoletti; also other figures on the wall, and a fresco in one of the façades. Lanzi says these works approach near the composition and manner of Mantegna.

PLAAS, DAVID VANDER, an eminent Dutch portrait painter, born at Amsterdam in 1647. After learning the principles of the art in his native city, he went to Italy, where he resided several years, and made the portraits of Titian his especial models. He aimed to produce the effect of that great master, though by a very different method of pencilling; as he laid on his colors with a strong body, and so judiciously placed his lights and shadows as to produce a lively and natural effect, without breaking the masses or scumbling together his colors. This method not only gave more power to his figures, but also preserved his colors in lasting beauty. Hence, though his pictures will not bear a close inspection, they have the appearance of life when viewed at a proper distance. On his return to Holland, he acquired great reputation, and painted many of the most distinguished personages of his time. His portrait of Admiral van Tromp, is considered a masterpiece in this branch of the art, and represents, to the life, the spirit, and resolute boldness of the old veteran. His portraits are said to partake of the vigor of Rembrandt, and the truth of Titian; the drawing of his heads and hands is remarkably correct. He died at Amsterdam in 1704.

PLACE, FRANCIS, an English amateur painter and engraver, born at Dimsdale, in the county of Durham, about 1645. His father was a wealthy gentleman, and educated him for the bar; but he abandoned that profession, and amused himself in painting a few pictures of landscapes, flowers, birds and fish, and in designing, etching, and mezzotinting some plates. He possessed talents, and had stern necessity compelled him to greater application, he might have distinguished himself. It is said that he was offered a pension of £500 in the reign of Charles II., to draw for the Royal Navy, which he refused, as he could not endure confinement. He died in 1728.

PLACES, LOUIS DES. See DESPLACES.

PLANO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter and architect, was born at Daroca, and flourished at Saragossa in the latter part of the 17th century. He acquired great reputation, both as a painter and an architect. He painted history and portraits, and particularly excelled in ornamental and perspective painting; in the latter branch. Palomino says he was equal to Colonna and Mitelli, an assertion which doubtless ought to be received with many grains of allowance. There is a grand picture by him in the parochial church at Santiago, representing the battle of Clavijo. None of his edifices are mentioned.

PLASS, or PLAS, PETER VANDER, a Dutch painter, who, according to Descamps, was born about 1570. He resided many years at Brussels, and painted history with great reputation. There are several of his works in the public edifices of that city. Balkema says he died there in 1626.

PLASSARD, VINCENT, an obscure French engraver, by whom there is a print of the Holy Family reposing in a landscape, signed V. Plassard in. et fe. 1650.

PLATEAU, ANTOINE, a French painter, born at Tournay in 1759, and died in 1815. He was an excellent decorative painter, and excelled in painting fruit and flower pieces.

PLATTENBERG, or PLATTEN, MATTHEW VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1600. After studying in his native city, he went to Italy for improvement. He resided some time at Florence, where, in conjunction with John Asselyn, called Crabbetje, he painted some sea pieces and landscapes, which were greatly admired. About 1630 he visited Paris, where his works were held in no less repute, and where he settled for life. There is a good deal of confusion about this artist, as he changed his name from Plattenberg to Platte Montagne, and marked his prints M. Montagne. He etched some spirited plates of marines and landscapes from his own designs. Dumesnil describes twenty-nine prints by him; the greater number are marked Montagne fecit. Morin ex. cum privil. Re. Some are marked M. Montagne fecit, or, in. et f. Some writers say his Christian name was Michel, but print No. 27, described by Dumesnil, is marked Matthieu, which settles the question. He married the sister of Jean Morin. He is confounded by the Italian authors with another artist, named Montagna, who excelled in marines. Malvasia calls him Mons. Rinaldo della Montagne; and Lanzi, copying Felibien, Niccolo de Plate Montagne. See Il Montagna.

PLATTENBERG, NICHOLAS VAN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1631. He is said to have studied painting under Philip de Champagne, and engraving under his uncle, Jean Morin, though it is highly probable that he received his first instructions from his father. He acquired distinction, both as a painter and an engraver, and was elected a member of the Academy at Paris in 1681. His principal works as a painter are in the churches of Notre Dame, St. Sacrament, and St. Nicholas des Champs, at Paris. He was also a good portrait painter. As an engraver, he surpassed his instructor, and his prints are highly commended for correctness of drawing, and boldness and freedom of execution. Dumesnil gives a descriptive list of twenty-eight prints by him. He died at Paris in 1706.

PLATZER, or PLAZER, JOHN GEORGE. According to Füessli, this painter was a native of Switzerland, born at Epan, in the Tyrol, in 1702. He first studied with his step father, named Kessler, and afterwards with an uncle on the father's side, a painter residing at Passau. In 1721 he went to Vienna, where he formed an intimate friendship with an artist named Janneck, and as they painted similar subjects, a spirit of rivalry sprang up between them, which proved beneficial to both, without in the least weakening their friendship. Platzer painted cabinet pictures of histories, and public festivals, with a multitude of excellent figures. His best pictures are exquisitely finished, his penciling very beautiful, his coloring gorgeous; and his pictures are very attractive to the uneducated eye. Hence he obtained abundant patronage, and his pictures are said to be found in many grand collections in Germany, and also in England. But his works are criticised as totally deficient in chiaro-scuro, and fantastically colored, without any just harmony of tints. His compositions abound with figures in theatrical action, and in the representation of his story, he frequently violates chronology, and the proprieties of costume. There are many of his works at Vienna, Breslau, and Glogau. He afterwards returned to his native place, where he was living in 1755.

Zani notices a Giovanni Giorgio Platzer, doubtless the same artist, a native of Trent, born in 1702, and died in 1760. He painted conversations; there are two of his pictures in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna, in which the figures are habited in Spanish costume.

PLATZER, JOHN VICTOR. Nagler says this artist was a painter and sculptor, born in Vintschgau, probably at Mals, in 1704. He first studied with Kessler at Inspruck, and afterwards with Christopher Platzer, court painter at Passau. He afterwards established himself at Vienna, where he painted cabinet pictures of histories, conversations, and assemblies, mostly with many figures, which were received with great applause, both at home and abroad. He bestowed immense labor on his pictures, and his intense application weakened his sight and diminished the firmness of his hand, so that he was obliged to use a machine to steady it while painting. The pictures he painted under these circumstances are greatly inferior to his earlier productions. None of his works as a sculptor are mentioned. He returned to his native place in 1755, where he died in 1767. By comparing the names of this and the preceding painter, the dates, subjects, style, &c., it will appear evident that they were brothers, if not one and the same artist.

PLATZER, JOSEPH, a German painter, born at Prague in 1752. He was the son of Ignatius P., the celebrated sculptor. After the completion of his studies at the University, he devoted six years to the study of drawing, particularly in architecture, under the instruction of F. Wolf. In oil painting he was his own master. His attainments were noticed by Prince Kaunitz, who honored him with his patronage. Thus favored, he went to Vienna, and devoted six years more to assiduous study, when he thought himself qualified to undertake greater works than those on which he had been employed. In hopes to attract public attention, he executed a grand triumphal arch thirty-six feet high, and erected it on a holiday at St. John's hospital. It was universally admired, and produced the desired result. In 1781, he was employed to decorate the new theatre at Prague, and was soon afterwards selected by the Emperor Joseph II. to embellish the Royal Theatre at Vienna. On the accession of Leopold II., he was appointed one of the court painters, and notwithstanding much opposition proved himself worthy of the situation. In 1790, he was appointed principal cabinet painter, which office he held till his death in 1810. He did not confine himself to decorative painting, but painted cabinet pictures of historical subjects with great ability. He also excelled in moonlight scenes.

MP. or MP.F. PLEGINCK, MARTIN, a German engraver on wood and copper, who flourished about 1590. He executed quite a number of prints of small size, which do not possess sufficient interest for insertion here; for a description of his works the reader is referred to Bartsch, P. G., tom. ix. He engraved a set of copper plates representing various figures engaged in different kinds of combat, in a style resembling that of Virgilius Solis; also a set of small wood cuts representing ecclesiastical orders and dignities, cavalry and foot soldiers, after J. de Gheyn. Also some cuts of animals and ornaments for goldsmiths. His prints are usually marked with one of the above monograms. Zani says he operated in 1606, but the latest date found on his prints is 1594.

PLEYDENWURFF, WILLIAM, an old German wood engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg in the latter part of the 15th century. In conjunction with Michael Wolgemut, he executed the cuts for the Nuremberg Chronicle, a heavy folio, compiled by Herman Schedel, and published in Latin at Nuremberg in 1493. It is illustrated with about 2000 cuts, representing views of ancient cities, figures of various kinds, and other subjects, which, though drawn in the stiff, formal, and incorrect manner of the time, are nevertheless spiritedly and boldly cut, with much expression in many of the heads.

PLIN, E., a French engraver, who flourished about 1780, and executed some plates of conversations and domestic subjects, etched and finished with the graver, in a neat, clear style.

PLINIUS, SECUNDUS, CAIUS, usually called the YOUNGER PLINY, was the nephew and adopted son of Pliny the Naturalist, and flourished about A. D. 100. He deserves mention in a work relating to architecture, for a number of excellent edifices which he caused to be erected, although not an architect by profession. While consul in Bithynia, he built the baths in the city of Nicomedia; rebuilt many public and private edifices in various parts of Asia Minor; erected a magnificent theatre at Nicæa; and cut a canal of communication from lake Nicæa to the sea. He was appointed by the Emperor Trajan to the general superintendence of the Roman aqueducts, and erected a number of beautiful edifices in Italy.

PLONICH, VEDASTUS DU, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1660, and executed a few plates of views in Holland, in a neat, though formal style.

PLOOS, CORNELIUS VAN AMSTEL. See AMSTEL.

PLOTT, JOHN, an English miniature painter, born at Winchester in 1732. He was bred to the law, but disliking that profession, he went to London in 1756, and became the pupil of Richard Wilson, the admirable landscape painter; but his genius leading him to portraiture rather than landscape, he left that master and placed himself under the tuition of Nathaniel Hone. He afterwards turned his attention to miniature, both in enamel and water colors, in which branch he was very successful, and met with considerable employment. He had a taste for painting history, and his drawings in that line possess great merit. He sometimes painted portraits in oil. Towards the close of his life he retired in easy circumstances to Winchester, where he was chosen a member of the corporation of that city. He died there in 1803.

PLUMIER, an artist, probably a Frenchman, by whom there are some spirited etchings, from his own designs, signed Plumier fecit, which show him to have possessed talent, though his drawing in the naked parts of his figures, is not very correct.

PO, PIETRO DEL, a Sicilian painter, born at Palermo in 1610. After learning the rudiments of the art at Palermo, he went to Naples, and studied under Domenichino, during the residence of that celebrated painter in that city. On his return to Palermo, he executed some works for the churches, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he also wrought some for the churches, but distinguished himself more for the pictures which he painted for the collections, and especially for his spirited engravings. He had a thorough knowledge of art. His chief work at Rome is a picture of S. Leone, in the church of the Madonna di Constantinopoli, which Lanzi says does not do him so much honor as some of his easel pictures, especially his small cabinet pictures, executed in the manner of miniatures with exquisite taste; some of them are to be found in the collections at Rome and Piacenza, and some were sent to Spain. He afterwards settled at Naples with his son, Giacomo, where he died in 1692. He executed some spirited etchings, finished with the graver, from his own designs, and after other masters, which are highly esteemed. Bartsch gives a list of thirty-two prints by him, which he believes to be a complete catalogue, though there are three or four others attributed to him, which do not bear his name. The following are the best:

St. John in the Wilderness; after An. Caracci. The Woman of Canaan before Christ; do. The Dead Christ on the Lap of the Virgin; do. The Virgin seated on a Throne with the Infant, and a Choir of Angels; after Domenichino. The four Cardinal Virtues, with their attributes; do. St. Jerome kneeling; with an Angel; do. The Annunciation; after N. Poussin. The Flight into Egypt; do.

PO, GIACOMO DEL, was the son of the preceding, born at Rome in 1654. He received his first instructions from his father, but afterwards studied under Niccolo Poussin. There are only two of his pictures in the churches at Rome, one in S. Marta, and the other in S. Angiolo. He went to Naples, where he settled, and found abundant employment in ornamenting the halls and galleries of the nobility with frescos of allegorical and fabulous subjects. His intimacy with letters aided the natural poetic taste with which his pictures are conceived, and his varied and enchanting colors, fascinated the eye of every beholder. He was singular and original in his lights and in their various gradations and reflections. His inventive genius, extraordinary facility of hand, and abundant employment, led him into negligence and incorrectness in design, especially in his figures and draperies; so that he fell into a kind of mannerism, as is usually the case with confident and rapid operators. He also executed a few works for the churches; but his genius chiefly shines in the gallery of the Marchese Genzano, and in the Palace of the Duke of Matalona; and still more in seven apartments of the palace of the prince of Avellino. He died in 1726.

PO, TERESA DEL. This paintress was a daughter of Pietro del Po, who instructed her in the art. She painted cabinet pictures in the style of her father, and was skilled in miniatures. She also etched some plates in a manner so closely resembling that of her father that they can scarcely be distinguished, except by the signature. Bartsch describes sixteen prints by her, and enumerates six more, mentioned by Füessli. The time of her birth is not known. She acquired so much distinction, that she was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke at Rome. She died at Naples in 1716.

POCETTI. See BERNARDINO BARBATELLI.

POCO E BUONO, IL. See GIROLAMO NANNI.

PODESTA, ANDREA, a Genoese painter and engraver, born about 1620. He went early in life to Rome, where he studied under Giovanni Andrea Ferrari. He is scarcely known as a painter, but he executed some spirited and masterly etchings from his own designs and after other masters, for the Giustiniani Gallery, which prove him to have been an artist of ability. He is called by most writers, Giovanni Andrea P.; and Zani says his true name was Giacomo Andrea, but he marked his prints AND. P., or And. P. in. et fec.

P. or R. POEHAM, MARTIN, an old German engraver, to whom Professor Christ attributes some plates marked with one of the above monograms. They chiefly consist of indifferently executed copies of other prints by Aldegrever, Hans Sebald Beham, and others.

POEL, EGBERT VANDER, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except by his works. His favorite subjects were conflagrations, representations of fire-works, with numerous figures, interiors by candle-light, &c., which he treated with great ability. His pictures are well designed, his pencil is free and firm, his coloring vigorous, and his chiaroscuro excellent. He is said to have been nearly related to Brower, and was perhaps his pupil, whose manner, as well as that of Teniers, he sometimes imitated with considerable success. In the Museum at Amsterdam is a fine picture by him, representing the explosion of a powder magazine at Delft in 1654, which he repeated several times. In the same collection is an interior of a cottage with females engaged in domestic employment.

There are many of his cabinet pictures in the various collections in Holland, where they are highly esteemed. His name is generally found on his pictures, though he sometimes marked them only with his initials, E. V. P. His works date from about 1660 to 1690, at which time Balkema says he died.

POELEMBOURG, CORNELIUS, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1586. He first studied under Abraham Bloemaert, and afterwards went to Italy for improvement. He at first adopted the style of Adam Ælshemer, but afterwards quitted it, on beholding the works of Raffaele, as we are sagely told by Houbraken, "to study and imitate the grace of that incomparable master, particularly in the naked"! He formed for himself a style entirely new, partaking of both the Flemish and Italian schools; Flemish in landscape, and Italian in accessories. He adopted a pleasing style of painting small cabinet pictures of landscapes, into which he introduced some small figures, usually naked, illustrative of fable, poetry, or mythology, enriched with ancient ruins and edifices. His skies are clear, light, and transparent, and he generally made choice of agreeable scenery. He frequently ornamented his backgrounds with vestiges of magnificent Roman edifices, carefully copied from nature; his figures were more remarkable for the neatness of his pencil and the clearness of his carnations, than for correctness of design. His composition is pleasing, and there is a polish and seductive brilliancy in his finishing, that captivates the generality of observers. He soon gained an immense reputation at Rome; his works were held in the highest estimation, and it is said that some of the cardinals and other great personages frequented his studio. This flattering encouragement could not subdue his desire to return to his own country, and he set out, via Florence, where he was received by the Grand Duke with distinguished honors, who commissioned him to paint several pictures, and endeavored in vain to retain him in his service, by the most marked liberality and munificence. Soon after his arrival at Florence, Rubens himself honored him with a visit, purchased several of his pictures and bespoke others, by which generous conduct, he greatly benefitted the artist, instructing others how to estimate and encourage his talents. On his return to his native city, he was received with joy, and his countrymen, impatient for his presence, and anxious to possess his works, loaded him with more commissions than he could execute at the time. In 1637, Poelemburg visited England at the invitation of Charles I., where it is supposed he resided several years. He painted several pictures for the King, and others for the nobility. In King Charles' catalogues are mentioned the portraits of his Majesty, and of the children of the King of Bohemia; and in that of James the II., are sixteen pictures by him. The success he met with could not induce him to remain in England, and he returned to Utrecht; where he died, in 1660. The works of Poelemburg have been largely imitated, and one of the most successful imitators of his manner was John vander Lys, whose works are often attributed to Poelemburg. He also sometimes inserted the figures in the works of eminent cotemporary artists, as Steenwyck, Kierings, and John Both; and they probably returned him a like compliment, by painting his landscapes. Descamps and Watelet assert that Poelernburg etched some spirited prints from his own designs, but these were probably executed by J. G. Bronkhorst, after his designs.

POERSON, CHARLES, a French historical and portrait painter, born at Metz. He went to Paris, where he settled, and practised his profession with considerable reputation till his death, in 1667.

POERSON, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1653. He learned the rudiments of the art from his father, and after his death became the pupil of Noel Coypel. He painted history and portraits, but was more successful in the latter branch; though he had an excellent general knowledge of art. His promising talents recommended him to the patronage of M. Mansard, through whose influence he was appointed portrait painter to Louis XIV., whose portrait he painted so much to the satisfaction of that monarch, that he honored him with the order of St. Lazarus. He was also employed to decorate the hospital des Invalides with some historical works, but these gave so little satisfaction, that Mansard caused them to be obliterated, and replaced by the frescos of Bon Boullongne, which obtained much applause. This sad failure threw Poerson into deep despondency, but his friend Mansard contrived to raise his spirits by inducing the King to appoint him professor of the French Academy at Rome, which office he filled with great honor. On the death of Carlo Maratti, he was made President of the Academy of St. Luke. He died at Rome in 1725.

POGGINO, ZANOBI DI, a Florentine painter, who studied under Gio. Antonio Sogliani. According to Baldinucci, he executed many works for the churches and edifices of Florence, in the style of his master. Lanzi says his works are now hardly known in that city.

POILLY, FRANÇOIS, THE ELDER, a very eminent French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1622. He was the son of a goldsmith and engraver, who instructed him in the rudiments of art. He afterwards went to Paris and studied with Pierre Daret three years. He then visited Rome, where he resided three years, greatly improved his design, and executed several plates after the Italian masters, in which he adopted the fine style of Cornelius Bloemaert, as his model. On his return to Paris, he distinguished himself as one of the most celebrated engravers of his country, and was appointed engraver to the King in 1664. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with uncommon firmness and dexterity. The correctness of his drawing corresponds with the beauty of his burin, and his heads have a fine expression. Though he had the assistance of some able pupils, it is surprising that he could have produced so many plates, many of them of large size, in a manner that requires both time and patience, and so uniform, that it is difficult to establish a ground of preference, except by the subject. There are about 400 prints which bear his name; the following are the most esteemed. He died in 1693.

PORTRAITS.

Pope Alexander VII., with accessories. Louis XIV. when young; after Noret. Cardinal Mazarine; after Mignard. Henry D'Arnaud, Bishop of Angers. Jerome Bignon, Counsellor of State; after Champagne. Abra-

The Parable of the Wedding Garment; after Champagne. The Crucifixion; a large print, in three sheets; do. The Trinity; do. Joseph's Bloody Garment presented to Jacob; after Antoine Coypel. Nymphs Bathing; after Giulio Romano.

POILLY, NICOLAS. This engraver was the brother of the preceding, born at Abbeville in 1626. It is said that he studied under his brother, but it is evident that he first studied under some other master, and that on the return of François from Rome, he improved himself by his instruction. He executed quite a number of prints in the style of his brother, and, though much inferior to them, they are executed in a clear, neat manner, and possess considerable merit. He died at Paris in 1696. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV., in a frame of laurels, with Children bearing emblems; after N. Mignard. Bust of Louis XIV., as large as life. 1683. Maria Theresa, Queen of France; do. 1680. Louis, Dauphin, the son of Louis XIV.; do. Louis Bourbon, called the Great Condé; do. Francis de Coetlogon, Bishop of Rennes. René Potier, Duke de Gesvres; after le Fevre. Nicholas Edward Olier, Counsellor of State.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Augustine holding a Crucifix. The Holy Family, with two Angels holding a Basket of Flowers; after S. Bourdon. The Marriage of St. Catherine; do. The Presentation in the Temple; after C. le Brun. The Holy Family, with the infant Jesus sleeping on the Knee of the Virgin; do. The Repose in Egypt; after Chapron. The Crucifixion; after N. Poussin.

POILLY, JEAN BAPTISTE, was the son and pupil of Nicolas P., born at Paris in 1669. After studying with his father, he went to Rome, where he resided several years. On his return to Paris, he executed a considerable number of plates, which gained him distinction. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy at Paris in 1714. His style of engraving was very different from that of his father or uncle. He forwarded his plates with the point, and finished them with the graver. His prints are distinguished for correct drawing, fine expression of the heads, and a pleasing and picturesque effect. The following are his most esteemed works. He died in 1728.

PORTRAITS.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Nativity; after Gaudenzio Ferrari; for the Crozat collection. The Virgin adoring the infant Jesus, who is sleeping; after Benvenuto Garofalo; do. The Martyrdom of St Cecilia; after Domenichino. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Maratti. The Rod of Aaron devouring the Rods of the Magicians; after N. Poussin. The Israelites worshipping the Golden Calf; do. The Holy Family; do. The Judgment of Solomon; after A. Coypel. Susanna and the Elders; do. Jupiter and Danaë; after Giulio Romano; for the Crozat collection. Eleven Plates from the paintings by P. Mignard, in the saloon of St. Cloud. The Four Seasons; do.; from the paintings in the Gallery of St. Cloud.

POILLY, FRANÇOIS, THE YOUNGER, was the younger son of Nicolas P., born at Paris in 1671. He received instruction from his father, and accompanied his brother to Paris, where he engraved a plate of St. Cecilia distributing her wealth to the poor, after Domenichino, a companion print to the martyrdom of that saint by the same master, engraved by Jean Baptiste Poilly. Nothing further is mentioned of him. He died in 1723.

POILLY, NICOLAS JEAN BAPTISTE, according to Basan, was the son of Jean Baptiste P., and was instructed by his father in the art, which he soon abandoned for some other employment. According to Nagler, he was born in 1712, and executed a few portraits, one of which is dated 1758, contradicting Basan's statement.

POINDRE, JACOB DE, a Flemish painter, born at Malines in 1527. He studied under Schwagers Marc Willems. He painted history and portraits, in which latter branch he excelled. He went to Copenhagen, where it is said he was employed to paint the portraits of some of the Kings, probably as historical recollections; but it seems more probable that he painted the portraits of the King and other members of the Royal family. He died there in 1570.

POINSART, J., a French engraver, who flourished about 1630. He was principally employed by the book-sellers, for whom he executed a variety of views of cities, castles, &c., executed with the graver, in a neat, but incorrect and tasteless style. Among other prints by him, is one of the Entry of Charles VII. into Rheims.

POINTE, F. DE LA, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1678. He engraved a plan of Paris in nine parts; and, in conjunction with Israel Silvestre, engraved some of the views of the Palace of Versailles.

POL, CHRISTIAN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Berkenrode, near Haerlem, in 1752. He obtained great reputation for his arabesques, which he rendered very agreeable by the introduction of birds, flowers, and fruit. In 1782 he went to Paris, and was employed in decorating the palaces of Bellevue, Chantilly, and St. Cloud. He also painted flower-pieces, in oil, in a style of excellence. He sometimes painted groups of flowers on snuff-boxes, so delicately executed that they might be mistaken for the works of the greatest masters in that line. He died in 1813.

POLANCOS, two Spanish painters, brothers, who flourished at Seville about 1646. Little is known of them except by their works. They studied under Francisco Zurbaran, whose style they so closely imitated that their works are often attributed to that master. This is particularly the case in the church of San Esteban at Seville, where Zurbaran painted the pictures of St. Peter, St. Stephen, and St. Hermenegildo, and the brothers Polancos an altar-piece of the patron Saint, a picture of the Nativity, and another of St. Fernando. They also painted several large pictures for the churches and convents of Seville, among which are the Angels appearing to Abraham, Jacob wrestling with the Angel, Joseph's Dream, and Tobit and the Angel, in the convent of St. Paul; and St. Teresa conducted by Angels, in the church of the Guardian Angel, belonging to the Barefooted Carmelites and Franciscan Friars.

POLANZANI, FELICE, an Italian engraver, who flourished from 1745 to 1766. He engraved some prints after Vandyck and other masters, a list of which may be found in Nagler's Lexicon.

POLANZANI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Andale, near Venice, about 1700. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he engraved a set of twenty-two plates of the Life of the Virgin, from designs which are attributed by some to Niccolo Poussin, and by others to Jacques Stella, whose style they more nearly resemble. He also engraved several plates after Cignani, Marco Benefiali, and other masters. There was another engraver of this name, who was a native of Verona, and flourished about 1750.

POLAZZO, FRANCESCO, a Venetian painter, born in 1683, and died in 1753. Lanzi says he was a good painter in the manner of Gio. Battista Piazzetta, softened down with that of Antonio Ricci, called Il Barbalunga. He could also imitate the touch of various masters, and for this reason was much employed in restoring ancient pictures.

POLESTANI, ANDREA, an Italian artist, probably a painter, by whom there is a slight and spirited etching of a Bacchanalian subject, from his own design, signed Andrea Polestanus, fecit. 1640.

POLETNICH, J. F., an engraver who flourished at Paris, from about 1760 to 1780. He engraved several plates after the works of Vandyck, Boucher, Lagrenée, and other masters.

POLI, two brothers, natives of Pisa, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. Lanzi briefly notices them among the landscape painters of the fourth epoch of the Florentine school, and says, "they executed many pleasing landscapes, which are to be found in the collections at Florence and Pisa."

POLIDORINO, IL. See FRANCESCO RUVIALE.

POLIDORO, DA CARAVAGGIO. See CARAVAGGIO.

POLIDORO, VENEZIANO, a Venetian painter, born in 1515, and died in 1565. His real name is not certainly known, though in the Necrologio of S. Pantaleone, he is expressly called Polidoro Pittore. According to Zanetti, he was a disciple of Titian, and an imitator of his style. He painted Holy Families, Madonnas, and other sacred subjects, for the collections, and wrought some for the churches and convents. Lanzi says he was for the most part a feeble imitator of Titian, who supplied the shops with an abundance of his Madonnas and other sacred subjects; one who made a trade of his profession. "To judge from an altarpiece at the Servi, and some other pictures by him at Venice, we may pronounce him a tolerably good composer, though he never distinguished himself much in the rank of his cotemporaries; yet, when the school declined, his labors acquired more esteem, and were exhibited in the studios of some artists, much in the same manner as sculptors collect specimens of ancient marbles, however inferior, as advantageous in the pursuit of their art";—by which he means that his pictures were used by artists as models in coloring.

POLLA, BARTOLOMEO DA, a painter of the Venetian school, who flourished about 1500. Little is known of him. He decorated the panels in the Choir of the Certosa, at Pavia, with figures of the Apostles and other Saints, which Lanzi says are designed in the style of Leonardo da Vinci.

POLLAJUOLO, ANTONIO, an eminent Italian sculptor, painter, and engraver, born at Florence in 1426. He was brought up to the business of a goldsmith and designer, under Bartolucci. He afterwards studied modeling and casting, under Lorenzo Ghiberti, whom he assisted in executing the celebrated gates in the church of S. Giovanni at Florence, which were the admiration of Michael Angelo. He executed in bronze the tombs of Sixtus IV., and Innocent VIII. His younger brother having distinguished himself as a painter, he became his disciple, and executed several pictures for the churches and public edifices, which rank him as one of the ablest artists of his time. The most celebrated of these is the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the chapel of the Marchese Pucci, in the church of the Servi at Florence. Lanzi says, "this is the finest picture of the 15th century I have seen; the coloring is not in the best style, but the composition rises above the age in which he lived, and the drawing of the naked figure shows what attention he had bestowed on anatomy. He was the first Italian painter who dissected bodies in order to learn the true situations of the tendons and muscles." He was also one of the earliest Italian artists who practised engraving. Contemporaneous with Maso Finiguerra, he is supposed to have learned the art from him. He engraved a few plates, executed in a style similar to that of Finiguerra, which are now extremely scarce. He died in 1498. The following prints are known to be by him, and bear his signature:

Hercules strangling Anteus.

A large plate, representing ten Naked Figures fighting with swords and other weapons. It is inscribed Opus Antonii Pollajoli Florentini, without a date. The background is a forest, very rudely represented. The design shows that he had paid some attention to the figure, and the heads are not without expression.

The Holy Family, in which the Virgin is seated, with the infant Jesus on her knee; St. Joseph appears on the right hand, leaning on his staff; on the left is St. Elizabeth, with St. John presenting a flower to the Child.

The following are also generally attributed to him:

Hercules combating the Giants. There is no signature to this print, but Bartsch and Ottley both describe it, and think there is every reason to believe it to be by him.

The Battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ, described by Ottley. Bartsch gives this print to Gasparo Reverdino, but there seems to be little doubt among connoisseurs that it is by Pollajuolo. This print, formerly in the Palazzo Riccardi, is now in the British Museum.

The niello of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, described by Duchesne.

POLLAJUOLO, PIETRO DEL, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Florence in 1433, according to Vasari, though others say in 1428. He studied under Andrea Castagno, and distinguished himself chiefly for his admirable portraits. He painted many of the great personages of his time, as large as life, which gained him immense applause. Among his best historical works, were the Labors of Hercules, in the Medicean palace. He died at Rome in 1498, the same year as his brother, aged 65 years.

POLLAJUOLO, SIMONE DEL, called IL CRONACA, a distinguished Italian architect, was born at Florence in 1454. The surname Il Cronaca (the Chronicle), was given him on account of his ability in relating stories. He visited Rome at an early age, where he resided with his relative, Antonio del Pollajuolo, and studied the remains of antiquity with great assiduity. On returning to Florence, he gained great reputation, and, according to Milizia, was employed to finish the Palazzo Strozzi, commenced by Benedetto da Maiano. He erected the beautiful façade in the Tuscan order, and at the top placed a Corinthian entablature, from his own design, which Milizia characterizes as the most magnificent that was ever seen. He adorned the court of this palace with a Composite order below, and a Corinthian above, with exceedingly beautiful columns, windows, and doors, all from his own designs. On the hill of S. Miniato, near Florence, Pollajuolo designed the church of S. Francesco, of such exquisite proportions that Michael Angelo was accustomed to call it his bella Villanella, or beautiful country seat. His sacristy of S. Spirito, at Florence, is of an octangular figure, elegant and well proportioned. Among his other works were the convent Dei Servi, and the great Council Hall of Florence. He was a follower of Savonarola. He died in 1509, and was entombed in S. Ambrogio.

POLLIO, VITRUVIUS, a Roman architect, and a celebrated writer on the art, who flourished in the age of Augustus. According to Milizia, he was a native of Fornia, now called Mola di Gaeta. Other authorities say that he was a native of Verona. During the civil war, Augustus employed him in constructing military engines; and, after peace was restored, appointed him Inspector of Buildings. It is said that he designed the Theatre of Marcellus, although its arrangement was inconsistent with his precepts. The Temple of Justice at Fano, was unquestionably erected by him; the centre nave was one hundred and twenty feet long, and sixty feet wide, supported by eighteen Corinthian columns fifty feet high; the lateral naves were twenty feet wide. The reputation of Vitruvius chiefly rests on his celebrated treatise upon architecture, in a historical form, containing the names of many eminent architects with their works. At the request of Augustus, he commenced his celebrated work on Architecture, availing himself of the Grecian rules, as well as his own matured experience. It is divided into ten books; seven of which treat of architecture in its proper sense; the last three of hydraulic architecture, gnomonics, and mechanics. The style of Vitruvius is unostentatious and concise. It is also sometimes obscure, which is easily explained by reflecting that, being the first Roman writer upon this subject, and compelled to use many new terms and forms of expression, he was, in a limited sense, the inventor of a new language, which was necessarily imperfect, and subsequently underwent many alterations. It is the only ancient production of the kind that has been preserved to modern times, and, though defective in some respects, is well worthy of its numerous translations and commentaries, which for several centuries have been the study of architects. Vitruvius was learned in both the civil and military branches of the art, and reduced the latter to very simple principles. It is evident that he had an elevated idea of the art, believing that it should be practised for honor rather than profit. Milizia says that he allowed certain liberties with the orders—such as making the shaft of the Ionic equal to the Corinthian—which cannot be justified by the principles of correct taste.

POLO, BERNARDO, a Spanish painter of fruit and flower pieces, who flourished at Saragossa in the latter part of the 17th century. Zani says he operated in 1680, and died about 1700. He painted his subjects from nature, in a style of excellence. His works are found in the collections at Saragossa and Madrid, where they are highly esteemed.

POLO, DIEGO, THE ELDER, a Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, at Burgos, in 1560. He studied under Patricio Caxes, at Madrid, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical and portrait painter. There are some of his works in the Escorial and the Royal Palace at Madrid, which prove him to have been a correct designer, and an excellent colorist. His best works are the portraits of the Kings of the Goths; St. Jerome chastised by the Angel, for taking too much pleasure in reading Cicero; and a Penitent Magdalen. He died at Madrid in 1600.

POLO, DIEGO, THE YOUNGER, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Burgos in 1620. He studied under Antonio Lanchares, but profited more by a diligent study of the works of Titian in the Royal collection, by which means he became an admirable colorist. He executed several works for the churches and convents at Madrid, the most esteemed of which are the Baptism of Christ, in the Church of the Carmelites, and the Annunciation, in S. Maria. He also excelled in portraits. He was an artist of great talents, but died young in 1655.

POLONY, ZIARAKA, an obscure engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1615. He executed a few etchings of various subjects.

POLVERINO, ROMUALDO, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1701. He studied under Francesco Solimena, and began to acquire distinction for his historical pictures, when he died, in the flower of his age, in 1731.

POLYCLES, a Greek sculptor mentioned by Pliny and Pausanias, who flourished in the 102d Olympiad, or about B. C. 370. He was cotemporary with Cephisodotus, Leochares, Praxiteles, and Lysippus. Little is recorded of him; although the notices by the above mentioned authors are so indefinite, that it is not always certain whether they refer to this artist, or to the one in the subsequent article.

POLYCLES, a distinguished Greek sculptor, flourished about B. C. 170. He was the son of Timarchides, an Athenian statuary; but studied, according to Pausanias, under Stadius. He appears to have often wrought in concert with his brother Dionysius, and Pliny says that their productions were carried to Rome, among which was a statue of Juno, in the temple of that goddess within the portico of Octavia, and near it a statue of Jupiter, also the work of Polycles and Dionysius. From the passage in Pliny, Polycles hermaphroditem nobilem fecit, this sculptor is supposed to have been the author of the original statue of the Hermaphrodite, from which the well known existing representations are copied, especially that usually termed the Borghese Hermaphrodite, from its having belonged to that collection, although now in the Louvre. Pausanias mentions a statue by Polycles, of Amyntas, a conqueror in the games, which was preserved at Olympia. Among his other works, were several statues of the Muses. He left several sons, who followed the profession of sculpture.

POLYCLETUS, a preëminent Grecian sculptor and an able architect, a native of Sicyon, flourished about B. C. 440. He studied under Ageladas of Argos, and was cotemporary with Myron, Alcamenes, and Phidias. The judgment of antiquity has given to Polycletus the reputation of one of the most remarkable sculptors of the golden age of Grecian art. It is evident that he was a worthy competitor and rival of Phidias; for, on one occasion, when five of the most eminent artists of the time, Phidias being among them, executed five statues in competition, that of Polycletus was preferred. He did not possess the grandeur of imagination of Phidias, but excelled rather in the beautiful. Phidias has been termed the Æschylus, and Polycletus the Sophocles of Sculpture. He finished his statues with the greatest care. Polycletus is said to have carried alto-relievo to perfection; and also the toreutic art commenced by Phidias, probably that of uniting metals with any other material. A correct estimate of his merit may be formed from the high eulogiums of the best ancient writers, and from the fact that among his scholars were Pericleus, Canachus the second, Asopodorus, Alexis, Aristides, Phryno, Dino, Athenodorus, and Demeas. Pliny says he succeeded best in statues of a soft and gentle character. Myron and Polycletus were always considered rivals; and one used the bronze of Delos in his works, while the other used that of Ægina.

Among the chief works of this eminent artist, was the colossal statue of Juno, in the temple of that goddess at Argos, which was considered in many respects equal to the finest productions of Phidias. It was chryselephantine, or composed of gold and ivory; all the naked parts being of ivory, while the gold was used for drapery and accessories. It was not as large as the Olympian Jupiter or the Minerva of Phidias. The goddess was represented seated on a throne; in one hand she held a sceptre, and in the other a pomegranate. The accompanying subjects and ornaments were of the richest description and of the most elaborate workmanship. The other works of Polycletus were almost as famous as his Juno. Among them were two statues of young men; one, called Diadumenos, fastening a band around his head; the other called Doryphorus, of a more manly character, carrying a lance. Pliny says the former work was valued at the enormous sum of 100 talents. A group of two naked boys, called As-tragalizontes, playing at a game of dice, was in the possession of the Emperor Titus at Rome, and was greatly admired. His statues of Canephoræ (female figures carrying baskets on their heads), were so greatly admired, that Cicero says the strangers at Messene crowded to see them, and that "the house in which they were preserved, was less its master's than the ornament or attraction of the whole city." Among the most important of the works of Polycleetus, however, was the statue of a Life-Guard of the King of Persia, termed The Canon, or Rule of Art, of such perfect proportions that other artists referred to it as a standard for executing their own works. Among the other works of Polycleetus, were the statues of an Amazon, Mercury, and several Athletes; also a group of Hercules lifting Antæus, and the image of a Voluptuary, languidly reclining on a couch, which was held in the highest estimation.

As an architect, Polycleetus acquired considerable distinction. One of the monuments of his skill was a marble building erected at Epidaurus, called the Tholus. Pausanias mentions a theatre erected within the precincts of the Temple of Æsculapius, also at Epidaurus, and says it was superior for symmetry and beauty, to any theatre extant.

POLYCLETUS, a Greek sculptor, probably a native of Argos; was the brother and scholar of Naucydes, and flourished about B. C. 380. It is supposed that he was the author of several bronze tripods dedicated at Amyclæ, and two celebrated statues described by Pausanias; namely, the Jupiter Philius, erected at Megalopolis, and the Jupiter Milichius, a marble statue at Argos.

POLYGNOTUS, a preëminent Grecian painter. He was a native of Thasos, an island of the Ægean sea, the son of the painter Aglaophon. Plutarch's account of his friendship for Cimon, and his love for Cimon's sister Elpinice, would indicate that his career commenced about B. C. 460. As Thasos was conquered by the Athenians under Cimon in B. C. 463, it is probable that Polygnotus left his native island at that time, and went with Cimon to Athens. At first he acquired a knowledge of sculpture, but subsequently studied painting under his father, and devoted his energies permanently to that art. He seems to have contributed more largely to the advancement of the art than any preceding painter. Before his time, the human countenance was represented without animation, and a kind of leaden dullness pervaded the features. Polygnotus kindled expression in the face, and threw intellect and feeling into the whole frame. He also first painted the mouth open, so as to display the teeth; and in this way, caused the lips to contribute their full share to the general expression. He first clothed his figures in light, airy, transparent draperies, which he elegantly threw about the light forms of his women. From the expressions of ancient writers, his coloring seems to have been superior to his design; but he was the author both of delicacy and expression in the paintings of Greece. Aristotle calls him Elhicos, one who conveyed an idea of character and moral qualities by his works; in the "Poetics," he contrasts this distinctive quality of Polygnotus with the want of such excellence in Zeuxis; and he also says that Polygnotus made his figures superior, Pauson inferior, and Dionysius equal, to Nature.

Pausanias gives an elaborate description of the pictures by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. They represented the Capture of Troy, the Return of the Greeks, and the Visit of Ulysses to the Shades. The variety of age and sex, and the passionate expressions portrayed, indicate a discrimination of character and a power of expression, fully equal to the eulogisms of the ancient writers. Although these memorable events comprehended so many interesting circumstances, and such terrible situations, that it appeared beyond the power of human genius to depict and unite them, yet the master mind of the artist, filled with the sublime conceptions of Homer, overcame all obstacles, and produced such effects as filled the mind with astonishment. His celebrated picture of Cassandra was sufficient to rank his name as the first painter of Greece. He represented her at the moment when brutally outraged by Ajax, in the temple of Minerva. The face of the unfortunate captive was partially veiled, but the glowing blush of outraged modesty was visible in her countenance. This admirable work is cited by Lucian in his description of the portrait of a perfect woman. "Polygnotus shall open and spread her eyebrows, and give her that warm, glowing, decent blush, which so inimitably beautifies his Cassandra. He likewise shall give her an easy, tasteful, and flowing dress, with all its tender and delicate wavings, partly clinging to her body, and partly fluttering in the wind." In the portico called the Pœcile, at Athens, Polygnotus painted the Battle of Marathon. In the foreground of the picture, the Greeks and Persians were represented as combating with equal valor; but in extending the view to the middle of the composition, the Barbarians were seen flying to the Phœnician ships, which were visible in the distance. The Athenians were so delighted with his work, that they offered to reward him with whatever sum he might please to ask. Upon his declining this generous offer, the Amphictyonic council ordered that he should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went. Among the other works of Polygnotus, were a picture of Ulysses after the slaughter of the Suitors, in the temple of Minerva Area, at Plataea; and the paintings on the Walls of Thespiæ, subsequently restored by Pausias.

POMAREDE, SYLVIVS, an Italian engraver, to whom Professor Christ attributes some prints marked S. P. F., the F for fecit, and says he flourished in 1720. Strutt says he lived in 1620, instead of 1720. Zani calls him (or another artist) Silvio Pomarede, and says he flourished from 1740 to 1768. Nagler calls him Silvestre Pomarede, and gives the same details as Zani, with a list of his prints, the chief of which are, the Triumphs of Time, Fame, Death, and the Christian Religion, after Titian.

POMPADOUR, THE MARCHIONESS OF. This celebrated lady amused herself with engraving. She etched some small plates after Boucher, Eisen, and others. She also engraved a set of sixty-three plates, from gems by Gay.

POMPEI, CONTE ALESSANDRO, an Italian amateur painter, and an eminent architect, born at Verona in 1705. He was of noble descent, and was sent while very young to the college of noblemen at Parma, where he manifested a strong inclination for design. Having completed his education, he devoted his attention to cultivating the sciences, and also studied painting, under Antonio Balestra, but practised it only as a recreation. In 1731, being desirous of rebuilding his palace in the Villa Illasi, and not finding in Verona an architect equal to the undertaking, he turned his thoughts to architecture. According to Milizia, he studied the best authorities, and acquired the requisite knowledge, not from masters, but from his own reasoning; and soon attained great excellence, both in theory and practice. In 1735 he published his work entitled I Cinque Ordini dell' Architettura, Civile di Michele Sanmicheli, containing descriptions of the five orders as employed by Sanmicheli, with a parallel between them and the orders practised by Vitruvius, Leon Battista Alberti, Serlio, Palladio, Scamozzi, and Vignola. This production is highly praised by Milizia for its correct taste. Among the principal edifices of Pompei, are his palace at Illasi, universally admired; the Palazzo Pindimonti, in the village of Vo; the Palazzo Giuliani, at Sessino; and the Merchants' Exchange, at Verona. In the latter city his abilities were frequently in request; and he was also chosen President of the Academy of Painting.

PONCE, NICHOLAS, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1746. He first studied painting under M. Pierre, but abandoned it for engraving, which he learned of Fessard and Delaunay. He distinguished himself in this branch, and was employed on several of the grand publications which do honor to the French nation, such as Le Musée Laurent; Le Cabinet de Choiseul; La Galerie du Palais Royal; Les Campagnes d'Italie; the folio edition of Racine by Didot; the edition of Ariosto by Dussieux, of which all the prints after Cochin's designs are engraved by Ponce; Les Illustres Français, avec les Notices historiques, 56 plates; Les Bains de Titus et du Livie, 75 plates; and La Guerre d'Amerique, engraved conjointly with Godefroy. He edited an edition of the Bible, with 300 plates after Marillier; and the beautiful edition of the Charter, dedicated to Louis XVIII. In addition to these numerous works, he executed some detached pieces after various masters, among which are Christ curing the blind Man, after le Sueur; the Battle of Marengo, after C. Vernet; the Virgin and Child, after Vouet; the Marriage of the Virgin, after Vanloo, &c. He also distinguished himself as an author; wrote and translated several works on the Fine Arts; was elected a member of various academies and literary societies, a corresponding member of the Royal Institute of France, and a member of the Legion of Honor. His life was one of extraordinary industry and great usefulness. He died in 1831.

PONCE, ROQUE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Madrid about 1690. He studied under Juan de la Costa, and painted landscapes in a style of excellence.

PONCHEL, CHARLES EUGENE DU, a French engraver, born at Abbeville, in 1748. He studied with Jacques Nicholas Tardieu, at Paris, and engraved several plates of portraits and historical subjects, among which are the Madonna della Seggiola, after Raffaelle; and a Holy Family, after Andrea del Sarto. He went to England about 1779, where he resided some time, and engraved a few plates.

PONCHINO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, called IL BOZZATO, a painter born at Castelfranco in 1500. There is considerable discrepancy about him, but the following is Lanzi's account: "He was a friend of Paolo Veronese, and an excellent pupil of Titian, whom, in some things, he imitated. He has been erroneously denominated by historians. He is called by Vasari, Zanetti, and Guarienti, Bazzacco and Brazzacco da Castelfranco, and Guarienti makes him the scholar of Badile. My information respecting him, as well as other artists of Castelfranco, has been obtained from a MS. communicated to me by the learned Dottore Trevisani. He took the name of Gio. Battista Ponchino, and the surname of Bozzato, a city of his native country, where several of his paintings in fresco still exist, together with his celebrated piece of the Limbo, in the church of S. Liberale—the finest work, if we except those of Giorgione, which that city has to boast, and it is greatly admired by strangers. He painted also at Venice and Vicenza, during the lifetime of his wife, a daughter of Dario Varotari; but at her death, he assumed the ecclesiastical habit, and afterwards paid little attention to the art." He died in 1570.

POND, ARTHUR, an English painter and engraver, of whom little is known. He was evidently a learned man, as Pilkington says he was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He is said to have contributed greatly to the encouragement of art in England, but in what manner we are not told. He painted portraits, both in oil and crayons, and, in conjunction with George Knapton, published a collection of heads of illustrious persons, engraved by Houbraken and Vertue; the memoirs were written by Dr. Birch. He engraved and published, in conjunction with Knapton, a set of ninety-five plates from the drawings of the great Italian masters, in a tasteful and spirited style, in imitation of the originals. He also engraved a set of twenty-five caricatures, after Cav. Ghezzi, and etched a few portraits in a style resembling that of Rembrandt. He died in 1758.

PONSE, JORIS, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1723. He studied under A. Schouman, in whose style he painted cabinet pictures of birds, fruit, and flowers, more remarkable for elaborate finishing, than for elegance of composition. He died at Dort in 1783.

PONT, NICHOLAS DU, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1660, and died there in 1712. He painted landscapes and architectural pieces, in which the figures are attributed to Bout, the coadjutor of Bondewyns. There is a perspective of a grand palace by him, with figures by Bout, in the Museum at Ghent.

PONTE, FRANCESCO DA, called also THE ELDER BASSANO, was the head of a family and school of artists called the Bassans, highly distinguished during and beyond the 16th century. He was born at Vicenza, about 1475, and is supposed to have studied at Venice, under Giovanni Bellini, whose style he at first imitated. He afterwards settled at Bassano, on the Brenta, from which town he and his descendants obtained their surname. He was well versed in polite literature and philosophy. He gradually abandoned the dry and gothic style in which he had been instructed, and adopted one of greater freedom, softness, and harmony of coloring, approaching the moderns. The styles of his altar-pieces, when compared with each other, manifest his progress, from the earliest to the latest specimens of his pencil. He is diligent, but dry, in his S. Bartolomeo at Bassano; more soft in another in the church of S. Giovanni; but best in his Descent of the Holy Ghost, in a church at the village of Oliero, near Bassano, a grand composition, with rich and harmonious coloring, and a fine expression in the heads. He died at Bassano in 1530, according to Verci, who wrote the Anecdotes of the lives and works of the artists of Bassano.

PONTE, GIACOMO DA, commonly called IL BASSANO, was the son of the preceding, born at Bassano in 1510. He received his first instruction from his father, and some of his youthful efforts are in the church of S. Bernardino in his native place, which bear the impress of his early education. He went to Venice for improvement, and was recommended to Bonifazio Veneziano—a master equally jealous of the secrets of his art as Titian and Tintoretto—from whom he obtained no advantage in seeing him color his pictures, except by secretly watching him through the key-hole at the door of his studio. He derived much advantage, however, in designing from the cartoons of Parmiggiano, and in copying the pictures of Bonifazio and Titian. It has been supposed by some that he studied a short time under Titian; and Lanzi says, "if conformity of manner—not always a sure guide—were sufficient evidence, we might admit the truth of the supposition, his second style being altogether that of Titian; and some of his youthful productions, as the Nativity and Flight into Egypt, seemed to promise a second Titian, so richly were they imbued with his sweetness of taste." At this period, too, he drew some of his figures larger than life, and aspired to a greatness of style of which he showed himself not incapable.

No correct idea of the style and real merits of Bassano can be formed from the generality of his biographers, as for the most part they copy Vasari, who could find more faults to condemn than beauties to commend in the works of this artist, and who certainly has not judged him with the candor his merits deserve. He was the head of a great school, which had more imitators than almost any other in the history of art. We have nowhere read so able, just, and learned a criticism upon his works as that of Lanzi; for which reason, and in consideration of his school, we give his own words, somewhat abridged, but strictly preserving the sense.

"Upon the death of his father, he was compelled to return to Bassano, a city at this day rich and populous, and in those times considerably esteemed, its situation being delightful, abounding with flocks and herds, and well adapted for fairs and the sale of merchandise. From these elements arose, by degrees, his formation of a third style, full of simplicity and grace, which gave the first indications in Italy of a taste altogether foreign—that of the Flemish school. In the use of his pencil, Jacopo may be said to have pursued two different methods. The first of these is much softened by a fine union of tints, and at last determined with fine strokes; the second, resulting in a great measure from the other, was formed by simple strokes of the pencil, with clear and pleasing tints, and a certain command, or rather audacity of art, that, nearly viewed, appears a confused mixture, but from a proper distance, an enchanting effect, of coloring. In both methods, he displays the originality of his own style, chiefly consisting of a soft and luscious composition, partaking at once of the triangular and circular forms, and arriving at a certain contrast of postures; so that if one of the figures is in full face, the other turns its shoulders, and if there are several figures in the composition, they are so arranged that the heads shall meet in the same line; in want of these, some of the objects are elevated in the same direction. In regard to his lights, he appears partial to such as are confined to one part, and he displays a masterly power in rendering it subservient to the whole; for with these rare lights, with the frequent use of middle tints, and the absence of deep obscure, he succeeded admirably in harmonizing the most opposite colors. In the gradation of his lights, he often contrives that the shadow of the interior figure shall serve as a ground for the one more forward, and that the figures should partake of few lights, but extremely bold and vivid at the angles; as, for instance, on the top of the shoulder, on the knee, and on the elbow, for which purpose he makes use of a flow or sweep of the folds, natural to all appearance, but in fact highly artificial, to favor his peculiar system. In proportion to the varieties of his draperies, he varies the folds with a delicacy of judgment that falls to the lot of few artists. His colors everywhere shine like gems; in particular his greens, which display an emerald tinge peculiar to himself.

"At the outset, Jacopo aspired to a grander style, which is apparent from some of his pictures remaining in the façade of the Casa Michieli at Venice. Among these, a Sampson slaying the Philistines meets with much praise; and indeed they all partake of the boldness of Michael Angelo. But, whether the result of disposition or judgment, he afterwards confined himself to smaller proportions, and to subjects of less power; even the figures in his altar-pieces are less than life size, and little animated. We do not meet with any of that noble architecture in his paintings, that adds so much to the dignity of those of the Venetian school. He appears rather anxious to find subjects into which he can introduce landscapes, cottages, candle-lights, animals, copper vessels, and all such objects as passed under his eye, which he copied with surprising accuracy. His ideas were limited, and he often repeated them—a fault to be attributed to his situation, it being an indisputable fact that the conceptions of both artists and writers become enlarged and increased by a residence in large capitals, and diminished in small places. All this may be gathered from his pictures produced for private ornament, the most familiar occupation of his life, inasmuch as he executed very few large altar-pieces. He conducted these works at his leisure in his studio, and, with the assistance of his scholars, having prepared a great number of various dimensions, he sent them to Venice, sometimes to the most frequented fairs; and produced so many as to render it a disgrace to a collection not to possess pictures by his hand rather than an honor to have them. In these may be viewed, almost invariably, the same subjects, consisting of acts from the Old and New Testaments; the Feasts of Martha, of the Pharisee, of the Rich Man, with a splendid display of brazen vessels; the Ark of Noah, the Return of Jacob, the Annunciation of the Angel to the Shepherds, with a great variety of animals. To these we may add, the Queen of Sheba, the Adoration of the Magi, with regal pomp of dress, and the richest array; then the Deposition of our Lord from the Cross, by torchlight. His pictures upon profane subjects exhibit the sale of beasts, and brazen vessels; sometimes rural occupations and husbandry corresponding to the seasons of the year; sometimes without human figures, merely a kitchen with furniture, a fowl-yard, or similar subjects. Nor is it the histories or compositions themselves that recur in every collection to the eye, but even countenances taken from individuals of his own family; for instance, arraying his own daughter as a queen of Sheba, a Magdalen, or a Villager presenting fowls to the infant Jesus. I have likewise seen an entire piece, entitled the Family of Bassano, sometimes in small size, and sometimes in large. Of the former, I remarked a specimen in possession of Sig. Ambrogio Durazzo at Genoa, where the daughters of the painter are seen, intent upon their feminine occupations, while a little boy is playing, and a domestic lighting a candle. One of the second kind, representing an Academy of Music, may be seen in the Medicean Museum.

“By this method, Bassano seemed to confess the poverty of his invention, though he derived from it a very remarkable advantage. By dint of continually repeating the same things, he brought them to the very utmost point of perfection of which they were susceptible, as we may gather from his picture of the Nativity in the church of S. Giuseppe at Bassano, which is not only the masterpiece of Jacopo, but in force of colors and the chiaro-scuro, surpasses everything that modern painting has to boast. The same is seen in his Burial of Christ, at the Seminario of Padua, which seems to breathe a spirit of pity and holy terror. Finally, in his Sacrifice of Noah in Santa Maria Maggiore at Venice, he represented all the birds and animals he had ever drawn elsewhere, producing a work so greatly admired by Titian that he wished to purchase a copy for the ornament of his own studio.

“Hence it happens that the works of Bassano, conducted at a certain age and with singular care, are estimated very highly and purchased at large sums, though not exempt from errors of perspective, awkwardness of postures, and faults in composition, particularly in point of symmetry. Indeed, it was the general belief that he possessed little skill in designing the extremities, thus avoiding as much as possible the introduction of hands and feet into his pictures. These accusations, and others before alluded to, might be greatly extenuated by producing such examples of his works as fully prove that he could, when he pleased, draw much better than he was accustomed to do. He knew how to vary his compositions, as evinced in his Nativity at the Ambrosiana at Milan, and he might as easily have varied his other pieces. He was also capable of conceiving with equal novelty and propriety, as we gather from his S. Rocco at Vicenza; and he might, if he would, thus have shone on other occasions. Moreover, that he knew how to draw the extremities, appears from his picture of St. Pietro in the church of the Umiltà at Venice; and he could give dignity to his countenances, as in his Queen of Sheba at Brescia. But whether he found such a task irksome, or from whatever other cause, he rarely displayed his full powers. He was generally content with reaching his peculiar method of coloring, of illuminating, and of shading, with a sovereign skill. So universally was he admired that he received numerous commissions from various courts, and an invitation to that of Vienna. What is more honorable, notwithstanding his defects, he extorted the highest praise, if not from Vasari, yet from many of the most renowned artists of his time, from Titian, from Annibale Caracci, who was so deceived by a book he painted upon a table that he stretched out his hand to take it up; and from Tintoretto, who commended his coloring, and in some measure wished to imitate him. Above all, he was honored by Paul Veronese, who intrusted him with his son Carletto for a pupil, to receive his general instructions, and more particularly in regard to that just disposition of lights reflected from one object to another, and in those happy counterpositions, owing to which the depicted objects seem clothed with a profusion of light.’ Such is the flattering notice given by Count Algarotti to the style of Jacopo da Ponte.”

It will be perceived, from the above account, that this artist had three manners; his first, or early one, partaking of that of his father; his second, resembling Titian; his third, original and peculiar to himself. It is to this artist that authors refer when they speak of Bassano, and to his last manner when they speak of the imitators of the style of Bassano, or of the Bassans. Jacopo Bassano designed and wrought with wonderful facility, and executed a multitude of works, which are to be found in the collections of every civilized country. His pictures have also been copied and imitated ad infinitum. His best works were held in great estimation, even in his own day, and he was invited to the court of the Emperor Rodolphus II., with the offer of a liberal pension; but he declined, preferring his own delightful retreat on the banks of the Brenta, to any prospect of emolument or honor. He also distinguished himself in portraits, and painted those of the Doge Sebastiano Venerio, Ariosto, and Tasso. Bassano educated four of his sons to his profession, and liberally instructed many pupils. He died in 1592.

PONTE, FRANCESCO DA, called THE YOUNGER, was the eldest son of Giacomo da P., born at Bassano in 1548, and was brought up in the school of his father. Lanzi says that of the “four sons of Jacopo, Francesco and Leandro were the best endowed to follow in his footsteps, and he was accustomed to pride himself upon the inventive talents of the former, and the singular ability of the latter in portraits. Of his two other sons, Gio. Battista and Girolamo, he used to observe that they were the most accurate copyists of his works.” Francesco afterwards established himself at Venice, where he greatly distinguished himself by the admirable works he executed for the churches and public edifices. He was employed to paint a series of pictures, for the ducal palace called the Palazzo Grande, illustrating the history of the Republic. Lanzi says, "his father assisted him with his advice in these works, himself attending on the spot, and instructing him, when he found occasion, how to add force to his tints, to improve his perspective, and to bring the whole work to the most perfect degree of art. His pencil may be very clearly traced in that of his son, as well as his style, which, in the opinion of some critics, is somewhat too much loaded, especially in his shades." It is no slight proof of his distinguished talents, that these ingenious productions sustain their claim to admiration, although in the immediate vicinity of some of the most esteemed works of Tintoretto and Paul Veronese. He painted several altar-pieces and other works for the churches at Venice and in the State, which sustained his reputation, though less vigorous than those of his father. There is also a fine picture of Paradise, in the church of Il Gesù at Rome, and another of St. Apollonio in S. Afra at Brescia. He would have achieved still greater things, had he not been afflicted with fits of melancholy so severe as to deprive him of reason. Finally, while under this influence, he threw himself from a window, and was immediately killed, in 1591, in the prime of life.

PONTE, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DA, was the second son of Giacomo da P., born at Bassano in 1553, and died in 1613. He was instructed by his father, and imitated his subjects and manner, with a precision that deceived the most experienced. He copied the works of Jacopo, and Lanzi says there is no original work attributed to him, except an altar-piece with his name, in the church of S. Gallio at Bassano, painted in the style of his brother Leandro. Doubtless he painted many works from his own compositions, but they are now all attributed to Jacopo—the inevitable fate of every successful imitator.

PONTE, CAV. LEANDRO DA, was the third son of Giacomo da P., born at Bassano in 1558. He also studied and followed the same maxims of art; but, by his skill and practice in portrait painting, he acquired more originality of expression. Lanzi says that "in the management of his pencil, he approaches nearer to the first than the second style of Jacopo. He is, moreover, more variable in it, and inclines somewhat to the mannerism of the age." One of his best performances is a picture of St. Caterina crowned by our Lord, in the church of S. Francesco at Bassano, with figures much larger than customary with the Bassanese school. Other fine pictures are the Resurrection of Lazarus at La Carità, afterwards placed in the Louvre; and the Nativity of the Virgin in S. Sofia, in his native city. He also produced several works for the churches at Venice, and in the State, distinguished by large proportions. He finished some of his brother's works in the Ducal palace, left incomplete at his death. Lanzi says, "if familiar with his father's productions, we may frequently detect domestic plagiarisms in Leandro, who often repeats the Family of da Ponte, copied in innumerable pieces, by Jacopo, by his sons, and by their imitators. Even in his pictures for private ornament, conducted according to his own style and fancy, he was fond of adopting paternal subjects and examples, being very skillful in drawing animals of every kind from nature." He, however, acquired most reputation for his admirable portraits, and executed an immense number, of princes and distinguished persons. He was invited to Vienna by Rodolph II., and painted the Imperial family, so much to the satisfaction of that monarch that he offered to make him his court painter; but Leandro declined, being more ambitious of enjoying fame at Venice than Vienna. He painted a noble portrait of the Doge Grimani, who conferred on him the honor of knighthood. Leandro was fond of display, supported his dignity with an imposing demeanor, and lodged, dressed, and maintained his table in princely splendor. He appeared in public, decorated with a gold collar and the insignia of St. Mark, accompanied by a train of disciples, one of whom bore his gold cane, and another the repertory in which he noted down all that was to be done during the day. Being suspicious of poison, he had his tasters, who took something of everything he ate or drank. Like his brother, he was at times afflicted with fits of melancholy. He died in 1623.

PONTE, GIROLAMO DA, was the youngest son of Giacomo da P., born at Bassano in 1560. Like his brother, Gio. Battista, he copied and imitated his father's works so perfectly as to make them pass at the time for originals by his father, to whom they are now mostly attributed. He, however, painted some works for the churches at Bassano, and other places in the vicinity, in which he excelled his father in the graceful airs of his heads. These compositions are very simple, and the coloring sweet and harmonious. Such is his picture of St. Barbara, in the church of S. Giovanni at Bassano. He also painted an altar-piece at Venice, after the composition of Leandro. He died in 1622. There were others of this name, the descendants of the preceding artists, but they are unknown in the history of art. The works of the Bassani, and those of their imitators, which possess sufficient resemblance of style and manner of execution, are all attributed to Jacopo.

PONTE, GIOVANNI DA, an old painter, born at Florence in 1306. He was a scholar of Buffalmacco, and acquired distinction in his time. Most of his works have perished. There are some remains of his pictures in the church of S. Francesco at Arezzo. He died in 1365.

PONTE, GIOVANNI DA, an eminent Italian architect, born at Venice in 1512. He attained great distinction in his native city, in an age illustrated by several preëminent professors of the art. According to Milizia, when the great Council Hall was burned, and the Ducal palace much injured, Giovanni da Ponte rebuilt the whole, notwithstanding the contrary opinion of Palladio, who desired a new palace, thinking any repairs would be useless; but the restoration was so admirably conducted, that the edifice still remains beautiful and strong. The greatest triumph of da Ponte was the bridge over the Rialto, for which his design was preferred to those of Scamozzi and Palladio. Milizia says the mechanical arrangement was highly ingenious, although the work was thought to be weak, and operations were consequently suspended for some time; but, upon examination it was pronounced perfectly sound, and was safely completed in the third year from its commencement, without having settled in the least. It is built of Istrian stone. Da Ponte also built the well known prison united to the Ducal palace by the famous "Bridge of Sighs"; highly praised for its solidity and magnificence. Among his other works at Venice were the warehouse of the Arsenal; the gate of the church degl' Incurabili; and the church of Santa Croce. He died in 1597.

PONTIUS, PAUL, a very eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about 1596. He studied engraving under Lucas Vostermans, but he greatly improved his design, and the effect in his prints, through the advice and friendship of Rubens, and engraved many admirable plates from his works, in the execution of which he seems to have possessed the mind of that great master. Few engravers have equalled him in correct and faithful imitation of their models, and in preserving in his figures the character and expression of the originals. In his fine portraits after Vandyck, he seems to have adapted his style to the character of the persons represented. His plates are executed with the graver, in a clear, bold style; and, though he did not possess the facility of Bolswert, or the delicacy of Vostermans, his plates will be ranked among the ablest productions of the Flemish engravers. The following is an ample list of his principal works; a full catalogue may be found in Nagler's Lexicon.

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDYCK.

Paul du Pont, or Pontius, Engraver. Peter Paul Rubens. James de Breuck, Architect. John Wildens, Painter, of Antwerp. John van Ravesteyn, Painter, of the Hague. Palamedes Palamdessen, Dutch Painter. St. Rosalia receiving a Crown from the infant Jesus; do. The Holy Family; after J. van Hoek. The Entombing of Christ; after Titian.

PONTONS, PABLO (PAUL), a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1606. He studied under Pedro Orrente, a scholar of Bassano, and followed the style of his instructor, both in design and coloring. He executed several works for the churches and convents of Valencia, of which the most considerable are a series of subjects from the life of San Pedro de Nola, in the church and cloister of the convent de la Merced. He painted some altar-pieces for the monastery de la Cartuja del Puche; and in the church of S. Maria de Morella, there are by him a Nativity and an Adoration of the Magi. He was also a good painter of portraits. He died in 1670.

PONTORMO, JACOPO. See CARRUCCI.

PONZ, DON ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, and a distinguished promoter of art, born at Bexix, in the province of Valencia, in 1725. He was intended for a literary career, but manifesting a strong inclination for art, was placed in the school of Antonio Richart at Valencia. In 1746 he visited Madrid for improvement, and afterwards went to Rome. On returning to Spain he was commissioned to paint for the Royal Library, the portraits of the most eminent Spanish authors. He was chosen by the King to select from the pictures in the convents of Andalusia, those most desirable for the Academy of San Fernando. In 1776 he was chosen secretary of that institution, and discharged the duties of his office during a period of fourteen years. It was to Ponz that Raphael Mengs addressed his descriptions of the pictures in the palace at Madrid, inserted in the sixth volume of his works. Ponz procured the publication of Guevara's work, entitled Comentarios de la Pintura. He wrote a large work of Travels in Spain, illustrated with numerous plates from his own designs; of which eighteen volumes were published. He instructed a large number of scholars, with great care; and was elected a member of nearly all the Academies of Fine Arts in Europe. The time of his death is not recorded; but his obsequies were celebrated with great pomp, by the Academy of San Fernando.

PONZ, MOYSES JACOB, a Spanish painter, born at Valls, near Tarragona, towards the close of the 17th century. He studied under Juncosa, and acquired considerable reputation for his works, designed in a good taste, and agreeably colored. In 1722 he was commissioned to paint a great part of the pictures in the Carthusian monastery. In 1732 he painted several frescos, and a fine picture of Christ reposing in the arms of the Virgin, in the Hermitage of Our Lady, near Reus.

PONZIO, PAOLO, an Italian sculptor, a native of Florence, who flourished about 1550. He visited France, and was employed under Primaticcio, upon the works executed in the reign of Francis I. He was first employed in the sculptures at Meudon; and afterwards at Fontainebleau, where he executed most of the sculptures which decorate that magnificent edifice. His mausoleum of Louis XII. and Anne of Bretagne, is praised by M. Alexandre Lenoir, for its elevated design and studied execution; although a correct taste will scarcely approve of representing the bodies of a monarch and his consort as they appeared after death. This mausoleum is now in the church of St. Denis. Among the other works of Ponzio, were a bronze statue of Alberto Pio, prince of Carpi, who died at Paris in 1530; and a statue of Charlemagne, which was greatly esteemed by Bernini.

PONZIO, FLAMINIO, a distinguished Lombard architect, who flourished about 1600. He visited Rome, where he was extensively patronized, and gained eminence in the art. He was commissioned by the Borghese family to erect the celebrated Pauline chapel in S. Maria Maggiore, similar to the Sistine chapel, but more profusely ornamented with intaglios and sculpture. Milizia highly praises his façade of the Palazzo Sciarra Colonna, as a shining example of the simple, correct, and majestic style of architecture. In this beautiful work, the windows are justly disposed; the ornaments are simple; there are no superfluous cornices, no breaks or projections, but a single entablature crowns the whole. Among the other works of Ponzio, are the sacristy in S. Maria Maggiore; and the grand double staircase in the Quirinal palace. He died, aged forty-five, during the pontificate of Paul V., who filled the papal chair from 1605 to 1621.

PONZONE, CAV. MATTEO, a painter of the Venetian school, and a native of Dalmatia. He studied under Santo Peranda, and assisted him in his great works at Mirandola. He at first adopted the manner of his instructor, but afterwards formed an original style, which Lanzi says surpassed Peranda in sweetness of coloring, though inferior to him in elegance of design. He was fond of copying from life without attempting much to add to its dignity. He acquired considerable distinction, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Venice, and also for the collections. It is generally, but erroneously, said that he was born at Venice. He was called Il Cav. Dalmatino; perhaps on account of his native country. He flourished about the middle of the 17th century, and perhaps later. He is said to have died about 1700, if so, he lived to a great age, as his instructor died in 1638.

PONZONI, GIOVANNI DE', a Milanese painter, who flourished about 1450. He was a reputable painter in his time, and executed, among other works, a picture of S. Cristoforo, in the church called Samaritana.

POOL, JURIAEN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1666. He was distinguished as a portrait painter, and passed the early part of his life at the court of the Elector Palatine, by whom his works were much esteemed. On the death of his patron, he returned to Holland, where he is said to have abandoned painting and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He married Rachel Ruysch, the celebrated paintress of flowers and fruit. He died in 1745.

POOL, MATTHEW, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1670. He went to Paris, where he learned the art of engraving, and on his return to Amsterdam executed a variety of plates after the Italian, Flemish, and French masters, in a style resembling that of Bernard Picart. He was living in 1727. Among others are the following by him:

The Portrait of Barent Graat, Painter. The Infancy of Jupiter; after B. Graat. Cupid taken in a Net by Time; after Guercino. A Bacchanalian subject; after N. Poussin. A set of twelve subjects; from designs by Rembrandt. A set of one hundred and three plates, entitled The Cabinet of the Art of Sculpture, by Francis van Bossuit; from drawings by B. Graat. Three burlesque representations of the Ceremonies adopted by the Flemish painters at Rome; do.

POOL, RACHEL. See RUYSCH.

POOST, FRANCIS. See POST.

POPELS, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, born at Tournay about 1630. He engraved some of the plates from pictures in the gallery of the Archduke at Brussels, for the collection of prints called the Cabinet of Teniers, among which are the following:

Hagar and Ishmael; after Titian. St. George and St. Stephen; after Gio. Bellini. St. John Baptist and St. Roch; after Palma Vecchio. The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John and St. Catherine; after Palma Giovine. A dead Christ, supported by Joseph of Arimathea; after Schiavone.

POPOLI, CAV. GIACINTO DE', a painter of the Neapolitan school, according to Dominici, and a native of Orta. He studied at Naples under Cav. Massimo Stanzioni, and was one of his most celebrated scholars. He formed a style for himself, founded on that of his master, which was more admired for fertility of invention and elegance of composition, than for the grace of the figures. He acquired great reputation, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Naples. He died in 1682.

POPPI, DA. See FRANCESCO MORANDINI.

POR, DANIELLO DE, called also DANIELLO DA PARMA, a painter of whom little is known. According to Vasari, he was an assistant of Correggio, and acquired from him and Parmiggiano, a certain softness of manner. The only work he mentions by him is a fresco in the church of S. Vito, where he invited Taddeo Zuccaro to join him as an assistant. He died at Rome, according to Bottari, in 1566.

PORBUS. See POURBUS.

PORCELLO, GIOVANNI, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, according to Hackert, in 1682. He studied under Cav. Francesco Solimena at Naples, and adopted his manner. On returning to his native city, he found the art at an extremely low ebb, and attempted to revive it by opening an academy in his own house, to diffuse the taste and principles of his master, which he fully possessed. He executed some works for the churches, and died in 1734.

PORCIA, IL. See APOLLODORO.

PORDENONE. See LICINIO.

PORETTANO, PIER MARIA, a Bolognese painter, who, according to Malvasia, was a scholar of the Caracci, and executed some works in their style for the churches at Bologna and the adjacent cities. Lanzi also briefly commends him as an excellent disciple of that school. He died in the first part of the 17th century.

PORFIRIO, BERNARDINO DI, an eminent worker in mosaic, born at Leccio, in the Florentine state. He executed a picture for Francis I., from the design of Vasari, "composed of Oriental alabaster, and large slabs of jasper, heliotrope, cornelian, lapis-lazuli, agate, and other precious stones and gems, valued at 20,000 crowns." He was living in 1568.

PORIDEO, GREGORIO, a Venetian painter, whom Lanzi supposes to have studied under Titian. There is a beautiful Madonna, executed in the manner of Titian, in the noble collection in the Casa Pisani, signed Gregorius Porideus, "most probably the production of one of Titian's imitators, whose name is now fallen into oblivion."

PORINUS. See ANTISTATES.

PORPORA, PAOLO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, was a scholar of Aniello Falcone, and at first painted battle-pieces, in the style of his master; but the impulse of his genius led him to paint pictures of fish, shells, and other marine productions, in which he succeeded to admiration. He was also skilled in painting flowers and fruit. He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1656, and died in 1680.

PORPORATI, CARLO ANTONIO, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Turin in 1741. He was intended for the profession of an architect, but manifesting a strong inclination for engraving, by copying with the pen all the prints he could find, he was encouraged by Count Bogino, minister of the Sardinian King, who commissioned him to design the Capture of Asti. He succeeded so well that the King assigned him a pension, and sent him to Paris for improvement. He studied under J. G. Wille, Chevillet, and Beauvarlet; and acquired considerable celebrity for his portrait of Charles Emanuel III., and other plates. He adopted an original style, and was the first of the Italian engravers who availed himself of the elegance and purity of line attained by the use of the graver alone. The flesh parts of his plates are exceedingly delicate; the heads are expressive and graceful; and the general effect harmonious. His many excellencies gained him a high reputation; but the draperies, animals, and landscapes in his plates are treated in a monotonous style, destitute of variety. In 1773, Porporati was chosen a member of the French Academy, and presented his plate of Susanna and the Elders, as his reception piece. Returning to Turin, he was appointed engraver to the King, and gained a high reputation. He was invited to Naples to establish a school of engraving; and during his residence in that city, he employed four years in engraving Raffaele's picture of the Madonna with the Rabbit. In 1797 he returned to Turin to complete his plate of the Bath of Leda, after Correggio. This was his last production, on account of enfeebled eyesight; and from this time until his death, in 1816, he instructed a number of pupils in the art. The following are his principal plates:

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Philip Vanduyck. Tanered and Clorinda; after C. Vantoo. Erminia asking shelter of a Shepherd; do. Cupid in Meditation; after Angelica Kauffman. The Death of Abel; after A. vander Werf. The Madonna with the Rabbit; after Raffaele. Venus caressing Cupid; after Pompeo Battoni. Jupiter and Leda; after Correggio; very fine. Leda and the Swan, and Leda bathing; do. La Zingarella; do. The young Girl with a Dog; after Greuze. The Lady preparing for Bed, and Paris and Helen.

PORRO, GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver on wood and copper, born at Padua about 1520. He wrought in various Italian cities, and engraved many plates in a tasteful and delicate style, for various works, among which were those in the edition of Orlando Furioso, published at Venice in 1548; one hundred prints in Camillo Camilli's Impressi degli uomini illustri; and his last work, a set of wooden cuts for I Funerali degli antichi di diversi popoli e nazioni, by Tommaso Porcacchi, published in 1574.

PORRO, MASO, an eminent painter on glass, and a native of Cortona, who flourished about 1560. He was employed in decorating the windows of the churches in Tuscany and elsewhere.

PORTA, BACCIO DELLA, called also IL FRATE, and FRÀ BARTOLOMEO DI SAN MARCO. This celebrated painter was born in the territory of Savignano, near Florence, in 1469. While very young he became the disciple of Cosimo Rosselli, and acquired the name of Baccio della Porta, from his residence near the gate of St. Peter. After passing some years under the instruction of that master, he applied himself with great assiduity to studying the works of Leonardo da Vinci, whose admirable chiaro-scuro and grandeur of relief were the particular objects of his admiration. In company with his friend Mariotto Albertinelli, he modeled and copied from the ancient bassi-relievi, by which means he acquired a breadth of light and shadow that forms one of the most striking characteristics of his style. His first works were of small size, gracefully composed and designed, and highly finished; such are his two cabinet pictures in the Florentine gallery, representing the Nativity and the Circumcision. But he afterwards adopted a grander style, and in his fresco of the Last Judgment, in the chapel of S. Maria Nuova, he evinced powers of a superior order. About this time, he became acquainted, and formed an intimate friendship, with the famous monk Jerome Savonarola, whose preaching had such an effect upon his mind that he is said to have destroyed all the studies he had previously made from the naked figure. He was employed in the convent of S. Marco, when the officers broke into the monastery by order of Pope Alexander VI., to seize the person of Savonarola, who was condemned to the stake. The execution of his friend preyed upon the mind of della Porta, and he entered the convent of S. Marco in 1500, at the age of 31, assuming the name of Frà Bartolomeo, and was called Il Frate. Like Botticelli and Credi, he abandoned the pencil for nearly four years; but after resuming it he seems to have made constant improvement during the remainder of his life; so that his earlier productions, though very beautiful, are inferior to the last. His improvement was accelerated by the friendship he contracted with Raffaele, who visited Florence for improvement about 1504. Il Frate instructed him in coloring and the folding of draperies, and in return Raffaele taught him the rules of perspective. Some years afterwards he went to Rome, to view the works of the two great rivals of the age, Michael Angelo, and Raffaele, and greatly elevated his style. "In that place" says Baldinucci, "he appeared with diminished lustre, in presence of those two great luminaries of the art, and speedily returned to Florence—a circumstance which also happened to Andrea del Sarto, Il Rosso, and other truly eminent masters, whose modesty was equal to the confidence of innumerable artists of mediocrity, who frequently enjoyed at Rome much ill placed patronage. Il Frate left there only two figures of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the Quirinal palace; the St. Peter, he left unfinished, and it received its last touches from the hand of Raffaello." The following admirable critique is extracted from Lanzi. "His manner at all times was more conformable to that of his friend (Raffaello), than to that of his fellow citizen (M. Angelo), uniting dignity with grace in his heads, and in the general design. His picture in the Pitti Palace, painted before he went to Rome, is a proof of this. His most finished productions are in Tuscany, which boasts various altar-pieces, all of them very valuable. Their composition is in the usual style of the age, which may be observed in the productions of every school, not excepting Raffaello, and which continued in the Florentine until the time of Pontormo; viz., a Madonna, seated with the Infant Jesus, and accompanied by saints. But in these hackneyed subjects, Il Frate distinguished himself by grand architecture, magnificent flights of steps, and the skillful grouping of his saints and cherubs; some of which are seated in concert, and some poised on their wings, to minister to their King and Queen, while others support the drapery, and others again have charge of the pavilion, a rich and happily conceived ornament, which he readily connected with such thrones, even in his cabinet pictures. He departed from this mode of composition in a picture he left in the church of S. Romano of Lucca, called la Madonna della Misericordia, who sits in a very graceful attitude, amid a crowd of devotees, shielding them with her mantle from the wrath of heaven. His rivals occasioned the production of two more altar-pieces, differing from his usual style; according to the example of other eminent men, he answered them by his classic performances, a retort the most galling to the invidious. They had stigmatized him as unequal to large proportions; and he filled a large piece with a single figure of St. Mark, which is admired as a prodigy of art in the Ducal Gallery, and is described by a learned foreigner (the Abbé Winckelmann), as a Grecian statue transformed into a picture. He was accused of being ignorant of the anatomy of the human figure; and to refute this calumny, he introduced a naked St. Sebastian into another picture, in the church of that saint, which was so perfect in drawing and coloring that it received the unbounded applause of artists, but being too much admired by the female devotees, it was removed by the fathers into a private room, and afterwards sold and sent into France. In short, Il Frate knew how to excel in every department of painting. His design is most chaste; his youthful pieces are more full and fleshy than was usual with Raffaello, and according to Algarotti, they are little elevated above the standard of ordinary men. His tints at an early period abounded with shadows produced by lamp-black or ivory-black, which impairs the value of some of his pictures; but he gradually acquired a better manner, so as to be able to instruct Raffaello. In firmness and clearness, he yields not to the best of the school of Lombardy. He was the inventor of a new method of casting draperies, having taught the use of the wooden figure, with moveable joints, which serves admirably for the study of the folds of drapery. His works are to be seen in several private collections at Florence, but they are rare beyond the precincts of that city; they are eagerly sought after by foreigners, but very rarely sold. The Fathers of St. Mark have a considerable number of his paintings in their private chapel, and among them a St. Vincenzo, said by Bottari, to resemble a work by Titian or Giorgione. His best and rarest performances are in the possession of the Prince, in whose collection is his last work, considered a model of art, a large picture in chiaro-scuro, representing the patron Saints of the City, surrounding the Virgin.

"The method of Il Frate was first to draw the figure naked, then to drape it, and form a chiaro-scuro, sometimes in oils, that marked the distribution of the light and shadow, which constituted his great study, and the soul of his pictures; the large chiaro-scuro before mentioned demonstrates such preparatives, and it has as high a value in painting as the antique plaster models have in sculpture, in which Winckelmann discovers the stamp of genius and compass of design, better than in sculptured marbles."

Several of the most celebrated works of Frà Bartolomeo were transferred by Napoleon from Florence to the Louvre, but they were afterwards restored. He gave the most of his designs to del Piombo, who deposited them with a Nun, as related by Vasari, in the convent of St. Catherine, at Florence. They came into the possession of Sir Benj. West, and afterwards into that of Sir Thomas Lawrence, at whose death, they were purchased by the Messrs. Smith, print dealers at London, and scattered over the world. See Introduction, p. vi., and del Piombo. Frà Bartolomeo died at Florence in 1517.

PORTA, GIUSEPPE, called also SALVIATI. This painter was born at Castel Nuovo, in the Grafagnana, in 1535. He was sent to Rome while young, and placed under Francesco Salviati, an eminent Florentine painter, from whom he acquired such an excellent taste of design, that he was called after the name of his master. He had already made considerable progress, when Salviati being invited to Venice, took with him his favorite pupil. Here he formed a style of his own, founded on that of his master, combining the energetic design of the Florentine school with the fine coloring of the Venetian, in which he acquired great reputation, and was ranked among the ablest artists of his time. His works were so much admired at Venice, that he was induced to settle in that city, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. He was approved by Titian, and was selected with Paul Veronese and other eminent artists to decorate the Palace and Library of St. Mark, where he painted the Prophets, the Sibyls, and the Cardinal Virtues. In the Piazza, he represented Alexander III. bestowing his benediction on Frederick Barbarossa, where he indulged his taste for splendid architectural ornament in the Venetian manner; and in the chapel he painted a Dead Christ with the Marys. He was invited to Rome by Pius IV., where he painted in the Sala Reale, the Emperor Frederick I. doing homage to Alexander III. Having finished these and other considerable works for the pontiff, who honored him with a munificent reward, he returned to Venice, and con-continued to reside there till his death. He executed several altar-pieces and other works for the churches and public edifices, of which the most esteemed are, the Assumption, in the church of the Padri Servi, and the Annunciation, in the chapel of the Incurabili. At Murano, in the church degli Angeli, is one of his finest works—a Descent from the Cross, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, a favorite subject with him, which he repeated several times. His style was distinguished for fine and fertile invention, excellent taste of design, and tender and harmonious coloring. Lanzi says his best pictures display great powers of invention, are wholly original, full of expression, with an air of majesty unusual in the productions of the Venetian school. There is, however, in some of his works a sameness of style, and a deficiency of strength in coloring and shading; he was also occasionally strained and extravagant in the delineation of the muscles, emulating the daring contour of Michael Angelo. Towards the close of his life he was more languid and monotonous. There were a few spirited engravings on wood attributed to him, which are variously signed Giuseppe Salviati, Joseph Porta Grafagninus, or Joseph Grafagninus.—These however, are believed to have been executed by an anonymous hand from his designs. He died at Venice in 1585. There is considerable variation among authors as to the exact time of his birth and death, but the dates given, are from the best authorities.

PORTA, ANDREA, a Milanese painter, born in 1656. According to Orlandi, he studied with Cesare Fiori, and afterwards gained improvement by contemplating the works of Legnanino. He formed for himself a style of coloring so vigorous and agreeable, as to excite general admiration. He executed some works for the churches, but more for individuals, in which, according to Lanzi, "he aimed at catching the manner of Legnanino." He died in 1744.

PORTA, FERDINANDO, was the son of the preceding, born at Milan, according to Oretti, in 1689, and died in 1767. He first studied under his father, and distinguished himself for a number of works for the churches, in imitation of the manner of Correggio. He also painted history with applause, for the collections. Lanzi says he "was too inconstant, and often unequal to himself."

PORTA, FRÀ GUGLIELMO DELLA, called MILANESE, an Italian painter, and a distinguished sculptor, was the nephew of Giacomo della Porta; and flourished about the middle of the 16th century. He was born at Porlizza, in the diocese of Como, and studied the elements of design under his uncle; but afterwards went to Genoa, and entered the school of Pierino del Vaga. According to Lanzi, he assisted in painting four apartments in the Palazzo Doria, from the cartoons of that master. The latter became warmly attached to him, and offered him his daughter in marriage; but della Porta declined, having decided to enter the priesthood. His instructor in sculpture is not mentioned. He afterwards visited Rome, where he became intimately attached to Sebastiano del Piombo, and acquired the esteem of Michael Angelo. He attained a high reputation for his admirable works. When the famous Farnese Hercules was discovered, della Porta was commissioned to restore the legs, and performed the difficult task in so masterly a manner, that, when the original limbs were discovered, Michael Angelo preferred to let the statue remain as it was. At the death of Sebastiano del Piombo in 1547, he was appointed to the office left vacant by the latter, of Keeper of the Seal to the pontifical Court. He was commissioned to sculpture the monument to Pope Paul III., and displayed great talent in its execution.

PORTA, CAV. GIO. BATTISTA DELLA, an Italian sculptor, a relative and scholar of the preceding, born at Porlizza in 1542. He resided chiefly at Rome, and attained a high reputation among the sculptors of his day. He was patronized by the noble Farnese family, through whose influence he was honored with the Order of the Golden Spur. Among his principal works are several sculptures in the church of Notre Dame di Loretto; a group of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in S. Pudore; and a colossal statue of St. Domenico, in S. Maria Maggiore. The Dizionario Storico of Bassano, erroneously places his death in 1547;—he died at Rome in 1597.

PORTA, TOMMASO DELLA, an Italian sculptor, was the brother of the preceding, and a scholar of Guglielmo della P. He was principally distinguished for the admirable bronze statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, placed on the Antonine and Trajan columns. Among his other works, was a group sculptured from a single block of marble, representing the Descent from the Cross, placed in the church of S. Ambrogio al Corso.

PORTA, GIACOMO DELLA, an eminent Italian architect, born at Milan about the commencement of the 16th century. During his early youth he studied design under the sculptor Gobbio, and was occupied in making bas-reliefs in stucco. He afterwards studied architecture under Vignola, and soon gained considerable reputation. He was commissioned to continue the buildings of the Capitol, and to erect the Gregorian chapel, according to the designs of Michael Angelo; also the Church of the Greeks, of good form, in the Strada del Babuino; the façades of the Madonna de' Monti, and S. Maria in Via. Della Porta was invited to Genoa, to erect the chapel of S. Giovanni Battista, in the cathedral of that city. In concert with Domenico Fontana, he was commissioned by Sixtus V. to erect the grand cupola of St. Peter's, after the model of Michael Angelo. Six hundred men were employed for twenty-two months upon this stupendous work. Milizia says "it combines originality, beauty, and grandeur;—the world has never seen its equal." Among the other works of Giacomo della Porta, are the church del Gesu, at Rome, after the designs of Vignola; the Palazzo Serlupi; the elegant Palazzo Gottofredi; the Palazzo Niccolini, noble in its simplicity; the majestic Palazzo Marescotti; and the design for the Villa Aldobrandini, at Frascati. The latter is justly considered one of the most celebrated palaces in the vicinity of Rome. Della Porta designed a number of fountains in Rome, at Piazza Navona, at the foot of the Capitol, at the Rotonda, &c. He died at the age of sixty-five, near the close of the 16th century.

PORTA, ORAZIO, a painter of the Florentine school, and a native of Monte Sansovino, was living in 1568. He was a reputable artist, and executed several works for the churches of his native city, and other places in the vicinity.

PORTELLI, CARLO, a painter of the Florentine school, a native of Loro, in the Valdarno, and a scholar of Ridolfo Ghirlandaio. He flourished about the middle of the 16th century. He was much employed at Florence, and Vasari commends him as an able artist. Lanzi says that he sometimes painted with little harmony, but that his picture of S. Romulus, at the Santa, proves him an artist of ability.

PORTENGEN, PETER, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Utrecht about 1638, and studied under Paul Moreelze. He painted landscapes in imitation of John Both; but, though his pictures possess considerable merit, they are every way greatly inferior to the works of that master, especially in the handling of his trees.

PORTER, SIR ROBERT KER, was the son of a British officer, born at Durham in 1780. His father dying while he was a child, his mother removed to Edinburg, where he exhibited such an extraordinary passion for sketching battle-pieces, that his parent was induced to take him to Mr. West at London, then President of the Royal Academy, who procured his admission as a student of that institution. He made rapid progress, and in 1793, painted an altar-piece for the Shoreditch church; in 1794 a picture of Christ stilling the Tempest, which he presented to the Roman Catholic chapel at Portsea; in 1798, St. John preaching, for St. John's college at Cambridge; and in 1800, he astonished the public by the exhibition of his Storming of Seringapatam, a very large picture, twelve feet by ten, executed in six weeks, "representing with Homeric fire and animation," says Stanley, "the details of an exploit of British valor never surpassed." He also painted several other renowned actions, among which are the Battle of Agincourt, the Battle of Alexandria, and the Death of Sir Ralph Abercrombie. In 1804, he went to St. Petersburg, and was appointed painter to the Emperor, in whose service he continued several years. In 1808, he accompanied Sir John Moore to the Peninsula, and attended him throughout the campaign, till that hero's death at Corunna, but whether as a commissary, or as a designer of the principal battles, is not mentioned. Soon afterwards, Porter made a second visit to Russia, where he married the princess Mary, daughter of Prince Shorbatoff. On his return to England in 1813, he published an Account of the Russian Campaign, and was knighted by the Prince Regent. He afterwards published an account of his travels in Georgia, Armenia, Persia, ancient Babylon, and other places, illustrated with numerous engravings of portraits, costumes, and antiquities. He was afterwards appointed consul for Venezuela, and during his residence at Caraccas, he painted a portrait of Bolivar, and three other pictures, representing the Last Supper, Christ blessing little children, and an Ecce Homo. In 1841, he paid a last visit to St. Petersburg, and died there of apoplexy, in 1842. The above account, from which little idea can be formed of the merits of Porter as an artist, is extracted from Stanley. It is fair to infer that he received some benefit from family influence, for had he preëminently distinguished himself as a painter, he would not have roamed over the world, and certainly not have accepted the situation of consul at Caraccas.

PORTIO, ANIELLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1700, and according to Zani executed a few portraits and other book plates.

PORTO, GIO. BATTISTA DE, an Italian engraver, who, according to Zani, flourished about 1503, and executed a few etchings marked J. B., with a bird.

P. or E. PORZEL, ELIAS, a German carver and engraver on wood, who, according to Nagler, was born at Isny in Suabia, about 1622, and died at Nuremberg in 1722. He engraved some Bible plates, marked with one of the above monograms.

POSI, CAV. PAOLO, a distinguished Italian sculptor and architect, born at Siena in 1708. He visited Rome at an early age, where he settled permanently, and attained a high rank among the professors of the day. He was extensively employed for many years, and was appointed pontifical architect. Milizia says he had naturally great talents, but was not a good architect; he gives him no credit for professional excellence, and criticises his edifices with such severity, as might lead some to suppose there had been personal jealousy between the parties. The peculiarities of Milizia, (see the sketch of his life), compel the candid connoisseur to receive his criticisms with caution; and it is clear that the merits of Posi were of no common order, since his reputation stood very high for many years; he was appointed architect of St. Peter's, and honored with the Order of the Golden Spur. His works in sculpture were chiefly mausoleums, of which he designed a great number. Among them was that of the Cardinal Caraccioli, at Aversa; the Cardinal Imperiali, in S. Agostino, at Rome; the Cardinal Caraffa, in S. Andrea de la Frate; and the Princess Chigi, in La Madonna del Popolo. Among his principal edifices, were the modernising of the Colonna Palace; the church of S. Caterina at Siena; the church and house of the Jesuits at Sinigaglia; and the two Case del' Progetti, at Narni and Viterbo. He died in 1776.

POSSENTI, BENEDETTO, a Bolognese painter, who, according to Malvasia, was brought up in the school of the Caracci, and excelled in painting landscapes, sea-ports, embarkations, fairs, festivals, &c., for the collections, which were held in considerable estimation. He also painted battle-pieces. His pictures are well designed, and the figures spiritedly executed.

POST, or POOST, FRANZ, a Dutch landscape painter, born at Haerlem in 1620; died in 1680. He was the son of John Post, a painter on glass, who taught him the elements of design. Before the age of twenty, he manifested such good abilities, that Prince Maurice of Nassau employed him to accompany him as draughtsman on a voyage to the West Indies and South America. During a residence of two years, he made numerous drawings of the most interesting views in that country, from which, on returning to Holland, he painted several large pictures for the palace of Ryksdorp, near Wassenaer. According to Houbraken, his pencil is light, yet firm; his coloring clear and agreeable; and his trees and plants touched in a neat and spirited style. Humboldt says that several of his paintings, representing Views on the banks of the Amazon, are to be seen in the picture galleries at Schleissheim, Hanover, Prague, and Berlin. His pictures sometimes occur in commerce. There are several spirited etchings by Post, among which are the following: A set of Views in Brazil; from designs by himself. A View of the Gulf of All Saints; Fr. Poost, fec. 1645. A View of Cape St. Augustine; do. A View of the Isle of Thamaraca; do.

POT, HENDRICK GERRITZ, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about 1600. It is not certainly known under whom he studied, but it is supposed he received some instructions from Francis Hals. He was a reputable painter of history, but more celebrated for his portraits. Houbraken celebrates a picture by him, representing Judith with the Head of Holofernes; and he commends a large picture of one of the princes of Orange in a Triumphant Car, in the Princenhof at Haerlem. In the Hall of the Society of Archers, at Haerlem, is a fine picture by him, representing the principal officers of that Society. He died in 1656.

POTENZANO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Palermo about 1550. His name is not mentioned in most works relating to art, but the Biographie Universelle notices him as an artist of decided merit. He visited Rome, Naples, and several cities of Spain, leaving everywhere proofs of his talent. His prints are after his own designs, in an elevated style, possessing considerable merit of execution. Among them are the Archangel Michael triumphing over Lucifer; the Adoration of the Magi, dedicated to King Philip II. of Spain; St. Christopher crossing a River, dedicated to Cardinal Za. From the inscription on the latter plate, it would appear that Potenzano was a member of the Florentine Academy. He also gained considerable reputation by his verses, particularly his Destructione di Gerusalemme; Naples, 1600, 8vo. He died at Palermo in 1599.

POTHOVEN, HENRY, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1725. He studied under Philip Vandyck, and adopted his manner. In his small family pictures, he introduced very successfully, the accessories of satin, velvet, lace, carpets, &c. He also painted portraits, understood the nude, and designed his figures correctly. His pencil is neat and clean, and his coloring agreeable. Balkema says he applied himself much to engraving in mezzotinto, and Brulliot mentions a print by him of an old Man reading a Book, by candle-light. He died in 1795.

POTMA, JAMES, a Dutch painter, born at Workum, in Friesland, about 1610. He was a scholar of Wybrant de Gheest, and painted history with reputation, but chiefly distinguished himself in portraits. He passed the greater part of his life at the different courts of Germany, where he was much employed. He died at Vienna in 1684.

POTRELLE, JEAN LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1788. He had the advantages of instruction under David, Tardieu, and Desnoyers, and manifested considerable talents. In 1806 he drew the second prize in engraving, from the Royal Academy. There are a number of portraits by him of distinguished individuals, also several subjects after the Italian masters, among which are the following:

POTTER, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Enkhuysen about 1595. Little is known of him, except that he painted landscapes, decorated with figures, representing scriptural and other subjects. Some of them were engraved by Peter Nolpe, as the Four Seasons, the Four Elements, the Prophet Elias and the Woman of Sarepta, and St. Paul the Hermit nourished in the Desert by an Eagle. He is better known by the fame of his son, than by his own productions.

POTTER, PAUL. This admirable painter of animals was the son of the preceding, born at Enkhuysen in 1625. He had no other instructor than his father, and early showed the most extraordinary talents, which he cultivated with such assiduity, that, at the age of fifteen, his works were held in high estimation, and he was regarded the most promising artist of the time. He carefully designed every object from nature, and it was his constant practice in his walks in the fields,—the only recreation he allowed himself,—to sketch every object that attracted his attention. He established himself at the Hague, where his works were in such demand, that he could scarcely execute all the commissions he received. The Prince of Orange was one of his greatest admirers, and purchased some of his finest pictures. His intense application was fatal to his naturally delicate constitution, and he died in 1654, in the 29th year of his age. He executed a great number of works for so short a life, considering their extraordinary merit; the subjects were landscapes, with different animals, but principally cows, oxen, sheep, and goats, which he painted in the highest perfection. His landscape is subordinate to his animals, and seldom extends beyond a pasture, with a stump of a tree, a farm house or a hovel. His pictures usually represent a brilliant effect of sunshine, with a lustrous glitter in his coloring that is peculiar to himself. His touch is free and firm, and his pencil usually full and flowing, although his pictures are highly finished. The best tests of the genuineness of his works are the wonderful correctness of his animals, which, in their attitudes and motions, seem to live and breathe; the natural verdure of his fields, and the careless manner of his leafing. His pictures are usually of small cabinet size, though he was not incapable of painting on a large scale, as is evinced in his picture of a herdsman and cattle, in the collection of the Prince of Orange, with figures as large as life, designed and painted with surprising energy and fidelity. This picture was transferred to the Louvre, but afterwards restored to its place. His cabinet pictures are, however, preferred to those of a larger size. His works now command enormous prices. One of the truest tests of the merits of a master is the progressive commercial value of his works after his decease, and it is interesting to observe this in those of Potter. In Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish Painters, vol. v., and the Supplement, may be found descriptive accounts of about 120 pictures by this master, with many curious particulars respecting them. A picture of Four Oxen in a Meadow, now in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg, sold in 1750, for about £25; in 1812, it rose to £320, and in 1815, was purchased by the Emperor of Russia for about £2800. One of two Cows and a Bull in a Meadow, measuring 17 inches by 15, sold in 1771, for about £186; in 1823, it brought in London 1210 guineas. The Dairy Farm, 24 inches by 20, was sold in 1817, for £689; it rose progressively at different sales to £1228, in 1825. A pastoral scene, 23 inches by 21, was sold in 1765 for about £135; in 1783 it rose to £678, and in 1829, to 1205 guineas. The large picture referred to in the collection of the Prince of Orange, was sold at public auction at Haerlem in 1749 for only about £56! His drawings also are held in the highest esteem, and command proportionally enormous prices. At M. Goll's sale, a few years ago at Amsterdam, the Messrs. Woodburn of London, gave £200 for one in India ink, heightened with white chalk, measuring about 13 inches by 8; and the Chevalier Claussins gave £163 for another, drawn with a pen worked in India ink, about 10 inches by 7.

Paul Potter also produced some etchings, drawn with great correctness and spirit, and executed in a masterly style. Bartsch describes eighteen prints by him; and also a set of eight prints of cows, oxen, and other animals, generally considered spurious, which he attributes to John Visscher. A few have been added to the list by the Messrs. Smith and others. They are signed, Paulus Potter, f., or in. et fe. A great number of the designs of Paul Potter were etched in a spirited manner by Mark de Bye, which see.

POTUIL, HENRY, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known. He is said to have imitated Gerard Douw, with sufficient art to deceive good judges.

POULLEAU, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1749, and engraved a few plates of ruins and other architectural subjects.

POURBUS, PETER, called THE OLD, a Dutch painter and architect, born at Gouda in 1510. It is not known under whom he studied. He settled at Bruges, and acquired distinction in history and portraits. He executed many altar-pieces and other works for the churches and public edifices at Bruges and other places in the Low Countries. There are some of his best works in the principal church in his native place, among which is one of St. Hubert. Another fine picture by him is a Crucifixion, in the church of Notre Dame, at Bruges. There are three of his works in the collection of the King of Holland. Michiels in his Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise, gives a catalogue of fifty pictures by this artist. He was also a geographer and geometrician, and executed for the magistrates of Bruges an immense chart, an oil painting on canvass, still preserved in the Stadt-House, representing the minutest details of the whole territory under their jurisdiction. He was also an excellent portrait painter, and his portrait of the Duke of Alençon, is considered an admirable performance, not only for striking resemblance, but for its handling and coloring. He was originally a mason, and after acquiring distinction as a painter and an architect, he marked all his works with a trowel. None of his works in architecture are mentioned. He married the daughter of L. Blondeel, and was President of the Corporation of Painters at Bruges. He died there in 1583.

POURBUS, FRANCIS, called THE ELDER, was the son of the preceding, born at Bruges in 1540. He received his first instruction from his father, but afterwards studied with Francis Floris; eventually surpassed both of his instructors, and was accounted one of the ablest artists of his time. He not only painted history, but also landscape and animals, and particularly excelled in portraits. He chiefly resided at Antwerp, where he was elected a member of the Academy in 1564. There are several of his works in the churches of that city, the most admired of which is a picture of the Circumcision in the Cathedral. One of his most esteemed works is the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of the convent at Oudenarde. Another fine picture is St. Aloisius preaching, in the Academy at Antwerp, into which he introduced several portraits. He painted animals extremely well, and was so exact in his landscapes, that every species of fruit and forest trees might be readily distinguished. One of his best works was a Martyrdom of St. George, painted for a confraternity of Dunkirk, and decorated with a landscape of great beauty. But his greatest excellence lay in portraits, which he executed with great truthfulness, life, and spirit, with admirable coloring. He died in 1580.

POURBUS, FRANCIS, called THE YOUNGER, was the son of the elder Francis P., born at Antwerp in 1570. After studying with his father, he set out for Italy, via Paris, where he met with such encouragement in portrait painting, that he took up his residence in that city for life. He acquired great distinction, and painted the portraits of the royal family, and many of the most distinguished personages of the court. His talents were not confined to portraits, and he executed several works for the churches, which obtained for him a high reputation as a historical painter. Among these are the Annunciation, and a picture of St. Francis, in the church of the Jacobins; and the Last Supper, formerly in the church of St. Len, now in the Louvre—a grand composition, admirably designed and colored. In the Hotel de Ville are two of his pictures, representing the Minority and Majority of Louis XIII., which he treated with great ingenuity, and the portraits which he introduced have the appearance of truth and nature. There are now six of his works in the Louvre, viz.: the Last Supper, previously referred to; St. Francis in ecstasy; a small portrait of Henry IV. in armor; another do. in black velvet; a portrait of Mary de' Medicis; and a portrait of Guillaume du Vair. There are also several of his works at Hampton Court, and in other collections in England. His portrait, painted by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery. He surpassed his father in elegance and grace, and in the noble simplicity of his drapery. His design was remarkably correct, and his coloring rich and harmonious. He died at Paris, in 1622.

POUSSIN, NICHOLAS. This distinguished painter was born at Andely, in Normandy, in 1594. He was descended from a noble family, originally of Soissons, whose fortunes had been ruined by the disastrous civil wars in the time of Charles IX. and Henry III. His father, Jean Poussin, after serving in the army of Henry IV., settled on a small paternal inheritance at Andely, where he cultivated a taste for literature and the sciences, and instructed his son in the same. Young Poussin had already distinguished himself for the solidity of his judgment, and his progress in letters, when a natural fondness for drawing, developed by an acquaintance he had formed with Quintin Varin, an artist of some eminence, induced him to solicit the permission of his father to adopt painting as a profession.

After learning the first principles of the art under Varin, he went to Paris in 1612, in search of improvement. The arts were at a very low ebb at that time in the French capital, and the only assistance which he appears to have received was from Ferdinand Elle, a Flemish portrait painter, but little qualified to forward him in the sublime ideas he had already conceived of the art. He remained with him only a few months, and then sought instruction from a painter named Lallemand, but perceiving that he could derive no benefit from him, he left him almost immediately, and devoted himself to the study of the best works to which he could gain access. Having obtained some prints after Raffaele and Giulio Romano, he studied them with delight and admiration; he also improved his design by drawing after casts of antique statues. By these helps he acquired a fine taste and readiness of composition, which procured him employment from the Capuchins of Blois, and at the Chateau de Chiverny, where he painted several Bacchanalian subjects, which elicited considerable applause. His talents and the endowments of his mind procured for him the esteem of several men of letters and distinction, and among them Cav. Marino, the celebrated Italian poet, who happened then to be at Paris. Marino became his friend, and strongly urged him to accompany him to Rome, an invitation Poussin would gladly have accepted, had he not then been engaged in some commissions of importance, among which were six large pictures in distemper for the College of Jesuits, and the Death of the Virgin for the church of Notre Dame. Having completed these works, he set out in 1624 for Rome, where he was warmly received by his friend Marino, who introduced him to Cardinal Barberini. He however derived little advantage from this favorable notice at the time, as the Cardinal soon after left Rome on his legation to France and Spain, and the Cav. Marino died about the same time. Poussin now found himself a stranger, friendless and unknown in the Eternal City, in very embarrassed circumstances; but he consoled himself with the thought that his wants were few, that he was in the very place where he had long sighed to be, surrounded by the glorious works of ancient and modern art, and that he should have abundant leisure to study. Therefore, though he could scarcely supply his necessities by the disposal of his works, and was often compelled to sell them for the most paltry prices, his courage did not fail him, but rather stimulated him to the greatest assiduity to perfect himself in the art. He lodged in the same house with Francis du Quesnoy, called Il Fiammingo, the state of whose finances at that time were not more flourishing than his own, and he lived in habits of intimacy and strict friendship with that eminent sculptor, with whom he explored, studied, and modeled, the most celebrated antique statues and bas-reliefs, particularly the Meleager in the Vatican, from which he derived his rules of proportion. At first he copied several of the works of Titian, and improved his style of coloring, but he afterwards contemplated the works of Raffaele, with an enthusiasm bordering on adoration. The admirable expression and purity of design which characterize the best works of Domenichino, rendered them particularly interesting to him, and he used to regard his Communion of St. Jerome as the second picture at Rome, the Transfiguration of Raffaele being the first.

A brighter day now dawned upon Poussin. What had happened to him, which would have been regarded by most young artists as the greatest misfortune and sunk them in despondency and ruin, proved of the greatest advantage to him. The Cardinal Barberini having returned to Rome, gave him some commissions, which he executed in such an admirable manner as at once established his reputation among those of the greatest artists of the age. The first work he executed for his patron was his celebrated picture of the Death of Germanicus, which Lanzi pronounces one of his finest productions. He next painted the Taking of Jerusalem by Titus. These works gave the Cardinal so much satisfaction that he procured for him the commission to paint a large picture of the Martyrdom of St. Erasmus, for St. Peter's, now in the pontifical palace at Monte Cavallo. These works procured him the friendship and patronage of the Cav. del Pozzo, for whom he painted his first set of pictures, representing the Seven Sacraments, now in the collection of the Duke of Rutland. He afterwards painted another set of the same, with some variations, for M. de Chantelou, formerly in the Orleans collection, now in that of the Marquis of Stafford. In 1639, Poussin was invited back to France by Louis XIII., who honored him with an autograph letter on the occasion; which invitation he accepted with great reluctance, at the earnest solicitation of his friends. On his arrival at Paris, he was received with marked distinction, appointed principal painter to the king, with a pension, and accommodated with apartments in the Tuileries. He was commissioned to paint an altar-piece for the chapel of St. Germain en Laie, where he produced his admirable work of the Last Supper, and was engaged to decorate the Gallery of the Louvre with the Labors of Hercules. He had already prepared the designs, and some of the cartoons for these works, when he was assailed by the machinations of Simon Vouet and his adherents; and even the landscape painter Fouquieres, jealous of his fame, presumed to criticise his works and detract from their merit. Poussin, naturally of a peaceful turn of mind, fond of retirement and the society of a few select literary friends, was disgusted with the ostentation of the court and the cabals by which he was surrounded; he secretly sighed for the quiet felicity he had left at Rome, and resolved to return thither without delay. For this purpose, he solicited and obtained leave of the King to visit Italy to settle his affairs, and fetch his wife; but when he had once crossed the Alps, no inducement could prevail on him to revisit his native country, or even to leave Rome. During a period of twenty-three years after his return to Rome from Paris, he lived a quiet, unostentatious life, and executed a great number of pictures, which decorate the principal cabinets of Europe, and will ever be regarded as among their most valuable ornaments. He confined himself mostly to works of the large easel size, which were eagerly sought after, and usually disposed of as soon as they were executed. He never made any words about the price of his pictures, but asked a modest and moderate price, which he always marked upon the back of his canvass, and which was invariably paid. Many of his works were sent to Paris, where they were valued next to the productions of Raffaele. He was plain and unassuming in his manners, very frugal in his living, yet so liberal and generous that at his death he left an estate of only 60,000 livres—about $12,000. Felibien relates an anecdote which pleasingly illustrates his simple and unostentatious mode of life. The Cardinal Mancini was accustomed to visit his studio frequently, and on one occasion, having staid later than usual, Poussin lighted him to the door, at which the prelate observed, "I pity you, Monsieur Poussin, that you have not one servant." "And I," replied the painter, "pity your Excellency much more, that you are obliged to keep so many."

The favorite subjects of Poussin were taken from fabulous or poetical history, and chiefly from Ovid. These he introduced into his landscapes, enriched with elegant architecture, designed after the magnificent edifices that abound in Rome and its environs; but he frequently painted subjects from the Bible and profane history. His figures are usually a palm and a half in length, as in his Seven Sacraments; and sometimes two or three palms, as in his picture of the Plague in the Colonna Gallery—but he did not succeed so well in large as in small figures. His invention was lively and happy, and he designed with great spirit and correctness. He was a perfect master of perspective and architecture, which he knew how to employ to the greatest advantage, enabling him to give a captivating air to his landscapes, the scenes and situations of which are always subordinate to, and in harmony with, his subject. His pictures are always highly pleasing, from their choice of scenery, and possess peculiar interest and beauty from the novelty of the objects introduced and the variety of trees, buildings, and other ornaments, as arches, columns, antique vases, urns, &c., as well as for the spirit and delicacy of his pencil. When Poussin first arrived at Rome, he endeavored to imitate the coloring of Titian, but when he afterwards became an enthusiastic admirer of Raffaele and the antique, his tone altered, and his carnations had no longer the warmth that distinguishes his earlier productions.

Perhaps the works of no painter have been the subject of so much and such divided criticism as those of Poussin. We cannot enter into any lengthened discussion on the subject, further than the main one—his coloring. Some critics contend that he was very unequal in coloring, that it was generally too cold and feeble; while others maintain a contrary opinion, and say that his coloring is that best adapted to his subject. In order to arrive at a just conclusion, it is necessary to look into the character of Poussin as well as his works. He was well versed in the classic authors of antiquity, and associated much with men of letters; his constant study of the antique statues and bas-reliefs inspired him with an attachment to them which partook of the fervor of devotion, and made him as intimately acquainted with the manners, rites, and ceremonies of the ancients, as he was with those of his own time. Lanzi says "he was very apprehensive lest his anxiety on that head (coloring) might divert his attention from the more philosophical part of his picture, to which he was singularly attentive; and to this point he directed his most serious and assiduous care. Raffaele was his model in giving animation to his figures, in expressing the passions with truth, in selecting the precise moment of action, in intimating more than was expressed, and in furnishing materials for fresh reflection to whoever returns a second and a third time to contemplate his well conceived and profound compositions. He carried the habit of philosophy in painting further than Raffaele, and often executed pictures whose claim to our regard is the poetical manner in which the moral is inculcated. Thus, in a picture at Versailles, called 'Memoria della Morte,' he represented a group of youths and a maiden, visiting the tomb of an Arcadian Shepherd, on which is inscribed the simple epitaph—'I also was an Arcadian.'" And again he says, "I think it may be safely asserted, without exaggeration, that the Caracci improved the art of landscape painting, and that Poussin brought it to perfection."

Poussin, in his directions to artists who came to study at Rome, says that "the remains of antiquity afforded him instruction that he could not expect from masters"; and, in one of his letters to M. de Chantelou, he observes that "he had applied to painting the theory which the Greeks had introduced into their music; the Dorian for the grave and the serious, the Phrygian for the vehement and the passionate, the Lydian for the soft and the tender, and the Ionian for the riotous festivity of his bacchanalians." He was accustomed to say "that a particular attention to coloring was an obstacle to the student in his progress to the great end and design of the art; and that he who attaches himself to this principal end will acquire by practice a reasonably good method of coloring." He well knew that splendor of coloring and brilliancy of tints would ill accord with the solidity and simplicity of effect so essential to heroic subjects, and that the sublime and majestic would be degraded by a union with the florid and the gay. The elevation of his mind is conspicuous in all his works. He was attentive to vary his style and the tone of his color, distinguishing them by a finer and more delicate touch, a tint more cheerful or austere, a site more cultivated or wild, according to the character of his subject and the impression he designed to make; so that we are not less impressed with the beauty and grandeur of his scenery, than with the varied, appropriate, and dignified characteristics which distinguish his works.

Notwithstanding this article has exceeded a proper length for a Dictionary, we cannot refrain from adding the following admirable critique from the 5th discourse of Sir Joshua Reynolds: "The favorite subjects of Poussin were ancient fables; and no painter was ever better qualified to paint such subjects, not only from his being eminently skilled in the knowledge of the ceremonies, customs, and habits of the ancients, but from his being so well acquainted with the different characters which those who invented them gave to their allegorical figures. Though Rubens has shown great fancy in his Satyrs, Silenuses, and Fauns, yet they are not that distinct, separate class of beings which is carefully exhibited by the ancients, and by Poussin. Certainly, when such subjects of antiquity are represented, nothing should remind us of modern times. The mind is thrown back into antiquity, and nothing ought to be introduced that may tend to awaken it from the illusion.

"Poussin seemed to think that the style and the language in which such stories are told is not the worse for preserving some relish of the old way of painting, which seemed to give a general uniformity to the whole, so that the mind was thrown back into antiquity, not only by the subject, but also by the execution.

"If Poussin, in imitation of the ancients, represents Apollo driving his Chariot out of the sea, by way of representing the sun rising, if he personifies lakes and rivers, it is noways offensive in him, but seems perfectly of a piece with the general air of the picture. On the contrary, if the figures which people his pictures had a modern air and countenance, if they appeared like our countrymen, if the draperies were like cloth or silk of our manufacture, if the landscape had the appearance of a modern one, how ridiculous would Apollo appear instead of the sun, and an old Man or a Nymph with an urn to represent a river or a lake?" He also says, in another place, that "it may be doubted whether any alteration of what is considered defective in his works, would not destroy the effect of the whole."

Poussin married the sister of Gaspar Dughet, but never had any children. He died at Rome of a palsy in 1665. In Smith's Catalogue raisonné may be found a descriptive account of upwards of three hundred and fifty of the works of this great artist, in many instances tracing the history from the time they were painted, the names of the present possessors, and the principal artists by whom they have been engraved, together with many interesting particulars of the life of the painter. There are eight of his pictures in the English National Gallery, fourteen in the Dulwich Gallery, and many in the possession of the nobility of England. The prices paid for those in the National Gallery vary from 150 to 1000 guineas.

POUSSIN, GASPARD, OR GASPARD DUGHET. This great landscape painter was born at Rome in 1613, according to Pascoli, Lanzi, and the best authorities; though others place his nativity in France in 1600. He was the son of a Frenchman settled at Rome, who had given his daughter in marriage to Niccolo Poussin. The latter adopted him as his son, instructed him in painting, taught him to select the beauties of nature and of art, so that he became an eminent, and in the opinion of many an unsurpassed, landscape painter. He was no servile imitator of his master, and considered merely as a landscape painter, certainly not his inferior. He selected the most enchanting scenery of the Tusculan, Tiburtine, and Roman territories, where, as Martial observes, nature has combined the many beauties she has scattered singly in other places. He also composed ideal landscapes; and following the example of Tasso in his description of the Garden of Armida, he concentrated in them all the beauties he had observed in nature. These enchanting scenes he decorated with appropriate edifices and figures; Italian scenes, with edifices in the beautiful proportions of antiquity, also arches, or broken columns, and other ruins; Egyptian scenes, with pyramids, obelisks, and the idols of the country: all displaying erudition and elegance. His figures sometimes represent shepherds with their flocks, but oftener subjects from ancient history and classic fable; poets crowned with laurel, hawking parties, and occasionally scriptural subjects, generally designed in a novel style, and finished almost as fine as miniature. His distances recede from the eye with true beauty of perspective, his grounds are charmingly broken, and his figures, trees, and other objects are so judiciously arranged and proportioned to the distance, as to produce a most pleasing illusion. His trees are so faithfully depicted as to represent the exact species, showing a natural and proper degree of agitation, and every leaf in motion. He was very fond of the spreading palm and the graceful poplar. He not only succeeded in representing the rosy tints of the morning, the splendor of noon, the softness of evening twilight, and a sky tempestuous or serene, but the passing breeze whispering through the leaves, tempests rending the trees of the forest, lowering skies, clouds surcharged with rain and rent with forked lightnings that rive the towering pine and crumble the mouldering turret. His touch is firm and vigorous, yet delicate; the fertility of his invention is only equalled by the astonishing facility of his execution; and it is said that, like Salvator Rosa, he could paint a well-finished landscape, and insert all the figures, in a single day. He frequently suggests more than he expresses; for instance, we may occasionally observe an artful winding of the road, which in part discovers itself to the eye, but in other parts leaves it to be followed by the mental vision. He is only accused of not having sufficiently diversified his tints, of representing his verdure too green, and of occasionally using too dark colors in his foregrounds; but, notwithstanding such small imperfections, his pictures are always very beautiful.

Gaspar Poussin had three manners, which are distinguishable without any great nicety. The first was rather dry and hard, with the cold coloring of Niccolo; but after seeing the works of Claude Lorraine, he adopted a more mellow and agreeable tone. In his third, he is not as lively, nor are his last pictures as well studied and finished. His second, or middle style, is therefore the best by many degrees; and his pictures of this period are distinguished for such a simple and learned design, and a coloring so natural, truthful, fresh, and lovely, that no one can behold them without admiration. Being an indifferent designer of the human form, he frequently prevailed upon Niccolo to paint his figures, who always introduced them with the utmost propriety; and pictures of this class are more highly valued than any other of the landscapes of Poussin. No commendation can be bestowed upon his works superior to their merit, and the great prices they command in all enlightened countries, evince their high estimation wherever painting is cultivated or understood. His works are numerous; they are found in the great collections in Italy, and throughout Europe.—There are six of his pictures in the English National Gallery, four in the Dulwich Gallery, three at Windsor Castle, and many more in the collections of the nobility, and gentlemen of wealth and taste, in England. His works have been constantly rising in value, and the prices paid for those in the English collections vary from 200 to 1000 guineas, according to the time when they were purchased, and the beauty of the picture. One of his best works would now bring at least 1000 guineas in London. Gaspar Poussin executed a few masterly etchings from his own designs, viz. : a set of four circular Landscapes, and a set of four Landscapes, lengthways. These are all that are described by Bartsch, and probably the list is complete. He died at Rome in 1675.

POUSSIN, JOHN DUGHET, the younger brother of the preceding, was born at Rome about 1615. He was instructed in painting by Niccolò, but manifesting little talent, he followed the advice of his instructor, and devoted his attention to engraving, but never acquired much distinction. His best prints are those engraved after the works of Niccolò Poussin; the following are the most deserving of notice :

POUSSIN, LE MAIRE. There were two French painters, named Le Maire, who were the pupils of Niccolò Poussin, and assumed his name. Pierre le Maire, according to Dumesnil, was born at Dammartin, near Paris, about 1597, and died at Gaillon in 1659. He was an intimate friend of Niccolò, was called Le Maire Poussin, and being a corpulent man, was also known by the name of Le gros le Maire. Dumesnil describes (Le Peintre Graveur Français, tom. vi.) fifteen etchings by him, executed in the manner of Remi Vuibert. Nothing is said of his pictures.

François le Maire Poussin was born at Maison-Rouge, near Fontainebleau, in 1620. He went to Rome, and studied under Niccolò, who is said to have called him Le petit le Maire, to distinguish him from his corpulent friend. On his return to Paris, he followed the manner of his master, and acquired so much distinction that he was admitted into the Academy in 1656. Stanley says he is known in England by the name of Poussin le Maire, as a painter of landscapes with figures, evidently from the designs or drawings of Niccolò. They generally represent porticos or vestibules of temples, with few figures, well executed, somewhat brighter in coloring, but lacking the antique dignity of the originals. He died in 1688.

POWELL, C. M., an English marine painter, who flourished from about 1800 to 1820. Stanley says he was a sailor, and self-taught in the art of painting. "In the management of his vessels he shows his practical knowledge, and his compositions are well understood by seamen. His more carefully painted pictures are still esteemed, and obtain good prices."

POWLE, GEORGE, an English engraver of little note, who flourished about 1776. He engraved a few portraits and other subjects for the booksellers.

POZZI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Rome in 1750. In conjunction with Coppa and Perini, he engraved some of the plates from the statues in the Clementine Gallery. Among other prints by him is a portrait of Pius VI., and the Aurora, after Guercino.

POZZI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Milanese painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th and first part of the 18th centuries. Not meeting with much encouragement at Milan, he went to Piedmont, where he painted a great number of frescos for the churches at Turin and other places. He wrought with great facility, and his works are more distinguished for brilliancy of coloring, than for elegance or correctness of design, yet some of them produce a fine effect, as in his picture of St. Cristoforo at Vercelli.

POZZI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Milanese painter, who, according to Baglioni, evinced remarkable talents, and was employed by Sixtus V. in the palace of St. John of Lateran, and in the Library of the Vatican. In the Sistine chapel he painted the Visitation of the Virgin, and the Angel appearing to St. Joseph in his Dream; in Il Gesu, a Choir of Angels. He died in the pontificate of Sixtus V., aged 28, deeply lamented as the most promising young artist of his time. Lanzi says none approached so near to Raffaello da Reggio as Pozzi, and as to ideal beauty, he may be considered the Guido of his day. Had he survived to the time of the Caracci, it is impossible to say what degree of perfection he might have attained."

POZZI, STEFANO, a painter born at Rome, who first studied under Carlo Maratti, and afterwards with Agostino Masucci. Lanzi says he was more noble in his design than Masucci, and more natural and vigorous in his coloring. He acquired considerable distinction, and executed several works for the churches and public edifices at Rome. In the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo is a fine picture by him, representing St. Gregorio, and in the church Il Nome S.S. di Maria an altar-piece of the Death of St. Joseph. He died in 1768. He had a brother named Giuseppe, who possessed excellent talents, but died young at Rome in 1765, before his powers were matured.

POZZI, Rocco, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1750. He engraved some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino, and others for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples.

POZZO, ANDREA, an eminent painter and architect, born at Trent in 1642. After learning the elements of painting under two indifferent artists in his native city, he went to Milan, where, by assiduously studying the works of the best masters, aided by the strength of his own genius, he made such progress as to be considered a young artist of great promise. But, falling into vicious company, he became extremely dissolute, until, disgusted by his course of life, and affected at the discourse of an eminent preacher, he resolved to retire from the world, and at the age of 23 joined the Society of the Jesuits, who, knowing his talents for painting, placed him under the instruction of Lodovico Scaramuccia, by whose precepts he acquired a grand and magnificent style of composition. He afterwards visited Rome and Venice, and greatly improved his design and coloring. At Rome, particularly, he diligently studied the works of Raffaello, and other great masters; also the most superb edifices of that metropolis, so that he acquired a profound knowledge of architecture and perspective. He painted both in oil and fresco, and executed many works at Rome, Genoa, Turin, and other places, chiefly for the churches of his order, which gained him the reputation of one of the ablest artists of the time. His pictures are composed in a grand style, the figures elegantly designed, the coloring rich and harmonious, and the whole enriched with noble edifices, or grand perspectives. Few artists have excelled him in architecture and perspective, the principles of which he perfectly understood, and published an elaborate treatise on them. The Emperor Leopold I. invited him to Vienna, where he executed many admired works, and painted noble portraits of that monarch and the Archduke Joseph.

Pozzo not only excelled in history, but in portraits and landscape. He acquired such a wonderful facility of operating, especially in fresco, that Ciro Ferri used to say that, while the horses of other painters moved at a slow pace, those of Pozzo were always on the gallop. Yet he did not despatch his work too hastily, nor until he was satisfied with his performance. Among his best works in oil are St. Francesco Borgia, in the church of Il Gesù at Rome; the Wise Men's Offering, at Vienna; and four pictures from the Life of Christ, in the church of the Congregazione de' Mercanti, at Genoa. Lanzi says these last named pictures are executed in his best manner, and that "he imitated Rubens in those beautiful and playful lights which seem to irradiate the composition." He was more eminent and greatly distinguished in fresco. The ceiling of the church of S. Ignatius at Rome is regarded as one of the ablest productions of his time; not only for its ingenuity and copiousness of composition, and brilliancy of coloring, but for its animated freedom of execution. His portrait, painted by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery.

As an architect, Pozzo gained some distinction, and executed, among other works, the altar of S. Ignazio in the church del Gesù at Rome; and the altar of St. Luigi Gonzaga in S. Ignazio. The former is said to be the richest altar in Rome, or in all Europe. He died at Venice in 1709.

POZZO, DARIO, a painter of Verona, who died in 1652, aged about 60, according to Lanzi, though others say in 1632. He painted a few excellent works for the churches at Verona and Urbino. He was learned in his profession, and instructed several pupils, among whom was Claudio Ridolfi, called also Claudio Veronese.

POZZO, ISABELLA DAL, a paintress of whom little is known. There is a beautiful picture by her, representing the Virgin and Infant with several Saints, in the church of S. Francesco at Turin, bearing her name, and the date 1666. According to Lanzi, there were few better artists at Turin, at the time she flourished.

POZZO, MATTEO DAL, a painter of Padua, and a pupil of Squarcione, who flourished about 1480. Little is known of him, and his works have mostly perished.

POZZO, CONTE GIROLAMO DAL, an eminent Italian architect, born at Verona in 1718. According to Milizia, he combined noble descent with a good education, an excellent disposition, and superior talents. He studied philosophy and the fine arts under the brothers Don Pietro and Don Gir-olamo Ballerini, after which he applied himself to architecture; and by designing the antique with great care, assisted by the writings of Vitruvius, Palladio, and Scamozzi, he became an excellent architect. Milizia says that he endeavored to improve the extravagant fashion of the 18th century, and to establish a beautiful style after the antique. His style is a mixture of Sanmicheli and Palladio; his principal members are never broken; his ornaments are always well adapted; and his edifices are distinguished for grandeur and harmony of effect. Among his principal works is the elegant villa of the Counts Trissino, in the Vicentino, situated on a hill, and surrounded with beautiful gardens. The Count dal Pozzo wrote several works on Architecture, among which is a treatise entitled Degli Ornamenti dell' Architettura Civile secondo gli Antichi; also another, Sopra i Teatri degli Antichi e sul Idea d' un Teatro adatto all' Uso Moderno. He was celebrated for his literary attainments throughout all Europe, and was chosen associate of the academies at Parma and Bologna. He died in his prime, but Milizia does not mention the exact date.

POZZO, JUAN DEL, a Spanish architect, who flourished about 1450. He was a Canon of the Cathedral at Cuenca, and the founder of the Dominican convent of St. Paul, near that city. He was principally distinguished for the celebrated bridge near the convent, over the river Huexar. It is admirably constructed, and with such solidity as to appear like a Roman work. It is 350 feet long, with five arches; the middle piers 150 feet high. Juan del Pozzo had a relative, named Pedro del P., who erected the convent of the Jesuits at Cuenca, now that of the Interpreters.

POZZOBONELLI, GIULIANO, a Milanese painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. Lanzi says he was a good artist, and executed several works which approach the best of the Cerani. He was living in 1605.

POZZOSERRATO, LODOVICO, called also LODOVICO POZZO, and DA TREVIGI. This artist was a native of Flanders, and was called Lodovico da Trevigi, from his long residence in that city. It is said that his family name was Toeput. He was cotemporary with Paul Brill, who then resided at Venice, and his landscapes were often put in competition with those of that master, and were sometimes preferred to them. Lanzi says, "he was equal to Brill in the representation of distant objects, and is more pleasing and select in the variations of his clouds and distinctions of light." Nothing can be finer than his representations of the rising and the setting sun, and the degradation of tint in his skies and distances. He painted landstorms and tempests with uncommon grandeur and effect. He was also celebrated for his altar-pieces. He resided a long time at Trevigi, where he flourished, according to Federici, about the beginning of the 17th century, and left many of his finest works. He died at Trevigi, aged 60 years; the exact time is not known, although he was living in 1604, as appears from the date upon one of his pictures at Trevigi; and according to the Guida di Rovigo he painted in that city as early as 1587. As his name is unknown in his own country, it is probable that he passed most of his life in Italy.

POZZUOLI, GIOVANNI, a native of Carpi, an eminent worker in scagliola, who studied under Annibale Griffoni. Lanzi says that, in conjunction with Giovanni Massa, he executed some wonderful specimens of this art in his native place, and in the adjacent cities of Guastalla, Novellara, and elsewhere. He died about 1734. See del Conte and Gio. Massa.

PRADIER, CHARLES SIMON, a Swiss engraver, born at Geneva about 1790. He went to Paris, and studied under the celebrated Desnoyers. Among his principal plates are several landscapes, and a number of beautiful plates after the Italian, French, and Flemish masters, among which are La Vierge aux Ruines, after Raffaelle; Cupid and Psyche, Virgil reading the Æneid to Augustus, Zephyr caressing Flora, and several portraits, after Gerard; Raffaelle and Fornarina, and Antiochus, after Ingres. He was living in 1841.

PRADO, BLAS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Toledo, according to Palomino, in 1497. He studied under Alonso Berruguette, and executed some excellent works for the churches at Toledo, among which are several in the chapel of St. Blas, much injured by time and the dampness of the situation. There are also some fine pictures by him at Madrid, particularly a Descent from the Cross, in the church of San Pedro, which shows the hand of an able master. He also excelled in portraits, and was invited to the court of the Emperor of Morocco, to paint the portrait of the daughter of that monarch, who munificently rewarded him. He died at Madrid in 1557. Others say that he studied under Francisco Comontes, and that he was living in 1593, about which time he was sent to Morocco by Philip of Spain, for the purpose above mentioned; and that there is an altar-piece by him in the church of the Minimes at Toledo, dated 1591. Probably there were two artists of this name.

PRAET, STEPHEN DE, a Dutch engraver, who executed a few portraits in a neat, but stiff and formal manner.

PRATA, RANUNZIO, a Milanese painter, who flourished at Pavia about 1635. Lanzi says he executed some works for the churches in that city, which are highly commended.

PRATO, FRANCESCO DE, a painter who flourished at Brescia about the middle of the 16th century. There is an altar-piece, highly commended by Oretti, in the church of S. Francesco at Brescia, representing the Marriage of the Virgin, signed Francisci de Prato Caravajensis opus 1547. Lanzi thinks there were two artists of this name.

PRATO, FRANCESCO DEL, a Florentine painter, who died in 1562. He was an eminent goldsmith, and an excellent artist in the inlaying of metals. He became inclined for painting when somewhat advanced in life, and studied under Francesco Salviati. He was soon able to execute cabinet pictures in the style of that master with great success. Vasari pronounces his Plague of the Serpents and Christ's Descent into Limbo "most beautiful productions." Lanzi thinks that some of the cabinet pictures ascribed to Salviati were very probably executed by this artist.

PRATT, MATTHEW, a native of Philadelphia, who went to London in 1764, and resided some time with Mr. West. In 1766 he exhibited a picture called the American School, consisting of the portraits of West, himself, and other American artists. He soon afterwards returned to his native city.

PRAXITELES, one of the most eminent Grecian sculptors, was cotemporary with Euphranor, and flourished, according to Pliny, in the 104th Olympiad, or B. C. 360. The place of his birth is not mentioned. He lived in the period immediately subsequent to the age of Phidias, but his genius took a different course from that character of elevation and sublimity which distinguishes the works of the Æschylus of Sculpture. Praxiteles was the founder of a new school. His style was eminently distinguished for softness, delicacy, and high finish; and he was fond of representing whatsoever in nature appears gentle, tender, and lovely. Consequently his favorite subjects were the soft and delicate forms of females and children, rather than the masculine forms of athletes, warriors and heroes. Perhaps in no work were his peculiar abilities so well displayed as in the Venus of Cnidus, which, with the exception of the Olympian Jupiter of Phidias, has received higher and more unqualified eulogisms from ancient writers, than any other work of Grecian art. These two great artists may therefore be considered, as standing at the head of their respective schools; Praxiteles, the delicate and beautiful—Phidias, the grand and sublime. Praxiteles acquired great skill in execution, and is said to have had some peculiarities in finishing his marble. He is said to have declared that he considered those to be his best works which had undergone the process of circumlitio by Nicias. As the latter artist was a painter, it seems probable that this work cannot mean, simply rubbing or polishing the statues, but that some very thin transparent varnish was laid over the surface of the marble after it had passed through the sculptor's hands.

Praxiteles was eminent for his works both in bronze and marble, but he seems to have had the highest reputation for his skill in the latter. Among those in bronze, Pliny and Pausanias mention a statue of Bacchus, and one of a Satyr, so excellent, that it was called Periboetos, or, the Celebrated. He also made a statue of Venus; a statue of a Matron weeping; and one of a Courtesan laughing, believed to be a portrait of the celebrated Thespian courtesan Phryne. His Apollo Sauroctonos (or the Lizard Killer), was the finest of his works in bronze, and was greatly distinguished for purity of style, and graceful beauty of form. There is in the Vatican a well-authenticated marble copy of this celebrated work, which is justly considered one of the greatest treasures of that storehouse of art. Among the works in marble by Praxiteles, the famous Venus of Cnidus takes the preëminence. He executed two statues of that goddess, the one draped, and the other naked; the people of Cos chose the former; the Cnidians immediately purchased the latter. This work is mentioned by Lucian as the master-piece of Praxiteles; and it is also the subject of numerous epigrams in the Greek Anthology. Its fame was so great that travelers visited Cnidus on purpose to see it; and Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, offered to assume the payment of a heavy debt for the Cnidians, on condition of their giving up this celebrated work. To their honor be it said, they declined the offer. The original work was destroyed at Constantinople, in the fifth century, in the dreadful fire which consumed so many of the admirable monuments of art, collected in that city. Some idea of the action and general composition of this statue, may be gained from the figure of Venus on the ancient coins of Cnidus. Pliny mentions two figures of Cupids, as among his finest works; and he places one of them quite on an equality with the Venus of Cnidus. It was made of Parian marble. A Cupid in the Vatican is thought to be a copy of this work. Pausanias relates an anecdote in regard to this statue, which may properly be introduced here, as evincing that the opinion of Praxiteles in regard to it, coincided with that of the ancient writers, forming a stronger testimony to the merits of the work. "Phryne, whose influence over the sculptor seems to have been considerable, was anxious to possess a work of Praxiteles, and when desired to choose for herself, not knowing which of his exquisite works to select, devised the following expedient. She commanded a servant to hasten to him, and tell him that his workshop was in flames, and that, with few exceptions, his works had already perished. Praxiteles, not doubting the truth of the announcement, rushed out in the greatest anxiety and alarm, exclaiming 'all is lost, if my Satyr and Cupid are not saved!' The object of Phryne was answered; she confessed her stratagem, and chose the Cupid." Among the other works of Praxiteles, were two statues of Phryne; one of marble, placed in the Temple of Venus at Thespiae; the other of bronze, gilt, dedicated by her at Delphi, where it had the honor of a distinguished place. Praxiteles appears also to have executed some works of more extended character and composition, among which were some sculptures that decorated the pediments of the Temple of Hercules at Thebes, representing part of the labors of that demi-god. Praxiteles had two sons, Cephisodotus and Timarchus, both of whom were artists.

There was a painter of inferior note named Praxiteles, mentioned by Pliny; also a chaser and modeller, living at a later period.

PRECIADO, or PREZIADO, DON FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1713. After studying with Domingo Martinez, he went to Rome and entered the school of Sebastiano Conca, whose style he adopted. According to Lanzi, he resided at Rome the greater part of his life, and died there in 1789. He painted some good works, particularly a Holy Family, entirely in the style of Conca, for the church of the Forty Saints. He was appointed painter of the Chamber to Ferdinand VI., and was for many years director of the Spanish Academy at Rome.

PREGLIASCO, GIACOMO, an Italian architect, born in Piedmont in 1757. He gained great distinction in theatrical architecture, particularly by restoring the theatre of Canobiana, at Milan; also by erecting the theatre at Monza, the grand theatre at Naples, and several others. Pregliasco was eminent for his designs of gardens, in the English style, evincing an original and excellent taste. He died in 1825.

PREISLER, JOHN DANIEL, a German painter and engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg in the latter part of the 17th. and first part of the 18th centuries. He attained little distinction, but had several sons whom he instructed in his profession.

PREISLER, JOHN JUSTIN, the eldest son of the preceding, born at Nuremberg in 1698; died in 1771. He was instructed in design by his father, and afterwards went to Italy, where he resided eight years. On his return to Nuremberg he acquired considerable reputation as a painter, and his picture of the Entombment of Christ, in one of the churches, is commended. He is better known however, as an engraver, and executed several plates after the French and Flemish masters, among which are the following:

The Four Elements; after Bouchardon. The Four Quarters of the World; do. A set of fifty-plates from the designs of Bouchardon; after the principal antique statues at Rome. Part of the plates from the ceilings painted by Rubens, in the church of the Jesuits at Antwerp, with the frontispiece, containing the Portraits of Rubens and Vandeyk.

PREISLER, GEORGE MARTIN, was the second son of John Daniel P., born at Nuremberg in 1700. He accompanied his brother to Italy, and resided there several years. On returning to Germany, according to Huber, he painted some portraits, but afterwards devoted himself to engraving, in which he acquired considerable eminence. He was employed to engrave some of the plates after the statues in the Dresden Gallery, and also by Stosch, for his work on Antique Gems. He engraved a set of twenty-one plates from the designs made by John Justin Preisler, after the antique and modern statues at Rome and Florence. He also executed many detached plates of portraits and other subjects, a list of which may be found in Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon. He died in 1754.

PREISLER, JOHN MARTIN, was the third son of John Daniel P., born at Nuremberg in 1715. He first studied with his brother George Martin P., and made considerable progress until 1739, when he visited Paris, and became a pupil of George Frederick Schmidt. In 1744 he was invited to the court of Denmark, appointed engraver to the King, elected a member of the Academy of Copenhagen, and resided in that city fifty years. He died there in 1794. He executed many plates of portraits and other subjects, a list of which is given by Nagler. The following are among the best:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick V., King of Denmark and Norway; Tilo, pinx. Christian VI., King of Denmark; Wahl, pinx. Jacobus Benzelius, Episcopus Upsal. 1751. Otto, Count de Thot; after Krafft. John Wiedewelt, Sculptor to the King; P. Alst. pinx. 1772. Klopstock; Juel, pinx. Preisler, sc. 1782. Equestrian Statue of Frederick V.; after a bronze by J. Saly. The Cardinal de Bouillon; after Rigaud.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

David and Abigail; after Guido. Semiramis putting the Crown of Ninus on her head; do. Christ bearing his Cross; after P. Veronese. These two prints were for the collection of the Dresden Gallery. Ganymede taken up by the Eagle of Jupiter; after Pierre. A Bacchanalian subject; do. Laban seeking for his Gods; after Cazes. The Triumph of David; after Trevisani. Jonas preaching to the Ninevites; after Sal. Rosa. The Madonna della Seggia; after Raffaello.

PREISLER, VALENTINE DANIEL, was the youngest son of John Daniel P., born at Nuremberg in 1717. He executed some indifferent portraits and other subjects in mezzotinto, of which Nagler gives a list of twenty-six pieces. He engraved some portraits of the Burgomasters of Zurich, after the designs of J. C. Fuessli, which, from some caprice, he signed with the name of S. Walch. He also engraved some portraits and other subjects after pictures in the collection of the King of Denmark. He died about 1765.

PREISLER, JOHN GEORGE, was the son of John Martin P., born at Copenhagen in 1757. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Paris, and studied with John George Wille. He engraved some plates in the neat, finished style of that master, and when elected a member of the Academy at Paris in 1787, he engraved for his reception piece, Icarus, after Vien. He died in 1808.

PRENNER, ANTHONY JOSEPH VON, a German engraver, born at Vienna about 1698. His instructor is not mentioned, but after the death of Mannl, he undertook to engrave all the pictures in the Imperial Collection, in conjunction with Andrew Altamont, Francis Stampart, John Adam Schmutzer, and others. These plates, 160 in number, were published at Vienna in four vols., each containing forty prints, under the title of Theatrum artis Pictoriæ, &c., 1728, 1729, 1731, and 1733. He also engraved a few portraits; a complete list of his works may be found in Nagler. He died in 1761.

PRENNER, GEORGE CASPAR VON, was the son of the preceding, born at Vienna about 1722. After learning the rudiments of art under his father, he went young to Italy, and studied and practised painting at Rome for many years. There is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Dorotéa. He executed a few spirited etchings, some of them neatly finished with the graver, after his own designs and those of other masters. He died about 1766.

PRENNER, JOHN JOSEPH VON, is said to have been the youngest son of Joseph Anthony P. After studying engraving with his father, he went to Italy, where he resided many years, and engraved a part of the plates of the Museo Fiorentino. He also engraved a set of forty-five plates after the paintings in the Castle of Caprarolla, by Taddeo Zuccaro, representing the most memorable actions of the Farnese family, entitled, Illustri fatti Farnesiani, published at Rome in 1744 and 1746. Nagler does not mention this engraver, but gives the works above mentioned to George Caspar P.

PRESTEL, JOHN GOTTLIEB, a German painter and engraver, born at Grunebach, in Suabia, in 1739. After learning the rudiments of art in his own country, he went to Venice, where he studied painting under Giuseppe Nogari, and engraving under Joseph Wagner. On returning to Germany, he devoted himself almost entirely to engraving, and executed a great number of plates in various styles, most of them spiritedly etched, and finished in aquatinta. He resided chiefly at Nuremberg, and died at Frankfort in 1808. Nagler calls him Johann Theophilus, or Gottlieb and Amadeus, and gives a list of 140 prints by him, principally after the Flemish and Dutch masters.

PRESTEL, MARIA CATHERINE, was the wife of the preceding artist, and assisted him in many of his best works. Some disagreement causing a separation, she went to London, and practised engraving there, until her death in 1794. Nagler gives a list of seventy-three prints by her, after the Italian, Dutch, and German masters, executed in the style of her husband, in a delicate and picturesque manner.

PRESTEL, CATHERINE, was the daughter and scholar of John G. P. She executed some plates in his style.

PRESTON, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about 1730. He executed a few book plates, possessing little merit.

PRETE, GENOESE. See GALANTINO.

PRETI, CAV. MATTIA, called IL CALABRESE, an eminent Italian painter, born at Taverna, in Calabria, in 1613. After studying some time at Parma and Modena, he went to Rome and studied a short time under Gio. Lanfranco. The reputation of Guercino induced him to visit Cento, for the benefit of his instructions. Lanzi observes, that Calabrese was accustomed to boast that he had studied under Guercino, that he had visited almost every country, and seen and studied the best productions of every school, both in and beyond Italy. "Hence in his painting he may be compared to a man whose travels have been extensive, and who never hears a subject started, to which he does not add something new; and indeed the drapery, ornaments, and costumes, of Preti, are highly varied and original. He confined himself to design, and did not attempt coloring till he was twenty-six years old. In design he was more vigorous and robust, than delicate, and sometimes inclines to heaviness. In his coloring he was not attractive, but had a strong impasto, a decided chiaro-scuro, and an ashy tone, well adapted to his mournful and tragical subjects; for, following the bent of his genius, he devoted himself to the representations of martyrdoms, slaughters, pestilence, and the pangs of a guilty conscience. It was his custom, says Pascoli, to paint at the first conception, with fidelity to nature, and he did not take much pains afterwards in correction, or in the just expression of the passions."

Preti executed a multitude of works for the churches and public edifices, as well as the private collections of all the principal cities of Italy—at Rome, Florence, Naples, and especially at Bologna. His fame reached Malta, whither he was invited by the Grand Master, Cotoner, who commissioned him to decorate the cathedral with some frescos, representing subjects from the life of St. John the Baptist, which he executed in such admirable style, that Cotoner conferred on him the honor of knighthood. He afterwards passed some time at Naples, and executed some considerable works in fresco for the church of the Carthusians. According to Dominici, in conjunction with other eminent professors, Preti endeavored to resist the innovations of Luca Giordano, but the unprecedented popularity of that artist triumphed over all his cotemporaries. Disgusted at the perversion of taste, Preti returned to Malta, where he passed the remainder of his days. His figures are generally half-size, like those of Guercino and Caravaggio. His oil pictures in Italy are almost innumerable, as he had great readiness of invention, a remarkable facility of hand, and lived to an advanced age. Wherever he went, he was accustomed to leave some memorials of his talents; sometimes in the churches, but more frequently in the private collections. There are many of his works in the palaces and collections of the nobility at Bologna, as well as some in the churches. One of his most finished altar-pieces is St. Bernardino preaching, in the cathedral at Siena. He painted three pictures in the church of S. Andrea della Valle, at Rome, representing subjects from the life of that saint; but unfortunately for his fame in that city, they were placed immediately under the Four Evangelists in the angles, so admirably painted by Dominichino. It is not considered derogatory to his character to allow that he was unequal to such competition. He died at Malta in 1699.

PRETI, GREGORIO, was a younger brother and pupil of the preceding, whose manner he followed. He painted both in oil and fresco, but did not acquire much distinction. There is a fresco by him in the church of S. Carlo de' Catenari, at Rome.

PRETI, FRANCESCO MARIA, an eminent Italian architect, born at Castel Franco, in Trevigiano, in 1701. He was of noble descent, and received an excellent education in the college of Brescia. After completing his studies, he returned to Castel Franco, and decided to study architecture. He received much important information from the Count Giacomo Riccati, and applied himself with such assiduity, that in a short time he designed the church of S. Liberale, the cathedral of Castel Franco, which received general approbation. Encouraged by this success, Preti began to study the ancient and modern writers, and visited Padua to pursue a course of instruction. He proposed to collect all the rules of the best authors, adding his own reflections, to fix the harmonic medium of height, to supply what was wanting to a complete theory on that subject, and to write a treatise upon it. He also intended to explain by a series of designs, all that had been reduced to practice; also the method of preserving unity, solidity, harmony, elegance and majesty, in architectural works. He made a great number of designs for this treatise, which must have occupied him several years; but in consequence of his many commissions, and his delicate state of health, it was not published until after his death, in 1780, at Venice, under the title of Elementi di Architettura. His drawings were not printed with this edition; which is much to be regretted, as they contained solutions of several architectural difficulties, arranged with the greatest convenience and beauty.

Preti made many designs for palaces, rural dwellings, and additions to churches, which Milizia says are distinguished for simplicity, correctness, and majesty. Among the principal, are the façade of S. Giustina, at Padua; the parochial church of Valla, in the Ionic order; that of Salvatronda, in the Doric order, of the form of a Greek cross; those of Caselle and of Tombolo, in the Corinthian order; and a theatre at Castel Franco.

According to Milizia, Preti practised the art merely from the love of it, never receiving any recompense for his services. He was liberal and sincere in conversation, the friend of every professor of art, and distinguished for his integrity and honor. He died in 1774.

PREVITALE, ANDREA, an eminent painter of Bergamo, whose works date, according to Tassi, from 1506 to 1528. He was one of the most distinguished disciples of Giovanni Bellini, whose dry manner he followed at first, but afterwards improved his design and coloring, and nearly approached the moderns, as is evident from his St. John preaching, in the church of S. Spirito, and his St. Benedetto, in the cathedral at Bergamo. One of his finest works is the Annunciation, at Ceneda, so beautifully colored and full of expression, that, according to Ridolfi, it was the admiration of Titian, who always, in passing through the place, contemplated it with rapture, charmed by its expressive spirit of devotion. Lanzi says his Madonnas are held in the highest estimation; in the features he appears less a disciple of Bellini, than of Raffaele, or da Vinci. Two of them, surrounded with figures of other saints, are in private collections at Milan. There are several of his works in the Carrara Gallery. Some of his pictures are signed ANDREAS BER. PIN., i. e., Andreas Bergomensis, Pinxit. He died of the great plague in 1528.

PREVOST, BENOIT LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris, according to Nagler, in 1740. He studied under Jean Oувrier, and engraved a variety of vignettes and other book plates, in a clear, neat style, among which are a set of twelve pieces for the Abregé chronologique du President Henault. Nagler describes twenty-six prints by him. He died in 1804.

PREVOST, or PROVOST, NICOLAS, a French engraver, who, according to Florent le Comte, studied under Claude Vignon, flourished about 1700, and etched six small plates. The Abbé de Marolles calls him Provost, in his catalogue of French artists. Dumesnil is of opinion that he is the artist of that name who painted the Decollation of St. John in the church of Nôtre Dame, at Paris. He also mentions an etching of a Holy Family, signed N. Preuost, Jr.

PREVOST, PIERRE, a French painter, born at Montigni, near Chateaudun, in 1764. He visited Paris, studied under Valenciennes, and painted a number of easel pictures of landscapes, with ruins, in the style of his instructor, evincing considerable talent. In 1797, Robert Fulton, the celebrated American inventor of the steamboat, visited Paris, and projected the first panorama ever exhibited in that city. Prevost determined to enter upon this novel branch of the art, and soon devoted himself to it with great assiduity. According to French authority, he designed all his views on the spot, and carried the art to the highest perfection. He first produced his panorama of the city of Paris, and afterwards those of Rome, Naples, Amsterdam, Bologna, Tilsit, Wagram, Antwerp, and London. In 1817 he visited the East, and painted his fine panoramas, of Athens and Jerusalem. While engaged upon a design of the city of Constantinople, he was prostrated by disease, and died, in 1823.

PREZ, F. DES, a French engraver on wood, who flourished at Paris about 1573. His prints possess little interest.

PRICE, an obscure English engraver, who executed a few portraits in a very indifferent manner.

PRICKE, ROBERT, an engraver mentioned by Vertue, as one of the pupils of W. Hollar, while that artist was in England, whose style he endeavored to imitate. He engraved the plates for a book on architecture by Pierre le Meurs.

PRIEST, THOMAS, an English landscape painter, who lived at Chelsea about 1740, and chiefly painted views on the Thames. He also etched and published a set of eight views of Chelsea, Mortlake, and other places, executed in a rather coarse, but spirited style.

PRIMATICCIO, FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, born at Bologna in 1490. He was of a noble family, and being a younger son, was intended by his father for commercial pursuits; but manifesting a strong inclination for art, he was permitted to study with Innocenzio da Imola, and afterwards with Il Bagnacavallo, under whom he showed great talents, and made extraordinary progress. The fame of Giulio Romano drew him to Mantua, and he entered the school of that master, where he continued six years, and assisted him in his great works in the Palazzo del Te. He was the ablest of all Giulio's scholars, and when Francis I. applied to the Duke of Mantua for an artist to decorate the palace at Fontainebleau, he recommended Primaticcio. On arriving in France, he found Il Rosso engaged in the King's service, and invested with the office of Superintendent of the buildings. A violent animosity sprang up between these eminent artists, to terminate which the King sent Primaticcio to Italy, to make a collection of antique statues and other works of art. During his absence Il Rosso, called by the French Maitre Roux, died, and on returning he succeeded to his employment. He then commenced the great works in the Royal Palace at Fontainebleau, for which he had first been invited to France. In the ceiling of the great gallery he represented, in fifteen compartments, the Gods of Homer; and on the sides, in fifty-eight smaller compartments, the Adventures of Ulysses, taken from the Odyssey. These stupendous works were chiefly executed from his designs by Niccolo Abati, called also dell' Abati, as mentioned in the life of that painter, assisted by other artists, among whom was Ruggiero Ruggieri, the pupil of Primaticcio, whom he had brought with him from Mantua. These works gave so much satisfaction to the king that he munificently rewarded him, and bestowed on him the revenue of the Abbey of St. Martin, at Troyes in Champagne, worth 8,000 crowns a year, which he enjoyed through life. After the death of Francis, he continued in the service of his successors, Henry II., Francis II., and Charles IX.

Few of the works of Primaticcio now remain. He passed most of his life in France, and all his great pictures before mentioned, in the palace at Fontainebleau, were unnecessarily destroyed in 1738, when that edifice was repaired, through the ignorance and barbarism of the superintendent of the works, greatly to the regret of every lover of art. All that remains of his pictures at Fontainebleau are the frescos in the Saloon of the Guards, now called the apartment d'Estampes, representing the History of Alexander the Great.

There is much discrepancy about the real merits of this great artist. Some writers, who do not hesitate to give to Raffaele the full merit of all the works executed from his designs by his numerous assistants, give a great share of the glory of the works at Fontainebleau to Primaticcio's assistant and coadjutor, Niccolo dell' Abati, although the latter had no hand in designing them. Their other objections are thus briefly summed up by Prof. Phillips, in one of his lectures: "Primaticcio and Niccolo dell' Abati wrought in the same brilliant and free style of design and composition; masterly, but false; able in art, but at variance with nature; manifesting far more science than feeling; freedom and ease of design being regarded by them as most worthy of attention." It is conceded, however, by the best authorities, that, though occasionally artificial, and somewhat incorrect from his expeditious manner, Primaticcio was distinguished for a fertile and inventive genius, judicious composition, a learned design, vigorous coloring, and a fine expression in his heads. It is also admitted that France was greatly indebted to him for the introduction of a better taste both in painting and sculpture. Vasari says, "the first stuccos and the first works in fresco of any consideration in France, took their rise from Primaticcio; he supplied the court with a rich collection of ancient statues, and moulds of many excellent sculpture, from which he afterwards took casts in bronze." Yet, while he mentions that the King of France gave Il Rosso a pension of 1,000 crowns, he omits the fact that he was so impressed with the value of the services of Primaticcio that he rewarded him with a rich benefice of 8,000 crowns, for which omission Malvasia severely taxes him with malice, and Lanzi says he leaves the motives of Vasari to the judgment of his readers. The fact that Primaticcio was sent to Italy by the King to make a collection of antiques, shows the confidence that monarch reposed in his abilities. He ably acquitted himself, and brought back one hundred and twenty-five statues, busts, and mutilated figures; he also took moulds of the most celebrated antiques which he could not purchase, as the Laocoon, the Tiber, the Nile, Ariadne, Commodus, and others, which he subsequently cast in bronze. The works he conducted in France have been fully described by Felibien, who adds that "the geniuses of France are greatly indebted for many exquisite productions to Primaticcio and M. Niccolo (dell' Abati), who are entitled to the fame of first introducing Roman taste into France, with all the beau ideal of ancient painting and sculpture." His works are exceedingly rare in Italy. In the Ducal palace (Palazzo Te) at Mantua, are the exquisite stucco friezes so highly commended by Vasari, and a few pictures, the authenticity of which is questioned by Lanzi, who mentions only one genuine work by him in Italy. His pictures, indeed, are of the utmost rarity in Italy, even in Bologna itself. In the grand Zambeccari Gallery there is a Concert by him, with three female figures, altogether enchanting; the forms, the motions, the coloring, the taste of the contours, and the easy and chaste foldings of the drapery, all combined with a certain originality pervading the whole composition, are well calculated to attract and rivet the eye at the first moment.

Primaticcio was also acquainted with architecture, and made a design for the palace at Meudon; but he never practised the art to any extent. He died at Paris in 1570. See Niccolo Abati.

PRIMI, GIO. BATTISTA, a Roman painter, who, according to Soprani, was a scholar of Agostino Tassi. He painted landscapes in the style of that master with much success, and executed many works for the collections. He settled at Genoa, where he died, in 1657.

PRIMO. See GENTILE.

PRINA, PIETRO FRANCESCO, a painter of No-

vara, highly commended by Orlandi, as an excellent ornamental fresco painter. He excelled in perspective and architecture, and was engaged in several extensive works at Milan and other places. He was living in 1718.

PRINCE, JEAN BAPTISTE LE, a French painter and engraver, born at Metz in 1733. He went to Paris and studied painting, first with J. M. Vien, and afterwards with François Boucher. After acquiring considerable reputation at Paris for his conversation pieces, he accompanied the Abbé Chappe to Siberia, when that astronomer went to make observations on the transit of Venus. During an absence of several years he visited various parts of the Russian Empire, designing the various costumes, and taking sketches of the most remarkable views of scenery in the country through which he passed. On visiting St. Petersburg, he painted a large picture of that city, of which he afterwards published an engraving. On returning to Paris with his extensive collection of drawings, he was very favorably received, painted many admirable pictures, and engraved above 160 plates from his own designs, a list of which may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Paris, and painted the ceremony of a Russian Baptism for his reception piece. He excelled in conversation pieces, interiors of guard-rooms, pastorals, rural festivals, &c., all which subjects he engraved. His prints are spiritedly etched, and usually finished in aquatinta. His works were so much admired that several of his countrymen occupied themselves in engraving from his designs. He died in 1781.

PRINS, J. H., a Dutch painter, born at the Hague, in 1758. His parents, being in good circumstances, intended him for the medical profession; but having a passion for painting, and being strongly opposed by his friends, he ran away from home, and traveled through Brabant and France, studying and making numerous sketches and drawings of the places through which he passed. He subsequently returned to the Hague, but afterwards visited Amsterdam, Utrecht, and Leyden, and practised his profession for a time in each of those cities. He acquired considerable reputation, and his pictures are compared by the Dutch writers to those of Berkheyden and Vanderheyden. There is not much resemblance, however, except in the subjects; and, though his works have merit, they only suffer by a comparison with the productions of those admired painters. His pictures are generally of small size, and are faithful representations of the cities of Holland. They are executed in a lively and spirited manner, with a pleasing effect. His figures are correctly designed and introduced with judgment; the contrast of light and shade is striking, and the reflection of the objects in the water is admirable. His pictures are so very minutely finished, that it appears as if each separate piece might be counted, even the bricks in his edifices—showing less of the artist than the artisan. Nagler gives a list of 12 etchings by him, and says he was drowned in a canal in 1805.

PRINS, B. M., a Dutch artist who flourished at Amsterdam about 1824, and painted landscapes and marines with considerable reputation.

PRISCUS, Accius, a Roman painter, who flourished under Vespasian, and was employed by him in concert with Cornelius Pinus, to execute some works in the temple of Virtue and Honor. He is said to have approached the style of the ancients more closely than Pinus.

PRIWITZER, JOHN, a painter born in Hungary, who went to England in the reign of James I., and was entertained at his court, where he painted the portraits of many of the nobility, among which is that of Sir William Russell, at Woburn Abbey, dated 1627.

PROBST, JOHN BALTHAZAR, a German engraver, born in 1673, and died in 1748. He worked with the graver, in a neat but formal style, and executed a part of the plates after the antique statues in the Dresden Gallery, and several plates of beasts and birds in the menagerie of Prince Eugene, published in 1734. He also engraved some detached pieces, after the Italian and German masters.

PROCACCINI, ERCOLE, THE ELDER, a painter born at Bologna in 1520. There is much discrepancy among Italian authors as to the details of this artist's life; but it is certain that, after acquiring distinction by executing many excellent works for the churches of his native city, he settled at Milan, and opened an academy, which became one of the most celebrated of his time. Besides his own sons, he educated some of the most distinguished artists of the Milanese school, among whom were Sammachini, Sabbatini, and Bertoja. Lomazzo extols him as a successful follower of the graceful design and admirable coloring of Correggio. Lanzi, after pointing out the errors respecting him, says, "In my opinion, he appears somewhat minute in design and feeble in coloring, resembling the tones of the Florentines, a thing so common among his cotemporaries as to make it no reproach to him. For the rest, he is more accurate, diligent, and pleasing than most artists of his age, and perhaps his over-diligence acted as an obstacle to him at Bologna, where the rapid Fontana bore the chief sway; but this quality, besides exempting him from the mannerism then beginning to prevail, rendered him an excellent preceptor, one of whose principal duties is found to consist in checking the inspiration of young artists, so as to ground them properly in the principles of art, and accustom them to precision and delicacy of taste." The principal works of Ercole P. are in the churches at Bologna, the most esteemed of which are the Annunciation, in S. Benedetto; the Conversion of St. Paul, and Christ praying in the Garden, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; St. Michel discomfiting the Rebel Angels, in S. Bernardo; and the Deposition from the Cross, in S. Stefano. There are also some of his works at Milan, and at Parma. He was living in 1591.

PROCACCINI, CAMILLO, was the eldest son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1546. As there is considerable discrepancy among authors as to the merits of this artist, we prefer to copy at length from Lanzi, who always ably investigates his subject, especially when there is any dispute. "He received his first instructions from his father, and often displays a resemblance in his heads, and in the distribution of his tints, though when he painted with care, he both warmed and broke them, as well as employed the middle colors, in a superior manner. He studied other schools, and if we are to believe some of his biographers, he practised at Rome from the models of Raffaele and Michael Angelo, besides being passionately devoted to the heads of Parmiggiano, an imitation of which is perceptible in all his works. He possessed a wonderful facility, both in conception and execution; added to nature, beauty and spirit, always attractive to the eye, though not always satisfactory to the judgment. Nor is this surprising, as he threw off the reign of paternal instruction, and executed works enough to have employed ten artists, in the various churches at Bologna, Ravenna, Reggio, Piacenza, Pavia, and Genoa. He was called by many the Vasari, and others the Zuccaro of Lombardy; although, to say the truth, he surpassed both these artists in sweetness of style and coloring. He was particularly employed at Milan, a city boasting some of his finest productions, by which he obtained reputation there; as well as many of his worst, by which he satisfied those who valued his name. Of his earliest works there, the most free from mannerism are those adjoining the exterior of the organ at the Cathedral, along with various Mysteries of Our Lady and two histories of David playing upon his harp. But he produced nothing at Milan equal to his Last Judgment, in the church of S. Procolo at Reggio, esteemed one of the finest specimens of fresco-painting in all Lombardy; and to his St. Roch administering to the sick and dying of the Plague—a picture which Malvasia says intimidated Annibale Caracci, when he was commissioned to paint a companion for it, to represent that Saint distributing alms to the poor. The pictures produced by Camillo in the Cathedral of Piacenza, where the Duke of Parma had placed him in competition with Lodovico Caracci, whose genius was then matured, are well and carefully executed. He there represented the Coronation of the Virgin, surrounded with a very full choir of Angels, in whose forms he displays the most finished beauty. It was the part of Lodovico to represent other Angels around and opposite to the Coronation, and the Padri del Limbo. Though Camillo occupied the most distinguished part of the tribune, he was esteemed by spectators then, as he is now, the least worthy of the two." Though Procaccini, in this contest, was unequal to his powerful antagonist in the dignity of his design, the novelty of ideas, and expression of the heads, yet it is no mean proof of his abilities, that his pictures possess a powerful attraction, even in the neighborhood of so dangerous a competitor, and that they have elicited the applause of several travelers and historians. Other admired works by him at Milan are the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, in the sacristy of the Cathedral, and the ceiling of the Padri Zoccolanti, where he represented the Coronation of the Virgin, surrounded by a beautiful Choir of Angels. His other most esteemed works are the Adoration of the Shepherds in the church of S. Francesco, and the Annunciation, in S. Clemente, at Bologna; the Last Supper, in the façade of the Cathedral, a grand composition, with figures considerably larger than life; and the Circumcision, in S. Domenico at Genoa. It is generally admitted that Camillo P. possessed a fertile invention, and great facility of execution; that his coloring, especially in frescos, was clear and vigorous; that the airs of his heads were generally expressive and graceful; and that his draperies were cast with judgment and a noble taste; but his promptness and dispatch sometimes led him into incorrectness and extravagance, and he may be occasionally convicted of mannerism. He died at Milan in 1626. He executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, among which are the following:

The Holy Family reposing, in which St. Joseph is represented lying on the ground, resting on the saddle of the ass. Another Holy Family, in which St. Joseph is presenting an orange to the Infant. 1493. The Virgin suckling the Infant. The Transfiguration. St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. 1593.

PROCACCINI, GIULIO CESARE, was the second son of Ercole P., born at Bologna in 1548. After receiving some instruction from his father, he devoted himself to sculpture for some time with success, but he afterwards returned to painting, and is said to have studied in the school of the Caracci. Lanzi says it is evident that he directed his attention to the works of Correggio, and made them his models, and that, in the opinion of many, no one approached nearer to the grand style of that great artist. "In his small pictures, with few figures, in which imitation is more easy, he has often been mistaken for his original, though his elegance cannot boast the same clear and natural tones, nor his colors the same rich and vigorous handling. One of his Madonnas, in the church of S. Luigi de' Francesi at Rome, was in fact engraved not long since, by an eminent artist, for a work of Correggio; and there are other equally fine imitations in the Palazzo Sanvitali at Parma, in that of the Careghi at Genoa, and in other places." Cesare passed some time at Rome, where he diligently studied the works of Raffaele, and it is said he occasionally imitated the rich, glowing coloring of Titian, though Correggio was evidently his great model. He settled at Milan, where he soon rose to distinction, and gained, by his merits, the friendship of the principal nobility. He executed an extraordinary number of well finished works for the churches and public edifices of Milan, Genoa, and other places, and more for private collections. He is esteemed the best of the Procaccini. Less prompt and capricious than his brother Camillo, his compositions are studied and judicious, his design dignified and correct, his masses broad and masterly, and his coloring rich and harmonious. In imitating the graces of Correggio, he sometimes attempted a tenderness of expression approaching to affectation; such are his pictures of the Virgin and infant Jesus surrounded with Saints, and a Choir of angels gazing smilingly on him, in the church of S. Afra, at Brescia; and his Annunciation, in S. Antonio, at Milan, in which the Virgin and Angel are seen smiling at each other. In his attitudes, also, he was occasionally extravagant, as in his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Nazario, in the church of that Saint—a picture full of harmony and grace, though the figure of the executioner is depicted in a constrained attitude, with a ferocious expression. His most esteemed works in the churches at Milan are the Israelites passing through the Red Sea, in S. Vittore; the Transfiguration, in S. Celso; the Adoration of the Magi, and St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, at the Padri Zoccolanti. Some of his histories are of very large size, as the Passage of the Red Sea, before mentioned. He died at Milan in 1626.

There is an etching attributed to this artist, representing the Virgin with the infant Jesus.

PROCACCINI, CARLO ANTONIO, was the third son of Ercole P., born at Bologna about 1555. He was instructed by his father, but afterwards devoted himself to landscape, flowers, and fruit, and acquired great distinction. He particularly excelled in landscape, and his works are highly commended by Malvasia and others, though Lanzi, who always considers such subjects as belonging to the lower branches of the art, hardly does him justice. He says, "he produced a variety of pieces for the Milanese Gallery, which happening to please the court, then one of the branches of Spain, he had frequent commissions from that country, insomuch that he rose, though the weakest in the family, into the highest repute." His works abound in Milan, and are found in many collections in other Italian cities. He also painted some pictures for the churches, one of the best of which is in S. Agata, dated 1605. He died about 1628.

PROCACCINI, ERCOLE, called THE YOUNGER, was the son of Carlo Antonio P., born at Milan in 1596. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with his uncle Giulio Cesare P., whose style he closely followed. Without possessing any remarkable powers, he enjoyed immense patronage, and executed many works for the churches of Milan and other places, but more for the collections. He also excelled in flower-pieces, and for an exquisite performance of this kind he was honored by the court with a gold chain. He opened an Academy at Milan, instructed several pupils; and at the death of his uncle Giulio he was appointed Superintendent of the Academy. Lanzi considers that he contributed to the decline of the Milanese school, by neglecting design too much, and by promoting a servile imitation, or a rapid and mechanical execution. He says of the artists of the Milanese school, who immediately followed the Procaccini, "in general it may be remarked of the artists of this epoch, that, though the pupils of different schools, they display a mutual resemblance, as much as if they had been instructed by the same master. They possess no character that strikes the eye, no beauty of proportions, no vivacity of countenances, no grace in the coloring. The whole composition appears languid; even their imitation of the head of the school does not please, as it is either deficient or overdone, or falls into insignificance"; and again:

"It is known that Ercole P., by public report, by his insinuating manners, and by the family reputation, arrived at a degree of consideration beyond his merit, and he lived to the great age of eighty. Hence he induced many to follow his maxims, and the more, as he kept an open academy in his own house for the study of the naked figure, and succeeded his uncles in their instructions; equal to them perhaps in rapidity, but not so well grounded in art. He painted much, and he maintains his place in the best collections in Milan, though he may not be in so much request as many others."

Lanzi admits however, that Ercole, in his more studied works, as the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Bergamo, "exhibits dignity, spirit, and a happy imitation of the manner of Correggio." He died in 1676.

PROCACCINI, ANDREA, a painter born at Rome in 1671. He studied under Carlo Maratti, and became one of his ablest scholars. He was one of the twelve artists selected by the command of Clement XI. to paint the twelve Prophets in St. John of Lateran, on a trial of skill. On this occasion, Procaccini painted Daniel in such a masterly manner as gained him great reputation. He executed several other works for the churches at Rome; was invited to the court of Spain, and appointed painter to the King. During a residence of fourteen years at Madrid, he executed several works for the churches and royal palaces, which are highly commended. In his design and coloring he closely followed the manner of his instructor, though he painted in a grander style than was usual with Maratti. He painted both in oil and fresco, but his easel works are few. He executed a few spirited and graceful etchings from his own designs, and others after Raffaello and Carlo Maratti. He died at St. Idelfonso in Spain, in 1734, and was buried with great pomp in the convent of San Francisco de Segovia.

PROFONDAVALLE, VALERIO, a painter born in Louvain in 1533. According to Lomazzo, he settled at Milan about 1560, where he was much employed by the Court. He was distinguished for fertile invention and pleasing coloring, especially in fresco; but he was chiefly eminent for his paintings on glass, elegantly designed and brilliantly colored. Lanzi commends him as an able artist, who found abundant employment during his long residence at Milan, where he died in 1600.

PROKOPHIEV, IVAN PROKOPHIEVITCH, an eminent Russian sculptor, born at Petersburg in 1758. At the age of twelve, he commenced studying under Gilet, one of the professors in the Academy of Fine Arts in his native city; and during the eight subsequent years he obtained medals and other prizes for a number of bas-reliefs. Having completed his academical course, he was sent at government expense, in 1779, to perfect himself under Julien at Paris. In 1780, he executed a bust in marble of Prince Gargarin, and a relief in terra-cotta, representing Moses. Having passed a few months at Stettin and Berlin, on his way home, he returned to Petersburg in 1784, and settled permanently in that city. He wrought with great industry, and executed a very large number of works, chiefly bas-reliefs, medallions, and other works on a small scale, mostly for private individuals, many of them being in terra-cotta. His productions evince considerable powers of invention and composition. Those executed in his earlier days have, with much beauty, somewhat of the French mannerism of that day, probably acquired from Julien; but he subsequently overcame this deficiency, and adopted a more noble and classical style. In the Petersburg Academy are his bust of Prince Gargarin, and his bas-reliefs of Moses and Morpheus. In the Imperial Library there are sixteen small caryatides and twenty-eight bas-reliefs by him. His last work was a bust of the Polish poet Trembecki. Soon after its completion, he was attacked by a complaint that rendered him incapable of using his right hand in modeling or designing. He died at Petersburg in 1828, aged 71.

PRONCK, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1691. He was instructed in drawing under F. van Houten, and in painting by Arnold Boonen. He was excellent in portraits, and found considerable employment. He drew views of cities, and landscapes, in water-colors and India ink, which are highly esteemed by collectors. He also etched a few plates of views of cities and landscapes, from his own designs. He died in 1759.

PRONTI, PADRE CESARE, a painter born at Rimini in 1626, according to most authors, though Pascoli says he was a native of Cattolica, of the family of Bacciochi. That author relates many interesting anecdotes of him, particularly one relating to his early passion for painting. When a boy, he accompanied his parents to a fair at Sinigaglia, where was a fine collection of pictures on exhibition. He gazed upon them for several hours, unmindful of his food or his parents, who were searching for him through the city, and when at length they found him, could hardly tear him from the spot. The impression made was indelible; he had resolved to become a painter, and his parents strongly opposing the fixed, determined resolution of his soul, he ran away to Bologna, and assumed the appellation of Pronti, the maiden name of his mother. He entered the school of Guercino, and adopted his style. At an early period of his life, he became a monk of the order of St. Augustine, and was afterwards employed in painting altar-pieces and sacred histories in fresco, for the churches of his order. He executed these in an excellent manner, generally enriching his back-grounds with admirable architecture. His principal works are at Rimini and Ravenna, and from his long residence in the latter city, he is frequently called Padre Cesare da Ravenna. Among his best works are a picture of St. Tommaso da Villanova, at Pesaro; and the Histories from the Life of St. Jerome, in the church of his order at Rimini, which Lanzi says are executed with abundant grace and spirit. He died at Ravenna in 1708.

PROTOGENES, was one of the most celebrated Greek painters. According to Pliny and Pausanias, he was a native of Caunus, a city of Caria, subject to the Rhodians. He was cotemporary with Apelles, flourished during the reign of Alexander the Great, about B. C. 330, and resided at Rhodes during the principal part of his life. Pliny says that Protogenes was originally in very poor circumstances, and that it was not known from whom he received instruction. He passed the earlier part of his life in obscurity, being principally employed in decorating ships. His fellow-citizens were totally insensible of his merit, until the generosity of Apelles roused the Rhodians from their indifference to the talent of their countryman. When that great painter visited Rhodes, he was struck with admiration at the works of Protogenes, and burned with indignation at the injustice of the Rhodians. He inquired what price he put upon his pictures, and when the Rhodian painter mentioned an inconsiderable sum, Apelles paid him fifty talents for a single picture, and publicly announced that he would make it pass and sell for his own. This liberality opened the eyes of the Rhodians, who immediately purchased back the picture at a still higher price, and thenceforward held Protogenes in the highest estimation. He finished his pictures with the greatest care, and consequently did not execute many works. Quintilian says that "cura" was the distinguishing characteristic of his paintings. The ancient writers always mention him in terms of the warmest approbation; and it is perhaps the highest proof of his merit, that Apelles declared Protogenes inferior to himself only in not knowing when "to take his hand from the tablet,"—i.e. in bestowing too much labor upon his paintings.

The most famous of all the paintings of Protogenes, was the picture of Ialysus and his Dog. Pliny says that he laid on four courses of color, lest it should be obliterated by age; and that he was occupied upon it seven years. The dog in this picture, represented as panting and foaming at the mouth, was greatly admired. It is related that Protogenes was for a long time unable to represent the foam in the manner he wished, till at length he threw his sponge in a fury at the spot, and produced the very effect he desired. The fame of this painting was so great, that, according to Pliny, Demetrius Poliorcetes, when besieging Rhodes, did not assault that part of the city where Protogenes lived, lest he should destroy the picture. His studio was situated without the walls, where, to the astonishment of the besiegers, he continued to paint with perfect tranquillity. This coming to the ears of Demetrius, he ordered the artist to be brought to his tent, and demanded how he could persist in the quiet exercise of his profession when surrounded by enemies? Protogenes replied that he did not consider himself in any danger, convinced that a great prince like Demetrius did not make war against the Arts, but against the Rhodians. During these hostilities he painted his famous picture of a Satyr playing on a Flageolet. At the recommendation of Apelles, the Athenians invited Protogenes to Athens, when he was about fifty years of age. He painted a picture of the Mother of Aristotle; one of Alexander; a picture of the god Pan; and the Thesmothæ, in the Senate House of the Five Hundred at Athens, mentioned by Pausanias. His famous picture of Ialysus and his Dog was still preserved in the time of Pliny in the Temple of Peace at Rome. According to Suidas, Protogenes wrote two books on the art.

PROU, JACQUES, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about 1639. He studied under Sebastian Bourdon, and followed his style in landscape painting. As an engraver, he executed a number of plates, among which are the following: A set of twelve Landscapes and Views, after his own designs; a set of six large Landscapes, after Seb. Bourdon; the Baptism of Christ, do.; the Flight into Egypt, after Agos. Caracci.

PROVENZALE, MARCELLO, a painter born at Cento in 1575. He studied under Paolo Rossetti and acquired some distinction in history, but is chiefly celebrated for his beautiful portraits in mosaic. Baglioni describes some of his works, executed by command of Paul V., among which was the portrait of that pontiff, wrought with inimitable art and judgment. The face alone consists of more than two millions of pieces, many of them no larger than a grain of sand; it is esteemed one of the great curiosities of art at Rome. Another fine picture is Orpheus playing upon the Lyre, in the palace of the Cardinal Borghese. In conjunc tion with Rossetti, he executed several mosaics in the church of St. Peter, after the cartoons of the Cav. Roncalli. He died at Rome in 1639.

PROVENZALI, STEFANO. According to Crespi, this artist was a native of Cento, and studied under Guercino. He devoted his talents mostly to battle-pieces, which are highly extolled by the author above cited, for their spirited design and vigorous coloring. He died in 1715.

PRUD'HON, PIERRE PAUL, an eminent French painter, was born at Clugny, according to Gabet, in 1760, although Nagler places his birth in 1768. He studied at Dijon, under Desvosses, and, having gained the prize at the exhibition, received a pension to enable him to visit Italy. At Rome he formed a friendship with the sculptor Canova, and remained in that city until 1789, when he returned to France. After painting miniatures and pastel portraits for some time, he produced his picture of Justice and Vengeance pursuing Crime, which was greatly admired, and placed Prud'hon in a high rank among modern artists. He was soon after chosen a member of the Institute and of the Legion of Honor, and teacher of design to the Empress Maria Louisa. His works are distinguished for richness of composition, elegance of design, beauty of coloring, and delicacy of penciling. The softness and harmony of his tints gained him the title of the French Correggio. He painted many subjects from poetry and history; also portraits and cabinet pictures, which are placed in the best French collections. Among the principal are, Psyche carried off by the Zephyrs; the portrait of the King of Rome; Venus and Adonis; Andromache; the Assumption of the Virgin; the Desolate Family; the Crucifixion; the Vault of the Musée, representing Diana; and a Zephyr hovering over the Water, sold in 1839 for 20,000f. Prud'hon died at Paris in 1823.

PRUNATO, SANTO, a painter of Verona, born in 1656. According to Pozzo, he first studied under Voltolino, and afterwards with Falcieri, at Verona. He next went to Venice, and became the pupil of Gio. Carlo Loth. To acquire a more correct and dignified manner, he afterwards proceeded to Bologna, and studied the works of the Carracci. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed some works for the churches at Verona, and other places in the vicinity, among which is a picture of St. Francesco di Sales, in the Cathedral at Verona. Lanzi says that, in design, and in the expression of his heads, he displays too much of the naturalist, but his coloring is soft and harmonious. He was living in 1716.

PRUNATO, MICHELE ANGELO, was the son of the preceding, born at Verona in 1690. He studied with his father, and imitated his manner with no great success. He executed some works for the churches, one of which is in the Cathedral, and compares unfavorably beside the one by his father, before mentioned.

PRUNEAU, NOEL, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1751. He studied under Augustin de St. Aubin, in whose style he engraved some plates, chiefly portraits, from his own designs, and after other masters, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Rosalie le Vasseur; after his own design. Hermann Boerhave; do. Albert de Haller; do. Gerard, Baron van Swieten, Architect; after A. de St. Aubin. John Joseph Sue; after A. Pujos. Francis de la Peyronie, principal Surgeon to Louis XV.

PUCCI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, a painter who studied under Antonio Domenico Gabbiani. Lanzi says that honorable mention is made of him as a painter and a poet, in the eulogy of Gabbiani, in the Lettere Pittoriche. He was living at Rome in 1716, then young.

PUCCINI, BIAGIO, a painter of Rome, who flourished in that city in the first part, and perhaps to the middle, of the 18th century. He painted some works for the churches, and Lanzi says he was esteemed an artist of good execution.

PUCHLER, JOHN MICHAEL, a German engraver of whom little is known. There are a few portraits by him, executed in a peculiar manner, the faces being stippled, and the hair and drapery formed of lines like writing. They are marked with the letters J. M. P. cursive, in a monogram.

PUCHLER, MICHAEL, a German engraver, who executed a few portraits, among which are those of the Emperor Leopold and Eleonora Magdalena Theresa, his Empress.

PUGA, ANTONIO, a Spanish painter of familiar subjects, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century, studied under Don Diego Velasquez, and is said to have exactly imitated the early manner of that master. There were six pictures by him in the collection of Don Silvestre Collar de Castro, so much in the style of his master, that they might easily be taken for his works.

PUGET, PIERRE PAUL, a French painter, sculptor, and architect, termed the Michael Angelo of France, was born at Marseilles in 1622. His father, a painter and architect, gave him instructions in those arts, and at the age of fourteen he was placed under a ship-builder, named Roman, who employed him in carving ornaments for decorating vessels. Disgusted with the drudgery of his situation, Puget quitted Marseilles at the age of seventeen, and went to Italy. At Florence, according to Milizia, he met with attention and kindness from the Sculptor to the Grand Duke, and pursued his studies with great success. Attracted by the fame of Pietro da Cortona, he repaired to Rome, and entered the school of that master, where he made such rapid progress as to be selected to assist his instructor in painting the Pitti Palace at Florence. Instead of remaining in that city, however, he suddenly resolved to return to France, although aged only twenty-one years. On arriving at Marseilles he was very well received, and was shortly afterwards commissioned to design a vessel of extraordinary magnificence, named La Reine, in honor of Queen Anne of Austria, which was completed in 1646. That princess commissioned a monk of the Order des Feuillants to visit Rome and make designs of the most celebrated monuments of antiquity, and he selected Puget as his assistant. The latter accordingly proceeded a second time to Rome, and spent five or six years in that city; but it is not known what afterwards became of this valuable collection of drawings. On returning to Marseilles in 1653, Puget received commissions for several pictures, and he painted a number for the churches of Marseilles, Aix, Toulon, and other cities; besides some cabinet pictures. In the cathedral at Aix is a picture by him of the Annunciation, elegantly and gracefully designed, though cold and languid in the coloring; also the same subject in the Jacobin church at Toulon, differently composed, somewhat in the style of P. da Cortona. The excessive application of Puget to the art, proved so injurious to his health, that by the advice of his physicians he renounced painting, and thenceforward devoted his energies to sculpture and architecture.

The excellence of Puget in sculpture and architecture was very highly rated in his own day; although Cicognara says his sculptures betray inaccuracy as to proportions, want of refinement in taste; and evince more of the painter than the sculptor in their treatment, seldom producing a pleasing effect, but from a single point of view. His talents, however, were well esteemed by Bernini; his works are full of spirit and fire; they show the hand of a master, and gained him great applause from his countrymen and from cotemporary artists. His talents met with encouragement at Toulon and Marseilles; for which latter city he projected many embellishments, which established his reputation; and he gave further proof of his talents by various machines and inventions, which he introduced into the marine at Toulon. Milizia says that his two Termini, which support the Hotel de Ville at Toulon, although his first work in sculpture, received the applause of Bernini; and the Terra with Janus, and Hercules, which he sculptured at Paris, were still more admired. He was sent by Fouquet to Genoa, for the purpose of selecting marble for some of the works to be executed at Marseilles; but that minister being shortly afterwards disgraced, Puget preferred remaining at Genoa, where he produced several of his finest works, among which were the two statues of St. Sebastiano and St. Ambrogio; the grand bas-relief of the Assumption, in the chapel of the Albergo de' Poveri; the Madonna, in the private oratory of the Sauli. He also designed several fine architectural works, among which were the church of the Nunziata, erected at the expense of the Signor Lomellini; and the chapel of St. Lodovico, in that church. His talents were highly appreciated and rewarded by the Genoese. At length, after a residence of about eight years at Genoa, he was recalled to France by Colbert, who obtained for him the post of sculptor and director of the Works in ornamenting Vessels, with a pension of 1200 crowns, in consequence, it is said, of the earnest recommendation of Bernini. His two works in sculpture at Marseilles, the Milo of Crotona and the group of Perseus and Andromeda, gained him great reputation; the former is considered his master-piece, and a work that will bear comparison with the antique. Among his other works, were a bas-relief of Diogenes, a statue of Apollo, and a bas-relief of the Plague of Milan. He does not seem to have executed many works in architecture; besides those at Genoa already mentioned, he erected at Marseilles the church de la Charité, and that of the Capuchins. In 1688, Puget was presented to the King at Fontainebleau, and was graciously received. He was not, however, calculated for the meridian of a court; and, after residing a short time at Paris, he returned to Marseilles, where he erected an elegant house, in the style of a small palace, and occupied it till his death, in 1694, at the age of 72.

PUGH, HERBERT, an Irish painter, who settled in London about 1758. He painted landscapes in a mannered and affected style, and also executed a few indifferent pictures in imitation of Hogarth. He died about 1775.

PUGLIA, GIUSEPPE, called IL BASTARO, a painter who, according to Baglioni, flourished in the pontificate of Urban VIII., and was employed in the Library of the Vatican. Lanzi reckons him among the second rate artists. He executed some works for the churches and public edifices at Rome, the chief of which are the Presentation, in the Cloister of the Padri della Minerva, and an altar-piece of the Assumption in the Basilica of S. Maria Maggiore. Baglioni says he died young; Zani says he wrought in 1600, and died in 1640; others say that he was born at Rome in 1620, and died in 1682.

PUGLIESCHI, ANTONIO, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. According to Baldinucci, he first studied with Ciro Ferri, and afterwards with Pietro Dandini. He was a reputable artist, and executed some works for the churches, but was mostly employed by individuals.

PULIGO, DOMENICO, a Florentine painter, born in 1475. He studied under Domenico Corradi, called Ghirlandaio, and was esteemed his ablest scholar. According to Vasari, he formed a strict intimacy with Andrea del Sarto, whose style he imitated in his Madonnas and Holy Families. He had an excellent taste of design and composition, but unfortunately for his fame, he was addicted to pleasure, and painted less for reputation than for immediate gain. He was also a good portrait painter. Lanzi says, "he was less skilled in design than in coloring. His tints are sweet, clear, and harmonious; but he aimed at covering the outline to relieve himself of the necessity of perfect accuracy; by this mask, he is sometimes recognized in Madonnas and cabinet pictures, which were perhaps designed by Andrea, and at first sight might pass for the works of that master." He died in 1527.

PULZONE, SCIPIONE, called GAETANO, from the place of his nativity, was born at Gaeta in 1550. He studied under Jacopino del Conte, and acquired considerable reputation in history, but chiefly distinguished himself for his excellent portraits. He painted many of the most distinguished persons of his time, among whom were Gregory XIII., the Archduke Ferdinand, the Cardinal de Medici, and others. Lanzi says, "he formed his manner on those of Raffaele and Andrea del Sarto, and though somewhat labored, he left behind him a great reputation, partly in portraits, of which he executed a great number for popes and princes, with so much success, that by some, he is called the Vandyck of the Roman school." His attitudes are elegant and graceful, and his heads full of life and expression. He finished his portraits very highly, representing in the pupil of the eye, the reflection of the windows and other objects, as minute and exact as in real life. He also painted some pictures in the finest style, as the Crucifixion, in the church of S. Maria in Vallicella, the Assumption, with the Apostles, in S. Silvestro in Monte Cavallo, and a Dead Christ, in the Lap of the Virgin, in del Gesu. In the Borghese Gallery, is a fine picture of the Holy Family, and in that of Florence, one of Christ praying in the Garden; and in other places are some of his cabinet pictures, which are deservedly esteemed. Lanzi says he died young, in his 38th year, in the pontificate of Sixtus V. Zani says he was born in 1562, and died in 1600.

PUNT, JOHN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born in 1711; died about 1779. As a painter, he was principally employed in theatrical decorations and chiaro-scuro. He engraved some plates; Nagler gives a list of thirty-six of the principal, after the designs of Jacob de Witt, from the ceilings painted by Rubens in the church of the Jesuits at Antwerp, which are the more interesting, as the originals were destroyed by lightning.

PUNTORMO. See JACOPO CARRUCCI.

PUPILER, ANTHONY, a Flemish painter, who was employed in Spain by Philip II., about 1556. He is said to have been an artist of great ability, but no opinion can be formed of his merits, as all his works were destroyed in the conflagration of the Prado.

PUPINI, BIAGIO, a Bolognese painter, of whom there are notices from 1530 to 1540. He was a disciple of Francesco Francia, whose style he followed, though with a more modern air. He executed some works for the churches of Bologna, the most esteemed of which are the Coronation of the Virgin in S. Giuliano; the Virgin and Infant, with St. Orsola, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; St. John preaching in the Wilderness, in S. Maria della Baroncella, and the Nativity, at the Institute. He often wrought in conjunction with other artists, at Bologna and in other places. He is sometimes called Biagio dalle Lame, or Lamane.

PURCELL, RICHARD, an English engraver in mezzotinto, born in 1736, and died about 1800. He scraped some portraits after Vandyck, Reynolds, and others, among which are the following: John Manners, Marquis of Granby; Lady Fenhoulet, afterwards Countess of Essex; Elizabeth, Countess of Berkeley; after Reynolds. The Children of Charles I.; after Vandyck. John Wilkes, Esq.; after Pine.

PUSCHNER, JOHN GEORGE, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg from about 1670 to 1720. He engraved a set of portraits for a folio volume entitled Icones virorum omnium ordinum eruditione, &c., published at Nuremberg.

PYE, JOHN, an English engraver, born about 1745. He engraved quite a number of landscapes, etched and neatly finished with the graver, after Claude Lorraine, Swanevelt, and Cuyp, and some marines after Vernet. He was much employed by Alderman Boydell. His prints date from 1773 to 1775.

PYNAKER, ADAM, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, born at the village of Pynaker, between Delft and Schiedam, in 1621. His first instructor is not mentioned; but he visited Italy while very young, and resided several years at Rome, studying the works of the best landscape painters, and designing the finest views in the vicinity of that capital. On returning to Holland, he soon gained distinction, and his works were held in great admiration. He was much employed in ornamenting the apartments of the nobility; he also painted easel pictures, which are very highly esteemed, and are placed in choice collections. His landscapes exhibit very pleasing scenery, frequently representing the sunny morning light breaking out from behind the woods or mountains, and diffusing a brilliant glow over the whole face of nature. His skies are clear, light, and floating; the foliage of his trees and plants is touched with unusual freedom and spirit; his pencil is firm and flowing, evincing remarkable facility of hand, with great breadth, richness, and brilliancy. His pictures are decorated with ancient architecture, figures and cattle, correctly drawn, and grouped in an elegant and tasteful style. Pynaker's easel pictures are not very numerous; Smith's catalogue contains a list of about seventy. Many of the finest are in England. He died in 1673.

PYNE, WILLIAM HENRY, an English designer and author, born at Holborn in 1769. As an artist, he confined himself to drawing, in which he manifested great facility, lively fancy, and delicate taste. In 1803, he published the first part of his interesting work entitled "The Microcosm; or a picturesque Delineation of the Arts, Agriculture, Manufactures, &c., of Great Britain," completed in 1806, illustrated with about 600 groups of small figures for the embellishment of landscapes. He afterwards published in three imperial quarto volumes, a "History of the Royal Residences," of Windsor, St. James, Carlton House, Kensington Palace, Hampton Court, Buckingham House, and Frogmore, illustrated with about 100 richly colored plates. He was much employed by the celebrated publishers, Ackermann & Co., in the Strand, in the supervision of their numerous publications. He died in 1843.

PYREICUS, a Grecian painter, who flourished about B. C. 200. His favorite subjects were scenes from low life; particularly interiors of the shops of tailors and shoemakers; also sheep folds, with groups of animals; asses going to market, laden with produce. His skill in representing scenes of the latter description, gained him the name of Rhyparographus. His pictures were of small size, exquisitely finished, and brought very high prices. Pliny thought that subjects from low life were beneath the dignity of painting, but the admiration universally conceded to them is sufficient evidence of their being proper subjects for the pencil. It is no small satisfaction to the lovers of art, that the ancients encouraged and appreciated every branch of painting.

PYRGOTELES, an eminent Grecian engraver on gems, who flourished in the time of Alexander the Great, about B. C. 330. He was cotemporary with the most distinguished painters and sculptors of Greece; as an engraver on gems, he was considered equal to Apelles in painting, and Scopas and Lysippus in sculpture. Alexander the Great conferred upon him the same honor as upon Lysippus and Apelles, who had the exclusive privilege of representing him in their respective arts. Among his principal productions, were the head of Alexander, the head of Phocion, and Hercules destroying the Hydra. There is no well authenticated work by this artist, which has reached modern times.

PYRRIUS. See LACRATES.

PYTHAGORUS, an ancient sculptor, a native of Rhegium. Some of his works exhibited a deeper sentiment and truer feeling, than any that had yet appeared in works of statuary. His chief works were the statues of Euthymus and Asty-lus, conquerors in the Olympic games. His statue of Philoctetes was remarkable for justness of proportions and delicacy of finish.

PYTHEUS, an eminent Grecian architect, who flourished about B. C. 324. He is principally distinguished for the celebrated mausoleum erected by Queen Artemisia in memory of King Mausolus of Halicarnassus, of which he had the entire direction, in conjunction with Satyrus; and both artists made the designs for the work.—(For a full description of this “wonder of the world,” see the article BRYAXIS.) Pytheus was also greatly distinguished for the famous pyramid, which surmounted the mausoleum, executed by himself. It was crowned with a car drawn by four horses abreast, representing the Chariot of the Sun. According to Vitruvius, Pytheus also erected at Priene, now Polazzo, a famous temple to Minerva Polias; which, though now in ruins, is an important evidence of Ionian elegance and grandeur. When entire, it overlooked the city, which was situated on the side of a mountain, on terraces cut out of the slope, descending in gradation to the edge of the plain. The communication from one terrace to another, was by steps cut in the solid rock, many of which are still remaining. The temple was surrounded by a wall, through which was a gateway. The plan of the edifice was a parallelogram, 122 feet six inches by 64 feet three inches, measured on the upper step. There were eleven columns in the flanks, and six in the fronts of the temple. The walls of the cell were four feet thick, ranging with the columns, and enclosing an area of sixty-five feet by thirty feet nine inches.

Q.

QUAGLIA, GIULIO, a painter, born at Como. According to Lanzi, he went to Friuli while young, towards the close of the 17th century, where he conducted works, principally in fresco, to an amount that almost defies enumeration. His histories of the Passion of our Saviour, in the Monte di Pietà, at Udine, are held in high estimation, although he conducted works on a much larger scale in the halls of many of the noble families, characterised by a fecundity of ideas, a decision of pencil, and a power for vast compositions, sufficient to distinguish him in his age, not only in the limits of Como, but also at Milan. Lanzi conjectures from his style, that he was a disciple of the Recchi.

QUAGLIATA, GIOVANNI, a painter of Messina, born in 1603. According to Hackert, he went to Rome, and studied under Pietro da Cortona. On returning to Messina, he acquired considerable distinction, and is said to have painted in competition with Rodriguez and Barbalunga. He died in 1673.

QUAGLIATA, ANDREA, was the brother of the preceding, born at Messina in 1600, and died in 1660. It is not known under whom he studied, and he never visited Rome, but was considered a good artist at Messina.

QUAGLIO, GIO. MARIA, an Italian architect and engineer, a native of Luino, probably the son, and certainly a relative, of Giulio Quaglia. He flourished in the first half of the 18th century. After acquiring a knowledge of the art in Italy, he visited Vienna, and was employed in the service of the Emperor. His son Lorenzo, was born at Luino in 1730, accompanied his father to Vienna, and was instructed by him in architecture. Lorenzo erected a number of edifices in Germany, esteemed for their superior taste, among which are the Theatre of Mannheim, and the Theatre of Frankfort. He died in 1804, leaving a son, named Giovanni Maria, born in 1772, who was a distinguished architectural and scene painter.

QUAGLIO, DOMENICO, a son of the elder Gio. Maria Q., the brother of Lorenzo Q., was a historical painter, and flourished in Germany about 1760. He had two sons—Giulio, an admirable scene painter, who flourished at Munich, and died in 1800—Giuseppe, born in 1747; died at Munich in 1828; was even more eminent than his brother, both in scene painting and general decoration. The latter had four sons; Domenico, Angelo, Lorenzo, and Simone. The two latter were born respectively in 1793 and 1795, but do not appear to have attained any distinction in art, if indeed they professed it at all. Angelo, born in 1788, was a scene painter of extraordinary genius. Some of his productions are described as producing an astonishing effect, particularly one representing the Illumination of St. Peter's at Rome, from studies made by him on the spot. He died in 1815. Domenico, the elder son, is the subject of the following article.

QUAGLIO, DOMENICO, an eminent architectural painter, the eldest son of Giuseppe Quaglio, was born at Munich in 1786. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was carefully instructed by his father. He made rapid advances, particularly in perspective and architectural painting, and also devoted considerable attention to drawing from the living model, to landscapes, and sketching from nature, as well as to etching and engraving. His versatility of talent had nearly prevented his attaining great excellence in any particular branch of art; but, following the advice of his brother Angelo, he devoted his energies to architectural painting. He was appointed to the office of scene painter of the theatre at Munich. Having imbibed a strong taste for the architecture of the Middle Ages from Angelo's drawings of the cathedral of Cologne (made for Sulpice Boisserée's magnificent pictorial work), he resolved to delineate chiefly the finest specimens of the edifices of that period. With this intent, he visited Freising and other places, and made many designs which he subsequently used in his compositions. His picture of the cathedral at Regensburg, gained him a high reputation, and was purchased by King Maximilian of Bavaria, who, as well as many other able judges, advised Quaglio to prosecute this department of the art. Accordingly, in 1819, he resigned his appointment as scene painter of the Munich theatre, and thenceforward devoted himself entirely to architectural painting. His reputation extended by degrees throughout Europe, and he received many commissions. His works, which are very numerous, are marked by striking picturesque effect. They are highly valued as representations of the finest specimens of German Gothic edifices, and have been partially instrumental in promoting that taste for the Arts and Architecture of the Middle Ages, which of late years has prevailed in Germany. In 1829, Quaglio accompanied Mr. Gally Knight, as architectural draughtsman, on his tour to Italy. While employed at Hohenswangau, in restoring and improving the Castle, he was attacked with apoplexy, and died April 9, 1837. There are a number of etchings and lithographic views by him; among the latter are a series of thirty subjects, entitled Den Kwardige Gebaude des Deutschen Mittelalters.

QUAINI, FRANCESCO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1611. He studied under Agostino Mitelli, and was one of his ablest scholars. He was much employed in decorating the churches, public edifices and palaces of Bologna with frescos of architectural and perspective views. Some of his most esteemed works are in the Sala Farnese, in the Palazzo Pubblico. He died at Bologna in 1680.

QUAINI, LUIGI, was the son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1643. After learning perspective with his father, he became the disciple of Guercino, and afterwards of his cousin Carlo Cignani, with Marc' Antonio Franceschini as a fellow pupil. Both these artists assisted Cignani in many of his works; and in distributing their labors he gave to Franceschini the fleshes, and to Quaini the more lively and spirited countenances and decorative parts, in which he succeeded so admirably that his painting could hardly be distinguished from that of his master. Franceschini and Quaini afterwards united their talents, the former painting the figures, and the latter the landscape, architecture, and other accessories, and thus in concert, they executed many admirable works for the churches and palaces of Bologna, Modena, Piacenza, Genoa, and Rome, in which latter city they made the cartoons for the cupola of St. Peter's, afterwards executed in mosaic. Quaini also painted many historical pictures of his own invention, mostly for individuals. His pictures in public at Bologna, are the Visitation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Giuseppe; a Pietà, in la Carità, and an altar-piece of St. Nicholas visited by an Angel, in the church of that saint. He died in 1717.

QUARENGLI, CAV. GIACOMO, an Italian architect, born at Bergamo in 1744. After receiving a liberal education, he studied painting under Mengs and Stefano Pozzi; but he subsequently gave his attention to architecture. According to the biographical memoirs published by his son Giulio, (entitled Fabbriche e Disegni, &c., Milano, 1821), he soon gained distinction in the art, and received many commissions at Rome. Unfortunately, none of these works are specified, nor is the chronology of his professional life recorded. Quarenghi was invited to Russia by the Empress Catherine II., who employed him to erect a variety of edifices, among which are the design for the triumphal arch erected in honor of the Emperor Alexander; the Theatre of the Hermitage; the Manège of the Imperial Guards, in the Isaac's Place at St. Petersburg; the Convent of Demoiselles Nobles; and the Palace of Prince Gargarin. Quarenghi attained a very high reputation in Russia; but his published designs afford little evidence of superior taste, or even of fertile invention. In comparison with many of his countrymen, he may be said to have been pure in his style of composition; but his merits are little more than negative;—if there is nothing glaringly offensive in his productions, there are no particular excellencies. They have insulated columns and ample prostyles. Ionic or Corinthian porticos, frequently attached to buildings in other respects naked and bare. His details evince a great deal of mannerism, being nearly the same on all occasions, as well as poor and meagre. He died in 1817.

Or  or  or  QUAST, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at the Hague in 1602; died in 1670. He painted humorous subjects, as beggars, drolls, assemblies of boors, merry-makings, &c., represented with great humor and spirit, not unmingled with vulgarity. He also executed some spirited etchings, after his own designs and those of other masters, in a manner resembling that of Callot, and usually marked them with one of the above monograms. Among others are the following:

The Five Senses; P. Quast, fec. 1638. The Four Seasons, in grotesque figures. A set of twenty-six plates of Beggars, Boors, &c. A set of twelve Grotesque Figures. A set of ten plates of Beggars, &c.; S. Savery, exc. A set of twelve fancy subjects, in imitation of Callot.

 QUATREPOMME, ISABELLA. This lady is mentioned by Papillon, as an engraver on wood, a native of Rouen, who flourished about 1521. He mentions one print by her, and Zani two more, marked with an apple and the figure 4, in allusion to her name.

QUEBOORN, or QUEBORN, CRISPIN VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at the Hague in 1604. He was chiefly employed in engraving small portraits for the booksellers, which possess considerable merit. He also engraved part of the plates for Thibault's Académie de l'Épée, published at Antwerp in 1628. Among others, are the following portraits by him:

Queen Elizabeth. 1625. Charles I. 1626. William I., Prince of Orange; after Visscher. Mary, daughter of Charles I., consort of the Prince of Orange. Frederick V. Elector Palatine. Elizabeth, daughter of James I., his consort. Juliana, Princess of Hesse. Frederick Henry, Prince of Nassau. 1630.

QUELLINUS, ERASMUS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1609. According to Sandrart, he received a liberal education, and devoted himself for sometime to the study of the Belles Lettres, in which he so far distinguished himself as to be appointed professor of Philosophy in the college of his native city. On becoming acquainted with Rubens, whose house was the resort of learned men, as well as distinguished artists, he was inspired with such a love of painting that he resigned his appointment, and entered the school of his friend. With a mind richly endowed by nature, and well stored with literature, he made rapid progress, and in a few years became one of the ablest artists of his country, at a period when Antwerp boasted the most celebrated painters of the Flemish school. He did not servilely imitate Rubens, like many of the scholars of that master, but formed a style of his own, abundantly evincing vivacity of genius, polished by study. His composition is good, his touch free and spirited, and his coloring rich and harmonious. His design, though considerably tinged with the Flemish manner, is tolerably correct, and his ideas are generally just, learned, and elevated, though his drawing is sometimes inaccurate. He had an excellent knowledge of architecture and perspective, with which he embellished the backgrounds of his pictures. He was equally successful in history and landscapes, and painted many of the most distinguished personages of his time. He painted both in large and small size; his large works are executed with great vigor and freedom, but his cabinet pictures are more delicately pencilled and colored with greater transparency. His most celebrated works are Christ at the house of the Pharisee, with Mary Magdalen washing his feet, and the Guardian Angel, in the church of S. Andrew, at Antwerp; an altar-piece of the Holy Family reposing in Egypt, in the church of S. Saviour at Ghent; and the Nativity, in the church of S. Peter at Mechlin. The latter has often been mistaken for the work of Vandyck. Erasmus Quellinus died at Antwerp in 1678. He executed a few spirited etchings, chiefly after Rubens, among which are the following: Samson killing the Lion; the Virgin and Infant Jesus, after Rubens. A landscape, with a dance of children and young satyrs; E. Quellinus fec.; rare.

QUELLINUS, JOHN ERASMUS. This eminent painter was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1629. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Italy, at the age of 21. Arriving first at Venice, he was captivated by the works of Paul Veronese, and made them his model. He afterwards visited Rome, Naples, and Florence, and found considerable employment in those places. He returned to Antwerp at the desire of his father, with a high reputation, and immediately received abundant encouragement, in painting altar-pieces and other pictures for the churches at Antwerp. He also painted much for the private collections in other parts of the Low Countries. The ornamental style of Veronese is visible in all his works. His design is correct, his figures are elegant and graceful, with a lively expression, and disposed with propriety and judgment. His coloring is clear and brilliant, partaking of the Venetian and Flemish schools; his chiaro-scuro admirable; his draperies well cast in large and flowing folds, and his backgrounds enriched with noble architecture, obelisks and monuments. His most capital work is Christ healing the Sick, in the church of the Abbey of St. Michael at Antwerp. It is an immense composition, extending the whole height of the edifice, with a multitude of figures as large as life, yet so admirably arranged as to be free from the least appearance of confusion; the background is embellished with noble architecture. This picture is so much in the style of Veronese, that it might easily be taken for his work. In the Refectory of the same Abbey, he painted four pictures representing Christ feeding the Five Thousand; the Feast of the Pharisee; the Supper at Bethany; and the Last Supper. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a fine picture of the Adoration of the Magi, and in the church of Notre Dame at Mechlin, the Last Supper, one of his finest works. The younger Quellinus is justly ranked among the ablest artists of his country, who succeeded the golden era of Flemish art under Rubens and Vandyck. He died at Antwerp in 1715.

QUELLINUS, ARTUS, a Flemish sculptor, the brother of Hubert, and the cousin of John Erasmus Q., was a native of Antwerp, and flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He visited Italy, and studied under Francis Duquesnoy; after which he returned to Flanders, and succeeded in attaining a high reputation. His principal sculptures are in the Stadt-House at Amsterdam, for which edifice he executed a large number of excellent works.

QUELLINUS, HUBERT. This engraver was the brother of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1608. It is not mentioned under whom he studied. He etched a set of plates in a singular style, resembling that of Peter Soutman, and neatly finished with the graver, from the marble statues of the sculptor Artus Quellinus, in the Stadt-House at Amsterdam. They are marked with the initials of both artists, A. Q. H. Q., and were published in a folio volume at Amsterdam in 1655. He also engraved some portraits, among which are Philip IV., seated on his throne, with the Prince Royal and several allegorical figures, and one of Artus Quellinus, from his own designs.

QUERFURT, AUGUSTUS, a German painter, born at Wolfenbittel in 1696. After receiving instructions from his father, a reputable landscape painter, he went to Augsburg and studied under Rugendas. He painted encampments, skirmishes of cavalry, battle-pieces, and huntings, in which he appears rather an imitator than an original painter. Sometimes he adopted the manner of Borgognone and vander Meulen; at others he aimed at that of Wouwerman, but with less success. His pictures are well composed and colored, and executed with spirit. He died at Vienna in 1761.

QUESNEL, or QUENET, FRANCIS. This painter is supposed to have been born at Edinburg about the year 1540. He passed his life in France, and was employed by Henry III., and Henry IV. Among others, he painted the portraits of those monarchs, and of Mary de Medicis. Several of his portraits have been engraved by Edelinck, T. de Leu, and van Schuppen. He died at Paris in 1619.

QUESNOY, FRANCIS DU. See DUQUESNOY.

QUEVERDO, FRANÇOIS MARIE ISIDORE, a French engraver, born in Brittany in 1740, although some writers place his birth-place in Spain. He engraved a part of the plates for the Voyage pittoresque d'Italie, by the Abbé de St. Non. He also engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, after his own designs and those of other masters. He was living in 1811.

QUEUX, MICHEL JOSEPH LE, a French architect, born at Lille in 1756. His career was short, as he was assassinated in 1786, at the age of thirty; but he erected several fine edifices in excellent taste, in his native city, and designed the Palais de Justice at Douay.

QUEWELLERIE, GUILLAUME DE LA, a French designer and engraver, who flourished about 1680. He engraved a set of small ornamental plates for jewelers, neatly executed. The frontispiece is inscribed with his name, Guilhelmies de la Quewellerie, fecit, An. Dni. 1680. The other plates are marked with the initials G. D. L. Q.

QUILLART, PIERRE ANTOINE, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1711. He studied under Anthony Watteau, on leaving whom it is said he was invited to the court of Portugal, appointed painter to the Queen, and elected a member of the Academy at Lisbon, where he died in the flower of his age. His principal work as a painter, was a beautiful ceiling in the Queen's bed-chamber. He designed and engraved a set of plates representing the funeral pomp of Duke Don Nuno Olivares Pereira, published at Lisbon in 1730.

QUINKHARD, JOHN MAURICE, a Dutch painter, born at Rees, near Cleves, in 1687. He studied successively under Arnold Boonen, Lubinietski, and N. Verkolie. He painted familiar, allegorical, and mythological subjects, well designed and colored. He also excelled in portraits, and was much employed in that branch. He died in 1772.

QUINTILIEN, a French engraver mentioned by Florent le Comte. He executed some plates after Callot, but did not affix his name to them.

QUIRICO, GIOVANNI DA TORTONA, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century. There is an altar-piece by him, painted on a gold ground, in the Hospital of Vigevano, dated 1505.

QUIROS, LORENZO, a Spanish painter, born at Santos, in Estremadura, in 1717. He studied under Bernard German Llorente, at Seville, with whom he made great progress, both in oil and fresco. He afterwards went to Madrid for improvement, where his talents recommended him to the notice of Carlo Corrajo and Raffaele Mengs, then in the service of the King of Spain, who offered him employment; but being of a turbulent disposition and a slave to his own fancies, he preferred imaginary liberty to fame and fortune. He afterwards retired to Seville, where he remained twenty years without making any one acquainted with his place of residence, and employed himself in copying and imitating the works of Murillo, which he sold, by means of an agent, for originals by that master. He is said to have been very successful, and doubtless many pictures in foreign collections, more recently smuggled out of Spain as the genuine works of Murillo, were by this master. He left some works at Madrid, in the Academy of San Fernando, at Cazalla, Granada, and other places in Spain. He died in 1789.

QUITER, HERMANN HENDRICK, a Dutch mezzotinto engraver, born about 1620, and died about 1700. He went to England, where he executed in an indifferent manner a few portraits after Sir Peter Lely and others, among which is that of Queen Catherine, consort of Charles II., after Lely.

QUITER, HERMANN HENDRICK, was the son of the preceding. He went to Rome, and studied in the school of Carlo Maratti. He afterwards returned to his own country, and was appointed painter to the Landgrave of Hesse. He died at Brunswick in 1731.

QUITER, MAGNUS, was a younger brother of the preceding. He visited Rome, and studied some time with Maratti, after which he went to England, where it is supposed he assisted Sir Godfrey Kneller. He afterwards returned to Holland, where he chiefly painted portraits, and occasionally historical subjects. He was appointed Keeper of the Gallery at Salzdalum, and died in 1744.

QUITER, E., a Dutch engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He executed some portraits after John de Baan and others.

RABASSE, or RABAS, JEAN, a French engraver and printseller, who flourished at Paris about 1650. Dumesnil attributes three prints to him: Judith, signed Jean Rabas, avec Preuilege du Roy; a Holy Family, marked with the initials J. R.; and a Repose in Egypt, with the same letters in a monogram. Brulliot attributes the mark on the last print to Jacob de Bray and Giuseppe Ribera.

RABBIA, RAFFAELLE, a portrait painter, born at Marino. Little is known of him except from the commendation of Cav. Marini, the poet, whose portrait he painted. He was living in 1610.

RABEL, JEAN, a French painter and engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1588. As a painter, he is little known. Prof. Christ says he published several of his designs, engraved on wood, but does not specify the subjects, nor mention whether they were engraved by himself or some other artist. There is a copper-plate by him, representing the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, copied from the print of the same subject by Marc' Antonio, after Baccio Bandinelli. It is less than the original, and is inscribed Io. Rabel Bellonaculus lute Parisii. According to Basan, he was born in 1550, and died in 1608.

RABEL, DANIEL, was the son of the preceding, who is supposed to have been his instructor. He painted landscapes in a pleasing style, some of which were engraved by cotemporary artists. He etched quite a number of plates from his own designs, in a style resembling that of Israel Silvestre, consisting of landscapes and views, with figures correctly drawn. Nagler places his death in 1628, but does not notice any of his prints. Zani says he operated in 1636.

RABEN, RAVEN, or RAEVEN, SERVATIUS, a Dutch engraver, of whom little is known with certainty, except that he engraved the Twelve Cæsars, after Stradanus, one of which is marked with a monogram formed of the letters S. V. R., and the rest with his name in full, variously spelled, as above. There is also a plate of the Madonna della Seggiola, after Raffaelle, signed Servatius Raeven. Zani and others consider him the same as Servoutter, the accounts of whom are very contradictory, but the monogram of the latter is quite different, being composed of the letters P. and S. interlaced, followed by a W. See Servoutter.

RABIELLO, PABLO, a Spanish painter who flourished at Saragossa in the beginning of the 18th century. The accounts of him are contradictory. According to Bermudez, though not very correct in his drawing, he understood the great maxims of the painter, and excelled in battle-pieces, following the styles of Fray Juan Rizi and Juan de Valdes. There are several pictures in the Trinitarios Calzados de Terruel, attributed to him, and others in the chapels of San Marco and San Jago. In the Cathedral at Saragossa is one of his pictures, representing the Battle of Clavijo.

RABIRIUS, an eminent Roman architect, who flourished about A. D. 80, in the time of Domitian. He was much employed in the extensive architectural operations of that monarch, and erected a number of temples and triumphal arches, besides many works on the Capitol, and the famous palace of Domitian, on the Palatine Mount. Among the other works of this monarch, which Milizia attributes to Rabirius, was the public highway called Via Domitiana, forty miles long, from Pozzuolo to Sinveffa, crossing the river Vulturno by a bridge of white marble, richly ornamented. The Roman roads were generally surveyed in nearly a straight line, with but little allowance for obstructions—marshes were filled up, rivers were bridged, hills were levelled, mountains were tunnelled—several strata of stones were laid as the foundation, forming a mass of extraordinary depth and width, on which were placed large stones cut into regular forms, and fixed with great nicety upon the surface; the whole work constructed with such solidity that it seemed to bid defiance to the attacks of time. Gibbon remarks, “the firmness of the Roman roads has not entirely yielded to the attacks of fifteen centuries.”

RABON, or REBON, PIERRE, a French painter, born in 1616. He settled at Paris, and acquired considerable reputation in portraits. He died there in 1684.

RABON, or REBON, NICOLAS, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1644. He studied under his father, and painted history with considerable distinction. He died at Hermant in 1686.

RACCHETTI, BERNARDO, a Milanese painter, born in 1639. He studied under his uncle, Giovanni Ghisolfi, whose manner he imitated so closely that his pictures are frequently taken for those of his instructor. They usually represent sea-ports embellished with shipping, and magnificent buildings, designed with accuracy, and touched with taste and spirit. His perspective is remarkably true, and none of his cotemporaries exceeded him in the artful management of the chiaro-scuro. He died at Milan in 1702.

RACINE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, born at Paris, according to Nagler, in 1747, and died in 1805, though Zani says he was living in 1807. He studied under François Aliamet, and engraved, in a neat style, some plates of landscapes after Breemberg, Pillement, and other masters; also a few subjects from pictures in the Orleans Gallery; and some vignettes and other book plates after the designs of Cochin.

RACLE, LEONARD, a French architect and engineer, born at Dijon in 1736. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was instructed in the principles of architecture by Moutin de Saint Andre, engineer of the province of Bourgogne. He prosecuted his studies with great energy, and attained such excellence as to attract the attention of Voltaire, who employed him upon his works at Ferney. The recommendation of that celebrated author gained for Racle the patronage of the Duke de Choiseul, who commissioned him to design plans for the city and port of Versoix; but various circumstances prevented their execution. In 1786, Racle obtained a prize of the Academy of Toulouse; and he was soon after invited to Russia by the Empress Catharine, but declined the offer. Among his principal works were the canal of Pont de Vaux; and Voltaire's monument at Ferney. He was a member of the central administration for the Department de l'Ain, and prosecuted several projects for the improvement of that province. He died in 1791.

RACONIGI, VALENTIN LOMELLINO DA, a Piedmontese painter, of whom little is known, except that he flourished at Turin about 1561, and was employed by the Duke as painter to the court.

RADEMACKER, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1672. He was the son of an architect, who instructed him in the rudiments of drawing and perspective, with the intention of rearing him to his own profession; but perceiving in his son an inclination for painting, he placed him with A. van Goor, a reputable artist in portraits. He had made considerable progress in his studies, when his instructor died; whereupon Gerard undertook to teach drawing and design, and was employed to instruct the niece of the Bishop of Sebasto. That prelate was so much pleased with his talents and amiable deportment, that he took him in his suite to Rome, where he spent three years in assiduously studying everything that could contribute to his advancement. On returning to Holland, his merit procured him friends and abundant employment, and his works were eagerly purchased by persons of the first rank. His genius led him to represent views of the principal edifices, monuments, and ruins in Rome and its vicinity, which he designed with great accuracy and precision. He did not, however, confine himself to architectural views, but painted historical and allegorical subjects with considerable success. In the Stadt-House at Amsterdam is an allegorical picture by him, representing the Regency of that city. Another fine picture is a View of the Interior of St. Peter's church at Rome, accounted a master-piece for the accuracy of design, as well as the style of handling. He was fond of introducing bas-reliefs and embossed work into his pictures, which he designed with great truth and elegance. Rademacker is esteemed one of the good masters of the Dutch school; his works show a superior grandeur of ideas and a well cultivated genius. He designed and wrought with facility, and executed many works for the shortness of his life. He died at Amsterdam in 1711, aged 39.

RADEMACKER, ABRAHAM. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1675, and is generally supposed to have been a younger brother of the preceding. We are expressly told that he reached an eminent rank in the art of landscape painting, without the assistance of an instructor; wherefore some writers doubt whether he was of the same family as Gerard R. At first he spent whole days and nights in drawing and copying with India ink, and next in water-colors, till he arrived to a perfection in that branch that excited the surprise and elicited the approbation of the best artists of his time. He afterwards practised oil painting with equal success. He diligently studied nature, and the rules of perspective and architecture. He painted landscapes and views of towns in Holland, but oftener landscape compositions, enriched in a picturesque manner with edifices and vestiges of ancient ruins. His invention being remarkably fertile, he was never at a loss to furnish an endless variety of scenes and subjects; he filled his pieces with suitable figures and animals, well designed and grouped. His coloring is bright and clear, with a pleasing tone and degradation in his distances, though there is a little dryness observable in his larger works, probably caused by his habit of painting in small. He engraved from his own designs, in a masterly style, a set of three hundred plates of the most interesting views of ancient edifices, monuments, &c., in Holland and the Netherlands, published at Amsterdam in six quarto volumes, in 1731. His oil paintings are numerous, and held in high estimation. He left an immense collection of drawings in water-colors and India ink, found in the collections of connoisseurs, by whom they are much prized for their neatness and delicacy of finishing, as well as their elegance of design. He finished a life of the most indefatigable industry in 1735.

RADI, BERNARDINO, an Italian designer and engraver, a native of Cortona, who flourished at Rome in the first part of the 17th century. He etched, in a slight and spirited style, a set of architectural ornaments, monuments, ruins, &c., published at Rome in 1618, under the title of Varie invenzioni per depositi di Bernardino Radi Cortonese.

RADIGUES, ANTOINE, a French engraver, born at Rheims in 1719. It is not known under whom he studied; but, according to Basan, he went to England, and afterwards traveled through Holland and Germany to Russia, where he resided several years. At St. Petersburg he engraved the portraits of the Prince and Princess Gallitzin, and other persons of distinction. He also engraved a plate for the Dresden Gallery, representing Angelica and Medora, after Alessandro Tiarini.

RAEBURN, SIR HENRY, an eminent Scotch portrait painter, born at Stockbridge, now a part of Edinburg, in 1756. At the age of six years he was left an orphan, and was placed in Heriot's Wark, the Christ's Church School of Scotland. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to an eminent goldsmith, but his propensity for drawing and sketching, manifested at school, seemed more to occupy his mind than the business of his master, who, on perceiving his inclination and examining some of his juvenile attempts at miniature, encouraged him to persevere, and took him to see Martin's pictures, the view of which astonished and delighted the young artist, and made a powerful impression upon his mind. He now devoted himself to miniature painting, and found sufficient employment to enable him to purchase the remainder of his apprenticeship. He also began to paint in oil, and obtained the loan of several pictures from Martin. The latter, however, soon grew jealous of his excellence, and is said to have unjustly accused him of selling one of his copies, when the latter indignantly refused any further assistance from so despicable an antagonist. Having begun to paint oil pictures, he gradually abandoned miniature, and became a professional portrait painter. At the age of twenty-two he married advantageously, and being ambitious to improve himself, he soon afterwards set out for London. Having introduced himself and his works to Sir Joshua Reynolds, the latter received him kindly, and advised him to study in Italy, at the same time proffering him all necessary funds and letters of introduction to distinguished artists and literati at Rome. Such disinterested and noble acts are worthy of immortality; yet how rarely they occur, and how much a calculating world has lost, and doubtless ever will lose, by rarely discriminating and encouraging the sons of genius, to whom it is indebted for the greatest conveniences, comforts, luxuries, and everything that ennoble the human mind! Young Raeburn gratefully accepted the last part of Sir Joshua's offer, and immediately set out with his wife, well furnished with every advantage. He spent two years in Italy, assiduously studying the great works of art. In 1787 he returned to Scotland, with his powers well matured, and settled at Edinburg, where he soon entirely eclipsed Martin, his former jealous friend, and completely drove him from the field into retirement. He became the only portrait painter of eminence in that city for a long time, and notwithstanding other able artists established themselves there, he continued to adorn both that and other branches of the art until his death. He was not in the habit of repairing to London, never having visited that metropolis but three times in his life, nor resided in it more than three months, consequently he saw little of the works of his contemporaries; and, having stored his mind with ideas drawn from the purest school of modern art, he was indebted for his subsequent improvement solely to his own genius, reflections, and the study of nature. Hence the striking originality in his works. He made it his peculiar study to bring out the mind of his subjects. His penetration enabled him quickly to discover their favorite pursuits, and to engage them in topics of lively conversation, and while they spoke, he caught the features enlivened by the strongest expression of which they were susceptible. Thus, instead of an expression of mental vacuity, his portraits not only seem to live and breathe, but to think, looking as though they were about to speak on some favorite topic. This is the greatest merit of his works, though he was accomplished in every other necessary particular. His drawing was correct, his coloring rich and clear, and his lights well disposed; his pencilling bold and free; and his accessories, whether drapery, furniture, or landscape, were treated with elegance and spirit. He excelled in animals, particularly the horse, and his equestrian portraits are considered among his best performances; his portraits of Sir David Baird, the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Hopetown, and his own son on horseback, are among the most admired. He painted the portraits of all the most celebrated individuals of Scotland who flourished during the last forty years of his life, many of them full-lengths. The merit of Sir Henry was amply acknowledged, both by literary societies, and by those formed for the promotion of art. He was elected a member of the Royal Society of Edinburg, of the Academy of Florence, of the Academy of New York, and various other institutions. In 1814, the Royal Academy of London, though unsolicited, elected him an Associate, and in 1815 an Academician. In 1822, when George IV. visited Scotland, he sat to Raeburn, conferred on him the honor of knighthood, and appointed him his painter for Scotland. His modesty was equal to his talents, and in his intercourse with young artists he was uniformly kind, communicative, and liberal. He was not only an artist, but a patron of art; and his gallery and study were always open to young artists. He died in 1822.

RAEFE, or RAEFUS, P., a French engraver on wood, mentioned by Papillon, who flourished at Paris about 1575. He engraved, in a spirited style, the greater part of two hundred cuts illustrating the Cosmographical work by André Thevet; the print of the Antiquities of Athens, page 796, is signed with his name, the others are marked with his initials, P. R. The rest of the cuts in the work were executed by O. Goujon, probably a brother of Jean Goujon, the celebrated sculptor. They are marked with the initials O. G.

RAFFAELLE, RAFFAELLO, or RAPHAEL SANZIO DI URBINO. The name of this illustrious Italian painter is variously spelled; by the Italians, Raffaello; by the French, Raphael or Raffaello; by the Germans, Rafael; by the old English writers Raphael, and the moderns Raffaele. The few works mentioned as bearing his signature, are inscribed in Latin, Raphael Sanctius Urbinas pinxit; Raphael Urbinas Pingebat, 1517; Raphaelis Sanctij Urbinatis opus, 1517. Two others with the last two signatures are dated 1518, and a medal struck in honor of Lucrezia Borgia, attributed to him, bears the name RAPHAEL, in Roman capitals, in the exergue on the reverse. The Italians say that in his familiar correspondence, he always wrote his name Raffaello, and that this is the correct orthography.

By the general approbation of mankind, Raffaele has been styled the prince of painters, and he is universally acknowledged to have possessed a greater combination of the higher excellencies of art, than has ever fallen to the lot of any other individual. He has had severe critics, but more able defenders. It has been remarked by Sir Joshua Reynolds and other authors, as well as by many travelers, as a remarkable fact, that the most capital frescos of Raffaele in the Vatican do not at first strike the beholder with surprise, nor satisfy his expectations; but, as he begins to study them, he constantly discovers new beauties, and his admiration continues to increase with contemplation. This circumstance is accounted for by writers in various ways. De Piles attributes it to a want of strength of coloring proper for each object, and a deficiency in the chiaro-scuro. Montesquieu observes, that "the works of Raffaele strike little at first sight, because nature is so well imitated that a spectator is no more surprised than he would be to see the object itself, which would excite no degree of surprise at all." Reynolds, after having expressed his first disappointment, and subsequent admiration, says, "I am now clearly of opinion that a relish for the higher excellencies of the art is an acquired taste, which no man ever possesses without long cultivation, and great labor and attention." These quotations explain the contrariety of opinions often expressed by writers as to the merits of Raffaele, especially by those superficial in art. Among other causes, doubtless, are the changes which time has wrought in depriving his frescos of their original beauty of coloring; and the fact that people who have read a great deal of any remarkable work of art or nature, frequently have their expectations so exalted that they are at first disappointed. Many persons, when they visit the cataract of Niagara, expect to see the water tumbling from the skies, with the noise of thunder and the shock of an earthquake, and find themselves disappointed; but when they begin to contemplate the wonder—its eternal, majestic, resistless current, that has cut its way for miles through the solid rocks, and formed for itself an impregnable barrier, as if afraid of deluging the world—they begin to realize, to be impressed with the sublimity of the scene.

There is nothing in the early life of Raffaele, excepting fictitious accounts, more remarkable than in that of many others, nor anything that can afford much instruction. He did not acquire any marked distinction till his arrival at Rome in 1508. This very circumstance has led to endless disputes, and caused Michael Angelo and others to declare that he possessed no great originality of genius, but was rather a bold adopter; while others have zealously labored to prove that he was a prodigy from his birth, descended from an ancient noble house, and that he rather instructed his masters than received from them instruction. His life, therefore, will be briefly traced to the important epoch before mentioned.

He was the son of Giovanni Sanzio or di Santi, a painter of little celebrity, and was born on Good Friday, March 8, 1483. His father removed not long afterwards to Perugia, where, having instructed Raffaele in the elements of design, and discovering his extraordinary talents, he sought for him a more able master, and placed him in the school of Pietro Perugino. Under this master he made great progress, soon surpassed all his fellow students, and even Perugino himself, if some historians may be credited, who cite in proof his first work of St. Niccolo da Tolentino crowned by the Virgin, at the Eremitani; a Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, in S. Domenico, at Città di Castello; the Coronation of the Virgin, in the convent of the Franciscans at Perugia; and the Marriage of the Virgin. The last work was painted about his 18th year, entirely in the style of Perugino, but with a finer expression in the heads, particularly of the Virgin. About this time, Bernardino Pinturicchio was commissioned by Cardinal Francesco Piccolomini to execute his great works in the Cathedral of Siena, to illustrate the life and actions of Æneas Silvius Piccolomini, afterwards Pope Pius II.; the embassies entrusted to him by the Council of Constance to various princes; and by Felix the anti-pope to Frederick III., who conferred on him the laurel crown; and also the various embassies he undertook from Frederick himself to Pope Eugenius IV., and afterwards to Callistus IV., who made him a Cardinal. No works of equal importance had hitherto been entrusted to any single master, and according to Vasari, Pinturicchio feeling himself incompetent to these vast undertakings, engaged the assistance of Raffaele, who made the designs and cartoons for all the works. The glory of these performances, by general consent of authors, is thus given to Raffaele, although they admit that he was a perfect novice in such matters, a stranger to the splendor of a metropolis, and wholly unacquainted with the manners and customs of the courts of Europe. This subject has been fully discussed under the head of Pinturicchio, which see. These great works were finished in 1504, about which time Raffaele is supposed to have made his first visit to Florence, though this is uncertain, and very probably it was somewhat earlier. Vasari expressly says that he went to Florence before the completion of the Library; but Lanzi is of a different opinion. At all events, when Raffaele learned that the cartoons of Michael Angelo and Leonardo da Vinci, which had been prepared in competition by those great artists in consequence of the prize offered by the city of Florence for the best designs for decorating the Palazzo Pubblico, were on exhibition in that city, he hastened thither to behold them. These cartoons, and many other invaluable treasures of art in Florence, made a deep impression on his youthful sensibilities, and he doubtless derived great advantage from the acquaintance of Ghirlandaio, Sangallo, and other distinguished young artists. Although Raffaele's biographers do not expressly say that he assiduously studied at Florence the works of the earlier masters, Cimabue, Giotto, Masaccio, Verocchio, Ghiberti, as Michael Angelo and Leonardo da Vinci had done, yet this is abundantly evident from the pictures he executed there, among which is a Madonna and Child, now in the Tribune at Florence, as well as from the works he afterwards executed at Rome, where it is known he adopted largely from Masaccio. The death of his parents obliged him to hasten home, and while arranging his father's affairs he painted several pictures, among which were two Madonnas, St. George, and probably its pendant, the St. Michael, and Christ praying in the Garden, now in Paris; and in 1504 the Marriage of the Virgin, called Lo Sposalizio, in the church of S. Francesco at Città di Castello, now in the Pinacoteca at Milan. Lanzi and others speak of this picture in strains of rapture. He says the two espoused have a degree of beauty which Raffaele scarcely surpassed in his mature age, in any other countenances. About this time, 1505, he executed several works at Perugia which sustained his reputation—a Madonna, for the church of the Servi, the Mater Dolorosa, over which he painted a second picture of God the Father, now in the Colonna palace at Rome, and a Crucifixion, preserved in the chapel of the Padri Camaldolensi. By these performances may be measured the progress he had made in his first visit to Florence. They partake of the style of Perugino, with little of the dignity, power, and grandeur of his later performances, but are distinguished for the sensibility and feeling belonging to the earlier school. That he had not made much progress in anatomy, is evident from his picture of the Crucifixion, in which the figure of Christ on the Cross does not discover any particular excellence in design, though affording him an excellent and appropriate opportunity to display his knowledge of that branch of the art. His desire for improvement drew him a second time to Florence, where he zealously pursued his studies of the old masters before mentioned, and derived great advantage from the acquaintance of Fra Bartolomeo, who returned to painting about this time. He communicated to Raffaele a more correct knowledge of coloring; and in return, the latter taught him the rules of perspective. (See Baccio della Porta, called Fra B.) He seems to have spent in study the whole time of his residence in that city; at least it is known that he executed nothing there except a few portraits, and the cartoon for the Entombing of Christ; the picture itself he painted at Perugia, from whence it was afterwards transferred to the Borghese palace at Rome. It is a miracle of composition, design, and expression, surpassed in these respects by few of his subsequent performances. After completing this work, Raffaele returned the third time to Florence, where his studies seem to have been his chief employment, as it is nearly certain that he executed at this time only two pictures—the Madonna called La Bella Giardiniera, now at Paris, and another Madonna with the Fathers of the Church, now at

Brussels. His repeated residence at Florence exercised over him the greatest influence. He found that the Florentine artists, as Cimabue, Giotto, Fiesole and others, could not only compete with his teacher Perugino in all the departments of art, but that some of them, as Masaccio, Fra Filippo Lippi, Mariotto Albertinelli, Ghirlandaio, and Fra Bartolomeo, surpassed him in excellence of composition, correctness of design, and liveliness of coloring. In the works of Ghirlandaio, and above all of Masaccio, he found what he most desired, a grander style in the forms, drapery, and outline. Doubtless, too, he derived some advantage by contemplating the works of da Vinci and Michael Angelo, though the latter had not then executed his greatest performances, nor was his manner congenial to Raffaele. Having previously acquired the excellencies of the greatest masters of the Romagna, he now possessed himself of those of the Florentine school, which he ever held in high estimation, evinced by his copying in the Loggia, without the least alteration, two figures by Masaccio, which may still be seen in the picture by the latter of Adam and Eve driven from Paradise, in the monastery of the Carmelites at Florence, as well as others in the Cartoons. (See Masaccio.) Raffaele now considered himself competent to undertake greater works than he had hitherto attempted, and was ambitious of painting an apartment in the Palazzo Pubblico at Florence, which is evident from his letter to one of his uncles, desiring him to request the Duke of Urbino to write to the Gonfaloniere Soderini for this purpose. This letter, now in the Museo Borgia, is dated in April, 1508, and contains all the provincialisms then common to the inhabitants of Urbino. Lanzi says his biographers do not speak of his literary attainments, and that if we are to judge from this letter, we might consider him grossly illiterate; but he exculpates him on the ground that he was writing in the familiar dialect of his country, as is still done, even in the public acts of Venice, and that he might and did, when he chose, use a more correct language. His uncle Bramante, however, the famous architect of St. Peter's, procured him nobler employment at Rome, by recommending him to Julius II. to decorate the Vatican. We now behold him placed in that famous palace, with such advantages of time and circumstances as enabled him to rise to the position of the first painter of the world. It will assist the reader in forming an estimate of the powers of Raffaele, to reflect on his attainments, and the new field opened to his view. Possessing extraordinary genius and talents, he had already attained all that was excellent in his predecessors. His talents were immediately recognized at Rome, and if deficient in any necessary branch of knowledge, the whole literary and artistic world was at his command. He was inspired by the most unbounded ambition; the efforts of Michael Angelo to supplant him only stimulated him to greater exertions; and, on his death-bed, he thanked God he was born in the days of Buonarotti. He was instructed in the principles of architecture for six years by Bramante, that on his death he might succeed him in superintending the erection of St. Peter's. He lived among the ancient sculptures, and derived from them not only the contours, drapery, and attitudes, but the spirit and principles of the art. Not content with what he saw at Rome, he employed able artists to copy the remains of antiquity at Pozzuolo, throughout all Italy, and even in Greece. It is also probable that he derived much assistance from living artists, whom he consulted in regard to his compositions. The universal esteem which he enjoyed, his attractive person, and his engaging manners, which all authors unite in describing as incomparable, conciliated the favor of the most eminent men of letters, as Bembo, Castiglione, Giovio, Navagero, Ariosto, Fulvio, Calcagnini, &c., who set a high value on his friendship, and were doubtless ready to supply him with many valuable hints and ideas.

Raffaello, on his arrival at Rome, says Vasari, was commissioned to paint a chamber in the Vatican, called La Segnatura, which, from the subjects of the pictures, was also called the Chamber of the Sciences. On the ceiling he represented Theology, Philosophy, Poetry, and Jurisprudence, and on each neighboring façade a grand historical piece illustrative of the same subject: on the basement, also, historical pieces belonging to the same sciences; and these smaller performances, and the caryatides and telamoni distributed around are monocromati or chiaro-scuro, an idea entirely original in Raffaello, and afterwards continued, it is said, by Polidoro da Caravaggio. Raffaello commenced with Theology, and imitated Petrarch, who in one of his visions assembled together men of the same condition, though living in different ages. He introduced the Evangelists, whose writings form the foundation of theology; St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Gregory, and St. Jerome, the doctors of the church who continued the tradition; and the fathers, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventura, and other theologians; above all, the Trinity in the midst of the beatified, and beneath, on an altar, the Eucharist. This subject, which has since been denominated, with little reason, the Dispute on the Sacraments, retains traces of the ancient style, as gilded glories round the heads of the saints, with other similar ornaments, and the composition is more formal and restrained than in his later productions. The Pope was so satisfied with the performance that he ordered all the works of Bramantino, Pier della Francesca, and others to be effaced, in order that the whole chamber might be decorated by Raffaello. At the earnest solicitation of the latter, however, out of respect to his instructor, one picture by Perugino was preserved, as well as some ornamental parts by Sodoma. In the subsequent works of Raffaello, and after the year 1509, no traces appear of his first style. He had abandoned every vestige of the antique gilding and manner, adopted a nobler style, and henceforth applied all his powers to bring it to perfection. On the opposite side of the chamber he represented Philosophy, now styled the School of Athens. In the upper part of the composition he introduced Plato and Aristotle, expounding their systems to a number of surrounding disciples; in another group, Socrates is seen reasoning with Alcibiades; and below, Pythagoras in the midst of his scholars, one of whom holds a tablet, engraved with the harmonic consonances. In another part of the picture, Archimedes is seen instructing his pupils in geometry; Zoroaster is represented with a Globe in his hand; and on one side Diogenes is stretched on the ground with a book in his hand. In this magnificent work, representing the School of Philosophy, consisting of fifty-two figures, Raffaello has given to the world a school of painting ever regarded as one of the most sublime productions of art, for its boldness of invention, its grandeur of composition, and perfection of design.

The third picture represents Jurisprudence, and is divided into two parts. On the left side of the window stands Justinian, presenting the book of civil law to Trebonianus, who receives it with an expression of submission and approval which no other artist can ever hope to equal. On the right side is seen Gregory IX., bearing the features of Julius II., delivering a book of the Decretals to an advocate of the Consistory. In the upper part of the picture are personified Prudence, Temperance, and Fortitude.

The fourth picture represents Poetry, where he introduced Apollo and the Muses on Mount Parnassus, surrounded by the most illustrious Greek, Latin, and Tuscan poets; Homer, seated between Virgil and Dante, is perhaps the most striking figure, appearing gifted with a divine spirit, uniting the characters of the prophet and the poet. The historical pieces in chiaro-scuro contributed, by their elegance, to charm the sight and preserve the unity of design; for instance, beneath the Theology, St. Augustine is represented on the borders of the sea, instructed by Angels not to examine the mystery of the Trinity, incomprehensible to the human mind; and under the Philosophy, Archimedes is seen surprised and slain by a soldier, while absorbed in his studies. The first chamber was finished in 1511, as appears from an inscription near the Parnassus.

It is proper to observe here, for the proper elucidation of this memoir, that Raffaello had three manners; the first, that of his instructor Perugino; the second, the same, modified by his residence and studies in Florence, which continued till the completion of the Theology, though constantly improving; and the third, his own grand, original manner, commencing with the School of Athens. It is also proper to notice the calumnies of the Florentine writers, who attempted to disparage Raffaello in order to aggrandize their own countryman, Michael Angelo. The life of Buonarrotti was written by two of his disciples, Vasari and Condivi, after the death of Raffaello, and during the life of Angelo, which gave the latter decidedly the advantage; for, had Raffaello been living when they attacked the originality of his style, he would have found no difficulty in confuting them. Vasari does not speak of the improvement in his manner until all the works above mentioned were completed. On the contrary, in his life of Raffaello, he says, "although he had seen so many monuments of antiquity in that city, and studied so unremittingly, still his figures up to this time did not possess that breadth and majesty which he afterwards exhibited; for it happened that the breach between Michael Angelo and the Pope, occurred about this time, and compelled him to flee to Florence; from which circumstance, Bramante, obtaining the keys of the Sistine chapel, exhibited it to his friend Raffaello, in order that he might make himself acquainted with the style of Buonarrotti"; and he then proceeds to mention the Isaiah, the Sibyls, and the Heliodorus, painted after this period. In his life of Michael Angelo, he again mentions the quarrel which obliged the latter to depart from Rome, and proceeds to say that when, on his return, he had finished one-half of the work, the Pope suddenly commanded it to be exposed, "whereupon Raffaello di Urbino, who possessed great facility of imitation, changed his style, and immediately designed the Prophets and Sibyls della Pace." Thus originated the dispute, subsequently prosecuted with the greatest warmth, not only in Italy, but in other countries. Bellori attacked Vasari in a violent manner, and ably defended Raffaele, in a work entitled Se Raffaele ingrandi e migliorò la maniera per aver vedute le opere di Michel Angiolo (whether Raffaele enlarged and improved his manner on seeing the works of Michael Angelo); Crespi also replied to him in three letters in the Lettere Pittoriche; and many other disputants have since arisen and started fresh arguments. It is impossible, in a brief biographical sketch, to pursue this subject, further than to observe that Raffaele's defenders have shown that when Michael Angelo fled to Florence in 1506, Raffaele was not even in Rome; that Angelo did not commence his works in the Sistine chapel before 1508, when he was invited to Rome by Julius II. for that purpose, and probably somewhat later, as it required some time to prepare his cartoons; that he did not finish the first half of it before 1511, when it was exhibited; and that in the meantime Raffaele had completed his first chamber in the Vatican; that Raffaele had studied the Torso of the Belvidere, as Angelo had done; that he formed his manner on the antique and on reason itself; and that the grand does not consist in enlargements of the muscles, or extravagance of attitudes, as practised by Buonarotti, but, as Mengs justly observes, "in adopting the noblest, and neglecting the inferior and meaner parts, and in exercising the higher powers of invention."* Lanzi says the objector to Vasari "would have proceeded to point out the grandeur of style in the School of Athens, in the majestic edifices, in the contour of the figures, in the folds of the drapery, in the expression of the countenances, and in the attitudes; and he would easily have traced the source of that sublimity in the relics of antiquity. If he appeared still greater in his Isaiah, he might have refuted Vasari from his own account, which assigns this work to a period anterior to 1511, and therefore cotemporary with the School of Athens; adding that he elevated his style by propriety of character and the study of Grecian art. The Greeks observed an essential difference between common men and heroes, and again between their heroes and their gods; and Raffaello, after having represented philosophers immersed in human doubts, might well elevate his style when he came to figure a prophet meditating the revelations of God." As to the rest, it is admitted that the works of Michael Angelo inspired him with a more daring spirit of design,* that in the exhibition of strong character, he did not hesitate even to imitate him, but Crespi observes that in this instance he rendered that very style more beautiful and more majestic; and Lanzi says, "whoever wishes to see what is wanting in the Sibyls of Michael Angelo, let him inspect those of Raffaele; and let him view the Isaiah of Raffaele who would know what is wanting in the Prophets of Michael Angelo."

* We have already mentioned the source whence Raffaele derived his inspiration—the antique. The style of Angelo was not congenial to him. He had seen at least some of his cartoons and pictures at Florence, though not his greatest works, afterwards executed at Rome. Nor did Raffaele study nature so attentively as some eminent masters have done, but he arrived at what nature should be; it was a maxim with him, which he taught his pupils, "We must not represent things as they are, but as they should be." Mengs says that "Raffaele diligently studied the bassi-rilievi of the arches of Titus and Constantine which were on the arch of Trajan, and adopted from them his manner of marking the articulations of the joints, and a more simple and easier mode of expressing the contours of the fleshy parts." Raffaele, like Shakspeare, did not hesitate to appropriate anything he found in ancient or modern art, that fitted his purpose; but, like the great poet, he threw around them the charm of his own incomparable genius. Michael Angelo scorned to borrow anything. It is a well known fact that the beautiful arabesques with which Raffaele decorated the loggie of the Vatican were copied from antiques, which he discovered while making excavations by order of Leo X., though greatly improved by his own exquisite fancy. In compliance with the wishes of that pontiff, he made drawings of the ancient buildings of Rome, accompanied with descriptions, and employed the compass to ascertain the exact admeasurement. This valuable work was destroyed, and many of the edifices measured were destroyed in the sacking of Rome in 1527. The Abate Morelli (Notizia, p. 210), has made public a high eulogium on this work, written by Marc' Antonio Michiel, a cotemporary with Raffaele, who asserts that "Raffaele had drawn the ancient buildings of Rome in such a manner, and shown the proportions, form, and ornaments so correctly, that whoever had inspected them might be said to have seen ancient Rome."

Towards the close of 1512, Buonarotti finished the other half of his great work in the Sistine chapel, so that the Pope was able to perform Mass at the Feast of Christmas. Raffaele was engaged in the same year in decorating the second apartment of the Vatican. The first subject was Heliodorus driven from the Temple by the prayers of Onias the high priest, one of the most celebrated pictures of the place, in which all the passions are wonderfully expressed. On the other side of the apartment are the Miracle of the Mass at Bolsena, the Deliverance of St. Peter from Prison, and Leo the Great stopping the progress of Attila. "In these works," says Mengs, "Raffaello gave to painting all the augmentation it could receive after Michael Angelo." Julius II. died in 1513, and was succeeded by Leo X., who, zealous for promoting the fine arts, and sensible of the extraordinary talents of Raffaele, continued him in his employment. The two works last mentioned, as well as the remaining decorations of these chambers, were illustrative of the history of that pontiff, whose in-prisonment at Ravenna, and subsequent liberation, are typified by St. Peter's deliverance from Prison by the Angel. It was in this picture that Raffaele exhibited an astonishing proof of his knowledge of the effects of light; the figures of the soldiers who stand without the prison, are illuminated by the beams of the moon; a torch produces a second light; and a clear, celestial splendor, rivalling the sunlight, emanates from the body of the Angel. Here he also showed how art may convert impediments into advantages; for the place where he was painting being broken by a window, he imagined on each side of it a staircase which affords an easy ascent to the prison, and on the steps he placed the guard, overpowered with sleep, so that the painter does not seem to have accommodated himself to the place, but the place to have become subservient to the painter.

* Lanzi says, "his rival Michael Angelo, too, and his party, contributed not a little to the success of Raffaello. As the contest between Zeuxis and Parrhasius was beneficial to both, so the rivalry of Buonarotti and Sanzio aided the fame of Michael Angelo, and produced the paintings in the Sistine chapel; and at the same time contributed to the celebrity of Raffaele, by producing the pictures in the Vatican, and not a few others. Michael Angelo, disdaining any secondary honors, came to the combat, as it were, attended by his shield-bearer, for he made drawings in his grand style, and then gave them to Frà Sebastiano del Piombo, the scholar of Giorgione, to execute; and, by this means, he hoped that Raffaele would never be able to rival his productions, either in design or color. Raffaello stood alone, but aimed at producing works with a degree of perfection beyond the united efforts of Michael Angelo and F. Sebastiano, combining in himself a fertile imagination, ideal beauty founded on a correct imitation of the Greek style, grace, ease, amenity, and a universality of genius in every department of art. The noble determination of triumphing in such a powerful contest animated him night and day, and allowed him no respite. It also animated him to surpass both his rivals and himself in every new work."

In the third apartment he painted four pieces, representing the Victory gained by St. Leo IV. over the Saracens in the port of Ostia; the Conflagration of the Borgo Vecchio; the Coronation of Charlemagne; and Leo III. vindicating himself before that monarch. These works, says Lanzi, justly entitle Raffaele to the epic crown. It would require a volume to describe intelligently all the works of Raffaele. The Incendio di Borgo, which is miraculously extinguished by St. Leo IV., is accounted a wonderful performance, alternately chilling the heart with terror, and warming it with compassion. The horrors of the conflagration are portrayed with all the truth and effect that art is capable of producing. The terror of the scene is increased by the darkness of the midnight hour; the flames, driven by a fierce wind, are spreading with fearful rapidity; the affright and sufferings of the inhabitants are carried to the highest pitch. Some rush forward with water, but are driven back by the scorching flames; others seek safety in flight, half naked, and with dishevelled hair; women turn an imploring look to the pontiff; mothers, less alarmed for themselves than their offspring, are solely intent in shielding them from danger. Amidst the confusion is seen an admirable group of a young man, like Æneas, carrying his aged father on his shoulders, sinking beneath the weight, but collecting his almost exhausted energies, to reach a place of safety. These three chambers, called the Stanze of Raffaele, which name they still retain, occupied him nine years, and were finished in 1517. He introduced into them correct likenesses of many of the most distinguished personages of the age. Thus in St. Leo is represented Leo X., and in Charlemagne, Francis I. of France. In portraits, Raffaele was transcendent, and his performances deceived persons the most intimately acquainted with the subjects; Cardinal Datary approached a picture of Leo X. with a bull and pen and ink for the pontiff's signature.

Having thus decorated the three principal apartments in the Vatican, Raffaele turned his attention to the embellishment of the loggie (the galleries of the Vatican palace connecting the rooms) the architecture of which was begun by Bramante and finished by Raffaele. These works were chiefly executed from his cartoons by his disciples, Giulio Romano, Gio. Francesco Penni, Pierino del Vaga, Pellegrino da Modena, Polidoro da Caravaggio, Giovanni da Udine, &c. The space of the present article will not even admit of mentioning all these productions, of which Vasari says "it is impossible to execute or conceive a more exquisite work." The most important are the thirteen small ceilings, each containing four subjects from sacred history, the first of which, representing the Creation, was painted by Raffaele himself, as a model to be followed by his scholars, and the whole were retouched and harmonized by Raffaele, according to his usual custom. This series of subjects has been frequently engraved, and is generally denominated Raffaele's Bible. He designed the famous cartoons for the tapestries of the papal chapel, representing the principal subjects of the Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles. The tapestries were wrought in Flanders, and afterwards annually exhibited in the Vatican, on the festival of Corpus Domini, but have lately been dispersed. The cartoons, regarded as one of the most exalted monuments of art, were purchased in Flanders by Charles I., at the recommendation of Rubens, and are now in Hampton Court.

The immense works in the Vatican did not prevent Raffaele from engaging in numerous other undertakings, to satisfy the desire of individuals to possess his works. He decorated the palace of Agostino Chigi, now the Farnesina, with admirable frescoes, representing the Triumph of Galatea, and a series of pictures of the Loves of Cupid and Psyche, their Marriage, and the Assembly of the Gods; the first was painted by himself, and the others by his scholars from his cartoons. These pictures were treated with such admirable taste and learning, that they may be compared to the best works of antiquity.

Of his pictures in oil, the following are the most remarkable: St. Cecilia, formerly in the church of S. Giovanni in Monte at Bologna, now in the Louvre; La Madonna Pesce; the Holy Family, called La Perla; Christ bearing his Cross, called La Spasimo de Sicilia—an inimitable performance. The three last are in the Escurial. Christ in glory, surrounded by Saints, called I cinque Santi, in which he introduced his own portrait. The Portrait of Julius II., in the Palazzo Pitti at Florence, now at Munich. The Portrait of Leo X., at Paris. The Madonna della Seggiola, in the Florentine Gallery. The Madonna di San Sisto, at Dresden; and many other Holy Families and devotional subjects for churches and individuals, as well as portraits.

We come now to the last great work and master-piece of Raffaele, the Transfiguration. It has already been stated in the Life of Frà Sebastiano del Piombo, that Michael Angelo, finding he could not successfully compete with Raffaele, called in the assistance of that admirable colorist, and furnished him with designs for his most considerable works, hoping thereby to raise a rival to Raffaele, who should drive him from the field, or at least, share with him the public favor; and that when the Cardinal de' Medici commissioned Raffaele to paint the Transfiguration, he also commissioned del Piombo to paint an altar-piece of the Resurrection of Lazarus, of the same size, for the cathedral of Narbonne; that Buonarrotti, to enable del Piombo to enter the lists with greater prospects of success, furnished him with the design; that this rivalry ended in a public exhibition of their works, and that the palm of victory was awarded to Raffaele, over his united competitors. See del Piombo. This sublime composition represents the mystery of Christ's Transfiguration on Mount Tabor.

At the foot of the Mount is assembled a multitude, among whom are the Disciples of our Lord, endeavoring in vain to relieve a youth from the dominion of an evil spirit. The various emotions of human doubt, anxiety, and pity, exhibited in the different figures, present one of the most pathetic incidents ever conceived; yet this part of the composition does not fix the attention so much as the principal figure on the summit of the mountain. There Christ appears elevated in the air, surrounded with a celestial radiance, between Moses and Elias, while the three favored Apostles are kneeling in devout astonishment on the ground. The head and attitude of the Saviour are distinguished by a divine majesty and sublimity, that is indescribable. This immortal production is generally considered the master-piece of Raffaele. 'This is a picture,' says Mengs, 'that combines more excellencies than any of the former works of Raffaele. The expression is more elevated, and more refined, the chiaro-scuro more correct, the perspective better understood, the pencilling finer, and there is greater variety in the drapery, more grace in the heads, and more grandeur in the style.' With this incomparable work ceased the labors and the life of Raffaele; he did not live to entirely complete it, and the few remaining parts were finished by his scholar Giulio Romano. While engaged upon it, he was seized with a fever, of which he died on his birth-day, Good Friday, April 7th, 1520, aged 37 years. His body lay in state in the chamber where he had been accustomed to paint, and near the bier was placed the noble picture of the Transfiguration. The throngs who came to pay their respects to the illustrious artist were deeply affected; there was not an artist in Rome but was moved to tears by the sight, and his death was deplored throughout Italy as a national calamity. The gentleness of his nature, more than his extraordinary talents, had endeared him to every heart. Respectful to the memory of Perugino, and grateful for the instructions he had received from him, he exerted all his influence with the Pope, that the works of his master in one of the ceilings of the Vatican might be spared, when the other paintings were destroyed to make room for his own embellishments. Just and generous to his cotemporaries, though not ignorant of their intrigues, he thanked God, that he had been born in the days of Buonarotti. Gracious towards his pupils, he loved and instructed them as his own sons; courteous even to strangers, he cheerfully extended his advice to all who asked it, and in order to make designs for others, or to direct them in their studies, he had been known to neglect his own works, rather than refuse them his assistance. The funeral ceremony was performed with great pomp, and his remains were interred in the church of the Rotonda, otherwise called the Pantheon. The Cardinal Bembo, at the desire of the Pope, wrote the epitaph, which is now inscribed on his tomb. All cotemporary writers unite in describing Raffaele as amiable, modest, kind, and obliging; equally respected and beloved by the high and the lowly. His beauty of person and noble countenance, inspired confidence and prepossessed the beholder in his favor at first sight. He never married, though by no means averse to female society. The Cardinal da Bibiena offered him his niece, which high alliance he is said to have declined because the honors of the purple were held out to him by the Pope, who favored him greatly, and made him groom of his chamber. Early in life he became attached to a young woman, the daughter of a baker at Rome, called by way of distinction, La Bella Fornarina, to whom he was solely and constantly attached, and he left her in his will sufficient for an independent maintenance. The rest of his property he bequeathed to a relative in Urbino, and to his favorite scholars, Giulio Romano and Gio. Francesco Penni.

It said that Raffaele executed some statues with his own hand, though only one is mentioned with certainty, the statue of a child, in the possession of Giulio Romano. In the Chigi chapel, in the church of S. Maria del Popolo, is a marble statue of the prophet Jonah, executed from a model by Raffaele under his direction, by Lorenzetto. Raffaele studied architecture under Bramante, and accompanied Leo X. to Florence. Among his principal works in that city, is the façade of S. Lorenzo, of two orders, and the Palazzo Ugoccioni, now Pandolfini, of two stories, the windows decorated with columns, supporting entablatures, with alternate triangular and circular pediments. At Rome he erected the stables of Agostino Chigi, in the Strada Lungara, near the Farnese palace. The first story has small double Doric pilasters, with an architrave of three faces, a plain frieze, and a cornice entire; the second floor has the same number of Corinthian pilasters. Near the church of S. Andrea della Valle, he built the Palazzo Caffarelli, now Stoppani, with a beautiful rustic basement, and over it an order of double Doric columns, between which are the windows, each with its balustrade of stone. After the death of Bramante, Raffaele was appointed architect of St. Peter's, and made a design for that edifice, in the form of a Latin cross, with three naves. Milizia criticises it as deficient in grandeur. Among his other architectural works were the designs for the Vatican gardens; his admirable drawings of the ancient Roman edifices have already been mentioned, with Vasari's high commendation. Marc' Antonio Raimondi engraved many of Raffaele's designs, who assisted him with his counsel, and is said to have etched the outlines of several of his plates. He was also a poet, and there is an affecting sonnet written by him, only a day or two before his death, in which he compares himself to a sinking vessel abandoned by her crew.

When we consider the number of Raffaele's paintings, the multitude of his designs, to which he devoted so much study, as is shown in his numerous sketches of Madonnas and Holy Families, &c., and especially his great works in the Vatican, in which, in many cases, he drew all the figures naked, in order the better to adapt the drapery and its folds to their respective attitudes; and further, his supervision of the building of St. Peter's church, his admeasurements of the ancient edifices of Rome with exact drawings and descriptions, the preparation of designs for various churches and palaces, with several collateral tasks, it seems incredible even a long life were sufficient for their execution; and when we further reflect that he accomplished all this at an age, when most men only begin to distinguish themselves, we are struck with astonishment at the wonderful fecundity of his genius. Raffaele possessed in a high degree all those qualities necessary to constitute a preëminent painter, and is universally acknowledged to deserve the place of supremacy. Volumes on volumes of descriptions and criticisms have been written on his works, but the author has nowhere read a more learned, judicious, and impartial critique than that of Lanzi, and for this reason, notwithstanding the great length of this article, he cannot forbear inserting it at length:

“Raffaello is by common consent placed at the head of his art; not because he excelled all others in every department of painting, but because no other artist has ever possessed the various parts of the art united in so high a degree. Lazzarini even asserts that he was guilty of errors, and that he is only the first, because he did not commit so many as others. He ought, however, to have allowed, that his defects would have been excellencies in any other artist, being nothing more in him than the neglect of that high degree of perfection which he was capable of attaining. The art, indeed, comprehends so many and such difficult parts, that no individual artist has been alike distinguished in all; even Apelles was said to yield to Amphion in disposition and harmony, to Asclepiodorus in proportion, and to Protogenes in application.

The style of design of Raffaello, as seen in those drawings, divested of colors, which form the chief ornaments of cabinets, presents us, if we may use the term, with the pure transcript of his imagination, and we stand in amaze at the contours, grace, precision, diligence, and genius which they exhibit. One of the most admired of his drawings I once saw in the gallery of the duke of Modena, a most finished and superior specimen, uniting in style all the invention of the best painters of Greece, and the execution of the first artists of Italy. It has been made a question whether Raffaello did not yield to Michael Angelo in drawing; and Mengs himself confesses, that he did, as far as regards the anatomy of the muscles, and in strong expression, in which he considers Raffaello to have imitated Michael Angelo. But we need not say with Vasari, that, in order to prove that he understood the naked figure as well as Michael Angelo, he appropriated to himself the designs of that great master. On the contrary, in the figures of the two youths in the Incendio di Borgo, criticised by Vasari, one of whom is in the act of leaping from a wall to escape the flames, and the other is fleeing with his father on his shoulders, he not only proved that he had a perfect knowledge of the action of the muscles and the anatomy requisite for a painter, but prescribed the occasion when this style might be used without impropriety, as in figures of a robust form engaged in violent action. He moreover commonly marked the principal parts in the naked figure, and indicated the others after the example of the better ancient masters, and where he wrought from his own ideas, his execution was most correct.

In chasteness of design, Raffaello was by some placed on a level with the Greeks, though this praise we must consider as extravagant. Agostino Caracci commends him as a model of symmetry; and in that respect, more than in any other, he approached the ancients; except, observes Mengs, in the hands, which being rarely found perfect in the ancient statues, he had not an equal opportunity of studying, and did not therefore design them so elegantly as the other parts. He selected the beautiful from nature, and as Mariette observes, whose collection was rich in his designs, he copied it with all its imperfections, which he afterwards gradually corrected as he proceeded with his work. Above all things, he aimed at perfecting the heads, and from a letter addressed to Castiglione on the Galatea of the Palazzo Chigi, or of the Farnesina, he discovers how intent he was to select the best models of nature, and to perfect them in his own mind.* His own Fornarina assisted him in this object. Her portrait, by Raffaello's own hand, was formerly in the Barberini palace, and it is repeated in many of his Madonnas, in the picture of St. Cecilia, at Bologna, and in many female heads. Critics have often expressed a wish that these heads had possessed a more dignified character, and in this respect he was, perhaps, excelled by Guido Reni, and however engaging his children may be, those of Titian are still more beautiful. His true empire was in the heads of his men, which are portraits selected with judgment, and depicted with a dignity proportioned to his subject. Vasari calls the air of these heads superhuman, and calls on us to admire the expression of age in the patriarchs, simplicity of life in the apostles, constancy of faith in the martyrs; and in Christ in the Transfiguration, he says, there is a portion of the divine essence itself transferred to his countenance, and made visible to mortal eyes.

This effect is the result of that quality that is called expression, and which, in the drawing of Raffaello, has attracted more admiration of late years than formerly. It is remarkable, that not only Zuccaro, who was indeed a superficial writer, but that Vasari, and Lomazzo himself, so much more profound than either of them, should not have conferred on him that praise which he afterwards received from Algarotti, Lazzarini, and Mengs. Leonardo was the first, as we shall see in the Milanese School, to lead the way to delicacy of expression; but that master, who painted so little, and with such labor, is not to be compared with Raffaello, who possessed the whole quality in its fullest extent. There is not a movement of the soul, there is not a character of passion known to the ancients, and capable of being expressed by art, that he has not caught, expressed, and varied, in a thousand different ways, and always within the bounds of propriety. We have no tradition of his having frequented the public streets, like Da Vinci, to seek for subjects for his pencil; and his numerous pictures prove that he could not have devoted so much time to this study, while his drawings clearly evince, that he had not equal occasion for such assistance. Nature, as I have before remarked, had endowed him with an imagination which transported his mind to the scenes of the event, either fabulous or remote, in which he was engaged, and awoke in him the very same emotions which the subjects of such a story must themselves have experienced; and this vivid conception assisted him until he had designed his subject with that distinctness which he had either observed in other countenances, or found in his own mind. This faculty, seldom found in poets, and still more rarely in painters, no one possessed in a more eminent degree than Raffaello. His figures are passions personified; and love, fear, hope, and desire, anger, placability, humility, or pride, assume their places by turns, as the subject changes; and while the spectator regards the countenances, the air, and the gestures of his figures, he forgets that they are the work of art, and is surprised to find his own feelings excited, and himself an actor in the scene before him. There is another delicacy of expression, and this is the gradation of the passions, by which every one perceives whether they are in their commencement or in their height, or in their decline. He had observed their shades of difference in the intercourse of life, and on every occasion he knew how to transfer the result of his observations to his canvass. Even his silence is eloquent, and in every actor the smallest perceptible motion of the eyes, of the nostrils, of the mouth, and of the fingers, corresponds to the chief movements of every passion; the most animated and vivid actions discover the violence of the passion that excites them; and what is more, they vary in innumerable degrees, without ever departing from nature, and conform themselves to a diversity of character without ever risking propriety. His heroes possess the mein of valor; his vulgar, an air of debasement; and that, which neither the pen nor the tongue could describe, the genius and art of Raffaello would delineate with a few strokes of his pencil. Numbers have sought in vain to imitate him; his figures are governed by a sentiment of the mind, while those of others, if we except Poussin and a very few more, seem the imitation of tragic actors from the scenes. This is Raffaello's chief excellence; and he may justly be denominated the painter of mind. If in this faculty be included all that is difficult, philosophical, and sublime, who shall compete with him in the sovereignty of art?

Another quality which Raffaello possessed in an eminent degree was grace, a quality which may be said to confer an additional charm on beauty itself. Apelles, who was supremely endowed with it among the ancients, was so vain of the possession that he preferred it to every other attribute of art. Raffaello rivalled him among the moderns, and thence obtained the name of the new Apelles. Something might, perhaps, be advantageously added to the forms of his children, and other delicate figures which he represented, but nothing can add to their gracefulness, for if it were attempted to be carried further, it would degenerate into affectation, as we find in Parmiggiano. His Madonnas enchant us, as Mengs observes, not because they possess the perfect lineaments of the Medicean Venus, or of the celebrated daughter of Niobe; but because the painter in their portraits, and in their expressive smiles, has personified modesty, maternal love, purity of mind, and, in a word, grace itself. Nor did he impress this quality on the countenance alone, but distributed it throughout the figure in its attitude, gesture, and action, and in the folds of the drapery, with a dexterity which may be admired, but never rivalled. His freedom of execution was a component part of this grace, which, indeed, vanishes as soon as labor and study appear; for it is with the painter as with the orator, in whom a natural and spontaneous eloquence delights us, while we turn away with indifference from an artificial and studied harangue.

In regard to the province of color, Raffaello must yield the palm to Titian and Correggio, although he himself excelled Michael Angelo and many others. His frescos may rank with the first works of other schools in that line: not so his pictures in oil. In the latter he availed himself of the sketches of Giulio, which were composed with a degree of hardness and timidity; and though finished by Raffaello, they have frequently lost the lustre of his last touch. This defect was not immediately apparent, and if Raffaello's life had been prolonged, he would have been aware of the injuries his pictures received from the lapse of time, and would not have finished them in so light a manner. He is on this account, more admired in his first subject in the Vatican, painted under Julius II., than in those executed under Leo X.; for being there pressed by a multiplicity of business, and an idea of the importance of a grander style, he became less rich and firm in his coloring. That, however, he excelled in these respects, is evinced by his portraits, when, not having an opportunity of displaying his invention, composition, and beautiful style of design, he appears ambitious to distinguish himself by his coloring. In this respect his two portraits of Julius II. are truly admirable, the Medicean and the Corsinian: that of Leo X. between the two cardinals; and above all, in the opinion of an eminent judge, Renfesthein, that of Bindo Altoviti, in the possession of his noble descendants, at Florence, by many regarded as a portrait of Raffaello himself. The heads in his Transfiguration are esteemed the most perfect he ever painted, and Mengs extols the coloring of them as eminently beautiful. If there be any exception, it is in the complexion of the principal female, of a greyish tint, as is often the case in his delicate figures; in which he is therefore considered to excel less than in the heads of his men. Mengs has made many exceptions to the chiaro-scuro of Raffaello, as compared with that of Correggio, on which connoisseurs will form their own decision. We are told that he disposed of it with the aid of models of wax; and the relief of his pictures, and the beautiful effect in his Heliodorus, and in the Transfiguration, are ascribed to this mode of practice. To his perspective, too, he was most attentive. De Piles found in some of his sketches the scale of proportion. It is affirmed by Algarotti, that he did not attempt to foreshorten his figures in ceilings. But to this opinion we may oppose the example we find in the third arch of the gallery of the Vatican, where there is a perspective of small columns, says Taia, imitated in that manner. It is true, that in his larger works he avoided it; and in order to preserve the appearance of nature, he represented his pictures as painted on a tapestry, attached by means of a running knot to the entablature of the room.

But all the great qualities which we have enumerated would not have procured Raffaello such extraordinary celebrity, if he had not possessed a wonderful felicity in the invention and disposition of his subjects, indeed his highest merit. It may with truth be said that, in aid of this object, he availed himself of every example, ancient and modern; and that these two requisites have not since been so united in any other artist. He accomplishes in his pictures that which every orator ought to aim at in his speeches—he instructs, moves, and delights us. This is an easy task to a narrator, since he can regularly unfold to us the whole progress of an event. The painter, on the contrary, has but the space of a moment to make himself understood, and his talent consists in describing not only what is passing, and what is likely to ensue, but that which has already occurred. It is here that the genius of Raffaello triumphs. He embraces the whole subject. From a thousand circumstances he selects those alone which can interest us; he arranges the actors in the most expressive manner; he invents the most novel modes of conveying much meaning by a few touches; and numberless minute circumstances, all uniting in one purpose, render the story not only intelligible, but palpable. Various writers have adduced in example the St. Paul at Lystra, which is to be seen in one of the tapestries of the Vatican. The artist has there represented the sacrifice prepared for him and St. Barnabas his companion, as to two gods, for having restored a lame man to the use of his limbs. The altar, the attendants, the victims, the musicians, and the axe, sufficiently indicate the intentions of the Lystrians. St. Paul, who is in the act of tearing his robe, shews that he rejects and abhors the sacrilegious honors, and is endeavoring to dissuade the populace from persisting in them. But all this were vain, if it had not indicated the miracle which had just happened, and given rise to the event. Raffaello added to the group the lame man restored to the use of his limbs, now easily recognised again by all the spectators. He stands before the apostles rejoicing in his restoration; and raises his hands in transport towards his benefactors, while at his feet lie the crutches which had recently supported him, now cast away as useless. This had been sufficient for any other artist; but Raffaello, who wished to carry reality to the utmost point, has added a throng of people, who, in their eager curiosity, remove the garment of the man, to behold his limbs restored to their former state. Raffaello abounds with examples like these, and he may be compared to some of the classical writers, who afford the more matter for reflection the more they are studied. It is sufficient to have noticed in the inventive powers of Raffaello, those circumstances which have been less frequently remarked; the movement of the passions, which is entirely the work of expression, the delight which proceeds from poetical conceptions, or from graceful episodes, may be said to speak for themselves.

Other things might contribute to the beauty of his works, as unity, sublimity, costume, and erudition; for which it is sufficient to refer to those delightful poetical pieces, with which he adorned the gallery of Leo X., and which were engraved by Lanfranco and Badalocchio, and are called the Bible of Raffaello. In the Return of Jacob, who does not immediately discover, in the number and variety of domestic animals, the multitude of servants, and the women carrying with them their children, a patriarchal family migrating from a long possessed abode into a new territory? In the Creation of the World, where the Deity stretches out his arms, and with one hand calls forth the Sun, and with the other the Moon, do we not see a grandeur, which, with the simplest expression, awakes in us the sublimest ideas? And in the Adoration of the Golden Calf, how could he better have represented the idolatrous ceremony, and its departure from true religion, than by depicting the people as carried away by an insane joy, and mad with fanaticism? In point of erudition it is sufficient to notice the Triumph of David, which Taia describes and compares with the ancient bassi-rilievi, and is inclined to believe that there is not anything in marble that excels the art and skill of this picture. I am aware that on another occasion he has not been exempt from blame, as when he repeated the figure of St. Peter out of prison, which hurts the unity of the subject; and in assigning to Apollo and to the Muses instruments not proper to antiquity. Yet it is the glory of Raffaello to have introduced into his pictures numberless circumstances unknown to his predecessors, and to have left little to be added by his successors.

In composition also, he is at the head of his art. In every picture the principal figure is obvious to the spectator; we have no occasion to inquire for it; the groups, divided by situation, are united in the principal action; the contrast is not dictated by affectation, but by truth and propriety; a figure absorbed in thought, often serves as a relief to another that acts and speaks; the masses of light and shade are not arbitrarily poised, but are in the most select imitation of nature; all is art, but all is consummate skill and concealment of art. The School of Athens, as it is called, in the Vatican, is in this respect among the most wonderful compositions in the world. They who succeeded Raffaello, and followed other principles, have afforded more pleasure to the eye, but have not give such satisfaction to the mind. The compositions of Paul Veronese contain a greater number of figures, and more decoration; Lanfranco and the machinists introduce a powerful effect, and a vigorous contrast of light and shade: but who would exchange for such a manner the chaste and dignified style of Raffaello? Poussin alone, in the opinion of Mengs, obtained a superior mode of composition in the groundwork, or economy of his subject; that is to say, in the judicious selection of the scene of the event.

We have thus concisely stated the perfection to which Raffaello carried his art, in the short space allotted him. There is not a work in nature or art where he has not practically illustrated his own axiom, as handed down to us by Federigo Zuccaro, that things must be represented, not as they are, but as they ought to be; the country, the elements, animals, buildings, every age of man, every condition of life, every affection, all were embraced and rendered more beautiful by the divine genius of Raffaello. And if his life had been prolonged to a more advanced period, without approaching the term allowed to Titian or Michael Angelo, who shall say to what height of perfection he might not have carried his favorite art? Who can divine his success in architecture and sculpture, if he had applied himself to the study of them, having so wonderfully succeeded in his few attempts in those branches of art?

Of his pictures a considerable number are to be found in private collections, particularly on sacred subjects, such as the Madonna and Child, and other compositions of the Holy Family. They are in three styles which we have before described: the Grand Duke has some specimens of each. The most admired is that which is named the Madonna della Seggiola.* Of this class of pictures it is often doubted whether they ought to be considered as originals or copies, as some of them have been three, five, or ten times repeated. The same may be said of other cabinet pictures by him, particularly the St. John in the Desert, which is in the Grand Ducal gallery at Florence, and is found repeated in many collections both in Italy and in other countries. This was likely to happen in a school where the most common mode was the following:—The subject was designed by Raffaello, the picture prepared by Giulio, and finished by the master so exquisitely, that one might almost count the hairs of the head. When pictures were thus finished, they were copied by the scholars of Raffaello, who were very numerous, and of the second and third order; and these were also sometimes retouched by Giulio and by Raffaello himself. But whoever is experienced in the freedom and delicacy of the chief of this school, need not fear confounding his productions with those of the scholars, or Giulio himself; who, besides having a more timid pencil, made use of a darker tint than his master was accustomed to do. I have met with an experienced person, who declared that he could recognize the character of Giulio in the dark parts of the flesh tints, and in the middle dark tints, not of a leaden color as Raffaello used, nor so well harmonized; in the greater quantity of light, and in the eyes designed more roundly, which Raffaello painted somewhat long, after the manner of Pietro Perugino."

RAFFAELLI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1705. He engraved some plates of historical subjects, after the Italian masters.

RAFFAELLINO, DEL COLLE. This artist was a native of Città San Sepolero, born about 1490. He first studied under Raffaello, and was employed by him in the Farnesina. He afterwards wrought for Giulio Romano in the Hall of Constantine. Hence he is considered rather a scholar of Giulio; and, after the death of Raffaello, he assisted him in his works at Rome, and in the ducal palace called the Te, at Mantua. Taia ascribes the History of Moses in Horeb, in the Loggia, to "the bold pencil of Raffaellino del Colle." It is very singular that Vasari did not write a separate life of this artist; he only incidentally mentions his name, in several places, with scanty praise. Lanzi says his merit is little known to the public, as he painted mostly in his native place, and in the neighboring cities, where he executed many fine works, and instructed several pupils. At Città S. Sepolero, in the church of S. Rocco, is a spirited picture of the Resurrection of our Saviour, "who, full of majesty, regards the soldiers with displeasure, which fills them with terror." The same subject is repeated in the Cathedral, and in the church of the Osservanti is an Assumption of the Virgin. At hand, is in the Palazzo Pitti at Florence, the best of all; 2. a scarcely inferior one in the Tribune of the Florentine Gallery; 3. one in the English National Gallery, from the Falconieri palace at Rome; 4. a very fine one, formerly in the Orleans Gallery; 5. an inferior one in the Corsini palace at Rome; 6. a very fine one in the Borghese Gallery at Rome; 7. one at Berlin, from the Giustiniani Gallery; 8. one in the possession of Count Torlonia at Rome. Most of these are doubtless copies by Raffaello's scholars, some of them finished by himself. The original cartoon is preserved in the Corsini palace at Florence.

Città di Castello is another Assumption of the Virgin, beautifully designed and colored, and exquisitely finished, in the church of the Conventuali; an Entombment, at the Servi; an altar-piece full of grace and beauty in the church of S. Angelo, representing St. Michael and St. Sebastian, who humbly presents an arrow to the infant Jesus with the Virgin, as a type of his martyrdom; and a picture of the Virgin, with St. Sebastian, St. Roch, and a canonized bishop. Lanzi says the last piece, both in the figures and the landscape, much resembles the manner of Raffaello. In the sacristy of the Cathedral at Urbino, he painted the Twelve Apostles, in small oblong pictures; they are noble figures, draped in a grand style, and finely colored. At Gubbio, in the chapel of the Olivet monks, is a Nativity and two pieces from the History of St. Benedict, painted in fresco, which he enriched with admirable architecture, and introduced into them several real portraits, and a figure of Virtue, which Lanzi says "seems a sister of the Sibyls of Raffaello." He also painted in the castle of Perugia, and in the Imperiale at Pesaro, a villa of the Duke of Urbino, who held his works in high esteem, and preferred them to those of the two Dossi. He was remarkably modest, and diffident of his own abilities. The time of his death is not known, but one of his works at Città San Sepolero is dated 1546, in his 56th year.

RAFFAELLINO, DA REGGIO. See REGGIO.

RAGGI, PIETRO PAOLO, a painter born at Genoa, according to Ratti, in 1646. Tassi says he was a native of Vienna, born about 1650, and that his parents removed to Genoa when he was a child. It is not known under whom he studied, but Lanzi says he was certainly a follower of the Caracci, in his large picture of St. Bonaventura contemplating a crucifix, in the Nunziata del Guastato at Genoa. According to Ratti, who highly extols his works, he was of a restless disposition, irascible, and dissatisfied with every place he inhabited. This truant disposition induced him to lead a wandering life, carried him to Turin, thence to Savona, and back again to Genoa. He afterwards went to Lavagna, thence through Lombardy, and lastly to Bergamo. Some of his best works are in the churches at Bergamo, among which are the Annunciation in S. Lorenzo, and Mary Magdalene taken up into heaven by Angels, in S. Marta, highly commended for correctness of design and good coloring. He also excelled in landscapes, decorated with figures of pastoral and bacchanalian subjects, in which he sometimes imitated the style of Benedetto Castiglione, and at others Giulio Carpioni. He died at Bergamo in 1724.

RAGOT, FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, born at Bagnolet in 1641. He engraved some plates after Charles le Brun, but chiefly distinguished himself by copying the best prints engraved by Bolswert, Pontius, and Vostermans, after the works of Rubens and Vandyck. He executed a considerable number of these copies, with such accuracy that they have often been mistaken by collectors for the originals. Nagler gives a list of thirty-four of his copies.

RAHART, FLORENT DELAMERE, a French

painter, born at Bayeux in 1630, and died at Versailles in 1718. He is commended for the excellence of his portraits.

RAIBOLINI, FRANCESCO. See FRANCIA.

RAIMBACH, ABRAHAM, an eminent English engraver, born at London in 1776. His father was a Swiss who had settled in London, and after giving his son a good primary education, he apprenticed him to J. Hall, an engraver. After the expiration of his apprenticeship, he entered the Royal Academy as a student, and occupied his time with his studies, engraving a few plates for the booksellers, and painting a few miniatures, but soon abandoned the latter occupation and devoted himself to engraving. His plates for Smirke and Forster's illustrated edition of the Arabian Nights established his reputation as an able artist. In 1812 and subsequent years he was employed by Sir David Wilkie to engrave many plates after his works, which proved very profitable both to the painter and the engraver. Among them are the Village Politicians, the Rent Day, the Cut Finger, the Errand Boy, Distraint for Rent, the Parish Beadle, and the Spanish Mother and Child. Raimbach is said never to have employed an assistant, but performed the whole work himself. His prints are executed in a bold style, and though deficient in freedom and delicacy of execution, especially in the extremities, they faithfully represent the spirit and expression of the original paintings, and were very popular. He died in 1843.

RAIMONDI, MARC' ANTONIO. This eminent engraver was born at Bologna in 1487 or 1488, and is generally known in art by the name of Marc' Antonio. He was instructed in design, and in the art of working in niello, by Francesco Francia, and next proceeded to engrave some of the productions of his master, the first of which was Pyramus and Thisbe, dated 1502. At first he imitated Andrea Mantegna, and next Albert Durer. According to Vasari, while on a visit to Venice in search of improvement, Raimondi met with a set of Durer's thirty-six wooden cuts representing the Life and Passion of our Saviour, and, being greatly pleased with them, he copied them on copper (affixing the cipher of Durer) with such precision that the prints were readily sold in Italy as originals. This deception reaching the ears of Durer, he went to Venice, and complained before the Senate of the plagiarism and injustice, but could obtain no further redress than an order forbidding Marc' Antonio to use his monogram on any future copies he might make of his works. Marc' Antonio copied both sets of Durer's prints, representing the Life of Christ and the Life of the Virgin; to the latter he affixed the mark of Durer, but not to the former, therefore Vasari made a slight mistake. He next proceeded to Rome, where his valuable talents immediately recommended him to the notice of Raffaello, who employed him to engrave after his designs, and is said to have etched the outlines on some of the plates himself, to ensure greater correctness of drawing. It is well known that under the instruction of Raffaello he acquired great improvement, and brought the art to a degree of perfection that has hardly been surpassed. This is shown in the prints he engraved after Raffaello. The first was the Death of Lucretia, which, though neatly executed, was somewhat stiff and formal; the next, the Judgment of Paris, is executed in a more bold and spirited manner, and these were followed by others exhibiting marked improvement, until Raffaello himself was satisfied with his performances, who is said to have sent some of his prints to Albert Durer, together with several of his own drawings, as a most acceptable present to that eminent artist, who had honored him by sending him his portrait. (See Durer.) Lanzi says that "Raffaello not only assisted Marc' Antonio with his advice, but that he might devote his whole time to engraving, he permitted his own grinder of colors, Baviera, to manage the press." He was also assisted by his two pupils Agostino Veneziano and Marco da Ravenna, who succeeded him in the series of engravings from Raffaello; which led Vasari to observe, in his life of Marc' Antonio, that "between himself, Agostino, and Marco, nearly all Raffaello's designs and paintings had been engraved."

After the death of Raffaello in 1520, he was employed by Giulio Romano, to engrave after his designs. It is said that he was prevailed upon to engrave a set of indecent subjects, with verses by Aretino. These prints so highly excited the indignation of Clement VII., that he ordered Marc' Antonio to be thrown into prison, and it was with great difficulty that Baccio Bandinelli and some of the cardinals procured his release. On recovering his liberty, Marc' Antonio, desirous of expressing his obligations to Bandinelli, engraved his celebrated print of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, after a picture by that painter, on which he exerted all his powers. The Pope, delighted at this masterpiece, quickly forgot the offence, and took him under his protection. He continued at Rome in full possession of public esteem, and favored with the patronage of the great, till the dreadful sacking of that city by the Spaniards in 1527, when he was despoiled of all his property, and obliged to flee to Bologna, where he continued to practise his art until 1539, when he engraved his last print, the Battle of the Lapithæ, after Giulio Romano. He is supposed to have died about this time. Malvasia says he was assassinated by a Roman nobleman, for having engraved a second plate of the Murder of the Innocents, after Raffaello, contrary to his engagements—a highly improbable story.

Marc' Antonio is justly regarded as one of the most extraordinary engravers that have ever appeared. The purity of his outlines, the beautiful character and expression of the heads, and the correct drawing of his extremities, establish his merit as a perfect master in design. His prints are very numerous, and are held in the highest esteem; but there is a great difference in the impressions, owing to the plates having passed through a succession of hands, by which means they became greatly worn, and were frequently retouched. They first passed into the possession of Tommaso Barlacchi, and then successively to Antonio Lafreri, Nicholas van Aelst, and lastly Rossi or de Rubens, at which time they were almost worn out. The best impressions are those without the name of any publisher. Lanzi says "he sometimes omitted every kind of mark, and every letter; sometimes he adopted the little tablet of Mantegna, either with or without letters. In some engravings of the Passion (rather the History of the Virgin) he counterfeited both the style and mark of Albert Durer; and not unfrequently he gave the initial letters of his own and Raffaello's name, and that of Michael Angelo, when he engraved after that master." For a complete account of the works of this artist, the reader is referred to Bartsch's Peintre Graveur, tom. xiv., the whole of which volume is devoted to an account of this artist, and of his two principal scholars, Agostino Veneziano and Marco da Ravenna, with a catalogue raisonné of their works; every known print being described, with all the variations. The Baron Heineken has also given a very complete catalogue of Marc' Antonio's prints, in his Idea Generale d'une collection d'estampes. The following is an ample list of his most esteemed prints.—Some are without any marks, but on most of them are found one of the following monograms on the little tablet, and occasionally the tablet without any letters :

PORTRAITS.

Aretin, the poet; inscribed Petrus Aretinus accerimus, &c. A Man wrapped in a cloak, seated near a table, and on the left a palette with colors. Malvasia calls this the portrait of Raffaelle. Charles V. when young; a medallion. Pope Clement VII.; do.

SUBJECTS OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

Adam and Eve; after Raffaelle. This print has been copied by Mr. Strutt, and is placed as the title to the second volume of his Dictionary of Engravers. Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; after the painting by M. Angelo, in the Sistine chapel. Noah sacrificing after leaving the Ark; after Raffaelle. God appearing to Noah; do. God appearing to Isaac; do. Joseph and Potiphar's wife; do. David cutting off the Head of Goliath; do. David taking up the Head of Goliath; do.; very scarce. The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds; after Francia. The Murder of the Innocents; after Raffaelle. He engraved this subject a second time, and has added in the second plate, towards the right of the print, a small pointed tree, resembling a yew tree, called in Italian la felcetta, in French la fougere or le chicot. The latter is considered the better print, and it is scarce. The Holy Family; the Virgin is seated, holding the infant Jesus on her lap, with St. John before him, and St. Joseph appearing behind; do. This print is usually called The Virgin with the long thigh. The Virgin seated, with St. Elizabeth and St. John, to whom the Infant is giving the Benediction. A large palm tree is seen in the back-ground, on which account the print is known by the appellation of The Virgin of the Palm; do. The Virgin seated near a cradle, presenting the infant Jesus to St. Anne. Behind it is an old woman with her arms extended, as if in admiration; do.; called The Virgin of the Cradle. The Virgin seated on a chair, embracing the infant Jesus; do. The Virgin holding the Infant, and reading; do. The Holy Family; after the painting by M. Angelo, in the Sistine chapel. The Virgin and infant Jesus, to whom Tobit, accompanied by an Angel, is presenting a fish. On the other side is St. Joseph reading in a book; after Raffaelle. The Virgin in the Clouds, holding the infant Jesus; do. Agostino Caracci, having got possession of this plate, retouched it, and added two beautiful heads of cherubim. A set of seventeen plates of the Life of the Virgin; copied from the wooden cuts by Albert Durer, with the monogram of that artist, and on the last plate the cipher of Marc' Antonio. Thirty-six plates of the Life and Passion of our Saviour; copied in imitation of the wooden cuts by Albert Durer, but without the mark of that master. Christ seated between two columns, upon the steps, with the Virgin and Mary Magdalene; after Raffaelle; called The Virgin with the Steps. Mary Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; do. The Last Supper; do.; called La piece des pieds. The taking down from the Cross; do. The dead Christ laid on the Sepulchre, with the Virgin with her arms extended, and in the deepest affliction; do. The same composition, in which the Virgin appears younger, and has one of her arms naked, called The Virgin with the naked arm. The dead Christ, with his head on the knees of the Virgin, with the holy women and two of the disciples, with Nicodemus; do. Jesus Christ with a glory, between the Virgin and St. John, and below, St. Paul and St. Catherine; do. This print is called The Five Saints. The Death of Ananias; do. Elymas, the Sorcerer, struck blind; do. St. Paul preaching at Athens; do. (The three last are the subjects of three of the cartoons.) St. Cecilia, with Mary Magdalene, St. Paul, and two other saints; do. The best impressions of this plate have a strong shadow on the neck of St. Cecilia, resembling a necklace, on which account it is called The St. Cecilia with the Necklace. In the inferior impressions the shadow is more feeble. The Martyrdom of St. Felicitia; do. St. Catherine holding the Palm of Martyrdom; after Francia. St. Catherine and St. Lucia; do. St. Martha holding the Palm of Martyrdom; do. The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; called by the Italians La graticola di S. Lorenzo; after Baccio Bandinelli. A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Apostles; after Raffaelle.

HISTORICAL AND OTHER SUBJECTS.

The four heroes, Curtius, Horatius, Scipio Africanus, and Titus Vespasian; supposed to have been among his first attempts on copper. The books of the Sibyls put into the tomb of Numa Pompilius; after Raffaelle. The Rape of Helen; do. Æneas saving his father Anchises from the burning of Troy, preceded by Ascanius; do. Venus appearing to Æneas in the form of a Huntress; do. The Death of Dido; do. The Death of Lucretia; do. The Battle of the Sabre; do. The same subject was engraved by Agostino Veneziano, called de Musis.

SUBJECTS OF THE FABLE.

Three of the Angels of the Farnesina; after Raffaelle; representing Jupiter caressing Cupid, Cupid and the Graces, and Mercury descending to earth from Olympus. The Judgment of Paris; do. Mars, Venus, and Cupid; after Mantegna. Vulcan, Venus, and Cupid; after Raffaelle. Apollo resting on the shepherd Hyacinth, accompanied by Cupid; inscribed 1506. Æt. 19. The Triumph of Galatea; do. The best impressions are without any name, the worst have the names of Van Aelst and Rossi. Mount Parnassus; do. Hercules strangling Anteus; after a design by some attributed to Raffaelle, by others to M. Angelo. The Battle of the Lapithæ; after Giulio Romano. 1539. Pyramus and Thisbe; after F. Francia, supposed to be his first engraving on copper. The two Sibyls; after Raffaelle. Neptune rising from the Sea, to calm the tempest in which Æneas and his companions were shipwrecked. It is surrounded by a border in which are nine compartments, containing subjects taken from the Æneid. The Pest, called Il Morbetto; after Raffaelle.

RAIMONDO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished at Turin about 1477. Lanzi says there is a picture by him, in several compartments, in the church of S. Francesco di Chieri, esteemed for the lively expression of the countenances and the excellence of the coloring, but with much gilding in the draperies, according to the custom of the age.

RAIMONDO, MAESTRO, an old Italian architect, who was a native of Monforte, and flourished about the middle of the 12th century. He was principally distinguished for rebuilding the Cathedral of Lugo, a strongly built edifice of white marble, well worked, and supported on strong arches, with three naves, and four towers at the angles. Raimondo died before the work was finished, and was succeeded by his son. According to Milizia, the Cathedral was completed in 1177.

RAINALDI, DOMENICO, a painter who flourished at Rome about 1665. According to Titi, he was the nephew of the celebrated architect, Cav. Carlo Rainaldi, was patronized by the Pope, and executed some works for the churches. His name is also mentioned in the Guida di Roma.

RAINALDI, TOLOMEO, an Italian architect, was the eldest son of Adriano R., a painter and architect, and is supposed by Milizia to have studied under Michael Angelo. He practised both the civil and military branches of the art, and was appointed architect to the royal house and fortifications of Milan. He had two sons, Domizio and Giovanni Leo, called Tolomei, who practised the same art, succeeded to the offices of their father, and erected a number of edifices and fortresses at Milan, in the States, and in the Valteline.

RAINALDI, GIO. BATTISTA, a Roman architect, was a younger brother of the preceding. He erected a number of edifices at Rome, and was also employed in the fortifications at Ferrara, and the Ponte Felice, at Borghetto. He had a son named Domenico, a painter and architect.

RAINALDI, GIROLAMO, an Italian architect, the younger brother of the preceding artists, was born at Rome in 1570. He studied under Domenico Fontana, and gained the esteem of that master by his talents and application. When Fontana was commissioned by Sixtus V. to design a church at Montalto, being occupied with many engagements, he entrusted it to Rainaldi; and the young architect produced a design of such excellence that it was accepted by the Pope, who ordered him to erect the building. This was the commencement of Rainaldi's fortune, and he was much employed under successive pontificates. He finished the Capitol; built the gate of Fano, under Paul V., the house for the professor of the Jesuits at Rome, and the Jesuitical college of S. Lucia at Bologna. He was also employed by the Duke of Parma, and erected a palace in that city, as well as one in Piacenza and Modena. He constructed the bridge of Terni, over the Nera, of a single arch, and well proportioned. Among the most important works of Rainaldi, is the grand Palazzo Pamfili, in the Piazza Navona at Rome; and the beautiful church of the Padri Scalzi at Caprarola. He was employed to visit the Chiane marshes, on account of the difference concerning them between the Grand Duke and the Pope. He died in 1655, and was buried in S. Martina.

RAINALDI, CARLO, an Italian architect, born at Rome in 1611. He was the son and scholar of Girolamo R., and gained great distinction in the pontificates of Innocent X. and Alexander VII. The former pope, after testing the abilities of Rainaldi by a number of designs and buildings, commissioned him to erect the church of S. Agnese on the Piazza Navona, which is highly praised by Milizia for the beauty of its design, in the form of a light, elegant, and well proportioned Greek cross. He designed and executed his works with rapidity; his ornaments were bold, though not always correct, especially in his façades of churches. The enemies of Bernini having suggested that his campanile over the façade of St. Peter's was in danger of falling, Rainaldi was named head of the Assembly appointed to investigate the affair, and used every effort, though unsuccessfully, to defeat the object of their attacks against that celebrated architect. He made four designs and models for the piazza before St. Peter's; one of a square figure, one circular, the third a long ellipsis, and the fourth hexagonal. On account of the death of Innocent X., they were never executed. Among his other works were the façade of Gesu Maria, on the Corso, and of S. Andrea della Valle, the most stately work in Rome, after St. Peter's; two beautiful temples for Cardinal Gastaldi; the Sepulchre of Clement IX., in S. Maria Maggiore; and the Palace of the French Academy. Rainaldi sent a number of designs to Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, who honored him with several rich gifts, and the Cross of S. Maurizio and Lazzaro. He sent a design for the Louvre to King Louis XIV., who returned the compliment by sending the architect his own miniature, enriched with gems. He died in 1691.

RAINIERI, FRANCESCO, called Lo Schivenoglia, a painter born at Mantua about 1680. He studied under Giovanni Canti, and adopted his style and subjects. Lanzi says he was equally distinguished for his landscapes and battle-pieces, and surpassed his master in design, though inferior to him in coloring. He died in 1758.

RAM, JOHN DE, a Dutch engraver, born about 1680. He studied under Romeyn de Hooghe, whom he surpassed in freedom and correctness of design. He was employed chiefly by the booksellers, and his prints are numerous in the Dutch publications of his day. He also engraved some portraits in mezzotinto, among which is one of Christian V. of Denmark.

RAMA, CAMILLO, a painter born at Brescia, who flourished about 1622. According to Orlandi, he studied under the younger Palma, and followed his style. He executed several works for the churches, convents, and public edifices of his native city, highly commended by the author above cited, though Lanzi does not deem them worthy of more than a passing notice.

RAMAZZANI, ERCOLE, a painter born at Roccacontrada, in the Roman territory. According to Lanzi, he studied under Pietro Perugino and afterwards under Raffaele. He executed some works for the churches in his native place and in its vicinity, which, in the Antichità Picene, are commended for their beautiful style of coloring, charming invention, and a manner approaching to Baroccio. He was living in 1588.

RAMBALDI, CARLO, a painter born at Bologna in 1680. He studied under Domenico Viani, and adopted his style. He painted history with considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches at Bologna, among which the principal are the Death of St. Joseph, in S. Gregorio, the Visitation of the Virgin, in S. Giuseppe, and St. Francis Xavier, in S. Lucia. He also painted many pictures for the collections. Lanzi says that his pictures, especially his half-length figures, are found in the select galleries at Bologna; and there are a few of his historical pictures in the royal collection at Turin. He died in 1717.

RAMBERG, JOHN HENRY, a German painter and engraver, born at Hanover in 1763. He went early in life to England, and studied with Sir Joshua Reynolds, under whom he showed great talents and made rapid progress. He acquired distinction, was patronized by the Royal Family, painted for the Prince of Wales at Carlton House, and was elected a royal académician. He afterwards made the tour of France, Italy, Germany, and Holland, and finally settled in his native city, where he practised his profession with distinction, and was chosen professor of painting in the Academy. He Painted both history and portraits, and was employed by Boydell in painting for his Shakspeare gallery. He also engraved some prints from his own designs in aquatint, and in the chalk manner. He died at Hanover in 1840.

RAMELLI, PADRE FELICE, a painter born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1666. He first studied under the Padre Abate Danese Rho, but finished his studies at Rome, where he took priestly orders, and was made one of the canons of the church of S. John of Lateran. He excelled in painting historical subjects and portraits in oil, as well as miniatures. He was invited by the King of Sardinia to Turin, where he executed for that monarch the portraits, in small, of the most celebrated artists, from the originals by themselves in the Florentine gallery. He finished his pieces with incredible neatness, and gave to each portrait in a small compass, the dignity and truth of nature. These works are preserved in the cabinet of the King of Sardinia, and among the heads, he took care to perpetuate his own, represented in the habit of his order. Most of his works are in the collections at Rome, where he chiefly resided, and died in 1740.

RAMENGGHI, BARTOLOMEO, sometimes called IL OF DA BAGNACAVALLO, and by Vasari IL Bologna, was an eminent Italian painter, born, according to Baruffaldi, at Bagnacavallo, a small village near Bologna, in 1484. He first studied under Francesco Francia, and next imitated the manner of Girolamo da Cotignola, till he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Raffaele and was employed, among other artists, in decorating the loggie of the Vatican. He afterwards returned to Bologna, where he executed many works for the churches, emulating the manner of Raffaele, for which reason, Vasari and other authors give him less notice than his talents and merits deserve. Lanzi says, "in his composition he most affected Raffaele, as may be gathered from his celebrated dispute of St. Augustine at the Scopetini, where the maxims of the school of Athens and of other copious and noble conceptions of Sanzio are apparent." (Why should not Bagnacavallo retort that Raffaele copied into his cartoon of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra, the whole of the ancient Sacrifice of Masaccio?) "Indeed in those subjects treated by Sanzio, Bagnacavallo contented himself with being a mere copyist, declaring that it was madness to attempt to do better, and appearing to follow the opinion of Vida, and other poets of his age, who inserted in their pages fragments of Virgil, because they despaired of excelling them." Lanzi says however, that he was well grounded in the principles of art, and that he conducted some paintings on the strength of his own invention, which absolve him from the accusation of a copyist, as at S. Michele in Bosco, at S. Martino, and at S. Maria Maggiore. He also says that he was the first to introduce a better style at Bologna, and that, though he had not the depth of design of Giulio Romano and Pierino del Vaga, he nearly approached the latter, and was perhaps equal to him in the excellence of his coloring, while in the graceful airs of his heads, at least in the boyish and infantile, he surpassed him. It is also well known that his works were the admiration of Guido, Albano, and the Caracci, who at first made them their study and models. He died at Bologna in 1542. The times of his birth and death are variously stated, but the above dates are from authentic documents.

RAMENGGHI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, was the son of the preceding artist. According to Malvasia, he was instructed by his father, and was employed as an assistant to Vasari in the palace of the Chancery at Rome; after which he accompanied Primaticcio to France, and assisted in his works at Fontainebleau. He afterwards returned to Bologna, where he executed some excellent works for the churches, and was chosen president of the academy in 1575. The notices of him are very scanty. He died in 1601. His son Scipione, was an excellent perspective and ornamental painter, and assisted his uncle Bartolomeo, the subject of the following article.

RAMENGGHI, BARTOLOMEO, was the cousin of Gio. Battista R., and flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. His instructor is not mentioned. He excelled in perspective and ornamental painting, and found much employment at Bologna. Lanzi says he associated himself with Gio. Battista Cremonini, and in conjunction with that artist, decorated an astonishing number of public and private edifices at Bologna, in the neighboring cities, and at the different courts of Lombardy. Ramenghi painted the architectural parts, and Cremonini the histories, figures, statues, and animals. (See Cremonini.) He had a son named Gio. Battista, also an eminent painter in the same branch, who flourished at Bologna in the first part of the 17th century.

RAMIREZ, GERONIMO, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville in the first part of the 17th century. He studied under Juan de las Roelas, and adopted his style. There is a fine picture by him, in the hospital de la Sangre, signed with his name, representing the Pope surrounded by Cardinals and other personages.

RAMIREZ, FELIPE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville about 1650, and was probably a relative of the preceding. His instructor is not mentioned, but according to Cean Bermudez, he was a correct and skillful designer of the human figure, as is evident from his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Stephen. He excelled in painting hunting-pieces, dead game, and objects of still-life, which are highly esteemed in Spain.

RAMIREZ, JOSÉ, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia, according to Bermudez, in 1624. He studied under Geronimo de Espinosa, and followed his style. Palomino commends some of his best works in the convent of San Felipe Neri, particularly a picture of the Virgin. Bermudez says he was a learned ecclesiastic, and wrote the life of San Felipe Neri. He died, according to Bermudez, in 1692, and to Palomino, in 1686.

RAMIREZ, JUAN, an eminent Spanish portrait painter, who flourished at Seville about 1550. He painted historical subjects, in the chapel of St. Christopher, and other places of note, but his works have all perished except his portraits.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, a Scotch portrait painter, the son of Allan Ramsay the poet, was born at Edinburg in 1709. After studying in London with Mr. Hyssidge, a painter of little note, he went to Italy, where he resided three years, chiefly at Rome, and studied successively under Solimena and Imperiali. Soon after his return to his own country, he settled at London, where he met with flattering encouragement. By the interest of Lord Bute, he was introduced to the Prince of Wales, afterwards George III., and painted his portrait. On the death of Shakelton in 1767, he was appointed principal portrait painter to the King. He painted several full-length portraits of George III., and Queen Charlotte, as well as others of the nobility, and persons of distinction, some of which were engraved. He visited Rome four different times, the last in company with his son, Major-General Ramsay. He died soon after his return, in 1784. Ramsay's portraits are distinguished for a calm, placid dignity, and a faithful representation of his subjects, devoid of the affectation that prevailed among his cotemporaries in London. Although he did not reach the highest rank in his profession, his works are esteemed, and he contributed to regenerate the art in his country. He was well versed in literature, and Boswell mentions him as a frequenter of the literary parties of Dr. Johnson, who said of him, "you will not find a man in whose conversation there is more instruction, more information, and more elegance, than in that of Ramsay."

RANBERT, LOUIS LE, a French painter and sculptor, born at Paris in 1614. His father was keeper of sculptures to King Louis XIII., who consented to act as sponsor to the young artist. He studied painting in the school of Vouet, and afterwards under le Brun. He then entered the atelier of the sculptor Sarrazin, and soon gained distinction for the grace and beauty of his figures, and his facility of execution. As a painter, he executed several small portraits of Cardinal Mazarin, Marechal de la Meilleraie, and others. His principal work in sculpture was the tomb of Marquis Dampierre. For the park at Versailles, he executed several statues of Nymphs, &c., and for the cathedral at Blois, two bas-reliefs in white marble, representing Memory and Meditation. His works possess considerable merit of execution; but they want the simplicity of the antique. Le Ranbert died at Paris in 1670.

RANC, JEAN, an eminent French portrait painter, born at Montpellier in 1674. He went to Paris and studied under Hyacinth Rigaud. After acquiring distinction, he was invited in 1724 to the court of Madrid, where he was appointed principal painter to the King, and painted the portraits of the King and other members of the royal family, besides those of the principal court personages. He also painted the portraits of the royal family of Portugal. He died at Madrid in 1735.

RANDA, ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, who first studied under Guido, and afterwards with Lucio Massari. Malvasia observes that there is little good to be said of him, referring to his deed of homicide, originating in a quarrel, in which he slew his antagonist, and was obliged to flee from Bologna. In other respects, he ranks him among the best scholars, first of Guido, and next of Massari, to whose style he was most attached. On account of his reputation, the Duke of Modena granted him an asylum in his state, and made him his court painter in 1614. He executed many works for the Duke, which are highly commended by Orlandi, and was afterwards much employed in painting for the churches at Ferrara, besides many other places in the Polesine. He afterwards betook himself to a cloister, which, in the eyes of Orlandi covered a multitude of sins, and doubtless would have softened the asperity of Malvasia, had he been cognizant of the fact. Lanzi praises a St. Cecilia, that he saw in a private collection, as an exquisite production. There are some of his works in the churches at Bologna, and particularly at Ferrara, where are two of his best works.—St. Filippo Neri, in S. Stefano, and a grand altar-piece of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Francis, in S. Libera. He died in 1650.

RANDON, JOHN, an engraver, probably a Frenchman, who flourished at Rome, from about 1710 to 1755. He engraved some plates of antique and modern statues for the collection published by Rossi; also several other subjects after Passebon.

RANSONETTE, NICOLAS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1753. His instructor is not mentioned, but he engraved some plates in a neat style, after his own designs and those of other masters, among which are the following. He died in 1810.

The new Palais-Royal at Paris. A View of the new Palace of Justice. The Rival Seducer; from his own design. The Lover Revenged; do. Cupid and Psyche; after Raffaele. Italian Amusements; after Watteau. Diana of Poitiers; after L. Penni. Agnes Sorel; do. The Dream of Voltaire; after St. Aubin. Nostradamus showing Mary de Medicis the throne of the Bourbons. Several plates of fabulous subjects; after Gabriel de St. Aubin.

RAOUX, JEAN, a French historical and portrait painter, born at Montpellier in 1677. He studied in the school of Bon Boullongne at Paris, where he made great progress, and obtained the grand prize of the Academy, which entitled him to visit Italy with the royal pension. He continued at Rome and Venice ten years, and practised his profession with credit in several Italian cities. On his return to Paris he acquired considerable distinction, and was admitted into the Academy in 1717, for his picture of Pygmalion and Galatea. Among his principal works are four pictures representing the different ages of Man, painted for the Prior of Vendome, Telemachus in the Island of Calypso, and a Sleeping Venus; the two latter have been engraved. He appears to have devoted his attention in France mostly to portraits and fancy pictures. It is said that he visited England, where he was sometime employed by Sir Andrew Fontaine. He died at Paris in 1734.

RAPHAEL. See RAFFAELLE.

RAPHON, or RAPHOHN, JOHANN, a German painter of whom little is known, and about whom considerable curiosity has recently been excited by the discovery of several pictures bearing his name. He is said to have been a scholar of Albert Durer, and to have died in 1528. There is an altar-piece by him in the Cathedral of Halberstadt, consisting of the Crucifixion, with laterals on the inside of folding-doors, representing the Annunciation, the Adoration of the Shepherds, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Presentation. The exteriors are decorated with figures of Saints. The composition is somewhat overcharged, and the heads are distinguished by energy and individuality of expression rather than by a manifestation of those inward feelings appropriate to the subjects. It is dated 1508. Another similar picture of a Crucifixion, with laterals, is in the Library of the University at Gottingen. A third altar-piece is dated 1499, and M. Hausmann, of Hanover, possesses two wings of a fourth. It is probable that more will be discovered.

RATHBONE, JOHN, an English landscape painter, born in Cheshire about 1750. By an assiduous study of nature, he acquired distinction as a painter of landscapes, and his pictures were frequently embellished with figures by Ibbeston, Anderson, and other cotemporary artists. He died in 1807.

RATTI, GIO. AGOSTINO, a painter born at Savona in 1699. He went young to Rome, and studied in the school of Benedetto Luti, whose style he followed. He painted history, both in fresco and in oil, but was more eminent for his decorations of theatres with beautiful scenes, and cabinets with lively caricatures. He executed some works for the churches, among which are an admired picture of the Decollation of St. John the Baptist, in the church of S. Giovanni at Savona, and some frescos in the choir of the church of the Conventuali at Casale di Monferrato. Lanzi says, "subjects of humor were his forte. In these he had an exhaustless fancy, fertile, and ever creative. Nothing can be more amusing than his masks, representing quarrels, dances, and such scenes as form the subjects of comedy. Luti extolled him as one of the first artists in this branch, and even equalled him to the Cav. Ghezzi." Lanzi also says that he engraved some plates after his own designs. He died at Genoa in 1775.

RATTI, CAV CARLO GIUSEPPE, a painter, and more eminent author, was the son of the preceding, born at Genoa about 1735. His principal literary works were, the Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects of Genoa; the Life of the Cav. Raffaello Mengs; and Historical Notices of Correggio; which last, in particular, brought down upon him the thunders of several writers, who accused him of plagiarism, and of having endeavored, by a change of style and the addition of trifling matter, to appropriate to himself what really belonged to Mengs. We cannot enter into the subject, further than to say that Ratti ably defended himself in an anonymous letter to a friend, which, however, did not satisfy the critics, and they carried the controversy to his works as a painter, so that it is impossible to form any correct estimate of his abilities. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Mengs, rather as a friend, with whom he lived in his own house for four years, and who always entertained a warm friendship for him. Mengs proposed him as Director of the Academy at Milan, and some historical and national pictures being required in the royal palace at Genoa, Ratti was recommended to this honorable commission by both Mengs and Battoni, and he executed them to the entire satisfaction of the public, though his enemies could discover nothing in them but imitation and plagiarism. Ratti also wrote on art at the instigation of Mengs. He executed many works for the churches at Genoa, Rome, and other places, and painted much for individuals. He was knighted by Pius VI., made a member of the Academies of St. Luke, of Florence, and other places, extolled by poets and men of letters, and was offered the direction of the Academy at Genoa for life, which honorable office he declined. His friends admit that he did not hesitate to adopt from ancient or modern masters, when it suited his purpose. Lanzi says that he was an admirable copyist, and that Mengs himself paid him a considerable sum for a copy of the St. Jerome of Correggio, probably one of his earlier performances, which he had made at Parma. He died in 1795.

RAUCH, CHRISTIAN, an eminent German sculptor, born at Waldeck in 1777. He acquired a knowledge of the art at Berlin, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement, in 1805. In 1811, the King of Prussia invited him to Berlin, to execute a mausoleum at Charlottenburg, in memory of the late queen. This splendid work was completed in three years, and is considered one of the finest productions of modern art. In 1815, Rauch was commissioned by the king to execute the statues of Scharnhorst and Bülow, which are now standing in Berlin, nearly opposite the King's palace. His works are principally distinguished for correctness of design. Besides those already mentioned, he has executed many others, among which are the bronze colossal statue of Blücher, at Berlin; and another of the same general at Breslau. In 1832, Rauch was Professor of Sculpture in the Academy of Fine Arts at Berlin. It is not ascertained if he is now living.

RAVENET, SIMON FRANÇOIS, the Elder, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1706, though Zani and Basan say in 1721. He studied under Philip le Bas, and after acquiring considerable reputation, he went to England, and settled in London about 1750, where he executed many plates after the Italian and French masters, which are highly esteemed. He gave both color and brilliancy to his engravings, and finished them with great neatness and precision. He died in 1774. The following are among his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

George I. George II.; after Mercier. Lord Camden; after Reynolds. Alexander Pope, Poet. James Thomson, Poet. David Hume, Historian. Mr. Garriek and Miss Bellamy, in Romeo and Juliet; after B. Wilson.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Emblem of Human Life; after Titian; Crozat collection. Venus and Adonis; after P. Veronese; do. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after D. Feti; do. Painting and Design; after Guido. The Virgin, with the infant Jesus sleeping; do. Charity; after Carlo Cignani. The Areadian Shepherds; after N. Poussin. Sophonisba receiving the Nuptial Present; after L. Giordano. The Death of Seneca; do. Tobias' Nuptial Night; after le Sueur. Tobit anointing his Father's Eyes; after Ag. Caracci. The Lord of the Vineyard; after Rembrandt. The Prodigal Son; after Sal. Rosa. Phryno tempting Xenocrates; do. The Return of the Prodigal Son; after Guercino. Lueretia deploring her Fate; after Casali. Gunhilda, Empress of Germany, acquitted of a charge of adultery; do.

RAVENET, SIMON FRANÇOIS, the Younger, was the son of the preceding, born in London in 1755. After learning engraving with his father, he went to Paris, and studied painting for a short time under François Boucher. On leaving that master, he went to Italy and settled at Parma, where he undertook the arduous enterprise of engraving and publishing plates from all the works of Correggio in that city, which occupied him several years. His prints are executed with neatness and spirit. He was living in 1813. The following are by him:

A set of twelve plates of the Cupola of the Cathedral. A set of plates of the Dome of S. Giovanni. The Madonna della Scodella. The Madonna della Scala. La Santissima Nunziata. The Madonna Incoronata. Christ bearing his Cross. The Descent from the Cross. The celebrated St. Jerome. The Martyrdom of St. Placido.—All of them after Correggio. Jupiter and Antiope; after Rubens. Theseus lifting the Stone; after N. Poussin.

MR. or SR RAVENNA. MARCO DA, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Ravenna about 1496. His family name was Dente, and Vasari calls him Marco da Ravignano. The fame of Marc' Antonio Raimondi drew many young men to Rome to study under him. Among them the most distinguished were Marco da Ravenna and Agostino de Musis, called Veneziano, both of whom assisted him in his works, and after his death engraved many admirable works by themselves. Ravenna imitated with precision the bolder style of engraving practised by his master, but was not equally successful when he attempted to follow him in his neatest and most finished works. He handled the graver with more freedom than his fellow-student Veneziano, though inferior to him in clearness and accuracy. He rarely signed his plates with his name, MRCUS RAVENAS, sometimes simply with an R., sometimes with a monogram composed of M. R., but more frequently with one composed of an R. and an S. interlaced as above. This last mark has led authors into a great deal of contradiction and confusion, which we cannot enter into, further than to say that some suppose there were two Ravennas, and that those plates marked R. or with the monogram M. R., were by Marco da Ravenna, and those with the monogram of R. and an S., were by an artist variously called Silvestro, Simone, or Severo da Ravenna. Others again interpret the monogram Raffaelle Sanzio, placed on the plate to denote that it was taken from a design by that master; but this opinion is confuted by the fact that he used the same mark on a print of the Murder of the Innocents, after Baccio Bandinelli. The prints in dispute are evidently by the same hand, and the best connoisseurs interpret the mark Ravenna sculpsit.—Those fond of such discussions are referred to Zani's Enciclopedia Metodica, parte prima, vol. xvi., and parte seconda, vol. v., where they will find the subject discussed con amore; and to Bartsch's Peintre Graveur, tom. xiv., who, with his usual critical acumen, has examined all the evidence of Zani, and placed the subject in as clear a light as practicable. The time of his death is not known. The following are his principal prints:

SACRED SUBJECTS.

A set of twelve plates of subjects from the Bible; after the paintings in the Vatican, from the designs of Raffaelle. The Murder of the Innocents; after Baccio Bandinelli. The Transfiguration; after Raffaelle. The Last Supper; do.; the same is engraved by M. Antonio. The Holy Family; do.; engraved also by M. Antonio, called The Virgin with the long thigh. The Virgin Mary holding the infant Jesus, seated on a pedestal with St. Joseph; after Polidoro da Caravaggio. A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Apostles; after Raffaelle; the same were engraved by M. Antonio. St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirit; do.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Remembrance of Death; an emblematical subject, in which a figure of Death is represented holding a book, surrounded by several emaciated figures; after Baccio Bandinelli; the same subject, with variations, was engraved by Agostino Veneziano. A Bacchanal subject, represented by children; after Giulio Romano. The Rape of Helen; after Raffaelle. Venus quitting Juno and Ceres; do. Two plates, the Interview between Scipio and Hannibal, and the Victory of Scipio; after Giulio Romano. The Triumph of Galatea; after Raffaelle; engraved also by M. Antonio. The Assembly of the Gods; do. Venus on the water, seated on a shell; do. Venus seated under a tree, taking a thorn from her foot, called The Venus with the Rabbit. Polyphemus pursuing Galatea; do. Galatea seated on a shell, flying from Polyphemus; do. Jupiter and Antiope; without the name of the painter. The Laocoon, after the antique statue; to this plate he has affixed his name nearly at length, MRCUS RAVENAS.

RAVESTEYN, HUBERT VAN, a Dutch painter of low subjects, born at Dort in 1647. He possessed uncommon abilities, and it is regretted that he had not devoted his pencil to more worthy objects. His pictures generally represent the interiors of slaughter houses, butcher's shops, and the inside of the miserable habitations of boors and villagers, with sheep penned up, slaughtering times, boys blowing up bladders, entrails of hogs, baskets of sausages, interiors of kitchens, with maids scouring utensils, &c. These disgusting subjects he treated with great address. His design is correct, his pencil neat and clear, his coloring transparent, his chiaro-scuro admirable, and every object is designed and touched with infinite nature and effect. His pictures, in point of color, light, and shadow, are compared to the admirable productions of Albert Cuyp. Immerzeel, differing from all others, says he was born in 1640. The time of his death is not known.

RAVESTEYN, JOHN VAN, an eminent Dutch portrait painter, born at the Hague about 1580. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but his works evince extraordinary merit, and he is said not to have been surpassed in his particular branch by any of his cotemporaries, with the exception of Rubens and Vandyck. He had an excellent knowledge of the palette, his lights and shadows are judiciously distributed, his coloring is clear and harmonious, and his touch broad and firm. Besides the portraits of many distinguished persons, which may be found in the private collections of Holland, he painted several large pictures, among which is a grand picture fifteen feet long, with twenty-six portraits of life-size, in the Banqueting Hall at the Hague, representing the magistrates of that city seated at a table. The figures are correctly drawn, admirably grouped, and the accessories are painted with great spirit and effect; the heads are full of dignity and expression, and the whole exhibits an appearance of truth and nature seldom surpassed; it is dated 1618. Another fine picture by him is in the Hall of the Society of Archers at the Hague, representing the officers and principal members of the Society. In the Town House is another, of the Burgomasters, in their robes of office, dated 1636. The time of his birth and death is variously stated. Houbraken says he was born in 1580, and died in 1649; Immerzeel, in 1572, and died in 1657. He was at the head of the forty-eight artists who, in 1655, presented a petition to be separated as a society from the company of house painters, at the Hague.

RAVESTEYN, ARNOLD VAN, was the son of John van R., born at the Hague in 1615. He was instructed in the art by his father, and though he did not equal him, he was accounted one of the greatest portrait painters of his time. He was chosen president of the Society of Artists at the Hague in 1661, and filled that office with honor till his death, in 1676.

RAVESTEYN, NICHOLAS VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Bommel in 1661. He was the son of Henry van Ravesteyn, a painter little known, who intended him for one of the learned professions, and gave him a classical education, but died before he had completed his course of study. Ravesteyn then turned his attention to painting, and having already learned the rudiments of design from his father, he went to the Hague, and first studied under Wm. Doudyns; but his genius leading him to portrait painting, he became the disciple of J. de Baan, who was then in high repute. He afterwards settled in his native place, where he found abundant employment. In 1694, he was sent for to the court of Kuilenberg to paint the princess of Waldeck, after her death. As no artist had been able to paint a satisfactory likeness of her while living, Ravesteyn had little hopes of accomplishing it after her death; yet he succeeded to the satisfaction of the court, and returned home liberally rewarded, with his reputation greatly increased. Although his chief excellence lay in portraits, he painted history with reputation. For the most part, he painted his portraits historically, designed his figures in good taste, and obtained a striking likeness. He had a free and easy manner of handling, and his coloring was clear and harmonious. He enjoyed abundant patronage, and is said to have exercised his pencil to the last year of his long life, without showing any traces of the weakness or infirmities of old age. He died in 1750, aged 89 years.

RAVI, JEAN, a French architect and sculptor, who was employed at Paris, according to Felibien, upon the church of Notre Dame, for twenty-six years, and completed it in 1351. It is a magnificent Gothic edifice, the largest in France, being four hundred and thirteen feet long, one hundred and fifty-six wide, and one hundred and ninety-eight high. The nave is eighty-nine feet wide, of a beautiful elevation, well lighted, and regularly planned. The transept is of the same width, and equally beautiful with the nave, flanked by double aisles, leading to thirty-five chapels, magnificently decorated. The choir and sanctuary correspond in style to the rest. Above the double aisles are spacious and high galleries or porches, vaulted with stone. The façade is flanked by two square towers, two hundred and four feet high. The whole edifice is of stone, and is adorned with an infinite variety of beautiful specimens in painting and sculpture.

RAWLINS, J., an English engraver of little note, who flourished about 1760. He engraved a few portraits and frontispieces for the booksellers.

RAVIGLIONE, DI CASALE, a Piedmontese painter who, according to Orlandi, was a native of Casalmonferrato, and flourished in the first half of the 17th century. He executed some works for the churches in his native city and elsewhere. Lanzi considers him, after Niccolo Musso, the ablest artist Monferrato has produced, although his name, his age, and his school are unknown.

RAVIGNANO, MARCO. See MARCO DA RAVENNA.

RAYMOND, JEAN, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1695. Little is known of him. He engraved some of the plates for the Crozat collection, among which are the Holy Family, after Raffaele; the Entombment, after Taddeo Zucaro; and the Miracle of the Manna, after Romanelli. His prints are executed with the graver, in a bold, clear style, and his drawing is tolerably correct.

RAYMOND, JEAN ARNAUD, a French architect, born at Toulouse in 1742. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was sent to Paris at the expense of the liberal M. de Puymaurin. He studied successively under Blondel, Hilaire, and Leroi. In 1767 he gained the grand prize, and immediately went with the royal pension to Rome, where he was principally occupied in studying and copying the antique and the works of Palladio. He studied the writings of that master with great assiduity, carefully examined and designed his edifices at Venice, Padua, and Vicenza, and wrote many learned notices upon them. On returning to France in 1775, he intended to edit the works of Palladio, but was anticipated by Cameron, who published an edition from the designs of Lord Burlington. Raymond was employed for three years, soon after his return to France, at Montpellier, where he directed several public works. He also made many admirable designs, at the request of Joubert, for embellishing Nismes, and other cities of Languedoc, which were approved, but were never executed. In 1784, Raymond was chosen a Royal Academician, and afterwards a member of the French Institute, and the governmental Conseil des Batiments. He died in 1811.

RAZALI, SEBASTIANO, a Bolognese painter who, according to Malvasia, was a pupil of the Caracci, and followed their manner. Little is known of him or his works. Lanzi commends his picture of St. Benedict among the Thorns, in the church of S. Michele in Bosco at Bologna. He flourished in the first part of the 17th century.

RAZZI, CAV. GIOVANNI ANTONIO, called IL SODOMA. There is a good deal of dispute as to the place and time of birth, and the merits of this artist, which we cannot enter into further than to say that, according to the best authorities, he was born at Vercelli, in the Piedmontese, in 1479; not at Vergelle, a Sieneese village, though he afterwards settled at Siena, and became naturalized. He studied under Giacomo dalle Fonte, but he formed his style on that of Leonardo da Vinci. Among his earliest performances were a series of pictures at Monte Oliveto, representing the history of St. Benedetto, painted about 1502. He afterwards went to Rome, where his talent recommended him to the notice of Julius II., who employed him in the Vatican, where he executed several works which were subsequently defaced to make way for the frescos of Raffaele, though the latter spared the grotesques. He was also employed by Agostino Chigi to decorate his palace, now the Farnesina, with frescos from the life of Alexander the Great, of which the Nuptials of Roxana, and the Suppliant Family of Darinus, are the most esteemed. Lanzi says of these works, "they do not exhibit the facility, grace, and the dignified heads that characterize the style of Vinci; but they show much of his chiaro-scuro, which was then much followed by the Lombards, and his perspective is conspicuous; they also abounded in gay images, little cupids with their arrows, and a pomp that is captivating."

The best works of Razzi are at Siena, the fruit of his studies at Rome, executed in the full maturity of his powers. The most celebrated of these are the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Agostino, executed wholly in the style of da Vinci; the Flagellation of Christ, at the Franciscans, preferred by many connoisseurs to the figures of Michael Angelo; and the Swoon of St. Catherine of Siena, in the chapel of that saint, in the church of S. Domenico, in which he emulated the manner of Raffaello; and St. Sebastian, now in the Ducal gallery, supposed to have been copied from an antique Torso.

Razzi, when advanced in life, by some misfortune which happened to him at Siena, was reduced to poverty; he then sought employment at Pisa, at Volterra, and at Lucca. The works he painted at these places, were frequently executed in a hurried manner, without preparatory study, and have greatly tended to injure his reputation. Vasari, the great enemy of his fame, generally styles him Mattaccio (buffoon), ascribing to chance or fortune whatever he performed well, as if his usual style had been that of a bad painter, and judging him from his last works, when misfortune, necessity, and advanced age oppressed him; yet he was so forgetful as incidentally to commend his works in high terms on several occasions. Thus in his life of Mecherino, he says that "Razzi possessed the grand principles of design," and in another passage he praises the brilliant coloring he brought with him out of Lombardy, and before noticing the works of his old age, often pronounced the others beautiful, and sometimes, most beautiful, and wonderful performances. It is sufficient to observe that public opinion at Siena, ranks him as one of the ablest artists of that city, and that his best works have received the unqualified approbation of both excellent writers and critics. Annibale Caracci, in passing through Siena, observed, "Razzi appears a very eminent master, of the greatest taste, and few such pictures are to be seen;" and Peruzzi affirmed of his St. Catherine, that "he had never seen a swoon so naturally represented." Lanzi says that, "the airs and various expressions of his heads are not borrowed from any artist, and on this account, he seems to have extorted the applause even of Vasari, and that he selected his models from among the Sieneese, whose heads possess great innate gaiety, openness, and spirit." He died in 1554.

READ, CATHERINE, an English paintress, who gained considerable reputation for her portraits, both in oil and crayons. Among her best performances are mentioned the portrait of Queen Charlotte, and Mrs. Macaulay, the historian. Several of her paintings have been engraved in mezzotinto. She died at an advanced age about 1786.

READ, RICHARD, an English mezzotinto engraver of little note, who flourished about 1780, and executed a few portraits and other subjects.

REALFONSO, TOMMASO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, was the most celebrated scholar of Andrea Belvidere. He excelled in painting still life, as dead game, fish, utensils, and similar subjects; also fruit, flowers, all kinds of confectionery and eatables, all which he painted with great truth and spirit. He flourished in the latter part of the 17th century.

RECCHI, GIOVANNI PAOLO, and GIO. BATTISTA, two brothers, painters of Como, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century, and perhaps later. They studied under Morazzone, whose manner they adopted. They acquired considerable reputation, and were employed conjointly in decorating with frescos the churches of their native city, at Varese, and other places in the vicinity. Gio. Battista was the most distinguished, became eminent beyond the state, and was much employed at the court of Turin; there are some of his works in the church of S. Carlo in the latter city, placed near those of his master, which do not suffer by the proximity. Lanzi says, "his style is solid and strong, his coloring forcible, and in his skill of foreshortening on ceilings, he yields to few artists of his time. Pasta, in his Guide to Bergamo, has deservedly praised him on this score when speaking of his Santa Grata, seen rising into heaven, a work, he observes, that is admirable and delightful." There was another Gio. Battista R., nephew of the preceding, who assisted him in some of the chambers of the Veneria at Turin. The elder Gio. Battista R., instructed several pupils in the art, some of whom acquired distinction.

RECCO, CAV. GIUSEPPE, a Neapolitan painter, born, according to Dominici, in 1634. He studied under Aniello Falcone, and became one of the most celebrated painters in Italy, of hunting, fowling, and fishing pieces, dead game, and similar subjects. His pictures are found in the best collections in Naples and other Italian cities, where they are admired for their excellence of composition, spirit of execution, and rich coloring of the Lombard school. Recco was invited to the court of Madrid, where he resided many years, whilst Luca Giordano was there. He died at Naples in 1695.

RECHBERGER, FRANZ, an eminent German landscape painter, designer, and etcher, born at Vienna in 1771. He studied under F. Brandt, with Martin von Molitor for a fellow student; the two young artists contracted an intimate friendship, and afterwards practised in conjunction. Rechberger is better known by his numerous designs and etchings, than by his paintings, though the latter are said to be executed in a pleasing and masterly manner. His etchings are so beautifully designed and spiritedly executed, that they rank with the choicest of modern times. They generally represent wild, romantic scenery, somewhat in the style of Jacob Ruysdael, or Albert van Everdingen. He also etched a number of plates of landscapes from drawings or paintings by Dietricy. Nagler mentions seventy-six plates by him, generally marked F. R., which has occasioned them sometimes to be attributed to Frederick Rehberg, a cotemporary artist, who used the same initials; but the works of the latter are historical, and belong rather to the Roman school. Rechberger was appointed keeper of the prints and drawings of the Archduke Charles at Vienna, and also had the care of the fine collection of prints formerly belonging to Count Fries. He was living in 1842.

RECLAM, FREDERICK, a German painter and engraver, was born at Magdeburg in 1734. After learning the rudiments of art in his native city, he went to Paris, and studied under J. B. Pierre. In 1755 he went to Italy, and resided several years at Rome, after which he returned to his own country, settled at Berlin, and painted landscapes and portraits with considerable success. He also executed a number of etchings from his own designs and those of other masters; of which Nagler enumerates twenty-nine. He died in 1774.

REDER, CHRISTIAN. There is some discrepancy among writers about the period of the birth and death of this painter, but the best authorities say he was born in Saxony in 1656, and died in 1729. According to Pascoli, he went to Rome in 1686, the year of the capture of Buda, and acquired considerable reputation for his representations of battles between the Christians and the Ottomans. Although his pictures were well composed and spiritedly touched, he executed so many of them, with little variation, that they soon depreciated in value. The best, in the opinion of Pascoli, was a grand picture in the gallery de' Minimi; and he left many in the palaces of the nobility. Lanzi says he was skilful in landscape and humorous subjects, in which he was assisted by Peter van Bloemen. He afterwards visited Venice, Hamburg, Amsterdam, and London, leaving specimens of his ability in each of those cities. Füessli calls his name Renter. He is also called by the Italians M. Leandro Sassone.

REDI, TOMMASO, a Florentine painter, born in 1665. After studying under Domenico Gabbiani in his native city, he went to Rome and entered the Florentine Academy, established by the Grand Duke Cosimo III., then under the direction of Carlo Maratti and Ciro Ferri. He prosecuted his studies at Rome with ardor, and success, and afterwards visited the most celebrated schools for the purpose of studying and copying the works of the great masters. On returning to Florence, he was commissioned by the Grand Duke to paint several works for the Pitti palace, and soon obtained abundant employment for the churches, convents, and public edifices of Florence, as well as for the palaces of the nobility. He painted subjects from ancient mythology and sacred and profane history. He was also an excellent portrait painter. Redit designed with elegance and correctness, and his coloring partakes much of the sweetness of Carlo Maratti. He was well grounded in his profession, with a ready invention and great facility of hand. Peter the Great having seen some of his works, and being desirous of establishing an academy of the Fine Arts at Moscow, made very liberal offers to Redit to undertake the direction of it, but his engagements at Florence prevented his accepting the proposal. He died at Florence in 1726.

REDMOND, THOMAS, an English miniature painter, who died in 1785. He was the son of a clergyman, and a native of Brecknock, in Wales. He was almost entirely a self-made artist. He resided chiefly at Bath, and practised with considerable success.

REDOU, PETER JOSEPH, an eminent Belgian flower painter, called by the French, the Raf-faëlle des Fleurs. was born in the province of Brabant, at St. Hubert, near Liege. After acquiring a knowledge of the elements of design, he visited various cities in the Low Countries for improvement. Meeting with the surpassing flower-pieces of John van Huysum, he greatly desired to devote himself to that branch of the art, and finally went to Paris, where he entered the studio of his elder brother Anthony, a painter of decorations. He shortly after commenced designing flowers, and entirely relinquished the other branches of the art. His merit soon became evident, and he was much encouraged by l'Heritier, who employed him to make a number of designs for the Sertum Anglicum, and by van Spaendonck, who commissioned him to paint the pictures of twenty rare plants, which he had engaged to furnish yearly for the collection of drawings on vellum, commenced in 1650, by Gaston, duke of Orleans, and continued to the present time by the Musée d' Histoire Naturelle. In 1792, Redout was appointed designer to the Royal Academy of Sciences, and afterwards a professor of the Institute, at its formation. In 1805 he was appointed flower painter to the Empress Josephine. In 1822 he succeeded to the office of van Spaendonck in the Royal Gardens. He was much employed in making designs for many pictorial works, such as the Flora Atlantica, of Desfontaines; and the Jardin de Malmaison, of Ventenat. He gained his principal reputation, however, by his Liliacées, and his Roses. The first were published with a descriptive text by Delaunay, from 1802 to 1816, in eighty numbers, embracing 480 plates of various specimens of the lily. The Roses were published from 1817 to 1824, in thirty numbers, embracing 180 plates. From 1827 to 1833, he published thirty-six numbers of selections of the most beautiful flowers and fruits; in 1835 and the following years twelve numbers of similar selections of flowers. In 1836, he published in fifteen numbers his Choix de soixante Roses dédiées a la reine des Belges.

The many honors conferred upon Redout sufficiently evince his excellence. He was the instructor of many pupils, among whom were Maria Antoinette, Josephine, Hortense, Maria Louisa, the Duchess de Berri, the Queen of the French, Madame Adelaide, Madame Panckoucke, Mlle. Arson, Madame Chantereine, and others. Redout died in 1840. A number of his designs were published after his death, under the title of Bouquet Royal. The Belgian government erected a monumental fountain at St. Hubert, in 1846, in memory of this distinguished artist, surmounted by his bust.

REDOU, HENRY JOSEPH, a Belgian painter, the younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1766. He practised flower painting with his brother for several years, but afterwards devoted his talents to animal painting. He accompanied the expedition to Egypt, and was subsequently appointed painter to the Museum of Natural History. His designs are distinguished for their fidelity, and have been the means of enriching the science of Zoology.

REGGIO, LUCA DA. See FERRARI.

REGILLO, DA PORDENONE. See LICINIO.

REGNARD, VALERIAN, a French engraver, of whom little is known. He studied under Philip Thomassin at Rome, where he passed most of his life. He engraved some plates after various Italian masters, and some of the antique statues in the Giustiniani gallery. He was living in 1650.

REGNAULDIN, THOMAS, a French sculptor, born at Moulins in 1627. He studied under François Anguier, and gained considerable distinction in the reign of Louis XIV., who sent him to Rome, with a pension of one thousand crowns. His principal sculptures are those of Autumn, Faustina, and the three Nymphs in the Baths of Apollo, after the designs of Lebrun. In 1657 he was chosen a member of the academy, and presented his statue of St. John the Baptist, as his reception piece. In 1704 he made a marble statue of St. Catherine, for the church of that saint at Paris. According to French authority, his reputation seems to have surpassed his merit. He died in 1706.

REGNAULT, JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1754. When very young he manifested a strong inclination for art. He was taken by his parents to America, and afterwards entered the marine service without their knowledge, where he remained many years as a cabin boy; but during his wanderings, he constantly practised the art of design. At length, his mother, having lost her husband and her other children, returned to France, and used every endeavor to discover her long lost son. She was finally successful, and the young sailor artist was restored to his mother's arms. He soon devoted his attention to design, and attracted the notice of the painter Baudin, who took him to Rome. After studying in that city for some time with the greatest assiduity, he returned to Paris, and gained the grand prize in painting, for his splendid picture of Diogenes and Alexander. He then revisited Rome, with the royal pension, and passed his time in assiduous studies, until his second return to Paris. His picture of the Baptism of Christ, painted about this period, is highly praised for its fine coloring and masterly execution. In 1783, he was chosen an Academician, for his picture of the Education of Achilles. This work is treated in an elevated style, and has been engraved by Berwick. Regnault executed a large number of historical, poetical, and allegorical subjects, among which the most excellent, besides those already mentioned, are the Deluge, Jupiter carrying away Io, and the Descent from the Cross. The latter work is in the style of the Caracci, and is said to be not inferior to the same subject by Poussin. Regnault was a chevalier of the Order of St. Michael and of the Legion of Honor; he was also appointed Professor of Painting. He died at Paris in 1831. He left numerous studies, designs, and finished sketches illustrative of the works of Ovid and other poets.

REGNE, M., a French engraver, who flourished about 1760. Little is known of him. He engraved a few prints, among which are a set of plates of animals, neatly executed.

WRREICH, WENDEL, a German engraver and bookseller, who flourished at Strasburg in 1540. He executed some wooden Cuts, bearing the above monogram. Prof. Christ says he lived at Lyons about 1515, where he engraved and published several cuts marked as above.

REINAGLE, PHILIP, an English painter, born about 1750. He studied under Allan Ramsay, and painted portraits for a while, but afterwards turned his attention to animals, and panoramic views, with some success. His pictures of huntings, with spaniels, shaggy ponies, and dead game, were the best of the day in England. He also copied the works of Paul Potter, Karel du Jardin, Berghem, and Adrian vander Velde, with considerable success. He assisted Barker in his panoramas of Rome, Naples, Florence, Gibraltar, Paris and Algesiras Bay. He is best known by the "Sportsman's Cabinet," engraved by John Scott, representing all the dogs used in field sports, drawn from life. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1812, and died at London in 1834.

REINAGLE, RICHARD RAMSAY, was the son and scholar of the preceding. His life has not yet been written, but he acquired distinction as a painter of animals, and English sporting scenes.

REINAGLE, GEORGE PHILIP, was the son of Richard Ramsay R., born about 1800. He studied with his father, and early manifested great talents for marine painting. After copying pictures by the best Dutch marine painters, he accompanied the expedition to Navarino, for the express purpose of giving a representation of the expected action, which he did with great applause. He died in 1833, in the flower of life.

REINER, WENCESLAUS LAURENT, a German painter, born at Prague in 1686. After learning the rudiments of design from his father, a sculptor of little note, he entered the school of Peter Brandel. Aided by his instructions, with a diligent study of nature and the works of the best masters, he became an accomplished and distinguished artist. He was a universal painter, and wrought both in oil and fresco. He painted history, landscapes, animals, and battle pieces with great credit, and executed several works for the churches and convents at Vienna, Breslau, and in other places. His best works are his landscapes with cattle, and battle-pieces, executed in a style resembling that of Peter van Bloemen. His pictures are well designed and colored, his figures and animals correctly drawn, and touched with great freedom and spirit. His works are chiefly confined to his own country, and are to be found in the best collections. There were several of his choicest works in the gallery of Augustus, King of Poland, and others in the collection of the late Count Bruhl. He died in 1743.

REINOSO, DON ANTONIO GARCIA, a Spanish painter and architect, born at Cabra, in Andalusia, about 1623. He studied under Sebastiano Martinez, and executed a number of works in the churches—distinguished less for taste than facility of execution,—among which was a large painting in the vault of a chapel in the church of the Capuchins at Andujar, representing the Holy Trinity, with a number of the patriarchs, and below, St. Michael and St. George. At Linares, he painted a picture of Susanna at the Bath, in which the water was represented so truthfully as almost to produce illusion. As an architect, Reinoso erected various edifices, particularly at Andujar and Martos. He died at Cordova in 1677.

REINSPERGER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1711, and died in 1780. He studied under Liotard, and painted portraits, some of which he engraved nearly as large as life, in a coarse, heavy tasteless style. He practised some years at Vienna. Among his prints are the portraits of the Emperor Joseph II., the Archduke Leopold, and the Empress Dowager, Elizabeth Christiana.

REITER, REYTER, or REUTER, BARTHOLOMEW, a German painter and engraver, who flourished at Munich in the first part of the 17th century. He was a scholar of Hans Ostendorfer the Younger. It is said, traditionally, that he was one of the best painters of Munich in his time, and instructed many pupils. None of his pictures are mentioned, and not a single name of his pupils is recorded. Nagler gives the following list of his prints, variously signed, Reiter, Reitter, Reyter, Reytter, Reuter, and with his initials B. R., or B. R. and F. for fecit.

1. Christ holding the Globe in his right hand. 2. Christ seated, crowned with Thorns; Bartlme Reitter—Pictor inv. Monachy 1615. 3. Christ carrying his Cross, group of half-length figures; Georg Beham inv. Monachii. Bart. Reitter fec. 1610. 4. Christ exposed to the People; inscribed Ecce Homo, Bart. Reitter pictor figur. Monachy 1612 fec. 5. The Holy Family, with St. Francis or St. Jerome, half-figures, a copy after Palma, with both monograms. 6. St. Jerome sitting in a Cavern, half-figure, the lion on the left; signed Bart. Reytter pictor inv. et excud. There is an impression signed Bartholome Reuter. 7. A Nymph sitting on the lap of a Satyr, Cupid at their feet; Bart. Reiter, fec. Monachy 1610. 7. Venus holding a Mirror, and seated with Cupid under a Tree, half-figures; Georg Beham inv. B. Reyter fec. 1610. 9. Neptune on a Sea-Horse, holding his Trident; Georg Beham inv. Monachy, with Reiter's mark, and the date 1610. 10. A Child seated on a Skull and blowing Bubbles; B. R. F. Monachi Zimmerman Excud. 11—18. Eight prints, a series of naked Children in different positions; marked B. R.

REITZ, E., a Swedish engraver, who flourished at Stockholm about 1700, and engraved some plates of coins and architecture, for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna.

REM, MATTHEW, a German engraver, who flourished about 1635. According to Prof. Christ, he engraved the plates for a work entitled L'Architecture de Furtenbach. He usually marked his plates with the initials of his name, M. R.

REMBRANDT, VAN RHYN, PAUL, was one of the most eminent painters and engravers of the Dutch school. He was the son of a miller, and was born in 1606, at a small village on the banks of the Rhine, between Leyderdorp and Leyden, whence he was called Rembrandt van Rhyen, though his family name was Gerretz. It is said that his father, being in easy circumstances, intended him for one of the learned professions, but was induced by Rembrandt's passion for the art to allow him to follow his inclination. He entered the school of Jacob van Zwaanenberg at Amsterdam, where he continued three years, and made such surprising progress as astonished his instructor. Having learned from Zwaanenberg all he was capable of imparting, he next studied about six months with Peter Lastmann, and afterwards for a short time with Jacob Pinas, from whom it is said he acquired that taste for strong contrasts of light and shadow, for which his works are so remarkable. He was, however, more indebted for his best improvement to the vivacity of his own genius, and an attentive study of nature, than to any information he derived from his instructors. On returning home, he fitted up an attic room with a skylight, in his father's mill, for his studio, where he probably pursued his labors for several years, as he did not remove to Amsterdam till 1630. Here he studied the grotesque figure of the Dutch boor, or the rotund contour of the bar-maid of an alehouse, with as much precision as the great artists of Italy have imitated the Apollo Belvidere, or the Medicean Venus. He was exceedingly ignorant, and it is said that he could scarcely read. He was of a wayward and eccentric disposition, and sought for recreation among the lowest orders of the people, in the amusements of the alehouse, contracting habits which continued through life; even when in prosperous circumstances, he manifested no disposition to associate with more refined and intellectual society. It will readily be perceived that his habits, disposition, and studies could not conduct him to the noble conceptions of Raffaele, but rather to an exact imitation of the lowest order of nature, with which he delighted to be surrounded. The life of Rembrandt is much involved in fable, and in order to form a just estimate of his powers, it is necessary to take these things into consideration. It is said by some writers, that, had he studied the antique, he would have reached the very perfection of the art, but Nieuwenhuys, in his review of the Lives and Works of the most eminent painters of the Dutch and Flemish schools, in Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. xii. and supplement, says that he was by no means deficient on that point. "For it is known that he purchased, at a high price, casts from the antique marbles, paintings, drawings, and engravings by the most excellent Italian masters, to assist him in his studies, and which are mentioned in the inventory of his goods when seized for debt." He then goes on to give a list of the works so seized. Be this as it may, he certainly never derived any advantage from them. He had collected a great variety of old armor, sabres, flags, and fantastical vestments, ironically terming them his antiques, and frequently introducing them into his pictures.

Rembrandt had already brought both the arts of painting and engraving to very great perfection (in his own way), when a slight incident led him to fame and fortune. He was induced by a friend to take one of his choicest pictures to a picture-dealer at the Hague, who, being charmed with the performance, instantly gave him a hundred florins for it, and treated him with great respect. This occurrence served to convince the public of his merit, and contributed to make the artist sensible of his own abilities. In 1630 he went to Amsterdam, where he married a handsome peasant girl, (frequently copied in his works), and settled there for life. His paintings were soon in extraordinary demand, and his fame spread far and wide; pupils flocked to his studio, and he received for the instruction of each a hundred florins a year. He was so excessively avaricious that he soon abandoned his former careful and finished style, for a rapid execution; also frequently retouched the pictures of his best pupils, and sold them as his own. His deceits in dating several of his etchings at Venice, to make them more saleable, led some of his biographers to believe that he visited Italy, and resided at Venice in 1635 and 1636; but it has been satisfactorily proved that he never left Holland, though he constantly threatened to do so, in order to increase the sale of his works. As early as 1628, he applied himself zealously to etching, and soon acquired great perfection in the art. His etchings were esteemed as highly as his paintings, and he had recourse to several artifices to raise their price and increase their sales. For example, he sold impressions from the unfinished plates, then finished them, and after having used them, made some slight alterations, and thus sold the same works three or four times; producing what connoisseurs term variations in prints. By these practices, and his parsimonious manner of living, Rembrandt amassed a large fortune.

Though Rembrandt acquired a distinguished reputation for his historical works, he is more deserving of admiration as a painter of portraits. He was a perfect master of all that relates to coloring, distribution of light and shade, and management of the pencil; but he has no claims to the other great requisites of the true artist—correct taste, composition, grouping, dignified expression, design, perspective, and drapery. He drew, indeed, from the naked models, for which he used his scholars; but what sort of models they were, his works plainly show. In his composition and grouping, he followed common nature alone, and his momentary humor, which was often whimsical; in design he followed his model. He generally concealed the naked parts as much as possible, rarely allowing the hands or feet to be seen, because he was unable to draw them correctly, always making them too large or too small. In those works where he could not avoid naked figures, as in the Descent from the Cross, the Entombment, and several representations of Bathsheba in the Bath, his figures are entirely destitute of proportion, and it is only the magic tones and touch of his pencil that prevents these pictures from exciting disgust in every beholder of taste. Furthermore, he was the most outrageous violator of the proprieties of costume in the whole history of art, often introducing the Dutch dress of his time into subjects from ancient history. His drapery is fantastical, almost entirely destitute of taste, and sometimes ridiculous. His heads possess expression and character, but they have no dignity; his Christ is a man of the lowest class of the people, and his Marys are common women. On the other hand, the seductive simplicity of his arrangements, the glowing beauty of his coloring, the magic charm of his chiaro-scuro, almost conceal his gross imperfections; and it was these excellencies alone that gained him his great reputation, and even at the present day uphold the estimation of his works, which command such enormous prices. He was undoubtedly the greatest master of chiaro-scuro that the world has ever produced, and one of the greatest colorists; in the harmony of his tones no other painter, with perhaps the exception of Titian, has equalled him. Although his portraits are without dignity or embellishment, they exhibit so much nature and animation, such truth and force of coloring, that it is allowed he has never been surpassed in this particular branch. Many of his heads are finished so minutely as to show, on a close inspection, every imperfection in the original, as moles, wrinkles, and even the hairs of the beard; yet, at a proper distance, the whole has such an astonishing relief and effect that every portrait seems ready to start from the canvass. Thus a picture of his house-maid, placed at a window of his dwelling, is said to have deceived the passers-by for several days, who wondered that she was always looking out of the window.

Rembrandt had two methods of handling. In the early part of his life, until some time after he settled at Amsterdam, he finished his pictures almost as highly as Gerard Douw, but with a more spirited pencil and a richer tone of color; such are his Esther before Ahasuerus, the Woman taken in Adultery, St. Peter in the Boat, St. John preaching in the Wilderness, and others. He afterwards adopted a greater breadth of light and shadow, and a more commanding facility of execution; in his lights, he sometimes laid on his colors so unsparingly that they project far from the canvass, and thereby much increase the effect at a distance; it is said that he laid on his color with his stick, palette knife, or finger, according as they were capable of producing the desired effect. The invention of Rembrandt was very fertile, his imagination lively and active, and he designed and wrought with great facility. He always preferred a light from above, and had a small aperture made in the roof of his studio, by which alone his model was lighted. To this uniform method is ascribed the sameness in his coloring, which is always similar and somewhat monotonous. His paintings are numerous, and are dispersed in various public and private collections of Europe; and when they are offered for sale they command enormous prices. There are eight of his pictures in the English National Gallery; one of these, the Woman taken in Adultery, formerly in the Orleans collection, sold for £5000. In Smith's Catalogue raisonné is a description of six hundred and forty pictures by him, the public and private galleries and collections in which they were located at the time of the publication of the work, together with a copious list of his drawings and etchings, and much other interesting information. He left many studies, sketches, and drawings, executed in a charming style, which are now scarce and valuable.

Rembrandt holds a distinguished rank among the engravers of his country; he established a more important epoch in this art than any other master. He was indebted entirely to his own genius for the invention of a process which has thrown an indescribable charm over his plates. They are partly etched, frequently much assisted by the dry point, and occasionally, though rarely, finished with the graver; evincing the most extraordinary facility of hand, and displaying the most consummate knowledge of the effects of light and shadow. His free and playful point sports in picturesque disorder, producing the most surprising and enchanting effects, as if by accident; yet an examination will show that his motions are always regulated by a profound knowledge of the principles of light and shadow. His most admirable productions in both arts are his portraits, which are executed with unexampled expression and skill. For a full description of his numerous prints, the reader is referred to Bartsch's Peintre Graveur. The following is a list of his most esteemed and interesting prints. He died at Amsterdam in 1665, as is satisfactorily shown by Nieuwenhuys, though others say in 1674 and 1688.

PORTRAITS OF REMBRANDT, BY HIMSELF.

Rembrandt with his mouth open. 1630. The Busts of Rembrandt and his Wife. 1636. A Bust of Rembrandt; highly finished. 1638. His Portrait, with a Crayon in his hand. His Portrait, in a Persian habit. 1654. There are no less than twenty-seven portraits of Rembrandt by himself.

REMSDYKE, a Dutch painter and engraver, of whom little is known. He visited England, and was much employed by Dr. William Hunter, in drawing and engraving subjects of natural history and anatomy. In conjunction with his son, he published a volume of plates in 1778, etched from various works in the British Museum.

REMSHARD, CHARLES, a German engraver, born at Augsburg, according to Zani, in 1678, and died in 1755. He executed a few plates, and copied some prints of other masters, generally marked with his initials, C. R.

RENANTO, J., an engraver of little note, mentioned by Strutt as the artist of a wooden cut of the Wise Men's Offering, indifferently executed.

RENARD, J., a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1710. He executed a part of the plates for the collection of views of the palace and gardens at Versailles.

RENARD, SIMON DE ST. ANDRÉ, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1614. He studied under Louis Bobrun, and painted portraits with considerable success. He is said also to have engraved quite a number of plates, the principal of which are a set of forty-six after the works of Charles le Brun in the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre. He died at Paris in 1677. Dumesnil doubts whether he engraved the plates after le Brun, as they were not published till 1695, eighteen years after his death; he supposes that they were executed by an engraver of the same name, probably his son.

RENARD, JEAN AUGUSTIN, a French architect, born at Paris in 1744. He first studied painting under Hallé, but subsequently devoted himself to architecture, and acquired a knowledge of that art under the professor le Roi. In 1773 he gained the grand prize, and visited Rome with the royal pension. While busily occupied in designing the antique monuments of that city, he frequently encountered the Abbe de St. Non, who engaged him as a coadjutor in his famous Voyage pittoresque d'Italie, for which Renard made a number of excellent designs. On returning to Paris in 1784, he was appointed Inspector of the Royal Buildings, and the following year Inspector of the Quarries. In 1792 he was chosen a Royal Academician. Under the rule of Napoleon he held several appointments from government. Among his principal works were the grand stables erected by order of Louis XVI. at Sevres and St. Germain en Laie. His chief talent was in decoration, evinced in the Hotel d'Orsay, the Hotel de Benevent, at Paris, and the chateau de Valençay. Renard died in 1807.

RENESSE, C. A., a Dutch designer and engraver, of whom nothing is known, except by a few etchings which bear so strong a resemblance to those of Rembrandt, that they might easily be mistaken for the works of that master, were it not for the signature. Bartsch has admitted one into his Catalogue (tom. ii. p. 104. No. 18.) Nagler describes six etchings by him; Brulliot says there are eleven known; and that only one bears his monogram, composed of the initials C. A. R., which he supposes to be the artist's portrait, as it represents a man seated at a table holding a burin in his hand; they are dated from 1649 to 1661; most of the prints are marked with his monogram, accompanied by renesse. The Dutch writers mention a J. Renesse, and an A. C. Renesse, who painted landscapes and sea-pieces. The following are the prints described by Nagler:

A half-length figure of a Man seated at table, with the monogram. A Clergyman seated at a table, with books, &c., signed Renesse. A half-length figure of a young Man. Full-face Portrait of a young Man, with long hair escaping from under his cap; signed C. A. Renesse. 1651. Christ bearing his Cross. A Village Fair, with Mountebanks and a crowd of People.

R or CR RENI, GUIDO. This great painter was born at Bologna in 1575. He was the son of Samuel Reni, an eminent musician, who intended his son for the same profession, but manifesting an early and decided passion for art, he placed him in the school of Denis Calvart, where he made such rapid progress that his instructor, after slightly retouching his pictures, sold them for his own. Upon attaining his twentieth year, the great reputation of the Caracci induced him to enter their academy, and he was for some time the favorite disciple of Lodovico. He had already given proof of uncommon ability in several works for the Palazzo Bonfiglioli, when some of the works of Michael Angelo Caravaggio were brought to Bologna. The novelty of the style, and the violent contrast of his light and shadow, astonished and pleased the generality of people, both at Rome and Bologna, and Guido was induced to adopt for a time, his singular principles. The applause bestowed upon the false style of Caravaggio, was extremely mortifying to the Caracci. Lodovico, familiar with the graces of Correggio, was disgusted with the praises bestowed on productions divested of dignity and grandeur, whose chief attractions were confined to a striking, but unnatural contrast of light and shade. In a conference held by the Caracci on this subject, at which Guido was present, Annibale proposed, as a means of bringing the new style into disrepute, to adopt one of an opposite character. "To the crudeness and violence of his tones," said he, "I would oppose tenderness and suavity. Instead of darkness and obscurity, I would represent my figures in the open day. Far from avoiding the difficulties of the art under the disguise of powerful shadows, I would court them by displaying every part in the clearest light. For the vulgar nature which Caravaggio is content to imitate, I would substitute the most select forms." The principles inculcated by Annibale, made a profound impression on the mind of Guido, and induced him to adopt a course which eventually conducted him to immortal distinction. He soon proceeded to put these principles into practice, but he had no sooner exhibited some specimens, than he encountered the violent animosity of his fellow students; they upbraided him with his insolence in aspiring to singularity, and adopting a new system, and even Lodovico, who had heretofore treated him with marked kindness, spoke of his new productions with harshness and severity, and at length dismissed him from his academy. From a pupil, he thus made Guido a rival, and in order to humble him, bestowed his favor on Guercino, an artist of quite another taste. By some critics Guido is esteemed the great genius of the Bolognese school, and the Caracci found sufficient reason for their jealousy, in his uncommon talents, his elevated and ambitious mind that aspired to something great and original from the outset of his career. When Guido painted his picture of St. Benedetto in the Desert, for the cloister of S. Michele in Bosco, where were several of the finest works of Lodovico, the public, astonished at the dignity and beauty of his picture, declared that the master had found a rival in his scholar. To the praise of that eminent artist, it is said that, notwithstanding his previous severe conduct, he expressed his approval of Guido's performance.

Guido had not yet visited Rome, though his works were well known and highly esteemed in that capital. He was invited thither by Giuseppino Cesari, with the intention of producing a rivalry between him and Caravaggio. Besides his desire of seeing and studying the works of Raffaele and other great masters, he wished to visit Annibale Caracci, then engaged in decorating the Farnesian gallery, whose unkindness he had forgotten, and whose great talents he always highly respected. Albano, his friend and fellow pupil accompanied him. His first production at Rome was the Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, for the church of that saint. Such was the infatuation that prevailed at Rome in favor of the works of Caravaggio, that when the Cardinal Borghese gave him the commission to paint his celebrated picture of the Crucifixion of St. Peter, he expressly stipulated that it should be painted in the manner of that master. Without departing from his engagement, Guido exhibited in the composition and design a correctness, dignity and grandeur, far superior to Caravaggio. He now rose rapidly in public estimation, and received such flattering encouragement as produced many enemies, the most furious of whom was Caravaggio, but the most dangerous was Annibale Caracci, who blamed Albano for bringing him to Rome, depreciated his talents, and put Domenichino in competition with him. Even Albano became his bitter enemy, when he found that Guido was esteemed his superior. But he triumphed over all his adversaries, and was chosen by Paul V. to decorate the private chapel of the palace of Monte Cavallo with histories of the Virgin, which materially added to his reputation. But being disgusted with the Cardinal Spinola, the Pope's treasurer, on account of the price he was to receive for his works, he returned to Bologna, where he executed his famous picture of the Murder of the Innocents for the church of S. Domenico, and the Repentance of St. Peter, for the Casa Sampieri one of his most esteemed works. These distinguished performances increased his reputation. The Pope invited him back to Rome, received him in the most gracious manner, loaded him with favors, and commissioned him to decorate the chapel of S. Maria Maggiore. His most celebrated works in the palaces at Rome are, his fresco of the Aurora, in the Palazzo Rospigliosi, which has been admirably engraved by Raphael Morghen; his Fortune, in the Campidoglio; the Rape of Helen, in the Spada palace, and his Magdalen, in the Barberini collection. He was next invited to Naples to decorate the chapel of S. Gennaro. He had scarcely commenced operations when he was assailed by that desperate band, of which Bellisario and Spagnoletto were the head. Being warned that he must instantly quit Naples or prepare for death, he lost no time in returning to Bologna, where he resided during the remainder of his life, receiving so many commissions from all parts of Italy, that he was under the necessity of refusing many of them.

The following learned and admirable critique is extracted from Lanzi, somewhat condensed, but the sense strictly preserved. "The words of Annibale Caracci made a deep impression on the mind of Guido, nor was it long before he applied himself to the style thus indicated. Sweetness was his object; he sought it equally in design, in the touch of his pencil, and in his coloring; from that time he began to use white lead, a color avoided by Lodovico, and at the same time predicted the durability of his tints, such as they have proved. His fellow pupils were indignant at his presuming to depart from the method of the Caracci, and returning to the feeble, undecided manner of the past century. He did not pretend to be indifferent to their remarks or advice; he still preserved that strength of style so much aimed at by his school, while he softened it with more than its usual delicacy; and by degrees proceeding in the same direction, he attained in a few years, to that degree of delicacy he had proposed. For this reason, I have observed at Bologna, more than elsewhere, his first manner distinguished from his second, and it is made a question which of the two is preferable; nor do all agree with Malvasia, who pronounced the former the most pleasing, and the latter the most studied.

In these variations, however, he never lost sight of that exquisite ease which so much attracts us in his works. He was more particularly attentive to the correct form of beauty, especially in his youthful heads. Here, in the opinion of Mengs, he surpasses all others, and, according to Passeri's expression, 'he drew faces of Paradise.' Rome more richly abounds in them than Bologna itself. The Fortune in the Capitol, the Aurora in the Rospigliosi, the Helen in the Spada, the Herodias in the Corsini, the Magdalen in the Barberini, with other subjects in the possession of several princes, are regarded as the wonders of Guido's art. This power of beauty was, in the words of Albano, his most bitter and constant rival, 'the gift of nature,' though the whole was the result of his own intense study of natural beauty, of Raffaele, and the ancient medals, cameos, and statues. He declared that the Medicean Venus, and the Niobe, were his most favorite models; and it is seldom we do not recognize in his paintings either Niobe herself, or one of her children, though diversified in a variety of manners, with such exquisite grace, as in no way to appear borrowed. In the same way did Guido derive advantage from Raffaele, Correggio, Parmiggiano, and from his beloved Paul Veronese, from all whom he selected innumerable beauties, but with such happy freedom of hand, as to excite the envy of the Caracci. And in truth, this artist aimed less at copying beautiful countenances, than at forming for himself a certain general and abstract idea of beauty, as we know was done by the Greeks, and this he modulated and animated in his own style. When interrogated by one of his pupils, in what part of heaven, in what mould, he found these wondrous features, which he only drew, he pointed to the casts of the antiques, just alluded to, adding, 'you too may gather from such examples, beauties similar to those in my pictures, if your skill be equal to the task.' He took, moreover, for the model of one of his Magdalens, the vulgar head of a color grinder, but under his hand, every defect disappeared, each part became graceful, and the whole a miracle of art. Thus too, in his naked figures, he reduced them, whatever they were, to perfect form, more especially in the hands and feet, in which he is singular; and the same in his draperies, which he often drew from the prints of Albert Durer, enriching them, freed from their dryness, with those flowing folds, or that grandeur of disposition best adapted to the subject. To portraits themselves, while he preserved the forms and age of the originals, he gave a certain air of novelty and grace, such as we see in that of Sixtus V., in the Galli palace at Osimo, or that wonderful one of Cardinal Spada, in the possession of some of his descendants at Rome. There is no one action, position, or expression, at all injurious to his figures; the passion, grief, terror, sorrow, are all combined with the expression of beauty; he turns them every way as he lists; he changes them into every attitude, always equally pleasing, and every one equally entitled to the eulogy given him of displaying in every action and every step, the beauty which secretly animates it.

What most surprises us is the variety which he infuses into this beauty, resulting no less from the richness of his imagination, than from his studies. Still continuing to design in the academy up to the close of his career, he practised his invention how best to vary his idea of the beautiful, so as to free it from all monotony and satiety. He was fond of depicting his countenances with upraised looks, and used to say that he had an hundred different modes of thus representing them. He displayed equal varieties in his draperies, though invariably preferring to draw the folds ample, easy, and natural, and with a clear meaning as to the origin, progress, and disposition, nor did he throw less diversity into the ornaments of his youthful heads, disposing the tresses, whether loose, bound, or left in artful confusion, always differently, and sometimes casting over them a veil, fillet, or turban, so as to produce some fresh display of grace; nor were his heads of old men inferior in this respect, displaying the inequality of the skin, the flow of the beard, with the hair turned up as we see on every side, and animating the features with a few bold, decided touches, and few lights, so as to give great effect at a distance, altogether with a surprising degree of nature, specimens of which are to be seen in the Pitti Palace, the Barberini and Albano galleries; and yet these are among the least rare of this artist's productions. He bestowed similar attention to varying his flesh colors."

These commendations will only apply to the best works of Guido. His exalted faculties were degraded by a fatal passion for gaming, which, though his gains were great, kept him in continual indigence. Towards the close of his life, to gratify his passion, and to supply his necessities, he sent into the world numerous works, executed with such negligence and haste, as to be totally unworthy of his reputation, and he even slightly retouched the pictures of his pupils and sold them as his own. This gave his enemies an opportunity to depreciate his merits, which they did not fail to employ, accusing him of being deficient in invention, incorrect in design and perspective, disproportionate in his figures, and mannered in his style, the latter accusation being strenuously insisted upon by the implacable Albano. Occasionally such were his necessities, that he sent his pictures to sale before their completion. Yet, says Lanzi, these pictures are not excluded from royal cabinets; that of Turin possesses one of Marsyas, a finely finished figure, before which is seen standing little more than the sketch of an Apollo. Therefore to form a fair estimate of his powers, we are to judge by his best works, such as the Crucifixion of St. Peter at Rome, the Miracle of the Manna at Ravenna, the Conception at Forli, the Murder of the Innocents, and St. Peter and St. Paul, at Bologna, the Purification at Modena, and the Assumption at Genoa, placed directly opposite the St. Ignatius of Rubens, by which contrast it does not suffer in the least, together with many other grand works at Rome, Bologna, and other places.

Some writers attribute to Guido two manners, and others three, at different periods; the first comprises those pictures which resemble the manner of the Caracci, and particularly that of Caravaggio, marked by deep shades, narrow and powerful lights and strong coloring; in short, an effort after great effect, distinguished his works at this period. The second manner is completely opposite to the first, and has already been fully described; the third commences soon after his return from Naples to Bologna, when he began to work more for profit than for fame. It is distinguished by a general carelessness in design and execution, with a greenish gray coloring, altogether mannered.

Guido is generally regarded as the most distinguished disciple of the school of the Caracci, with the exception of Domenichino, and some even give him the preference. The Italians say of him that "grace and beauty dwelt upon his pencil to animate his figures." The distinguishing characteristics of his style are elegance and grace, a singular facility of execution, a free but delicate pencil, an exquisite touch, and great suavity and harmony of coloring. He particularly excelled in tender, pathetic, and devout subjects, in which he could manifest the sweetness and delicacy of his thoughts. In one of his letters to a friend, he expressed a wish "that he had had the wings of an angel, to have ascended into paradise, and there to have beheld the forms of the beatified spirits, that he might have copied them into his pictures." He possessed an extraordinary faculty of being able to express grief, sadness or terror, without detriment to the beauty of his heads. His Madonnas and Magdalens are distinguished by a noble simplicity peculiar to himself. The heads of his figures are accounted not inferior to those of Raffaele for correctness of design or engaging propriety of expression. De Piles says that "the great merit of Guido consisted in that moving and persuasive beauty which did not proceed so much from regularity of features, as from a lovely air he gave to the mouth, with a peculiar modesty, which he had the art to place in the eye." Guido instructed many pupils; he taught at Rome, and at Bologna, he opened a school, which, according to Crespi, was frequented by more than two hundred pupils. Even his rivals took advantage of it, as Domenichino, Albano, and Lanfranco, along with their best disciples, and Lanzi says it is an indisputable fact, that they derived from him that degree of delicacy in which they sometimes surpass the Caracci.

The works of Guido are numerous, and are to be found in all the principal collections in Italy, and throughout Europe; there are several in the English National gallery, but some of them are of doubtful authenticity, or if genuine, are among his poorest works. He was fond of amusing himself with the point, and we have a considerable number of his charming etchings, executed with great freedom and boldness, in the style of a perfect master. They exhibit the same beautiful expression in the heads and correctness in the extremities, which are so much admired in his pictures. Simone Cantarini, called Il Pesarese, imitated the etchings of Guido with such precision, as to mislead the inexperienced. Bartsch describes sixty-eight prints by him, marked with his monogram, or simply with his initials, G. R. He also modeled in clay, and is said to have executed several statues. Among those pupils who adhered most closely to his style, were Francesco Gessi, Giacomo Semenza, Guido Cagnacci, Simone Cantarini, Pietro Ricchi, Andrea Sirani, and Gio. Battista Bolognini. He died at Bologna in 1642.

RENOU, ANTOINE, a French painter, born at Paris in 1731. He studied successively under Pierre and Vien, and gained the second prize in painting. About 1760, he was invited to the court of Stanislaus, king of Poland, where he was appointed painter to the court, and also exercised his talents in the histrionic and poetic arts. At the death of his patron, he returned to Paris about 1766, where he gained considerable distinction for his picture of Christ disputing with the Doctors, exhibited in that year. In 1781, he was admitted into the Academy, upon the execution of his picture of Aurora, in the Apollo gallery of the Louvre. Among his other productions at Paris, were several well-arranged compositions, representing Agrippina with the ashes of Germanicus; the Annunciation, in the church of S. Germain en Laie; and a vault in the Hotel des Monnaies, or Mint. Renou wrote a tragedy entitled Tereus and Philomela, and translated Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, into French. He died in 1806.

RENOU, LOUISA, a French lady, was born at Paris in 1754. She engraved several plates after the modern artists of her own country, among which is one of Alexander and his Physician, after Colin de Vermont.

RENTER, BART. Mr. Strutt attributes to this artist a correct and spirited etching of Christ shown to the Jews by Pontius Pilate, inscribed Bart. Renter pictor figur. Monachii, 1612. There is a print of the same date, and nearly the same inscription, described among the works of Bartholomew Reiter, and it is highly probable that they are both one artist.

RENZI, CESARE, a reputable Italian painter, was a native of S. Ginesio, in the Picenum, and flourished about the middle of the 17th century. Lanzi says he studied under Guido, and became a respectable pupil of that master. Among other works, he executed a picture of St. Tommaso, at the church of that saint in his native town.

RESANI, ARCANGELO, a painter born at Rome in 1670. He studied under Gio. Battista Boncuore, and chiefly excelled in painting animals and huntings, decorated with large and small figures, in which, according to Lanzi, he had equal taste. His works were highly esteemed at Siena, Bologna, and Venice. His portrait is in the Medicean gallery at Florence, accompanied with a representation of still-life, in which he excelled. Resani died about 1740.

RESCHI, PANDOLFO. This painter was born at Dantzic, in Germany, in 1643. He went to Italy while young, entered the school of Jacopo Borgognone, and attained great distinction by his battle-pieces in the style of that master. He also painted landscapes in the style of Salvator Rosa, and excelled in architectural subjects. Lanzi mentions a picture by him of surprising merit, with a view of the Pitti palace, decorated with figures in a spirited style; and there are several of his works in the Florentine collections.

RESTOUT, JEAN, a French painter, born at Rouen in 1692. He studied at Paris under his uncle Jouvenet, whose style he followed with considerable success, and approached nearer to the merit of that master than any of the other artists of the time. He wrought with great facility, but with little true excellence; and his works are condemned even by French authority, as marking a most deplorable decadence of art in the French school. In 1720, he was chosen a member of the Academy, for his picture of Arethusa flying into the arms of Diana to escape from Alpheus. He passed through all the degrees of distinction in the Academy of Painting, until he was honored with the office of Chancellor. Among his principal works at Paris are, the Death of Ananias, and the Pool of Bethesda, in the church of S. Martin des Champs; and the ceiling of the Library of St. Genevieve. Restout died at Paris in 1768.

RETZSCH, FRIEDRICH AUGUST MORITZ, a German painter of the present century, was born at Dresden in 1779. Naturally of a roving and imaginative disposition, he spent his earlier years in the amusement of hunting and the contemplation of nature. About the age of twenty, however, he entered the Dresden academy, and acquired a knowledge of the art. He gained considerable distinction by his pictures illustrating the works of Goethe, Schiller, and Shakspeare, whose wild and luxuriant fancies were well adapted to his peculiar inclination. It is uncertain whether he is still living. His principal works have been engraved; among them are the following:

Sketches illustrative of Goethe's Faust. Illustrations of Schiller's Fight with the Dragon; Fridolin, or Walk to the Forge, Song of the Bell, Pegasus in the Yoke. Ditto to Bürger's Ballads. Outlines illustrative of Shakspeare's Macbeth, Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, Lear, Tempest, Othello, Merry Wives. Various Fancies and Truths, Faust and Margaret. The Goblet, the Chess-players, &c.

REVELEY, WILLIAM, an English architect, who flourished in the latter part of the 18th century, and studied under Sir William Chambers. He accompanied Mr. Stuart to Greece, and completed the great work commenced by that eminent artist upon the Athenian Antiquities, which he published in folio. Among the principal structures of Reveley, are the church of All Saints at Southampton. He died in 1799.

REUVEN, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1650. He studied at Antwerp, under Jacob Jordaens, but afterwards returned to Holland, and was much employed in decorating the halls of public and private edifices with historical and allegorical subjects. His pictures were distinguished for fertility of invention, freedom of pencilling, facility of execution, and a brilliancy of coloring equal to the best productions of the Flemish school. Among the principal, were the triumphal arches of the reception of William III., at the Hague; several pictures in the finest apartments of the palace at Loo; and an admirable composition in a ceiling of the mansion of M. de la Court Vandervoort. Reuven died in 1718.

REVELLO, GIO. BATTISTA, called IL MUSTACCHI, a reputable Genoese painter, was born in 1672. He studied under Antonio Haffner, and formed a close friendship with Francesco Costa. According to Ratti, they wrought in concert for nearly twenty years, and executed the landscape, architecture, ornaments, and other accessories in the backgrounds of the works of various historical painters. Lanzi says they are both equally commended for their knowledge of perspective, their grace, brilliancy, and harmony of tints; but Revello surpassed his companion in the embellishment of flowers. Their master-piece is said to be at Pegli, in the Palazzo Grillo, the decorations of a saloon and several chambers. Besides their works in concert, they also conducted many separately, "being considered the Colonna and Mitelli of their country." Revello died in 1732.

REVERDINO, CESARE, an Italian engraver, concerning whom there is considerable doubt. Zani says he wrought from 1531 to 1554; Bartsch mentions a print by him dated 1531, and Bryan another dated 1602. Bartsch describes thirty-nine of his prints, and Nagler eleven more, executed in a very neat style, closely resembling that of Æneas Vico, with figures poorly drawn. Le Comte says he engraved several obscene subjects, which have probably been destroyed. The following are among his principal plates:

Moses striking the Rock. The Wise Men's Offering. A small Frieze, representing a Bacchanalian subject; marked with his name. 1564. Venus coming to Vulcan for the Arms of Æneas; marked also with his name, and dated 1602.

REVETT, NICHOLAS, a distinguished English architect and designer, was born in the county of Suffolk, in 1721. In company with Stuart, he visited Rome in 1750, and studied design under Cav. Benefiali. The two artists subsequently continued their travels to Athens, Smyrna, Salonica, and the isles of the Archipelago. On returning to England, they commenced their valuable work upon the Athenian Antiquities, of which the last volume appeared in 1794. The whole contains 281 plates. In 1766, Revett started on a second expedition to Asia Minor, at the expense of the Dilettanti Society, in company with Dr. Chandler of Oxford, and Mr. Pars the designer and painter. After an absence of three years, the party returned to England with ample materials; and the publication of the Ionian Antiquities in two volumes, gave the public tangible evidence of their industry and skill. Besides his admirable drawings for the above mentioned works, Revett designed many edifices in England, among which is a church in the Grecian style at Ayot St. Lawrence, in the county of Hertz. He died at London, in 1804, aged 83.

REVOIL, PIERRE HENRI, a distinguished French painter of the present century, was born at Lyons in 1776. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was placed in the school of David, who was greatly pleased with his natural talents. The first work by Revoil that attracted public attention, was his grand allegorical composition, of the city of Lyons raised from its ruins by Gen. Bonaparte. He was afterwards commissioned to paint several sacred subjects in the church of S. Nizier at Lyons, and in 1809 was chosen professor of the School of Design in that city. In 1814, he exhibited two excellent pictures at the Louvre; in 1817 his simple and graceful picture of the Convalescence of Chev. Bayard, afterwards placed in the Luxembourg. His picture of Henry IV. playing with his children, drew a prize of 3000 francs, and was purchased by the Duke de Berri. In 1822, Revoil was chosen painter to the Dauphin and the Duchess de Berri; but the authorities of Lyons demanded the fulfilment of his duties as professor at the School of Design in that city, and he therefore returned thither. At the Revolution of 1830, he retired from Lyons for about three years, and executed his admired pictures of Charles V. at the Abbey of St. Juste, and Palamede de Forbin giving Provence to Louis XI. These were sent to Paris, and met with such admiration, that Revoil returned thither, and settled with an aged uncle, who had aided him in his youth. His success was proportioned to his expectations, and the court purchased some of his pictures for the palace at Versailles. Besides those already mentioned, he executed among others, a picture of Joan of Arc imprisoned at Rouen, purchased by the Count d'Artois; and Philip Augustus taking the Oriflamme at St. Denis, before his departure for the Holy Land. He died in 1842. His subjects were principally taken from the history of the Middle Ages, particularly of the days of chivalry. Revoil was a member of the Legion of Honor, and Correspondent of the Academy of Fine Arts.

REY, ANTONIO DEL, an excellent Spanish architect, who flourished about 1600, and studied under Giovanni de Herrera. He was employed to erect the college of Corpus Christi at Valencia, which is well proportioned, with a fine cupola. It has a court, ornamented with eighty-six columns, and a magnificent staircase.

REYN, JOHN DE, a distinguished Flemish painter, was born at Dunkirk in 1610. He visited Antwerp while young, and entered the school of Vandyck, where he made such rapid progress that the latter invited him to accompany him to England. He continued to assist Vandyck in his numerous works, until the death of that illustrious painter, in 1641, when he returned to Flanders, settled at Dunkirk, and received many commissions for portraits and historical works. His pictures are entirely in the style of Vandyck, exhibiting the same correctness of design, purity and delicacy of coloring, freedom and spirit of pencilling; distinguished for ingenious composition, masterly and effective lights and shadows. Doubtless many of the works and much of the reputation of Reyn are assigned to his great exemplar. Besides numerous admirable portraits in private collections, little inferior to those of Vandyck, there are by him in the church of S. Eloi at Dunkirk, the Death of the Four Royal Martyrs; in the church of the English convent, the Baptism of Totila; and the principal altar-piece in the parochial church of S. Martin, at Bergues St. Vinoux, near Dunkirk, representing Herodias bringing the Head of St. John to Herod. Reyn died in 1678.

REYNA, FRANCISCO DE, a Spanish painter, was born at Seville about 1635. He studied in the school of Francisco de Herrera the elder, where he made rapid progress, and exhibited a high degree of talent in a picture of the Blessed Spirits, for the church of All Saints; but he died in the flower of his age, in 1659, greatly regretted by the friends of art.

REYNOLDS, SIR JOSHUA, an eminent English painter, was born at Plympton, in Devonshire, in 1723. He was the son of the Rev. Samuel Reynolds, the teacher of the grammar school in that town, and was intended for the medical profession; but, as he manifested a strong inclination for art, and executed several excellent likenesses, his father was induced to send him to London for superior instruction than he could obtain in the country. Accordingly, at the age of seventeen, Reynolds commenced studying under Hudson, and made such rapid improvement in the course of two years, that his instructor gradually became jealous of his excellence, and finally rendered his situation so unpleasant that he returned to Devonshire in 1743. During a residence of three years in his native county, he practised portrait painting with reputation, and then settled at Plymouth Dock, where he was greatly encouraged, particularly by Lord Mount Edgecumbe, who also recommended him to the favorable notice of Captain, afterwards Lord Keppel. The latter, appointed to the Mediterranean station, invited Reynolds to accompany him thither; and the young artist gladly embraced this opportunity, which promised a sojourn in Italy. On arriving at Rome, he devoted himself with great assiduity to the study of the best works of art, particularly those of Raffaele and Michael Angelo; and he seems, from his own account, to have principally occupied his time in contemplating their peculiar excellencies, rather than in copying their productions. On leaving Rome, he visited various other Italian cities, passing two months at Florence, where he painted several portraits; and after a short stay in Venice, he returned to England in 1752, having been absent three years. He settled at London, where his talents before long attracted considerable attention, and his admired full-length portrait of his friend and patron, Admiral Keppel, elevated his reputation above that of any cotemporary English artist. He consequently soon gained a large share of the public patronage and esteem, and was for many years considered the head of the English school of painting. Deficient in fertility of invention and correctness of drawing, he produced few large historical works; but in portraits he deserves very high commendation for his admirable coloring, which, though inferior to the excellence of the Venetian and Flemish masters, with whom he is sometimes compared, is highly distinguished for vigor, purity, truth, and harmony. His chiaro-scuro is justly praised; the expression of his portraits is dignified and characteristic; and their interesting air of history, in the landscape, accessories, and general execution, adds greatly to their value. His portraits of children are greatly esteemed for their attractive air of innocence. The attainments of Reynolds were the result of indefatigable industry; if his pencil was deficient in spirit, on account of successive efforts to improve the drawing, he yet added to the vigor and harmony of his coloring by every successive repetition.

At the formation of the Royal Academy in 1768, Reynolds being justly esteemed at the head of his profession, was appointed to the office of President, and shortly afterwards received from the king the honor of knighthood. On the annual occasions, during the twenty-one years of his presidency, of distributing prizes to the successful competitors, he was accustomed to deliver a lecture relating to art; and, according to his biographer, the entire collection of his discourses contains "such a body of just criticism on an extremely difficult subject, clothed in such perspicuous, elegant, and nervous language, that it is no exaggerated panegyric to assert that it will last as long as the English tongue, and contribute, not less than the productions of his pencil, to render his name immortal." Reynolds also contributed to the advancement and firm establishment of the Academy, by practical as well as theoretical labors; and he sent two hundred and forty-four pictures to the various exhibitions. In 1780, he completed his design for the great window in the New College Chapel at Oxford, containing in the seven divisions of the lower part, emblematical figures, with appropriate attributes, of Temperance, Fortitude, Justice, Prudence, Faith, Hope, and Charity; in the upper part he represented the Nativity, with the light emanating from the body of the Infant. In 1781, Reynolds visited Holland and the Netherlands, to examine the productions of the best Dutch and Flemish masters, by which he is said to have improved his coloring. In 1782, Mason's translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting was published, with notes by Reynolds. In 1784, at the death of Ramsay, he was appointed principal painter to the king; and in that year he exhibited his picture of the Fortune-teller, and his celebrated portrait of Mrs. Siddons, as the Muse of Tragedy, now in the Grosvenor Gallery. About 1786, the Empress Catharine of Russia commissioned him to execute a subject of his own selection, and he chose the Infant Hercules, a picture highly praised for its excellent coloring and chiaro-scuro, for which the Empress sent him fifteen hundred guineas, and a gold box, with her picture set in diamonds. Several pictures for Boydell's magnificent Shakspeare Gallery were painted by Reynolds—the Death of Cardinal Beaufort, Macbeth with the Witches, in the Cauldron scene, and Puck, or Robin Goodfellow, from Midsummer Night's Dream. About 1789, he was obliged to relinquish practising the art, on account of weakened eyesight. In 1791, his health began to fail; his disease was ascertained to be an affection of the liver, and he died in the following year. His remains were deposited in the crypt of St. Paul's, near the tomb of Sir Christopher Wren. There are several pictures by Reynolds in the National Gallery, among which are the portrait of Gen. Elliot, and the Age of Innocence, formerly purchased by Mr. Vernon for 1520 guineas. In the collection of Sir Robert Peel there were, among others, the portraits of Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, and Admiral Keppel. Besides these, there are by him, in various collections, the portraits of Lady Charlotte Spencer, Charles J. Fox, the Earl and Countess of Bute, Dr. Beattie, Horace Walpole, Lady Montague, Sir Joseph Banks, Queen Charlotte, George III., and many other distinguished nobles and literati of the last century. He formed a splendid collection of works of art, which, after his death, brought at public sale about £17,000. The whole of his property amounted to about £80,000, the bulk of which he left to his niece, who married Lord Inchiquin, afterwards Marquis of Thomond. He never married, but his sister, Frances Reynolds, conducted his domestic affairs. She was an ingenious lady, painted miniatures in good style, and was esteemed by Dr. Johnson for her literary taste and acquirements. She died in 1807.

Sir Joshua Reynolds is called by his countrymen "the great founder of the British school of painting." If we are to believe some of his biographers, he was one of the greatest painters that ever lived. Burke says, in his eulogium, "in taste, in grace, in facility, in happy invention, and in the richness and harmony of coloring, he was equal to the greatest masters of the renowned ages; in portraits he went beyond them. * * * * In full affluence of foreign and domestic fame, admired by the expert in art and the learned in science; courted by the great, caressed by sovereign powers, and celebrated by distinguished poets, his native humility, modesty, and candor never forsook him, even on surprise or provocation; nor was the least degree of arrogance or assumption visible to the most scrutinizing eye, in any part of his conduct or discourse. His talents, of every kind, powerful from nature, and not meanly cultivated by letters, his social virtues in all the relations and habitudes of life, rendered him the centre of a very great and unparalleled variety of agreeable societies, which will be dissipated by his death. He had too much merit not to excite some jealousy, too much innocence to provoke any enmity." Dr. Johnson declared that he "should grieve to see Reynolds transfer to heroes and goddesses, to empty splendor and to airy fiction, that art which is now employed in diffusing friendship, in renewing tenderness, in quickening the affections of the absent, and continuing the presence of the dead." Such opinions, though emanating from men so distinguished in letters, can have little influence with connoisseurs. The following extract from the biography of Reynolds, in Rees' Cyclopedia, supposed to have been written by the late Prof. Thomas Phillips, R. A., is written with more knowledge and much candor, though few foreign critics will feel disposed to endorse the sentiments of the writer :

“It remains to speak of his style as an artist, which is precisely that denominated in his lectures the ornamental style, but which, beautiful and seducing as it undoubtedly is, cannot be recommended in so unreserved a degree as his industry both in study and practice: that which he characteristically terms his own uncertainty, both in design and execution, operates too frequently and too powerfully against its entire adoption. In the higher attainments of the art, coloring and chiaro-scuro were undoubtedly elements which he favored, and in which he moved uncontrolled. Drawing, as he himself candidly confessed, was the part of the art in which he was most defective; and from a desire perhaps to hide this defect, with an oversolicitude to produce a superabundant richness of effect, he was sometimes tempted to fritter his lights, and break up his composition, particularly if it happened to be large, into too many parts; yet, in general, his taste in lines and forms was at the same time grand and graceful, and the taste and skill with which he drew and set together the features of the human face, has never been surpassed by any artist. We would be understood to speak of his finest productions; of the ordinary class among them, we must allow that the marking favors of manner, and the substance is not always characteristic of flesh. In execution, though he wanted the firmness and breadth which appertain to the highest style of art, yet the spirit and sweetness of his touch were admirable, and would have been more remarkable had he been more a master of drawing; but not being able readily to determine his forms, he was obliged to go over and over the same part, till some of the vivacity of his handling was frequently lost; his labor, however, was never wholly so, for he added to the force and harmony of his pictures by these repetitions; and frequently attained graces by them which would otherwise perhaps have remained unknown. The numberless instances in which he is known to have borrowed thoughts, both in actions of figures and effect of color, seem to impeach his power of invention. But surely it could not proceed from want of a sufficient portion of that high and necessary quality, that he who produced so many novel combinations, adopted that short-hand path to composition. We see it exemplified in a superior degree in most of his principal productions; and particularly in his whole-length and half-length portraits, the arrangements of which are no less beautiful and interesting than new, and entirely his own. These are composed in a taste far surpassing all that had ever been done by his predecessors, uniting the grandeur, simplicity, and fulness of Titian, and the grace and nature of Vandyck, with the artful and attractive effects of Rembrandt. One quality he had, which no other painter that ever breathed shares with him in an equal degree,—fascination. The effect of his best pictures acts like a charm, and arrests the tasteful beholder with irresistible power. On the works of others we look with approbation, and sometimes with feelings of admiration and delight, or even with a sensation of awe; but in those of Reynolds there is generally an indescribable unity and amenity which act upon us with the most fascinating power, and rivet the attention with superior gratification. No real connoisseur can deny the existence of this quality in his pictures, but wherein it specifically dwells, it is not easy to discover or define. They are not labored to perfect imitation, indeed they stop very far short of that; yet they present a full image, with a degree of life and animation that has rarely been displayed upon canvass. It is a dangerous doctrine to advance, and may be abused; but, perhaps, this power may be in a great measure owing to his having painted less upon system than from feeling; and the latter governing the exercise of his pencil, not to the neglect of, but in a superior degree to the influence of, the former, necessarily imbued his works with a glow of nature, which, it will be allowed, attracts beyond the power of art. Whencesoever this fascination of which we speak proceeds, it must be acknowledged that no painter ever possessed it like Reynolds.”

“This is just and masterly criticism,” says Stanley, “as far as relates to the portraits by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and may be extended to his single figures in subjects of fancy, particularly of children; it applies also to the coloring and chiaro-scuro of many of those compositions by him that are classed as historical. But it would be contrary to truth to claim for his attempts at poetical and historical compositions an equality even with the great masters of the Italian and Flemish schools. The greater part of his productions in these departments are failures. His picture of the Nativity is commonplace, partly borrowed; and the introduction of his own portrait and that of Jarvis in their European costume, a puerile absurdity. The allegorical figures of the Christian Virtues are prose versions of classical symbols; his Ugolino, without dignity, exhibits only the outward effects of punishment on culprits of the common herd; his Head of a Banished Lord belongs to the inmate of a lunatic asylum; his Holy Family* in riposo (in the National Gallery) is an egregious plagiarism, vulgarized by the adoption of forms deficient in beauty, grace, and intellect. His Macbeth with the Witches, and his Death of Cardinal Beaufort, are wholly deficient in that grandeur and sublimity that such subjects should have displayed. Even in that noblest of his productions, the portrait of Mrs. Siddons as the Muse of Tragedy, the genius of mischief interfered. The attitude and the expression are admirable; but the introduction of the two attendants

* Charles Lamb is exceedingly severe upon this picture. “Here, for a Madonna, Sir Joshua has substituted a sleepy, insensible, unmotherly girl—one so little worthy to have been the mother of the Savior, that she seems to have neither heart nor feeling to entitle her to become a mother at all.” The coloring in this picture, though originally rich and glowing, is much injured in parts, and the harmony is entirely destroyed.

Mrs. Jameson says of the Infant Samuel in the National Gallery, “Call it a little boy saying his prayers, it is charming; but there is nothing here of the incipient prophet, nothing to bring before the imagination all that was grand, and supernatural, and tragic, in the incident it represents—the consecrated child waked from his innocent sleep in the dead of night by a divine voice, to be filled with a spirit beyond his own conceiving.” Again, of the Graces sacrificing to Hymen, “The composition of this picture is rather fantastical than poetical. It is difficult to know what to say of the young ladies who personate the Graces, in silk gowns and high head-dresses, and are sacrificing to Hymen in a Wood. The picture, however, is beautiful, and full of that ladylike grace and sentiment which Sir Joshua gave to his female portraits.”

with the dagger and bowl destroy the illusion ; and, instead of the exalted personification of the highest order of poesy, we behold the figure of Medea meditating murder. It is vain to close the eyes of our understanding to these defects in our most admired painter ; if we will not see them, others will ; and it is better, therefore, to acknowledge it at once, than to be taunted by foreigners for blind or ignorant partiality. The fame of Reynolds, as a painter, is established on his numerous superlative portraits, and his enchanting representations of the innocence, simplicity, and natural habits of unsophisticated children : in these he stands alone. Let us not, by claiming too much, weaken that title to superiority which is justly his due, nor enter into a contest in which we might show zeal and pugnacity, but must fail of victory."

Sir Joshua Reynolds was confessedly deficient in the first principles of art—academic knowledge and skill—which totally unfitted him, had his talents been ever so great, for the highest order of historical painting. He frequently said with regret, that "he could not draw." This was a part of artistic education that he had not had the means of acquiring, or had neglected till too late. He could therefore only paint from his model. How different the case with the great artists, with whom he has been ranked and compared ! Many of the great Italian masters were accustomed to study and to draw from the living model, not only in their youth, but all their days, like the skilful surgeon constantly practising dissection, "to keep his hand in." Before touching the brush to their canvass, they always prepared a cartoon of the same size as they intended the picture ; they first drew each figure separate and naked, then grouped and draped them. (See Raffaella.) This in art, is what plan and foundation are to the superstructure of an edifice. Again, his method of coloring is not to be commended. His palette, as given by Beechey in his Memoirs, is a curiosity of art. It might do well enough with his peculiar manner of handling, but would never answer in the hands of another. He was ignorant of chemistry, so much so that he sometimes employed mineral colors that reacted in a short time, also vegetable colors, and mixed with these various vehicles, as megilips, and different kinds of varnishes or glazes, so that he had the mortification of seeing some of his finest works change and lose all their harmony, or become checked with unsightly seams. He even anatomized several valuable pictures by Titian and other great colorists, to discover their peculiar methods of coloring—a practice which might be likened to the boy who cut open the bellows to find the wind. He lived to regret these experiments, and would never permit any of his students to practise them. These things are mentioned only to put others on their guard, for his system has been largely imitated, even in the United States. The true method for excellence and permanence in coloring, is to employ well prepared canvass, then to lay on a good heavy body color, and afterwards to employ only the best mineral colors which will not chemically react, giving the colors time to harden after laying on each successive coat, and above all to use no varnishes in the process, nor after the completion of the work, till it has sufficient age.

REYNOLDS, SAMUEL WILLIAM, a distinguished

English designer and engraver, was born in 1774. He studied under William Hodges, and attained considerable eminence for his plates in mezzotinto, as well as for his numerous sketches in oil, which are much esteemed. He engraved many portraits, historical, and fancy subjects, after pictures by modern artists, particularly those of Sir Joshua Reynolds, of whose works he engraved nearly three hundred. In 1826 he visited France, and executed several plates after Horace Vernet, Gericault, Delaroche, and others. He died in 1835. Among his principal plates are the portrait of Reginald Heber, bishop of Calcutta, after Owen ; Lady Ellis Agar, after Jackson ; the Chapeau de Paille, after Rubens ; the Visit of the Poor Relations, after Stephanoff ; the Lion and the Snake, the Vulture and the Lamb, and the Falconer, after Northcote ; the Fisherman's Dog, and the Setters, after Morland.

REYNOSO, DON ANTONIO GARCIA, a Spanish painter and architect, born at Cabra, in Andalusia, in 1623. He studied at Jaen, in the school of Sebastian Martinez, and gained considerable distinction by his pictures for the churches and private collections. Palomino mentions several of his works, particularly an altar-piece in the church of the Capuchins at Andujar, representing the Trinity with several saints. Reynoso also painted landscapes, and there are several of his pictures in the churches and private collections of Cordova. None of his architectural works are mentioned. He died at Cordova in 1677.

REYSSCHOOT, F. VAN, a Dutch engraver of whom little is known. He executed among other plates, several after Teniers, in a very neat and spirited manner.

RHELINGER, WELSER, a German wood engraver, mentioned by Papillon as the artist of one hundred and twenty prints, illustrating a German book entitled Patricium Stirpium Augustanarum Vindelicum. et earundem sodalitatibus insignia. The principal figures are all represented on horseback, in full armor, with their respective family arms inscribed on their shields.

RHODES, JOHN, an English landscape painter, born in 1810. His father was a reputable painter of Yorkshire, and gave lessons to his son, who early manifested a strong inclination for the art. His subjects were usually taken from scenes of rural life, and they possess much of the charm of nature. He chiefly resided at Leeds, but when about 30 years old, he went to London, where he met with some encouragement. His health, however, soon failed, and he was compelled to return to Leeds, where he died in 1843, at the age of 33.

RHOECUS, an old Greek sculptor, a native of Samos, who flourished about B. C. 776, in the time of Dipenos and Scyllis. He obtained great celebrity in that early age, for his sculptures in brass. His son Telectes, and his grandson Theodorus, were also celebrated for their skill in the art. According to Pausanias, their works in wood, metal, and ivory, were extant in the age in which he lived. See Theodorus.

RHOLUS. See THEODORUS.

RIBALTA, FRANCISCO, a distinguished Spanish historical painter, was born at Castellon de la Plana, in the kingdom of Valencia, in 1551. After acquiring the elements of design from an artist of Valencia, he visited Italy for improvement, and is said to have studied under Annibale Caracci. He studied the works of Raffaele, Sebastiano del Piombo and the Caracci, with great assiduity; and at the end of three years he returned to Spain so much improved, that his former instructor, who had previously refused him his daughter in marriage, now consented to the match. Ribalta soon acquired a high reputation, and executed many works for the churches and collections of Valencia, as well as for other parts of Spain. He made copies from the pictures of Sebastiano del Piombo, in the royal collection at Madrid, three of which are in the convent of the Carmelites in that city. Commissioned by the archbishop Don Juan de Ribera, Ribalta executed a picture of the Last Supper, for the grand altar of Corpus Christi, which was so greatly admired that Vincenzo Carducci visited Valencia on purpose to see it. His works are distinguished for admirable composition, excellent taste and elevation of design. There were two of his pictures in the Louvre, the Last Supper, and a picture of St. Peter; they were restored in 1815, and the former is now in the church of the Patriarch at Valencia, with many other of his works. In the chapel of the Magdalen college at Oxford, there is "a grand specimen" by Ribalta. He died at Valencia in 1628.

RIBALTA, JUAN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Valencia in 1597. He early manifested extraordinary abilities, and painted a picture of the Crucifixion, at the age of eighteen, which gave promise of great eminence. He also painted for Don Diego de Vich, about thirty portraits of eminent Valencians, and would probably have been a shining ornament to the Spanish school, had he not died young, in 1628. Many of his works are attributed to his father.

RIBAULT, J. F., a reputable French engraver, was born at Paris in 1767. He studied under Inghouf, and attained sufficient excellence to be employed on the Musée Napoleon, for which he engraved two plates, representing Paris and Cœnone, after Vanderwerf, and a Young Lady playing on the Guitar, after Metz. He also engraved several plates for the collections of Laurent and Robillard; portraits of Bernardin de St. Pierre, the poet Lebrun, and the Empress Maria Louisa; Marcus Sextus, after Guerin, and the Crowning of Thorns, after Titian. Ribault died in 1820.

RIBERA, JOSÉ, called IL SPAGNOLETTO, an eminent Spanish painter, born, according to authentic records cited by Bermudez, at Nativa, in the kingdom of Valencia, in 1588. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and entered the school of Francisco Ribalta. After several years' study under that master, he visited Italy for improvement about the age of sixteen, supporting himself by the exercise of his talents. Arriving at Naples in 1606, while Caravaggio was residing in that capital, Ribera was greatly pleased with the vigorous style of that distinguished artist. Favored with his advice and instructions, he made rapid progress, and was soon denominated Il Spagnoletto, as a mark of distinction. On leaving Caravaggio, Lanzi says he "visited Rome, Modena, and Parma, and saw the works of Raffaele, and Annibale Caracci in the former place, and the works of Correggio in the two latter cities, adopting in consequence a more graceful style, in which he persevered for a short time, but with little success, as there were others in Naples, who pursued with superior skill the same path. He returned therefore to the style of Caravaggio, which, for its truth, and strong contrast of light and shade, was much more calculated to please the general eye. In a short time he was appointed painter to the court, and subsequently became the arbiter of its taste." His careful studies enabled him to surpass Caravaggio in invention, selection, and design. His subjects were generally austere, representing anchorets, prophets, apostles; and frequently of the most revolting character, such as sanguinary executions, horrid punishments, and lingering torments; which he represented with startling fidelity, and admirable correctness of design, particularly in delineating the muscles. His works are very numerous in Italy, and many of them were sent by the Viceroy to Spain, among which is his Ixion on the Wheel, in the Buon Retiro at Madrid. Giordano highly praises his Deposition from the Cross, in the Certosini at Naples, as alone sufficient to form a great painter, and worthy to compete with the highest luminaries of the art. Ribera seems to have sometimes departed from his severe manner, and Lanzi praises his Martyrdom of St. Januarius, in the Royal chapel, as beautiful beyond his usual style, and almost in the manner of Titian. He also painted portraits, which were highly esteemed. Among his other best productions, are St. Jerome and St. Bruno, at the Trinità; and Democritus and Heraclitus, in the collection of Sig. Girolamo Durazzo. Ribera's drawings with chalk or the pen, are much esteemed by the collectors. He executed about twenty etchings, in a bold, free style, producing a fine effect, correctly drawn, and the extremities marked in a very masterly manner. When not inscribed with his name, they are generally marked with one of the following monograms. Ribera died at Naples in 1656.

RICAMATORE. See DA UDINE.

RICCA, or RICCO, BERNARDINO, an Italian painter, who flourished at Cremona about 1512. He executed, among other works, a Pietà, or Dead Christ, in the church of S. Pietro del Po at Cremona, which Lanzi says deserves commendation for the time.

RICCHI, PIETRO, called IL LUCCHESE, a painter of Lucca, born, according to Baldinucci, in 1606. After studying under Passignano, he went to Bologna, and is said by Orlandi and Baldinucci to have entered the school of Guido, after which he resided many years at Venice. Lanzi says he frequently imitated the forms of the latter master, adhering to the manner of Passignano in design and coloring, combined with the principles of Tintoretto and other eminent Venetian masters. He was distinguished for fertility of invention and great facility of execution, but Lanzi seems inclined to charge him with introducing the oily and obscure mode of coloring, practised at Venice by the Tenebrosi, and says "it is at least certain that, besides having made use of bad priming, he was in the habit of covering his canvass with oil whenever he applied his pencil, which has occasioned the loss of so many of his works, that once produced an excellent effect, but which are now either defaced or perished. This is the case with those that remained at Venice, Vicenza, Brescia, Padua, and Udine; some of which, indeed, are not greatly to be regretted, being the production of mere mechanical skill, and that not always executed correctly. A few, however, are conducted with more care, as in his St. Raimondo, at the Dominicans of Bergamo, and his Epiphany in the patriarchal church at Venice, both highly deserving of commendation, no less for the union of their colors, than for the taste displayed in their whole composition." Ricci practised the art in several cities of France, in the Milanese, and the Venetian states. There are many of his works at Udine, where he died, in 1675.

RICCHIEDO, MARCO. This painter was a native of Brescia, but the time when he lived is not recorded. There is a fine picture by him, representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in the church of that saint at Brescia.

RICCHINO, FRANCESCO, a Brescian painter, who flourished about 1568. Lanzi mentions him among the better disciples of Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto. His pictures evince an attempt to "extract improvement from the pictures, or at least from the engravings, of Titian." Among his best productions at Brescia, are several pictures in S. Pietro Oliveto.

RICCI, ANTONIO. See BARBALUNGA.

RICCI, CAMILLO, an eminent painter of Ferrara, born in 1580. He studied under Ippolito Scarsellino, and attained such excellence, according to Baruffaldi, that his master declared if Camillo had preceded him in the art, he would have chosen him as an instructor. Lanzi remarks, "the most skilful had difficulty to distinguish him from Scarsellino. His style is almost as tender and attractive as his master's, the union of his colors is even more equal, and has more repose; and he is principally distinguished by less freedom of hand, and by his less natural, and more minute folding." He manifested great fertility of invention in eighty-four pictures in the church of S. Niccolo, representing scenes in the life of that saint. There are many of his smaller pictures in the Palazzo Trotti, and Barotti mentions many admired works in the churches, among which are the pictures of St. Vincenzo and St. Margherita, in the cathedral; and the Annunciation, in S. Spirito. Ricci died at Ferrara in 1618.

RICCI, GIO. BATTISTA, called DA NOVARA, a painter born at Novara in 1545. He visited Rome at an early age, and studied under Raffaellino da Reggio, on leaving whom he was employed by Sixtus V. in the palace of St. John of Lateran, and in the Library of the Vatican. He was also appointed superintendent of decorations at the Quirinal palace, and according to Baglioni, was much employed in the pontificate of Clement VIII. Lanzi says that his works display great facility of pencil, beauty of forms, and attractive brilliancy and elegance; his style was that of Raffaele reduced to mannerism, and he promoted the prevailing effeminate taste. His works are very numerous in Rome; among them are the Visitation, the Ascension, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in S. Maria Maggiore; and the Consecration of St. John of Lateran, placed in that Basilica. Orlandi mentions Ricci as an engraver, but does not specify any of his works. He died in 1620.

RICCI, SEBASTIANO, a painter born at Belluno, in the Venetian State, in 1659. After acquiring an excellent knowledge of art from Federigo Cervelli at Venice, he accompanied that master to Milan, and studied also under Alessandro Magnasco, named Lissandrino. He afterwards visited Bologna, and was patronised by the Duke of Parma, who employed him at Piacenza, and enabled him to visit Rome for improvement. On the death of his patron he quitted Rome, and visited Florence, Modena, Parma, and other cities, leaving proofs of his ability. Invited to the court of Vienna, he was employed to decorate the imperial palace of Schoenbrunn; and on returning to Venice, he went to England in the reign of Queen Anne, at the suggestion of his nephew, Marco Ricci, who was then residing in London. He was much employed by the nobility, and painted, among other works, the hall and several ceilings of Burlington House, and the altar-piece of the chapel of Chelsea College. After a residence of ten years in England, he returned to Italy, because, as it is said, Sir James Thornhill was preferred to paint the cupola of St. Paul's.

Lanzi says, "he did not early acquire a good knowledge of design, but he afterwards succeeded in this object, which he cultivated with extreme assiduity in the academies, even in mature age. The forms of his figures are composed with beauty, dignity, and grace, like those of Paul Veronese; the attitudes are more than usually natural, prompt, and varied; and the composition appears to have been managed with truth and good sense. Although rapid in the handling, he did not, like many artists, abuse this quality; his figures are accurately designed, and appear starting from the canvass, most frequently colored with a very beautiful azure, in which they shine conspicuous over all. His works in fresco have generally preserved their tints, but his other works appear to have suffered; his coloring was originally pleasing and spirited, and he perfected it in Flanders."

Ricci, like Luca Giordano, attained great skill in imitating the eminent Italian masters; one of his Madonnas at Dresden was for some time attributed to Correggio; and his imitations of Paul Veronese would deceive the best judges. His mind was greatly enriched by his travels, and he frequently adopted fine imitations of various masters into his works; but Lanzi absolves him from the charge of plagiarism. Among his principal works are the Apostles adoring the Sacrament, in the church of S. Giustina at Padua, containing many points of resemblance to Correggio's dome at Parma; and his St. Gregorio, in S. Alessandro at Bergamo, reminding the careful observer of Guercino's picture of the same subject at Bologna. Ricci died at Venice in 1734.

RICCI, MARCO, was the nephew and scholar of the preceding, born at Belluno in 1680. He completed his studies at Rome, where he remained several years, designing the finest scenery and most remarkable ruins in the vicinity of that city. He was principally employed in painting landscapes, decorated with admirable architecture, which gained him great reputation. In 1710, he visited England, and was much employed by the nobility ; after which he traveled on the continent with his uncle Sebastiano R., and executed a number of works at Paris. He died at Venice in 1730, in which year were published in that city a set of twenty-one plates of landscapes with ruins, etched by him from his own designs.

RICCI, NATALE and UBALDO. These painters, natives of Fermo, are supposed by Lanzi to have studied under Lorenzino di Fermo before visiting Rome, where they entered the school of Carlo Maratti. They afterwards settled in their native place, and practised the art in the latter part of the 18th century. Ubaldo appears to have surpassed his companion ; he is highly praised for his picture of St. Felice, at the Capuchins in Fermo, although Lanzi says he did not often transcend the bounds of mediocrity.

RICCIARDELLI, GABRIELE, a reputable Neapolitan painter, who flourished at Naples, according to Dominici, in 1743. He studied under John Francis van Bloemen, called Orizzonte, and attained considerable distinction for his landscapes and marine views at the court of King Charles of Bourbon, where he was much employed.

RICCIARELLI, DANIELE, called DI VOLTERRA, an eminent Italian painter, born at Volterra in 1509. After studying successively under Gio. Antonio Razzi, and Baldassare Peruzzi, he visited Rome, and became the assistant of Pierino del Vaga in the Vatican, and in the Massimi chapel, in the church of La Trinità de Monti. The style of Michael Angelo was congenial to his taste, and he studied with great assiduity the works of that master, who greatly esteemed his talents, appointed him his substitute in the works at the Vatican, and brought him forward into public notice.—Daniele soon rose to distinction, and was commissioned by Agostino Chigi to execute several frescos in the Farnese palace, in which he was much assisted by the designs and advice of Buonarotti. In the Orsini chapel in the church of La Trinità de Monti, he painted in seven years a series of frescos representing the History of the Cross, in which he was also assisted by Buonarotti. The principal painting was the wonderful Deposition from the Cross, which Lanzi classes with the Transfiguration of Raffaele, and the St. Jerome of Domenichino. What higher praise could he give ? “ We seem to behold the mournful spectacle, and the Redeemer sinking with the natural relaxation of a dead body in descending ; the pious men engaged in various offices, and thrown in different and contrasted attitudes, appear assiduously occupied with the sacred remains, which they seem to venerate ; the mother of Jesus having fainted between the sorrowing women, the beloved disciple extends his arms and bends over her. There is a truth in the naked figures that seems perfect nature ; a coloring in the faces and the whole piece that exactly suits the subject, and is more determined than delicate ; a relief, a harmony, and, in a word, a skill that might do honor to the hand of Michael Angelo himself, had the picture been inscribed with his name.” Unfortunately for the art, this sublime production was unintentionally destroyed by the French, while attempting to remove it from the wall ; but some idea of it may be gathered from the fine print of Dorigny. Volterra also designed the Assumption of the Virgin and the Presentation in the Temple, painted by his scholars Michele Alberti and Gio. Paolo Rossetti, in another chapel of the same church. His last great work in painting was his famous picture of the Murder of the Innocents, from his own design, for the church of S. Peter at Volterra, which was subsequently purchased by the Archduke Leopold, and placed in the Tribune of the Royal Florentine Gallery—“ an honor,” says Lanzi, “ that speaks more for it than my eulogy.” At the death of Pierino del Vaga, in 1547, he was appointed by Paul III., at the recommendation of Buonarotti, to superintend the works in the Vatican. Naturally slow and irresolute, he did not complete anything in the course of two years, and was compelled to remove his scaffolding in 1549, at the death of the pope, to accommodate the college of cardinals. The unfinished work did not meet with public approval, and Volterra was removed from his employment by Julius III. He subsequently devoted his attention to sculpture. Under the pontificate of Paul IV., however, he was induced to add draperies to some of the nude figures in Michael Angelo’s Last Judgment, which that pontiff considered as too freely treated for the sanctity of the Sistine chapel. He died in 1566.

RICCIO, DOMENICO, called BRUSASORCI, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Verona in 1494. According to Ridolfi, he studied under Gio. Francesco Carotto ; but Lanzi ranks him among the pupils of Niccolo Giolfino. After completing his preparatory course, he visited Venice, and studied with great assiduity the works of Giorgione and Titian. According to Lanzi, he exhibited the style of the latter with great accuracy in a few of his pictures, particularly in the St. Rocco at the Padri Agostiniani at Verona, and several pictures of Nymphs and Venuses for private collections. Unlike many other followers of that great colorist, he did not confine himself to his style ; and his works at Mantua partake of the depth of Giorgione, and the graceful design of Parmiggiano. In the Ducal Palace remains his Fable of Phaëton, which, though injured by the lapse of time, is greatly admired for its copious and ingenious composition, masterly foreshortening, and harmonious coloring. His greatest merit, however, was in fresco painting, and he executed many admirable works for the villas and palaces, displaying great poetical erudition, and a high order of pictorial talent. Among his historical works, the masterpiece is the Procession of Clement VIII. and Charles V. through Bologna, in the Casa Ridolfi. Lanzi remarks, “ a nobler specimen cannot well be imagined ; and although other specimens, both of this and similar subjects, are met with generally at Rome and Florence, none produce equal effect ; combining in one piece a large concourse, fine distribution of figures, noble attitudes in the men and horses ; variety of costume, pomp, splendor, and dignity ; all bearing an expression of pleasure adapted to such a day.” Riccio died in 1567.

RICCIO, FELICE, called BRUSASORCI THE YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Verona, according to Ridolfi, in 1540. Losing his father when seventeen years of age, he completed his studies under Jacopo Ligozzi at Florence. On returning to Verona, he introduced a style extremely elegant and refined, as displayed in his Madonnas, with boys and beautiful cherubs, adorning various collections; and with features similar to those of Veronese, if not a little more spare. He also excelled in subjects requiring vigorous treatment; evinced by his picture of the Forge of Vulcan with the Cyclops, in the collection of Count Gazzola, which is designed in good Florentine taste, and powerfully colored. The churches of Verona possess many of Riccio's works, among which his St. Elena, in the church of that name, is greatly admired. His genius was inferior to that of his father, and he produced no fresco works; but some of his large pictures in oil are highly meritorious, particularly the Fall of Manna, in S. Giorgio at Verona. He also painted excellent portraits; and Lanzi mentions a number of his small pictures of sacred and other subjects, executed on stone or marble, which he colored with great skill, availing himself of the shades in the marble itself. Felice Riccio died in 1605. His sister Cecilia studied painting under her father, and attained considerable excellence in portraits.

RICCIO, GIO. BATTISTA, called also BRUSASORCI, was the brother of the preceding. He studied under Paul Veronese, and painted a number of pictures for Verona, which were highly esteemed. He subsequently visited Vienna, and manifested sufficient abilities to be appointed painter to the Emperor. Nothing further is recorded of him, except that he remained in the Emperor's service during the rest of his life.

RICCIO, MARIANO, a painter of Messina, born, according to Hackert, in 1510. He first studied under Alfonso Franco, but preferring the style of Polidoro da Caravaggio, he entered the school established by that master in Messina. He imitated his style so successfully that Hackert says his works pass for those of his instructor; but Lanzi remarks, "I think this can only apply to inexperienced purchasers, since if there be a painter, whose style it is almost impossible to imitate to deception, it is Polidoro da Caravaggio. In proof, the comparison may be made in Messina itself, where the Pietà of Polidoro, and the Madonna della Carità of Mariano, are placed near each other." Antonello, the son of Mariano, studied also under Caravaggio, and followed his style with considerable success. He flourished at Messina about 1576.

RICCIO, IL. See BARTOLOMEO NERONI.

RICCIOLINI, NICCOLO and MICHAEL ANGELO. These two artists were born at Rome respectively in 1637 and 1654. They both executed a number of works for the churches of Rome. Lanzi says that the first had the reputation of a better designer than the second, and competed with Cav. Franceschini in the cartoons painted for several mosaics in the Vatican church. The second executed, among other works, several paintings in S. Lorenzo in Piscibus, and a ceiling in S. Maria in Campitelli. He died at Rome in 1715. Their portraits, painted by themselves, are in the Florentine Gallery.

RICHARDSON, JONATHAN, an English portrait painter, was born about 1665. He was articulated to a scrivener at an early age, but his master dying when six years of his apprenticeship had expired, he determined to gratify his natural inclinations, and commenced studying painting under John Riley. After remaining four years with that artist, Richardson established himself as a portrait painter, married the niece of his instructor, and succeeded in gaining a good share of public patronage. During the lives of his cotemporaries, Kneller and Dahl, he was considerably employed; and, after their death, he was esteemed at the head of his profession in England. According to Walpole, his heads were distinguished for vigor and boldness of coloring, freedom and firmness of execution; but his pictures were destitute of imagination, his attitudes, draperies, and backgrounds were totally devoid of taste. He wrote three works relating to art, containing much excellent advice to artists, which he never reduced to practice. These were "The Theory of Painting"; "The Connoisseur"; and "An Account of some of the Statues, Bas-Reliefs, Drawings, and Pictures in Italy, &c., with remarks by Mr. Richardson, senior and junior. His son visited Italy, and wrote many notes, letters, and observations, from which, after his return, they prepared the last mentioned work for the press. Richardson retired from the practice of his profession long before his death, which occurred in 1745. There are a few etchings by him, among which are a portrait of himself, two portraits of Alex. Pope, one of Milton, and one of Dr. Mead.

RICHARDUS, MARTIN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1591, and died there in 1636. He is said to have painted landscapes in a good style.

RICHART, F. J. DE LA MARE, a French engraver of little note, born at Bayeux about 1630, and died at Versailles in 1718. He executed, among other plates, one of St. Jerome, after L. de la Hire; two plates of the Ecce Homo and the Virgin, the former inscribed F. de la Mare. fec. 1650; and sixteen fancy heads, mentioned by Dumesnil, in the style of Lievens, without marks.

RICHER, P., an engraver mentioned by Nagler, who flourished from 1630 to 1660, and executed, among other works, eleven plates of philosophical tables by Louis Lesclaches.

RICHER, LIGIER, a French sculptor, a native of Dagonville in Lorraine, who flourished during the 16th century. He visited Paris, and acquired a knowledge of sculpture; after which he returned to his native place, and practised the art with considerable reputation. His most distinguished work is a marble figure of the Holy Sepulchre, with thirteen statues surrounding it; which is now in the parish church of the town of St. Mihiel.

RICHIERI, ANTONIO, a Ferrarese painter of mediocre abilities, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. According to Passeri, he studied under Giovanni Lanfranco, and afterwards accompanied that master to Naples and Rome, where he painted at the Teatini from his designs. Passeri says he afterwards devoted himself to engraving, and executed several plates from the designs of his instructor. Strutt miscalls him A. Richer.

RICHMANS. See RYCKMANS.

RICHOMME, JOSEPH THEODORE, an eminent French engraver of the present century, was born at Paris in 1785. He acquired an excellent knowledge of design under Regnault the painter, and subsequently studied engraving under J. J. Coigny.

In 1806, he gained the grand prize at the Institute for the best engraving, and was subsequently chosen a member of that body, and of the Legion of Honor. Stanley classes his plates with those of the best modern Italian engravers. It is not ascertained whether he is still living. Among others, there are by him the following :

The Triumph of Galatea; after Raffaele. The Five Saints; do. The Holy Family; do. Adam and Eve; do. Neptune and Amphitrite; after Giulio Romano. Venus at the Bath; after the Antique. Andromache; after Guerin. Thetis crowning Vasco de Gama; after Gerard.

RICHTER, CHRISTIAN, was a Swedish painter, and visited England in 1702, where he painted portraits, both in oil and in miniature, adopting the forcible coloring of Michael Dahl. Towards the latter part of his career he applied himself to enamelling, but died before making much progress in that branch, in 1732.

RICKE, BERNARD DE. This painter was born at Courtray about 1520. His instructor is not mentioned; but he painted history in his native place with a high degree of reputation, and afterwards settled at Antwerp, where he was chosen a member of the Academy in 1561. In the church of S. Martin at Courtray, there are two pictures by Rieke, representing the Decollation of St. Matthew, and Christ bearing his Cross; the latter is highly esteemed.

RICKMAN, THOMAS, a distinguished English architect, born at Maidenhead, in 1776. He was intended for the medical profession, which he pursued for some time, but subsequently entered into commercial pursuits, and afterwards engaged as clerk in an insurance office at Liverpool. Having abundance of leisure in the latter occupation, he devoted his attention to the study of architecture, and examined the ancient edifices with great diligence, pursuing his inquiries without the aid of an instructor. He made many excellent designs, and carefully noted the slighter peculiarities, which had escaped less discerning eyes. He also attempted original plans, and when Parliament granted £1,000,000 to erect new churches, Rickman sent in a design, which was accepted. He then determined to devote himself entirely to architecture, and removed to Birmingham. Possessing no practical knowledge of the art, he engaged Mr. Henry Hutchinson as assistant in all his matters of business, and after the death of the latter in 1830, he entered into partnership with Mr. Hussey. As a writer on the art, he was highly esteemed, and gained great celebrity by his "Attempt to discriminate the styles of Architecture in England." This production was originally written for "Smith's Panorama of Science and Art," but was subsequently much extended and improved as a separate publication, and has become a standard work, quite indispensable to the student. Its publication opened his way to an extensive practice, and procured him patronage in the most influential quarters. Rickman probably erected a larger number of churches than any other English architect. Among his other edifices are the new court and buildings of St. John's College, the restorations at Rose Castle, and the palace of the Bishop of Carlisle. He died in 1843.

RICO, ANDREAS, an ancient painter, a native of the island of Candia, who probably flourished about the middle of the 14th century. There is a Madonna in the Florentine Gallery, inscribed in Latin characters, Andreas Rico de Candia pinxit. Notwithstanding the rudeness of the composition, drapery, &c., this ancient work is still distinguished by such fresh, vivid, and brilliant coloring, that Lanzi says, "there is no modern work that would not lose by a comparison; the coloring is so extremely strong and firm, that, when tried with the iron, it does not liquefy, but rather scales off, and breaks in minute portions." He further remarks, "the Greeks were undoubtedly in possession of the best methods transmitted to them by a tradition, which, though in some measure corrupted, was confessedly derived from their ancestors." This opinion of a highly eminent and candid connoisseur may perhaps excite modern artists to investigate more closely the ancient methods of coloring, which were undoubtedly far more durable than those at present in use.

RIDINGER, or RIEDINGER, JOHN ELIAS, a German painter and engraver of animals, was born at Ulm in 1695; died at Augsburg in 1769. He studied under Christian Resch, and subsequently settled at Augsburg. His animals are designed with admirable correctness, and his pictures possess considerable merit of execution. As an engraver, he was much employed by the booksellers, and executed many plates of animals, which have seldom been surpassed; the compositions are ingenious and animated, and each animal is drawn in its peculiar character and attitude, with surprising exactness. His two sons, Martin Elias and John James, were also engravers; the former was distinguished for his talents in delineating insects. Among the principal plates of John Elias R., are the following :

A set of twelve plates of the Creation. A set of Heads of Wolves and Foxes. Four plates of Boar huntings. A set of sixteen plates representing the mode of hunting different animals in Germany, with inscriptions in German and French. Eighteen plates of Horsemanship. Thirteen plates of various Wild Beasts. A Lion-hunting; after Rubens; for the Dresden Gallery.

RIDOLFI, CLAUDIO, a painter born at Verona in 1560. According to Cav. Carlo Ridolfi, he was of noble birth, and first studied for amusement under Dario Pozzo, in his native place; but being afterwards compelled by necessity to practise the art, he became the scholar of Paolo Veronese, and the rival of the Bassans. Not finding much employment at Venice, he removed to Rome, and afterwards to Urbino, where he formed an intimacy with Federigo Baroccio, then in high reputation. Aided by the advice and instruction of that master, he acquired an amenity of style, and a beauty in the airs of his heads, by which his subsequent works are distinguished. Ridolfi married at Urbino, and afterwards settled at Corinaldo, in the Marquisate of Ancona, where he painted many pictures for the churches of that place and its vicinity, which, according to Lanzi, "yield little in tone to the best colorists of his native school, and are often conducted with a design, a sobriety, and a delicacy, sufficient to excite their envy." His portraits, also, are distinguished for their dignity, character, and accurate resemblance. There are many of his works at Urbino, among which are his highly esteemed pictures of the Birth of St. John the Baptist, in S. Lucia; and the Presentation in the Temple, in S. Spirito Santo. At Rimini, Lanzi mentions by him a fine Deposition from the Cross; there are also some of his works at Venice, Verona, and Padua; in the celebrated church of S. Giustina, in the last city, is his admirable picture representing the honors rendered to the Benedictine order, distinguished for appropriate invention, rich ornaments, elegant and well finished execution. He died in 1644.

RIDOLFI, CAV. CARLO, a distinguished Italian painter and writer on the art, born at Vicenza, according to Orlandi, in 1602. He studied under Antonio Vassilacchi, called Aliense, and subsequently gained great improvement from the works of the best masters at Verona and Vicenza. He afterwards distinguished himself at Venice, and painted, among other works, the Visitation of the Virgin, in the church of the Ognissanti, "exhibiting," says Lanzi, "some novelty in the adaptation of the colors, a fine relief, and exactness in every part." There are also other specimens by him in the churches of Venice and the State, but most of his works were executed for private collections, consisting of portraits, half-length figures, and historical pieces. As a writer on art, Ridolfi deserves high commendation, and Lanzi ranks him among the best Italian biographers. His Lives of the Venetian Painters were published at Venice in 1648, entitled Le Maraviglie dell' arte, ovvero le Vite degli illustri pittori Veneti, e dello Stato. Orlandi says he died about 1660; Boschini mentions him as among the living authors, in 1660; Zanetti records his epitaph, placing his death in 1658, at the age of 64.

RIDOLFO, MICHELE DI, called GHIRLANDAIO, was a distinguished Florentine painter, and flourished about 1550. According to Vasari, he studied successively under Lorenzo Credi and Gio. Antonio Sogliani; after which he entered the school of Ridolfo di Domenico Ghirlandaio, assumed the name of that master, and was treated by him rather as a son than a companion. They painted many pictures in concert, which always pass under their names, among which is the St. Anne of Città di Castello, commended by Lanzi for its exquisite design, and peculiar fullness of coloring. Michele paid particular attention to coloring, and manifested his excellence in various fresco paintings over several gates of Florence; he was also employed by Vasari as the companion of his labors. His friend and coadjutor died in 1560, after which Michele is mentioned as operating in 1568.

RIDOLFO, PIETRO DI, a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1612, and is supposed to have studied under the last of the Ghirlandai. Lanzi says there is a large altar-piece at Florence by him, representing the Ascension. Strutt notices an engraver of this name, who flourished from 1710 to 1723, and executed, among other plates, a frontispiece to a collection of views in ancient and modern Rome, published at Venice in 1716, in a style resembling that of Cornelius Bloemaert, though very inferior.

RIEDEL, JOHN ANTHONY, a German designer and engraver, born at Prague in 1732, and died, according to Nagler, in 1816. He was appointed Keeper of the Dresden Gallery, and engraved, in the style of Rembrandt, several plates from the pictures in that celebrated collection. Nagler enumerates fifty-two, among which are the following; the latest is dated 1772.

The Virgin and infant Christ; after Baroccio. The Seven Sacraments; after Gio. Maria Crespi. A portrait of Rembrandt; after a picture by himself. A Warrior, with a cap and feather; do. A Portrait of a Lady holding a Letter; after Vandyck.

RIETER, HENRY, a Swiss landscape painter, born at Winterthur in 1751. He early manifested an inclination for art, and studied under a painter of his native place, but afterwards visited Dresden, and completed his professional education under Graf. He gained considerable improvement from the works in the Dresden Gallery, particularly the landscapes of Claude, Berghem, and Ruysdael. In 1775 he visited Holland; and two years after, he commenced practising at Berne. About this time, Aberli was prosecuting his work on the landscapes of Switzerland, and he engaged Rieter to accompany him in his excursions. The latter made many excellent designs of Swiss scenery, and in 1786, after the death of Aberli, he continued the publication of the work. He was appointed Professor of Design in the public school at Berne, and held that office for thirty-seven years. His landscapes possess considerable merit, particularly those of a wild and romantic character, such as his Cascade of Reichenbach, which has been engraved. He died in 1818, leaving several sons, one of whom continued the publication of the above mentioned work.

RIETSCHOOF, JOHN KLAASZ, a Dutch marine painter, was born at Hoorn in 1652. He studied under Ludolf Backhuysen, and attained great distinction for his admirable sea-pieces and storms, so much in the style of his instructor that they are sometimes mistaken for the works of Backhuysen. His calms possess considerable merit, with some resemblance to the works of Wm. Vandervelde; but his hurricanes and tempests are represented with the most impressive fidelity. Many of his pictures have been purchased for the private collections of England, and they are highly prized both there and in Holland. Rietschoof died in 1719. His son and scholar, Henry R., was born at Hoorn in 1678, and painted similar subjects, which, though unequal to the works of his father, possess sufficient merit to find a place in the Dutch collections. He also copied the works of Backhuysen with great exactness, and his works are probably mostly attributed to that master or to the elder Rietschoof.

RIGAUD, HYACINTHE, an eminent French portrait painter, surnamed the French Vandyck, was born at Perpignan in 1659. He acquired the elements of design from his father, Matthias Rigaud; but the latter dying while he was very young, he was placed under a portrait painter at Montpellier, where he continued till his eighteenth year, and then settled at Lyons. Notwithstanding the ample encouragement he received in that city, he was determined to attain greater excellence. In 1681 he visited Paris, to study historical painting in the Academy, and in the following year he obtained the grand prize, which entitled him to the royal pension. Instead of proceeding to Italy, however, he decided to accept the advice of Charles le Brun, and confine himself to portrait painting. Adopting the admirable style of Vandyck, he attained great excellence, and was very extensively patronized by Louis XIV., whose portrait he frequently painted; also by the French nobility, and many illustrious foreigners. His heads are full of character and expression, his touch is bold and free, and his coloring more chaste than usual among French artists. Unfortunately for the beauty of his portraits, they are mostly represented with enormous perukes and preposterous habiliments; but this was rather the fault of the times than the artist. In 1700, Rigaud was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, and presented, as the reception piece, his admirable portrait of Desjardins.— Among his few historical works are a picture of St. Andrew, in the hall of the Academy; and a Nativity, engraved by Drevet. Many of his portraits have also been engraved by the best French artists, among which are those of Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, by Drevet; and his own portrait, by Gerard Edelinck. Rigaud was honored with the Order of St. Michael; was appointed a professor, and afterwards director of the French Academy. He died in 1743.

RIGAUD, JEAN, a French painter and engraver of landscapes and views, was born at Paris about 1700. He engraved many plates from his own designs, in a spirited and masterly style, with figures neatly and correctly drawn. Several of his etchings represent views in the vicinity of London, wherefore he is supposed to have visited England. Nagler says he died in 1754, and gives a long list of his plates, among which are the following. His son, Jean Baptiste R., engraved a view of the Bourbon palace, after a design by his father.

A pair of Views of Marseilles, at the time of the plague in 1720. A set of six Views of the Chateau and Gardens of Marly. The Garden of the Tuileries. A View of the Chateau of the Luxembourg. A View of Hampton Court. St. James' Park. Greenwich Park. Greenwich Hospital. A set of six Landscapes with figures. A set of six Views in France, with rural amusements.

RIGAUD, JOHN FRANCIS. This historical painter was probably of French origin. He visited England in the latter part of the last century, and practised the art there for a number of years. He painted a number of pictures for Boydell's Shakspeare Gallery; also several subjects of a sacred character, and subjects from the history of England. He was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, and presented his picture of Samson breaking his Bonds, in a style partaking more of the French than the English school. The reputation of Rigaud has been considerably diffused through many engravings of his pictures, and by his translation of Leonardo da Vinci's Treatise on Painting, illustrated with copper plates. His death is supposed to have happened in 1810.

RIGHETTI, MARIO, a painter born at Bologna about 1590, who studied under Lucio Massari. There are several of his works in the Bolognese churches, among which are the Nativity in S. Lucia, and Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene in S. Giacomo Maggiore.

RILEY, JOHN, an English portrait painter, born at London in 1646. He studied under Isaac Fuller and Gerard Zoust. Walpole considers him as one of the best English artists, but being very diffident of his own abilities, he was little noticed until after the death of Lely. He painted the portraits of Charles II., James II. and his Queen; also those of William and Mary, who appointed him their court painter. Several of his works, according to Bryan, would have done credit to either Lely or Kneller, particularly his portrait of Lord Keeper North at Wroxton. He died in 1691.

RILEY, CHARLES REUBEN, an English painter, was born at London about 1752. He studied under J. H. Mortimer, and drew the gold medal at the Academy in 1778, for his picture of the Sacrifice of Iphigenia. At the recommendation of his instructor, he was employed by the Duke of Richmond in the decorations at Goodwood; and subsequently embellished the mansion of Mr. Conelly, in Ireland. During the remainder of his life, he was principally occupied in making designs for the booksellers, evincing considerable fancy, taste, and ability. Riley died in 1798.

RIMINALDI, ORAZIO, an eminent painter, born at Pisa in 1598. After studying under Aurelio Lomi in his native place, he visited Rome, and entered the school of Orazio Lomi, called Gentileschi. During a residence of several years at Rome, he studied with great assiduity the antique and the productions of the great masters, and on returning to Pisa, became distinguished as one of the most promising artists of his time. He did not imitate either of the Lomi, but followed at first the style of Caravaggio, and afterwards adopted that of Domenichino, "to rival whom," says Lanzi, "he seems to have been intended by nature. From the time that the art of painting revived in Pisa, that city had not perhaps so eminent a painter, nor have many better been born on the banks of the Arno, a soil so propitious to the arts. Grand in contour and in drapery, after the manner of the Caracci, pleasing and agreeable in his carnations, full, free, and delicate in the management of his pencil, he would have been faultless, had not the wretched style of engraving raised prejudices against him." Among his principal works in the churches of Pisa, are two in the Cathedral, representing the Brazen Serpent, and Sampson destroying the Philistines, forming a perfect study to gain a knowledge of that epoch of painting. His Martyrdom of St. Cecilia is now in the Florentine Gallery. Lanzi says his last work, the Assumption, painted in oil, is one of the best conceived and most perfect works that Tuscany has ever beheld. Unfortunately for the art, Riminaldi was carried off by the plague, according to Morrona, in 1631; his Assumption was feebly completed by his brother Girolamo, and sold at 5000 crowns. Had this artist lived longer, it involves no great hazard to assert that he would have been a second Zampieri.

RIMINALDI, GIROLAMO, was the brother of the preceding, and flourished at Pisa about 1630. He gained considerable distinction in his time, and was invited to Naples, where he executed some works in the chapel of S. Gennaro. According to Morrona, he afterwards visited Paris at the request of Marie de Medicis, and was employed by the French court. There are a few of his works in the collections of Pisa and other places.

RIMINALDI, DOMENICO, an Italian sculptor in wood, was born at Pisa in 1595. He gained considerable distinction for his admired works in the Cathedral of Pisa, among which was a bas-relief of the grand altar, representing the Coronation of the Virgin, afterwards placed in a chapel of the Campo Santo. He died at Pisa in 1637.

RIMINI, BARTOLOMEO DA. See CODA.

RIMINI, LATTANZIO DA. See DELLA MARCA.

RINALDO, SANTO, called IL TROMBA (the Trumpet), was a reputable Florentine painter, and flourished from about 1640 to 1660. He studied under Francesco Furini, and painted landscapes and battle pieces.

RINCON, ANTONIO DEL, a Spanish painter, born at Guadalaxara, in 1446. He is termed the founder of the Spanish school. He studied at Rome, and on returning to Spain was appointed painter to the court of Ferdinand and Isabella. Many of his works perished in the destructive conflagration of the Prado, in 1608; the principal that remain are two portraits of his royal patrons Ferdinand and Isabella, in the church of San Juan de los Reyes at Toledo; and an altar-piece in the church of Robledo de Chabela, a small town in the archbishopric of Toledo. Rincon was appointed groom of the king's chamber, and a knight of the order of Santiago. He died in 1500.

RING, PETER DE, a Dutch painter of still-life, who flourished about 1650. His name is not mentioned by the writers of his country, but there is an admired picture by him in the Museum at Amsterdam, representing a table covered with blue velvet, upon which are various kinds of fruit, and shell-fish. His works are generally marked with a ring, probably in allusion to his name; several were taken to England a number of years ago, and are supposed to have been attributed to John David de Heem.

RRINGGLI, GOTHARD, a reputable Swiss painter, born at Zurich, according to Füessli, in 1575. Little is known of the circumstances of his life, and his instructor is not mentioned. He was employed by the magistrates of Berne to paint several large pictures relating to the national history, such as the Foundation of the city of Berne, and the Arms of the Republic, sustained by allegorical figures of Religion and Liberty. Füessli praises them for ingenuity of composition, correctness of design, vigorous and beautiful execution. Among the other excellent works of Ringgli are his pictures of Christ at the Tomb, Susanna in the Bath, and Faith preserved from the Storms of Persecution. Nagler and Brulliot mention about twelve etchings by this artist, from his own designs, in a bold, free style, marked with a monogram composed of the letters G. R., or G. Ringly u Zurich, fecit, 1628. He died in 1635.

RIOJA, DOMENICO DE LA, a reputable Spanish sculptor, who flourished at Madrid about 1645, under the reign of Philip IV. Among other works he executed a statue of St. Peter, for a church of that city; and several bronze statues for the Octagon Saloon of the royal palace. He died about 1656.

RIPOSO, FELICE. See FICHERELLI.

RISTORO, F., was an old Florentine painter and architect, who flourished in the 13th century, and erected, in concert with F. Sisto, the grand bridges of the Carraja and the Holy Trinity, in 1264. Baldinucci says their pictures resemble those of Arnolfo, and proceeds to class them among the scholars of that master; but Lanzi thinks it more probable that Arnolfo, and even Cimabue, imitated them.

RISUENO, JOSÉ, a reputable Spanish painter and sculptor, was born at Granada about 1640. He studied both arts under Alonso Cano, and attained considerable reputation. He painted a number of pictures in the churches of his native city, distinguished for their good taste of design, soft and harmonious coloring. His largest painting is in the cupola of the Carthusians, where he wrought in concert with his eulogist, Antonio Palomino. There are also many of his sculptures in the churches of Granada, in the style of Alonso Cano. Risueno died at Granada in 1721.

RITCHIE, JOHN, a Scottish sculptor, was born at Musselburg in 1810. He was the brother of the distinguished sculptor Alexander Ritchie, who studied at Rome, under Thorwaldsen, and is now an Associate of the Royal Scottish Academy. He acquired a good knowledge of the art in his native country, and produced a number of works, which evince considerable skill and inventive genius. His statue of Sir Walter Scott, at Glasgow, is a work of uncommon merit; and his group from "The Deluge," exhibited at Edinburg in 1832, received much approbation. Upon the arrival of his brother Alexander from Rome, John Ritchie entered his studio as an assistant, and wrought with him for many years. At length Mr. Davidson of London, having seen Ritchie's model of "The Deluge," commissioned him to execute it in marble, whereupon he started for Italy, in order to prosecute his work with every advantage. Unfortunately, he died soon after his arrival, in the autumn of 1850.

RITRATTI, SANTINO DA'. See VANDI.

RITUS, MICHAEL, an obscure engraver, who lived about the middle of the 17th century, and executed, among other works, a plate of the Virgin and Infant, after Annibale Caracci. 1647.

RIVALZ, JEAN PIERRE, a French painter, born at Bastide d'Anjou in 1625. He had a strong inclination for art, and learned design from a monk, named Ambroise Fredeau, who had been a scholar of Simon Vouet. He afterwards visited Rome for improvement; and according to the Biographie Universelle, he attained such excellence, particularly in perspective and architecture, that Poussin employed him to assist him in some of his works. On returning to France, he settled at Toulouse, and was appointed painter to the city. He executed many works which compared favorably with contemporaneous productions of the French school; but they were nearly all destroyed in 1793. Rivalz instructed a number of scholars, among whom was la Fage. He died in 1706.

RIVALZ, ANTOINE, a distinguished French painter, the son of J. P. Rivalz, was born at Toulouse in 1667. After acquiring from his father the elements of design, he visited Paris for improvement, and afterwards went to Rome, where he studied the works of the great masters with assiduity, and succeeded in drawing the prize at the Academy of St. Luke, for his picture of the Fall of the Rebel Angels. On returning to Toulouse, he established himself in that city, and practised the art with reputation for many years. Inferior to his father in beauty of coloring, he surpassed him in fertility of invention and correctness of design; he also possessed an extraordinary talent for copying the productions of the great Italian masters. Rivalz was very active, both in words and deeds, in founding and establishing the Academy of Painting, in his native city, where most of his works are to be found. He died in 1735. There are by him a great number of drawings, executed in a very free style, resembling that of Raymond de la Fage; also a few spirited etchings, among which are the following: The Martyrdom of St. Symphorianus. An Allegorical subject of Vice driven away by Truth, as the enemy of the Arts and Sciences; in memory of N. Poussin. Four plates of Allegorical subjects for a treatise on Painting, by Dupuy du Grez.

RIVALZ, JEAN PIERRE, a French painter and engraver, was the son of Antoine P. After acquiring a knowledge of design in his own country, he visited Italy for improvement, and remained there eleven years. The Pope made him a knight of the Order of the Golden Spur. On returning to France he settled at Toulouse, and gained considerable reputation. Among his principal works in that city, are those at the Chartreuse, and at the hotel of the Grand Prior of Malta. He established a school of painting and engraving, and published a collection of prints in folio, engraved by his scholars, of a number of antiques, in his own possession. In 1770, he published a work entitled Analyse des ouvrages de peinture, sculpture, etc., qui sont dans l'hotel de ville de Toulouse, 8 vo. Rivalz died in 1785.

RIVALZ, BARTHOLOMEW, a French engraver, was the nephew and pupil of Antoine R., born at Toulouse in 1724. He executed a number of spirited etchings, among which are the following: The Fall of the Rebel Angels; after Ant. Rivalz. Judith and Holofernes, do.; Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, do.; The Death of Mary Magdalene, after Benedetto Luti.

RIVAROLA, ALFONSO, called IL CHENDA, a distinguished Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in 1607. He studied under Carlo Bononi, and became his most distinguished disciple. At the death of that master he was proposed by Guido Reni, to complete the Marriage of the Virgin, sketched by Bononi, for the church of S. Maria in Vado at Ferrara. Rivarola also painted a number of excellent works for the churches, which are highly esteemed; among them is his Baptism of St. Agostino, in the church dedicated to that saint, "exhibited," says Lanzi, "in a temple of noble architecture, in a style of foreshortening that displays a master"; also the Resurrection, at the Teatini; and the Brazen Serpent, in S. Niccolo. There are a few of his works in the private collections of Ferrara, but he seems to have aimed rather at popular admiration, and was frequently employed as architect and painter for arranging tournaments and other public festivals. Rivarola died at the premature age of thirty-three, in 1640.

RIVE, PETER LOUIS, a reputable Swiss portrait painter, born at Geneva in 1753. He studied under Chevalier Fassin, and afterwards visited Italy for improvement. He traveled through Switzerland and Savoy, making many designs of the most romantic scenery, which were of great use in his subsequent productions. His works were much esteemed, and are scattered over Germany, Russia, and England. Among the principal is a grand landscape, of a warm and vigorous coloring, presented by Rive to the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts at Geneva; and a splendid View of Mont Blanc, in the Cabinet of Prince Galitzin, at St. Petersburg.

RIVELLO. See MORETTO.

RIVERDITI, MARC' ANTONIO, a painter born at Alessandria della Paglia, who studied at Bologna, according to Lanzi, and flourished in that city, in the latter half of the 18th century.—He painted portraits with considerable success, and Lanzi commends his subjects of history for their clear, chaste style, and freedom from mannerism. He frequently imitated the style of Guido, particularly in his Conception, in the Padri Camaldolesi. He died, according to Lanzi and Zani, in 1774.

RIVIERA, FRANCESCO, a French painter, who visited Italy, and flourished at Leghorn during the first half of the 18th century. According to Lanzi, he was much esteemed for his talents in painting conversations and Turkish ballets for the private collections. Having been extensively employed in painting portraits for the foreign nobility of Florence, his name must be well known in England and France, although not mentioned in the English dictionaries. There is a portrait of Riviera, executed by himself, in the Florentine gallery. He died at Leghorn about 1750.

RIVOLA, GIUSEPPE, a Milanese painter, born in 1740, was a scholar of Filippo Abbiati. He painted much for the private collections, and, according to Lanzi, was esteemed by his fellow citizens among the best pupils of his instructor.

RIZI, FRANCISCO. This artist, the son of Antonio Rizi, a Bolognese painter, who had accompanied Federigo Zuccaro to Spain, was born at Madrid in 1608. He studied under Vincenzio Carducci, and early manifested great natural talents; but being allowed to indulge his abundant imagination, he neglected academic study, and soon fell into a dangerous facility of execution. His brilliant, though superficial talents, gained the approval of the public; Rizi was appointed painter to the cathedral of Toledo, and in 1656, court painter to Philip IV.; he was also continued in that office by Charles II., who added to it the honor of deputy Keeper of the royal Keys. There are many of his works in the palaces, churches, and cathedrals of Spain, which sufficiently evince that he contributed materially to the downfall of art in that country. His last design, probably his best, was a sketch for the esteemed altar-piece in the sacristy of the Escorial, completed after the death of Rizi, by his disciple Coello. He died in 1685.

RIZI, FRAY JUAN, the brother of the preceding, was born at Madrid in 1595. He surpassed his brother in correctness of design, and the conduct of the chiaro-scuro. In the latter part of his life, he went to Rome, and was appointed an archbishop by Clement X., in 1675, but died before entering upon his office. There are a number of his principal works in the Benedictine monastery of S. Martin at Madrid. During the peninsular wars, a painting representing St. Benedict celebrating mass, was removed to Paris, and placed in the Louvre; but it was restored in 1815.

RIZZO, MARCO LUCIANO, an eminent Venetian artist in mosaic. This art was commenced in Italy by the Greeks as early as the eleventh century, and was subsequently continued by the Ital-ans. Its gradual improvement may be traced by the invaluable specimens preserved in the church of S. Mark at Venice, first the antique, and afterwards the antique modern style. Finally, according to Lanzi, the art was completely reformed about 1517, by Marco Luciano Rizzo, and Vincenzo Bianchini, under whom, and the two Zuccati, it attained such perfection, that Vasari says "it could not be possible to effect more with colors." See Bianchini.

RÒ, GIOVANNI. See JOHN ROTTENHAMER.

ROBART, a Dutch painter who flourished during the last century, and is said to have been a scholar of John van Huysum. He painted fruit, flowers, dead game, and landscapes. His works are probably attributed to some more eminent painter.

ROBARTO, GIO. STEFANO, a painter born at Savona, in the Genoese state, in 1649. He studied at Rome under Carlo Maratti, and subsequently matured his genius by visiting other schools of Italy. After a visit in Germany, he returned to his native place, and executed a number of excellent works, which excited the unqualified praise of the Genoese professors, especially for their beautiful coloring. Unfortunately for the cause of art, he degraded his noble talents by a fatal passion for gaming, and produced many inferior works at a trifling price, so that, according to Lanzi, it may be said that Savona had not a better nor a worse painter than Robatto. One of his best frescos is in the cloister of the Capuchins, representing St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. He died in 1733.

ROBBIA, LUCA DELLA, a Florentine sculptor, who flourished about 1450. It is very probable that he was a scholar of Lorenzo Ghiberti, as he seems to have executed a part of the bas-reliefs on the famous gates of the Florentine Baptistery. Together with his brother Agostino, and his nephew Andrea, he gained considerable reputation for his enamelled sculptures in terra cotta. At San Miniato, near Florence, there is a bas-relief by Luca, representing the Virgin and Infant; and the Hospital of the Innocents at Florence, are several figures of children by Andrea, in demi-relief, commended by Vasari.

ROBERT, NICOLAS, a French painter, was born at Orleans in 1610. He gained considerable distinction for his miniature pictures of animals, insects, and plants, and was employed by Gaston, Duke of Orleans, to paint the most curious beasts and birds in the royal menagerie. These miniatures are still preserved in the royal library at Paris; there are also by him several etchings of similar subjects, and a set of six plates of vases, after the designs of Charmeton. Robert died in 1684.

ROBERT, A., a French engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He studied under J. C. le Blond, and is chiefly known for a number of good prints, colored according to the system of his instructor, by printing with four plates.

ROBERT, HUBERT, a reputable French painter, was born at Paris in 1733. After acquiring the elements of design in his native city, he visited Rome for improvement, and studied in the French Academy, then under the direction of Carlo Natoire. During a residence of several years at Rome, he made many accurate designs of architectural monuments in that city; he afterwards returned to Paris, and was principally employed in painting architectural and perspective views. Many of them represent scenes in the vicinity of Rome, which were highly esteemed, combining the styles of Gio. Paolo Pannini and Joseph Vernet. Robert was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, and was twice invited to St. Petersburg by the Empress Catherine II., in 1782 and 1791. There are by him several spirited etchings, among which is a set of ten architectural landscapes, entitled Les Soirées de Rome. He died in 1808.

ROBERT, NICOLAS, a French painter, who visited the court of Savoy at Chambéry, and was employed, according to Lanzi, by the Duke (Philipbert I.), from 1473 to 1477. His works have either perished, or remain unknown; and Lanzi thinks it probable that he was a miniature painter, or illuminator of manuscripts.

ROBERT, PAUL PONCE ANTOINE, a French painter, born at Sery en Porcien, in Champagne, in 1686. He studied under Pierre Jacques Cazes, and afterwards in Italy. On returning to Paris, he painted an altar-piece for the church of the Capuchins, representing the Martyrdom of St. Fidele, which is his principal work as a painter, and gained him a pension from Cardinal de Rohan. Robert etched several plates from the chiaro-scuro by Nicolas le Sueur, for the Crozat collection, which are described in the Manual of Huber and Rost. He died at Paris in 1733.

ROBERT, LOUIS LEOPOLD, a painter of the French school, was born in the Canton of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, in 1794. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was taken by the engraver Charles Girardet to Paris, where he entered the school of David, and made excellent progress in painting. He also studied engraving under Girardet, and in 1814 gained the second prize for a fine copper plate. He made strenuous exertions to gain the grand prize in painting; but the congress of Vienna having transferred to Prussia in 1815, his native province Neuchâtel, he was declared a foreigner, and excluded from competition in the Academy. The banishment of his friend and instructor David, at the Restoration, induced Robert to leave France, and he accordingly returned to his native province, where he painted portraits for about a year and a half, and was then offered a pension to enable him to go to Rome, by M. de Mezerac. During his residence in Italy, he prosecuted his studies with the greatest energy and assiduity. The Roman government having captured a large number of bandits, with their wives and children, Robert frequently visited the prison, and made many faithful studies to illustrate their wild and romantic mode of life. In 1828, he returned and settled in his native place. Several of his pictures were sent to the Louvre, and were greatly admired; such as his Corinne singing on Cape Misenum, exhibited in 1822, under the title of L'Improvisateur Napolitain, and highly praised for its simplicity, grandeur, and varied expression in the figures. His Fête of the Madonna dell' Arco, and his Return of the Harvesters, are also much commended; the latter has been engraved. Robert was of melancholy temperament, and finally put an end to his life, in 1835.

ROBERTELLI, AURELIO, a painter who flourished at Savona, in the Genoese state, in the latter part of the 15th century. Lanzi mentions a picture of the Virgin by him, painted on a column of the old cathedral and subsequently transferred to the new one, where it excites the particular veneration of the people.

ROBERTS, JAMES, an English engraver, was born in Devonshire in 1725, and executed several plates of landscapes and views from the pictures of Richard Wilson, George Barret, Smith of Chichester, and others.

ROBERTSON, GEORGE, an English painter, was born at London about 1742. After acquiring the elements of design in Mr. Shipley's drawing school, he visited Italy for improvement, and produced several landscapes of considerable merit. He subsequently made a voyage to Jamaica, and designed several views in that island, some of which were exhibited in the Academy in 1775. Meeting with little encouragement in landscape painting, he adopted the profession of a drawing-master, in which he was more successful. There are a few etchings by Robertson, from his own designs. He died in 1788.

ROBETTA, an old Italian engraver, concerning whom little is known. According to Huber, he was born at Florence about 1460; the researches of Vasari and Zani tend to show that he flourished also in the first part of the 16th century, contemporary with Gio. Francesco Rustici, with whom and ten other Florentine artists he was accustomed to mingle in convivial entertainments, about 1512. Robetta followed the occupation of a goldsmith, and engraved a few plates in the rude manner practised in Italy before the time of Marc' Antonio. His prints are very scarce; Zani speaks of having seen thirty, signed Robeta, or Robetta, but more commonly ROBTA. or R. B. T. A. Bartsch gives a list of twenty-six, as follows:

List of Prints by, and attributed to, Robetta.

SUBJECTS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. The Creation of Eve; not signed. 2. Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; not signed. 3. Adam and Eve, and their two Children; signed RBTA. There are two impressions of this plate. In the first the sky is white; the second is retouched, and there are several clouds in the sky, particularly to the right. 4. Adam and Eve, and their two Children; no mark. The first state before a round hole at the bottom of the plate. 5. Adam and Eve and their two Children; no mark.

SUBJECTS FROM THE NEW TESTAMENT.

6. The Adoration of the Kings; signed ROBETTA. 7. The Nativity; not signed, but undoubtedly his work. 8. Jesus Christ baptized in the river Jordan; signed RBTA. 9. Jesus Christ taking leave of his Mother; do. 10. The Resurrection of Christ; do. 11. The Virgin presenting her breast to the Infant; signed ROBTA. 12. The Virgin seated in a landscape, &c.; signed RBTA. 13. The Virgin with Angels, &c.; not signed, but considered one of the most beautiful pieces of the master. 14. St. Sebastian and St. Roch; not signed. 15. Faith and Charity, with their attributes; signed RBTA.

MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS.

16. Ceres, with two goat-footed Infants; signed RBTA. 17. A young Man tied to a Tree, &c.; do. 18. Venus surrounded by Cupids; some traces of the name may be seen in a dark shadow. 19. Apollo and Marsyas; signed RBTA. 20. The young Hercules between Virtue and Vice; not signed. 21. Hercules killing the Hydra; signed RBTA. There are two impressions; in the first, the sky is left white; in the second, there are some clouds, and a falcon chasing a heron. 22. Hercules and Anteus; not signed. 23. The Lyrist; signed RBTA. 24. An old Woman and two amorous Couples, &c.; not signed. 25. A Man tied to a Tree by Cupid, &c.; on a tablet RORETA (sic.) 26. Mutius Scævola; signed RBTA.

ROBINSON, R., an obscure English engraver, who left several plates in mezzotinto, among which are those of Sir James Worsley, knight; Thomas White, bishop of Peterborough; Charles II.; James II.; and Charles I., after Vandyck.

ROBINSON. This English painter was born at Bath, about 1715. He studied under John Vanderbank at London, and gained considerable distinction in portraits. He succeeded Jervas in his house in Cleveland Court, and obtained extensive employment. His draperies were painted in imitation of the style of Vandyck, but his coloring was feeble, and his abilities were of an inferior order. He died in 1745.

ROBSON, GEORGE FENNEL, a distinguished English landscape painter in water-colors, was born at Durham in 1790. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and was accustomed to observe, with intense interest, the operations of the artists who frequently visited his native town, to design the beautiful scenery in its vicinity. Encouraged by Mr. Wm. Daniell and Mr. Cotman, he produced several drawings of considerable merit, without the aid of regular instruction; and at the age of sixteen he visited London for improvement. For about a year, he maintained himself by the sale of his drawings, and then published a View of Durham, which brought him into public notice. He afterwards traveled through Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, designing many views of the most interesting scenery, distinguished for vigorous coloring and execution, and embellished with animals by the painter Hills. He was a member of the Water-Color Society, and sent a large number of drawings to the exhibitions of that association. His works were very popular during his life, and are still much esteemed. Robson died in 1833.

ROBUSTI. See TINTORETTO.

ROCCA, GIACOMO, a Roman painter, was probably born about 1520, and studied under Daniele Ricciarelli, called di Volterra. His pictures are mostly after the designs of other masters; and according to Lanzi, they possess little merit of execution. Volterra, at his death, bequeathed to this artist a large number of designs by his instructor, Michael Angelo; and several pictures painted in concert with Rocca by Giuseppe Cesari, after some of these designs, established the reputation of the latter painter. Rocca died in the pontificate of Clement VIII., between 1592 and 1605.

ROCCA, MICHELE, called IL PARMIGGIANINO, a Roman painter, who flourished about the commencement of the 18th century. Lanzi says he gained considerable reputation, but does not mention any of his works. There is some danger from the identity of their surnames, of confounding him with Mazzuoli and Scaglia.

ROCCADIRAME, ANGIOLILLO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about the middle of the 15th century. According to Dominici, he was one of the best scholars of Antonio Solario, called Zingaro, and painted a picture in the church of S. Brigida, representing that Saint contemplating in a vision the Birth of Christ, which might pass with experienced connoisseurs for the work of his instructor.

ROCCHETTI, MARC' ANTONIO, a distinguished painter of Faenza, who flourished in the latter half of the 16th century. Lanzi supposes him to have been the same as Figurino da Faenza, enumerated by Vasari among the best disciples of Giulio Romano, but mentioned by no other writer. In the youth of Rocchetti, he executed for the church of S. Sebastiano at Faenza, many small pictures of subjects from the history of that saint, which were dispersed when the edifice was destroyed, and are now preserved with high esteem in private collections. He afterwards adopted a grander style, and imitated the manner of Baroccio with such simplicity of composition, and sweetness of coloring, that his works are quite conspicuous in the churches, particularly in S. Rocco, where he painted a picture of the titular saint, dated 1604. Lanzi also mentions another by him, in the Communal collection, which is highly praised, representing the Virgin with St. Francis, a bishop, and two portraits below. It is inscribed M. Antonius Rochettus Faventinus pinxerat. 1594.

ROCHERS, ETIENNE DES, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris in the first half of the 18th century. He was probably the pupil of P. Drevet, whose style he followed. His works do not possess much merit; but, according to the Biographie Universelle, he executed a set of 800 portraits of illustrious personages, was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, engraved a portrait of Charles VI., and was honored by that prince with a gold medal. He died in 1741.

ROCHFORD, P. DE, a French engraver, who flourished about 1720. He practised the art for a number of years in his own country, and afterwards removed to Portugal, where he spent the remainder of his life. There are by him several plates after J. B. Santerre, and other painters; also part of the plates in the large folio collection of Views of the Palace and Gardens of Versailles, published by P. Menant.

ROCHIERNE, PIERRE, a French engraver on wood, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. According to Papillon, he executed, in concert with J. Ferlato, a set of indifferent wooden cuts for the New Testament in Latin, published in 1551. Several prints in the Legende Dorée, published in 1557, were also by him.

ROCQUE, J., a French engraver, who visited England, and executed, among other plates, two large plates of Wanstead House, in Essex.

RODE, CHRISTIAN BERNARD, a German painter and engraver, was born at Berlin in 1725. After acquiring the elements of design in his native city, he visited Paris, and studied under Charles Vanloo and Jean Restout. He subsequently passed some time in Italy, and then returned to Berlin. He painted history and portraits with flattering success; was employed for the churches of Berlin and other cities in Prussia; and executed a number of works for the royal palace of Sans Souci. As an engraver, he produced a large number of etchings, several of which are after his pictures in the public edifices. Rode died in 1797. Nagler gives a long list of his plates, among which are the following:

His Portrait; engraved by himself, after Reclam. Christ, with the Disciples at Emmaus. The Descent of the Holy Ghost. The Ascension; from his picture in the church at Rostock. St. Paul preaching. Christ in the Garden of Olives; from the picture in the church of S. Mary at Berlin. Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren

RODE, JOHN HENRY, a German engraver, the younger brother of the preceding, was born at Berlin in 1727. He first learned the business of a goldsmith, but afterwards devoted himself to engraving. After producing several admired plates at Berlin, he went to Paris, and studied under J. G. Wille, in whose finished style he executed several plates. On returning to Berlin, he published several prints from the designs of his brother, and soon acquired a distinguished reputation, but was cut off in the commencement of a flattering career, in 1759. The following are among his principal works:

The Portrait of John George Wille; after Schmidt. A Head of Epicurus; after T. M. Preisler. Jacob wrestling with the Angel; after C. B. Rode. An Ecce Homo; do. A Sacrifice of the Vestals; do.

RODERIGO, or RODRIGUEZ, LUIGI, a Sicilian painter, probably of Spanish origin, who flourished, according to Hackert, in the first half of the 17th century. After acquiring a good knowledge of the art in Rome, he settled at Naples, and at first continued his studies under Bellisario Corenzio, whose style he subsequently relinquished for that of Giuseppe Cesari, called Cav. d'Arpino. There are many of his works in the public edifices of Naples, which have a degree of mannerism, but are distinguished for a certain grace and judgment superior to Arpino. Notwithstanding the amiable qualities of Roderigo, his former instructor—the treacherous and revengeful Bellisario—became jealous of his fame, and poisoned him in the flower of his life.

RODERIGO, ALONSO, an eminent Sicilian painter, the brother of the preceding, was born at Messina in 1578. He attained a high reputation in his native place, and executed a large number of works for the churches and public edifices, which sufficiently evince, according to Hackert, his facility and excellence. Among his most admired works were the Probatica, in S. Cosmo de' Medici; and his capital picture of the two founders of Messina, in the senatorial palace, for which he received a thousand scudi. On the return of Antonio Ricci, called Barbalunga, to Messina, his fame and commissions began to decline; but being elevated above the influence of petty jealousies, he was nobly accustomed to term his rival the Caracci of Sicily. Roderigo died in 1648.

RODERIGO, GIO. BERNARDINO, called IL PITTOR SANTO, was the nephew and scholar of Luigi R., and flourished about 1650. He followed the style of Giuseppe Cesari with excellent success, and was commissioned by the Carthusian monks to complete a picture left imperfect at the death of that master.

RODERMONT, a Dutch engraver, who is also called Rotterdamdt and Rotermans. He flourished about 1640, and executed a number of plates, some of which are in the style of Rembrandt. Among others by him, are the portraits of Joannes Secundus, a Latin poet of the Hague, signed Rodermont. fec.; and Sir William Waller, with a Battle in the back-ground, after C. Jansen.

RODOLPH, CORRADO. This artist was a native of Germany, the son of a sculptor, and flourished in the 17th century. After acquiring a knowledge of design from his father, he visited Paris, and afterwards Italy, where he studied in the school of Bernini. He then went to Spain, and gained great reputation at Valencia; he was also employed at Barcelona by the archduke, afterwards Charles III. One of his principal works was the façade of the Cathedral at Valencia, which is unmercifully criticised by Milizia.

RODRIGUEZ, FRATE ADRIAN, a painter born at Antwerp in 1618. His name was originally Dierix, but upon visiting Madrid he entered the Jesuitical order, and changed it to Rodriguez. There are several pictures by him, probably in the churches of his order at Madrid, in the Flemish taste, among which are the Marriage at Cana, the Disciples at Emmaus, and the Feast of Simon. Rodriguez died in 1669.

RODRIGUEZ, VENTURA, the most eminent Spanish architect of the 18th century, born at Cienpuecos in 1717. He studied first under Estéban Marchand, who was then engaged in carrying on the works at Aranjuez. After the death of his instructor in 1733, he was engaged by Ivara to assist in making drawings for the design of the new palace at Madrid; and after the death of Ivara, he was employed by his successor Sacchetti, as principal superintendent of the works, in the erection of that edifice, in 1741. He soon rose to distinction, and in 1747 was chosen an honorary member of the Academy of St. Luke at Rome. In 1752, at the establishment of the Academy of San Fernando at Madrid, Rodriguez was chosen chief professor of architecture; and he discharged the duties of his office with admirable zeal and fidelity. Commissions poured in upon him from every quarter, and there was scarcely a work of importance throughout the country, in which he was not employed or consulted. His numerous engagements prevented his visiting Italy; but he collected all pictorial works relating to its ancient or modern edifices, and carefully studied the various monuments in the Peninsula, of Roman, Moorish, and Gothic architecture. He is highly praised by Ponz in the Viage de Espana; his talents were of surpassing excellence, and he doubtless merited the title accorded him by his cotemporaries, of "The Restorer of Architecture in Spain." Rodriguez was employed upon a variety of works, as hospitals, colleges, churches, and cathedrals, in the cities of Saragossa, Malaga, Granada, Toledo, Valladolid, and other places. Among the principal are, the Sanctuary at Cabadonga; the church of the hospital at Oviedo; that of S. Felipe Neri at Malaga; and the Palace of the Duke de Liria at Madrid. Rodriguez died at Madrid in 1785, and was buried in the church of S. Marcos, erected by himself.

ROELAS, JUAN DE LAS, an eminent Spanish painter, descended from a noble family of Flemish origin, was born at Seville in 1560. He first commenced the study of medicine, but after taking his degree he concluded to gratify a strong inclination for art, and accordingly went to Italy for improvement. He visited Venice, and is said by Palomino to have studied under Titian, but the latter died in 1576, when Roelas was only sixteen years of age. It is more probable that he studied under a scholar of that great master. On returning to Seville, he was much employed in ornamenting the churches, and produced many admirable works, which are compared with those of Palma and Tintoretto, being distinguished for ingenious and abundant composition, correctness of design, perfect delineation of the human figure, and the rich and harmonious coloring he had acquired in the Venetian school. Among his principal works is a picture of St. Jago riding over the Moors, a spirited and majestic composition, in the chapel of that Saint at Seville; the Conception, in the Academy; and the Death of St. Isidore, in the church of that saint, altogether in the style of Titian. This eminent artist entered the priesthood in the latter part of his life, and went as a canon to Olivares in 1624, where he died in the following year. He was termed El Clerigo Roelas, probably from his spiritual office; and El Licenciado Juan, probably from his doctor's degree. Palomino calls him Pablo, but Francesco Pacheco, his cotemporary, denominates him Juan.

ROEPEL, CONRAD, an eminent Dutch painter of flowers and fruit, was born at the Hague in 1679. He studied portrait painting for some time under Constantine Netscher, but his delicate constitution obliged him to quit the city, and reside at a country mansion belonging to his father. Amusing himself in cultivating flowers, he made attempts at painting the beautiful objects of his care, and succeeded to admiration. He sent to the Hague one of his earliest productions, which was immediately purchased by a celebrated florist, who thereafter sent him the finest flowers of his garden. From these choice models, Roepel produced flower-pieces so agreeably disposed, and finished with such fidelity to nature, and clearness of coloring, that they were very highly esteemed, though not equal to the productions of Rachel Ruysch and John van Huysum. Invited to Dusseldorf in 1716 by the Elector Palatine, he was received with every mark of distinction, and painted several fruit and flower pieces for that prince, which were greatly admired, and gained him, besides a liberal reward, the decoration of a gold medal and chain. At the death of the Elector, he returned to the Hague with increased reputation, and was employed for some time in the service of Prince William of Hesse, and the families of Fagel and Lormier. In 1718, Roepel was chosen a member of the Society of Painters at the Hague. He was subsequently made Director, and discharged the duties of that office until his death, in 1748.

ROER, JACOB VANDER, a Dutch painter, was born at Dort in 1648. He studied under John de Baan, and afterwards went to England in the reign of Charles II. He practised the art for some time there, and then returned to Dort, where he died in 1699.

ROESEL, AUGUSTUS JOHN, a German painter and engraver, was born near Arnstadt, in 1705. After acquiring a knowledge of art from a relative, he settled at Nuremberg and practised miniature painting and engraving for many years. He also passed two years at Copenhagen, and was patronized by the Danish court. He subsequently devoted his attention to natural history, and made designs of insects, frogs, and other reptiles, from which he engraved many plates, and published several pictorial works. He died in 1759.

ROESTRAETEN, PETER, a Dutch painter, was born at Haerlem in 1627. He studied under Francis Hals, and afterwards married his daughter. He painted portraits in the manner of his instructor, and also pictures of gold and silver vases, bas-reliefs, musical instruments, with other objects of use or ornament, correctly designed, well colored, and touched with delicacy and freedom. After gaining considerable distinction in Holland, the success of Sir Peter Lely induced him to visit England, during the reign of Charles II. Although Lely received him with great kindness, and presented him to the king, it does not appear that he was much employed at court. Probably doubtful of success in portraits, he applied his talents to the other branch of the art, in which he excelled, and was extensively employed by the nobility and gentry of the time. He died at London in 1698.

ROETTIERS, FRANÇOIS, a French engraver of little note, of Flemish origin, was born at Paris in 1702. Several members of his family had held for many years the office of medalist at the French mint. There are a number of etchings by him, among which are two plates after Nicolas de Lar-gilliere, representing the Crucifixion, and Christ bearing his Cross, executed with great spirit and effect. Roettiers died in 1770.

ROGER, OF BRUGES, an old Flemish painter, a native of Bruges, was probably born about 1390. He studied under John van Eyck about the time when he discovered oil painting, and executed historical works on a larger scale than those of van Eyck, well designed for that early period. According to van Mander, several of his works were preserved at Bruges in 1604. Among the names of several Flemish painters who practised the art in Italy in the 15th century, Vasari mentions that of Ruggieri da Bruggia, probably identical with Roger of Bruges. In the Palazzo Nani at Venice, there is a picture by him, representing St. Girolamo between two virgins, signed Sumus Rugerii manus. There is also at Venice a portrait of this artist, painted by himself, in 1462; and in the Vendramini collection is a picture by him, representing the Virgin and Infant, in a temple of Flemish architecture. The same artist is also highly commended by Bartolomeo Facio, in his work "De Viris Illustribus;" and, according to Lanzi, he appears to have acquired great reputation in Italy, from the cotemporaneous testimony of Ciriaco Anconitano, who saw in 1449 his picture of the Deposition from the Cross, in the possession of the Duke of Ferrara. There has been much useless disquisition in regard to this artist, to prove his identity with Roger vander Weyde of Brussels, which see.

WR ROGERS, WILLIAM, an old English engraver, born at London about 1545. He engraved a number of frontispieces and portraits, in a neat, stiff style, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth; a small upright plate. Henry IV. of France; a whole-length. The Earl of Essex, Earl Marshal of England. The Earl of Cumberland. Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk. Sir John Harrington; the title to his Orlando Furioso. Thomas Moffat; a frontispiece to his Theatre of Insects. John Gerarde, Surgeon; frontispiece to his Herbal.

ROGMAN, or ROGHMAN, ROLAND, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1597. His instructor is not mentioned, but he became an eminent painter of landscapes. He traveled through several parts of Germany, designing the most agreeable scenery, architectural views, villages, figures and cattle, which he usually sketched on the spot. His pictures generally represent views in Holland and Germany, which are admired for their close resemblance to nature in the forms, though the coloring is dark and disagreeable. Rogman lived on terms of intimacy with Rembrandt, whose excellence in pencilling and chiaro-scuro he endeavored to follow—at a distance. He left a number of spirited pen drawings, and about thirty-three bold and masterly etchings of views of chateaux in ruins. There are six plates of "Views of the Wood at the Hague," in three sets of proofs; and it is supposed from the inscriptions, that the first was published by Rogman; the second, after retouching, by Peter Nolpe; and the third by N. Visscher and P. Schenck. Rogman probably died in 1689. His daughter, Gertrude R., engraved about twenty plates after him, among which is one entitled Le Chateau de Zuylen, in the style of Hermann Saftleven.

ROKES, HENRY MARTIN, called ZORG, or, the CAREFUL, a Dutch painter, was the son of Martin Rokes, the captain of the passage-boat from Rotterdam to Dort, who acquired the above appellation from his extraordinary attention to the comfort and interest of his passengers. The surname descended to his son, who was born at Rotterdam in 1621. After acquiring a knowledge of the art at Rotterdam from William Buytenweg, he visited Antwerp, and studied under the younger Teniers. He attained great reputation for his pictures of subjects similar to those of that master, representing interiors of Dutch apartments, with figures regaling and amusing themselves; also for his conversations, domestic subjects, fairs, and fish-markets. His pictures generally combine the styles of Teniers and Brower; the composition is ingenious, the design correct, the coloring warm and mellow, with good management of the chiaro-scuro. They are very highly esteemed, and the best are worthy of a place in choice collections. Rokes died in 1682.

ROLAND, PHILIPPE LAURENT, a distinguished French sculptor, born near Lille, in 1746. He early showed considerable talent, and visited Paris, where he was received into the studio of Pajou. Entrusted with a part of the works in the Palais Royal, he acquitted himself successfully, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement, where he remained five years. On returning to Paris, he manifested great progress, and gained considerable reputation by his statue of Cato Uticensis, executed in 1779. In 1781, he was chosen a member of the academy, for his fine statue of Samson; and he was soon after commissioned, by M. d'Angivilliers, to execute his statue of the great Condé. The works of Roland are distinguished for purity of design and facility of execution. Among the principal were, a bas-relief of the Nine Muses, for the queen's apartments at Fontainebleau; a bust of Pajou; and Homer playing on his Lyre, in the Louvre. The latter was exhibited in 1802, and is highly praised. Roland was appointed Professor of Sculpture in the Royal Academy, and a member of the Legion of Honor. He died in 1816.

ROLDAN, PEDRO, an eminent Spanish sculptor, born at Seville in 1624. He visited Italy, and resided for a long time at Rome, where he gained several prizes in the Academy of St. Luke. On returning to Spain, he was much employed at Seville and Madrid. There are about thirty of his statues in the former city, and a number of groups, which are highly praised by Palomino. Among the principal are, the Burial of Christ, in the Charity church; and the Crucifixion, in that of St. Bernard. The latter work was considered equal to the same subject in the Basilica of S. Paolo, at Rome, destroyed in the conflagration of that edifice. Roldan died at Seville in 1700.

ROLDAN, LOUISA, the daughter of the preceding, was born at Seville in 1654. She studied sculpture under her father, and assisted him in many of his works. She gained so much reputation that Philip IV. invited her to Madrid, commissioned her to execute a number of works, and assigned her a pension of six hundred ducats. There are a number of her works in the Escorial; also a fine group at Seville, representing the Body of Christ, with the Virgin and saints. She died at Madrid in 1704.

ROLI, or ROLLI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Bologna in 1643. He studied under Michael Angelo Colonna, and seems to have gained great reputation in his day, from the commendation of Cav. Titi, who extols his landscapes in the Certosa at Pisa, as "perfect miracles of the art." Roli died in 1696.

ROLI, GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Bologna in 1654. He studied under Domenico Maria Canuti, and subsequently went to Germany, where he remained several years. On returning to Bologna, he executed several fresco works for the churches. He died, according to Zani, in 1727. There are several plates by him, after the eminent Bolognese painters, among which are two, representing Charity, after Lodovico Caracci; and a Sybil, after Lorenzo Pasinelli.

ROLLO. Nothing is known of this artist, except by a picture of Christ crowned with Thorns, in the style of Guido, said to be so beautiful that it may be mistaken for the work of that master. It is inscribed Rollo Gallois. F.; from which it is supposed he was of French origin.

ROLLOS, PETER, a German engraver of little note, who resided at Frankfort and Berlin, and engraved a number of plates for books published in both those cities, among which is the frontispiece for a book of Emblems, by G. de Montenay, published at Frankfort in 1619.

ROMA, SPIRIDONE, an Italian painter of little note, who flourished in the latter half of the 18th century. He visited England, and was chiefly occupied in the restoration of pictures, although he also painted a ceiling in the East India House. He died in 1786.

ROMAIN, — DE LA RUE. The name of this painter has been Gallicized by French writers, although he was probably of Dutch origin. He is said to have imitated with great success the styles of John Asselyn, Swanevelt, and Both. His pictures pass for the works of those masters, and his name is almost lost in oblivion—a warning to all mere imitators.

ROMAN, BARTOLOMÉ, a Spanish painter, was born at Madrid, according to Bermudez, in 1596. He studied successively under Vincenzo Carducci, and Don Diego Velasquez. He painted historical subjects with great reputation, among which Palomino mentions several in the Sacristy of the Padres Cayetanos at Madrid, and compares them, in regard to coloring and effect, to the works of Rubens. His draperies are also very highly praised. In the church of the Franciscans at Alcala de Henares, there are several considerable works by Roman. He died at Madrid in 1659.

ROMANELLI, GIO. FRANCESCO, a distinguished Italian painter, was born at Viterbo in 1617. Manifesting an early inclination for art, he was sent by his father to Rome, where he was patronized by the Cardinal Barberini, who placed him in the school of Pietro da Cortona. After several years of assiduous study under that master, he became one of his most distinguished scholars, and followed his style with such success, that, when Pietro started on a journey to Lombardy, he left him to supply his place in decorating the Barberini palace. On leaving his instructor, Romanelli altered his style, by the assistance of Bernini, adopting by degrees a more elegant and seductive manner in his figures, but manifesting less grandeur and science than that of Pietro. He painted a picture of the Deposition from the Cross, for the church of S. Ambrogio, which excited such universal applause, that Pietro was stimulated to paint opposite to it, his wonderful picture of the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, upon seeing which, Bernini exclaimed that he then perceived the difference between the master and the scholar. For the church of S. Peter, he painted the Presentation in the Temple, which has since been executed in mosaic; and the original is preserved in the Certosa. When Innocent X. succeeded to the papacy, Cardinal Barberini was obliged to quit Rome, and flee to Paris, where he recommended his former protégé to Cardinal Mazarin. On arriving at Paris, Romanelli was presented to Louis XIV., and was commissioned to execute several works, among which were a series of subjects from the Æneid, in the apartments of the Old Louvre, called the Queen's Bath. The King rewarded him in munificent style, and honored him with the order of St. Michael. According to Lanzi, Romanelli made two visits to France, and was preparing to start the third time, when he died at Viterbo, in 1662. He left numerous works in Rome and other cities, both in churches and private collections. The large copy of Guido's Triumph of Bacchus in Hampton Court, is said to be by Romanelli.

ROMANELLI, URBANO, the son and scholar of the preceding, was a native of Viterbo. After the death of his father, he completed his course under Ciro Ferri, and was subsequently employed for the churches of Veletri and Viterbo. According to Lanzi, his pictures from the life of St. Lorenzo, in the church of that saint at Viterbo, show that he might have attained great eminence, had he not been cut off prematurely, in 1682.

ROMANET, ANTOINE LOUIS, a French engraver, was born at Paris in 1748, and died in 1807. He studied under J. G. Wille, and was subsequently employed upon several great pictorial works, such as the Galerie du Palais Royal, the Galerie d'Orleans, the Cabinet Le Brun, &c. He resided some time at Basle, and executed several plates under the direction of Christian von Mechel. There are also by him many detached pieces after various masters; the following are among his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Charles Theodore, Elector of Bavaria; after P. Baltoni. Louis Francis de Bourbon, Prince of Conti; after Le Tellier. John Grimoux, Painter; after a picture by himself.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Death of Adonis; after Kupetzky. The Village Printseller; after Seekatz. The Ballad Singer; do.

ROMANI, DA REGGIO, a painter of Modena, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. According to Tiraboschi, he studied at Venice, attaching himself to the works of Paolo Veronese, and particularly to those of Tintoretto, whose rules he usually practised, with excellent success. Lanzi mentions a picture by him at Modena, in the style of Paolo, representing the Mysteries of the Rosario.

ROMANINO, or ROMANO, GIROLAMO, an eminent painter of the Venetian school, born at Brescia about 1504. After acquiring the elements of the art from Stefano Rizzi, he studied the works of Titian with great assiduity, and followed the styles of that master and Bassano, in many of his works. Cotemporary with Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto, he became his rival; Ridolfi ranks him at least equal, but Vasari inferior, to that master; and Lanzi endeavors to reconcile their judgments by observing that Romanino surpassed him in extent of genius and boldness of execution, but was inferior to him in delicacy of taste and careful execution, several of his works being painted with a hasty pencil. In general, however, he displays the qualities of a great master, in subjects from sacred and profane history, and also in burlesque compositions. His principal works are at Brescia and Verona; in the church of Sts. Faustino and Giovita at Brescia, is his Descent from the Cross, commended by Palma for its strong resemblance to the Venetian style; in S. Maria in Calcara, is his St. Apollonio administering the Sacrament, a surprising and delightful work, distinguished for great fecundity of invention, varied expression in the heads, and select choice of forms, combining many singular pictorial beauties within the limits of propriety and truth. In S. Giorgio at Verona, are his four histories from the life of that Saint, composed with surprising spirit and vigor. Vasari says he died before 1566; Ridolfi merely states that he died at an advanced age. Romanino sometimes signed his pictures Hier. Roman, Hieronimi Rumani, and Hieronimus Rumanus.

ROMANO, GIULIO. The family name of this great painter was Pippi, but he is universally known in the history of art under the appellation of Giulio Romano. He was born at Rome in 1492, and manifesting an early genius for art, he was placed under the instruction of Raffaello, soon after the arrival of that master at Rome, and became his most distinguished disciple. Raffaello placed him at the head of his scholars, entrusted him with the execution of several of his greatest works, made him one of his heirs, and at his death confided to him and to Gio. Francesco Penni, the completion of his unfinished works. During the lifetime of Raffaello he did not gain distinction by any original works, but afterwards he was enabled to develop his faculties, and soon displayed an elevated mind, poetic genius, unusual grandeur of conception, and remarkable correctness of design. He was particularly successful in battle-pieces and other warlike subjects, representing them with great spirit and correctness. In these subjects he imitated the grand design of Michael Angelo, commanding, with a master's hand, the whole mechanism of the human body, and rendering it subservient to his purposes. His chief fault is, that his demonstrations of motions are sometimes too violent. Vasari preferred his drawings to his paintings, as he thought the fire of his original conceptions partially evaporated in the finishing. Some critics have objected to the squareness of his physiognomies, and complained that his middle tints are too dark; but Niccolo Poussin was of a contrary opinion, and admired the asperity of the coloring in his Battle of Constantine, as suitable to the character of the subject. In sacred and other subjects he did not succeed as well. His figures lack the dignity and inimitable graces of his preceptor, his contours are harsh and severe, and his coloring cold, crude, and inharmonious. These defects are, however, in a great measure counterbalanced by the extraordinary fecundity of his imagination, and his learned acquaintance with ancient history and mythology.

After the death of Raffaello, he was employed by Leo X. and Clement VII., in conjunction with Penni, to finish the Hall of Constantine in the Vatican, in which he painted the Apparition of the Cross, or the Harangue of Constantine, and the Battle wherein Maxentius is drowned and Constantine remains the Victor. The other two subjects, the Baptism of Constantine by St. Silvestro, and the Dotation of the city of Rome to that pontiff, were executed by Penni. They afterwards painted, or rather finished, the pictures of the Villa at Monte Mario, ordered by the Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, but suspended after the death of Raffaello, till the second or third year after his elevation to the papacy, under the title of Clement VII., about 1525. He also painted a fine picture of Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, for the church of La Trinità di Monte, and the Marriage of St. Catherine, for S. Andrea della Valle. It was about this time that he painted his celebrated picture of the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, for the church of S. Stefano at Genoa, which, for grandeur of composition, and pathetic expression, is regarded as a masterpiece of art.

Giulio had already distinguished himself as an architect, when he was invited to Mantua by the Duke to rebuild the Palazzo del Te. It was there that he won his greatest reputation, both as a painter and architect, and established a school in imitation of his master, which Rome herself might have envied. He erected many noble edifices, villas, palaces, temples, and decorated a considerable portion of them with his own hands, so that the Duke was heard to exclaim, in a transport of gratitude, that Giulio was in truth more the master of Mantua than himself. His time was now so much occupied in his architectural pursuits that he was obliged, like Raffaello, after preparing the cartoons, to leave the execution of his works to his scholars and assistants, afterwards carefully retouching them himself. The Palazzo del Te, which occupied him several years, is regarded as a lasting monument of his genius, both as an architect and a painter. His great abilities in painting are conspicuous in the two grand saloons, in one of which he represented the Fall of the Giants, and in the other the History of Cupid and Psyche. In the former it appears as if Romano, emulating Michael Angelo himself in grandeur of design, had soared to the utmost stretch of pictorial daring. He afterwards decorated the Ducal palace at Mantua with fresco histories of the Trojan war, in which he displayed the most capacious powers of invention and poetic fancy, aided by a profound knowledge of his subject. Sometimes, like Homer, he surprises by the heroic sublimity of his feats of arms; at others, like Anacreon, he captivates by the most seductive representations of festivity and love. Lanzi says these works have been so frequently retouched, that little remains of the original coloring.

As an architect, Giulio Romano gained great distinction. At Rome he designed the beautiful Villa Madama, on Monte Mario, about half a mile from the city; also the church of the Madonna dell'Orto, in the form of a Latin cross, with three naves, a well-proportioned and beautiful chapel at the back, and the two arms of the cross semi-circular. He also erected the beautiful palace of Cicciaporci, on the Strada di Bianchi; and the Palazzo Cenci, over the piazza of S. Eustachio. By these works, he gained so much distinction that the Duke of Mantua invited him to that city, and employed him to erect the Palazzo del Te, which is regarded as the chief monument of his fame, being one of the most magnificent edifices in Italy. The room where he painted the Battle of the Giants, is of a circular form, and vaulted; the walls, windows, and angles are of rustic work, apparently split and broken, as if shivered and falling with the Giants, struck by the thunderbolts of Jove. Although this room is only thirty feet in diameter, it appears much larger, in consequence of its correct proportions. (See Carlo Maderno.) When the Emperor Charles V. arrived at Mantua, Giulio Romano erected several triumphal arches, of the most elegant designs. His design for the façade of S. Petronio, was preferred before those of a large number of competitors, although submitted to several celebrated architects. According to Milizia, this work "is of one order, a medium between the Gothic and the Greek, with a grand and picturesque effect, showing that Romano excelled in architecture more than in painting." The unqualified commendation which that author—usually so caustic in his criticisms—bestows upon the works of Romano, is a high evidence of their surpassing merit. His reputation at length rose so high, that the Duke forbid the citizens of Mantua to erect any edifice without consulting Romano. Among other works at Mantua, he restored the church of S. Benedetto; modernized and enlarged the Ducal palace; and erected another for the Duke at Marmiruolo, five miles from the city. He performed so many celebrated works there, in painting and architecture, that the Cardinal Gonzaga was accustomed to say that Mantua was created by Giulio Romano, and was his rightful property. Finally, he was honored by the pope with the appointment of architect to St. Peter's, and was earnestly entreated to repair to Rome, in order to commence operations upon that Basilica, which he doubtless would have done, had he not been prevented by death, in 1546.

ROMANO, DOMENICO, a painter of the Florentine school, of whom little is known. According to Vasari, he was a pupil of Salviati, whose manner he followed. He was living in 1568.

ROMANO, VIRGILIO, a painter who flourished at Siena about 1540. He studied under Baldassare Peruzzi, and executed some works for the churches and public edifices of Siena, which are commended by Vasari. There are also some grotesques at Siena, attributed to him.

ROMBORGH, a Dutch painter of whom little is known, who flourished in the commencement of the 18th century. He is said to have studied at Rome. He painted landscapes resembling those of Frederick Moucheron.

ROMBOUTS, THEODORE, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1597. He studied under Abraham Janssens, with whom he made great progress. On leaving his master in 1617, he went to Rome, soon attracted public notice by his assiduity and talents, and received several commissions, which he executed in a manner that augmented his reputation. From Rome, he went to Florence at the invitation of the Grand Duke, for whom he executed several excellent works, so much to the satisfaction of that prince, that he liberally rewarded him, and gave him several valuable presents as a mark of his esteem. After an absence of eight years he returned to Antwerp, whither his reputation had preceded him, and he was commissioned to paint several works for the churches, which excited universal admiration. Rubens was then residing at Antwerp, in the full enjoyment of his exalted reputation; and Rombouts, perceiving that his own performances were obscured by the perfections of that eminent master, had the vanity to think that he could successfully compete with him. This self-sufficiency, however, proved of great advantage to him, for the ambition of vanquishing so powerful an opponent stimulated him to extraordinary exertions, and his best productions were conceived and executed under the influence of this determination. He possessed a ready invention, a fine style of design, animated expression, warm and brilliant coloring, and uncommon facility of hand. His figures are usually as large as life. His most celebrated works are at Ghent—the Taking down from the Cross, in the Cathedral; St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, and the Angel appearing to Joseph in his Dream, in the church of the Recolets; and Themis with the attributes of Justice, in the Town House. The last named work is said to have elicited the commendation of Rubens himself. He occasionally painted cabinet pictures, gallant assemblies, concerts, merry-makings, mountebanks, &c., designed and executed with great ingenuity and spirit. He found a ready sale for these works, and they are still held in high estimation. He died at Antwerp in 1637, in the prime of life.

ROMEGIALLO, GIOVANNI PIETRO, a painter born at Morbegno in the Valteline, in 1739. After learning the rudiments of art under G. F. Cotta, an obscure painter in his native city, he went to Rome, and studied with Agostino Masucci. He afterwards greatly improved himself by studying and copying the works of Guercino, Guido, and P. da Cortona. After returning to his native place, he painted many works, well designed and colored, with a fine expression in the heads, for the private collections, the churches, and public edifices of Como, and other neighboring cities. The time of his death is not recorded.

ROMEO, DON JOSÉ, a Spanish painter, born at Cervera in Arragon, in 1701. He went to Rome at an early age, and studied with Agostino Masucci. On his return to Spain, he resided some time at Barcelona, where he executed several works for the church of the Mercenarios Calzados. He afterwards went to Madrid, where he was taken into the service of Philip V. He died at Madrid in 1772.

ROMEYN, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known. He painted landscapes, with figures and cattle, much in the manner of Karel du Jardin, which occasionally occur in the collections of Holland. His pictures are generally of small size, well designed, delicately pencilled, and chastely colored.

ROMNEY, GEORGE, one of the most eminent painters of the English school, was born at Furness, near Dalton, in Lancashire, in 1734. His father was a builder; and George, in his twelfth year, was taken from the village school to superintend the workmen. He showed a passion for drawing from his earliest years, and at length prevailed upon his father to allow him to study painting, under one Steele, a portrait painter of little note, who barely taught him the use of the materials of the art. At the expiration of two years he left his instructor, married, and resided some time at York, where he met with considerable success; but aspiring to higher things, in 1762 he established himself in London. During the first year of his residence there, he painted portraits at the modest price of five guineas a head, and acquired considerable practice through the influence of Mr. Braithwaite, the comptroller of the foreign post-office. In 1763, he gained the second prize of fifty guineas from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for his picture of the Death of General Wolfe. In 1764 he visited Paris, and on his return he settled at Gray's Inn. In 1765, he obtained the first prize from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for his picture of the Death of King Edmund. In 1768 he removed to more eligible and convenient quarters, in Great Newport street, where his practice rapidly increased. Romney had hitherto confined himself to portrait painting, but being ambitious of gaining distinction in a higher department of art, and conscious of the necessity of cultivating his taste abroad, he set out for Italy in 1773, accompanied by Ozias Humphrey, the celebrated miniature painter. He resided there two years, chiefly at Rome, studying with enthusiastic assiduity the antique and the best works of the great Italian masters. In 1775 he returned to London, and took a house in Cavendish Square, where he resided during the remainder of his professional career. While abroad, the admiration and delight he experienced in contemplating the works of the old masters, made him resolve to devote his attention in future to historical painting; but soon after his return, the public taste, the persuasions of his friends, and the enticements of emolument, induced him to change his purpose. He soon became one of the most popular and most employed portrait painters in London, and even the rival of Sir Joshua Reynolds. When Boydell projected the Shakspeare Gallery, Romney entered into the scheme with enthusiasm, and executed four pictures for the work, representing the Infant Shakspeare attended by Nature and the Passions, the Storm Scene in the Tempest, the Infant Shakspeare nursed by Tragedy and Comedy, and Cassandra in Troilus and Cressida. He also produced many fancy pictures, which were among the most esteemed productions of the British school in his day. He painted upwards of thirty pictures of Magdalens, Bacchantes, Nymphs, and subjects from history or fable, for which the beautiful Emma Lyon, afterwards Lady Hamilton, served for his model, "for whose charms upon canvass, princes and peers contended." In 1797, Romney felt a paralytic stroke, which prevented him from continuing his professional labors. Finding his health declining, he revisited his native place in the following year, where he died in 1802.

It is a little singular that Romney was never elected a Royal Academician. This has been attributed to the spirit of rivalry between him and Reynolds, though the latter affected to ridicule the idea of Romney's pretensions. At all events, after the death of the president, the Academy feeling that they had done injustice to his talents, offered reparation, which Romney promptly declined. It has been said that he was fortunate in his biographers, but he ought rather to be regarded as unfortunate; for his friends extol him as one of the greatest modern painters, without any just discrimination of his real merits and defects; while on the other hand, his enemies make him "the best abused man in the world." Setting aside the sycophantic eulogies of Cumberland and Hayley, and the caustic critiques of Fuseli and Cunningham, it will be safe to give Romney the benefit of the opinion of an able and conscientious artist in another branch—Flaxman the sculptor: "When Romney first began to paint he had seen no gallery of pictures, nor the fine productions of ancient sculpture, but then women and children were his statues, and all objects under the cope of heaven formed his school of painting. The rainbow, the purple distance, or the silver lake, taught him coloring; the various actions and passions of the human figure, with the forms of clouds, woods, and mountains, or valleys, afforded him studies of composition. Indeed, his genius bore a strong resemblance to the scenes he was born in; like them, it partook of the grand and beautiful; and like them, also, the bright sunshine and enchanting prospects of his fancy were occasionally overspread with mist and gloom. On his arrival in Italy, he was witness to new scenes of art and sources of study, of which he could only have supposed previously that something of the kind might exist; for he there contemplated the purity and perfection of ancient sculpture, the sublimity of Michael Angelo's Sistine Chapel, and the simplicity of Cimabue and Giotto's schools. He perceived those qualities distinctly, and judiciously used them in viewing and imitating nature; and thus his quick perception and unwearied application enabled him, by a two years' residence abroad, to acquire as great a proficiency in art as is usually attained by foreign studies of a much longer duration. After his return, the novelty and sentiment of his original subjects were universally admired. Most of these were of the delicate class; and each had its peculiar character. Titiana, with her Indian votress, was arch and sprightly; Milton dictating to his daughters, solemn and interesting. Several pictures of wood-nymphs and bacchantes charmed by their rural beauty, innocence, and simplicity. The most pathetic—Ophelia, with the flowers she had gathered in her hand, sitting on the branch of a tree, which was breaking under her, while the melancholy distraction visible in her countenance, accounts for her insensibility to the danger. Few painters have left in their works so many examples of the tender and delicate affections; and several of his pictures breathe a kindred spirit with the Sigismonda of Correggio. His Cartoons, some of which have unfortunately perished, were examples of the sublime and terrible—at that time perfectly new in English art. As Romney was gifted with peculiar powers for historical and ideal painting, so his heart and soul were engaged in the pursuit of it, whenever he could extricate himself from the importunate business of portrait painting. It was his delight by day, and his study by night; and for this his food and rest were often neglected. His compositions, like those of the ancient pictures and basso-relievos, told their story by a single group of figures in the front; while the background is made the simplest possible, rejecting all unnecessary episode and trivial ornament, either of secondary groups, or architectural subdivision. In his compositions the beholder was forcibly struck by the sentiment at the first glance; of which he traced the gradations and varieties through several characters, all conceived in an elevated spirit of dignity and beauty, with a lively expression of nature in all the parts. His heads were various—the male were decided and grand; the female lovely: his figures resembled the antique—the limbs were elegantly and finely formed; his drapery was well understood; either forming the figure into a mass with one or two deep folds only, or, by its adhesion and transparency, discovering the form of the figure, the lines of which were finely varied with the union or expansion of spiral or cascade folds, composing with or contrasting the outline and chiaro-scuro. Few artists, since the fifteenth century, have been able to do so much in so many different branches; for, besides his beautiful compositions and pictures, which have added to the knowledge and celebrity of the English school, he modeled like a sculptor, carved ornaments in wood with great delicacy, and could make an architectural design in a fine taste, as well as construct every part of the building.”

ROMSTEDT, CHRISTIAN, an obscure German engraver, who flourished at Leipsic from 1630 to about 1670. He engraved some portraits, indifferently executed, and marked with the above monogram. There was another artist of this name, probably a son of the above, who died in 1725. He engraved a few portraits, and several of the subjects in the Farnese palace, after Annibale Caracci.

RONCALLI, CAV. CRISTOFORO, called IL CAV. DALLE POMERANCE, was born at Pomerance, in the diocese of Volterra, in Tuscany, in 1552. He went to Rome and studied with Niccolo Circignani, called dalle Pomerance, by whose instructions and a diligent study of the antique, and the works of the best masters, he became an eminent painter of history, and one of the most popular and most employed artists of his time. As soon as his works were known at Rome, they immediately attracted public attention, and he was employed in decorating numerous churches and the palaces of the principal nobility. His performances gained him the highest applause, for their elegance of composition and correctness of design. He was employed by Paul V. in the execution of several important works, among which were the Death of Ananias and Sapphira, in the Certosa,—a picture so much admired, that it was afterwards copied in mosaic in St. Peter's, and other mosaics also were executed in the same edifice from his cartoons. In the Basilica of St. John of Lateran, he painted a grand composition of the Baptism of Constantine. He was also charged with the continuation of the gallery of Raffaele, under the direction of the Padre Danti.—(See Danti). These works gave so much satisfaction to the Pope that he conferred on Roncalli the honor of knighthood. He executed several other important works for the churches of Rome, the principal of which are the Visitation of the Virgin in S. Giovanni Decollato, and St. Michael discomfiting the Rebel Angels in S. Andrea della Valle; but the most celebrated is the cupola of La Santa Casa di Loreto. He also painted in the treasury of the same edifice, several pictures representing the history of the Virgin. He obtained this vast commission, in competition with Caravaggio and Guido, through the powerful patronage of the Cardinal Crescenzi; which so much enraged Caravaggio, that he hired an assassin to murder him, but the intended victim escaped with a severe wound in his face. The distinction Roncalli gained by executing these works, soon brought his talents into great request, and he executed many works for the churches in the Picenum, besides others for the churches of Naples, Ancona, Genoa, and other Italian cities. He was also invited to several of the different courts of Europe, and visited Germany, Flanders, France, and England, leaving several specimens of his abilities in all those countries.

It is the opinion of Lanzi that Roncalli enjoyed a greater reputation than his merits deserved. He had many pupils, and Lanzi says, “he learned to avail himself of the labors of others, and to content himself with mediocrity.” This however, is contrary to the testimony of Baglioni, and several other excellent historians, and it is evident from Lanzi's memoir that he did not consider him an artist of mediocrity, but intended to censure him for not having attained to higher perfection, and for being more intent upon acquiring gain, than a lasting reputation. His style of design is a mixture of the Florentine and the Roman. In frescos, his coloring was fresh and brilliant, but in oil pictures his tints were more subdued, harmonized by a tone of general tranquillity. He had a lively invention, and designed and wrought with great facility, frequently enriching his back-grounds with landscapes treated with great beauty and effect. His faults were errors in perspective, occasional carelessness in design and frequent repetition, especially in his shortened heads, full and rubicund countenances, and his backgrounds. He died at Rome in 1626.

RONCELLI, D. GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Bergamo in 1677. According to Tassi, he acquired so high a reputation for his nocturnal scenes of landscapes and conflagrations, that Celesti added figures to his works, and Mazzoleni wrote his life. His works are also commended by Lanzi, and they are highly esteemed at Bergamo. He died in 1729.

RONCHIO, MICHELE DI, an old Milanese painter, who wrought in the cathedral of that city from 1375 to 1377. Lanzi says that remnants of his works still survive, and show that he approached nearer to the composition of Giotto, than the artists of Pavia.

RONDANI, FRANCESCO MARIA, a painter born at Parma about 1505. According to Affò, he was educated in the school of Correggio, and assisted him in two of his principal works, particularly in the dome of the church of S. Giovanni. In the church of S. Maria Madalena at Parma, is a noble picture by him of the Virgin and Christ, which has often been attributed to his instructor, and Lanzi says it might be really believed a work by Allegri, were it not for historic evidence. There is an altar-piece at the church of the Eremitani, representing saints Agostino and Girolamo, so much in the manner of Correggio, as to be esteemed one of the best works at Parma. There are also some frescos by him in a chapel of the cathedral, and in other churches and convents at Parma. Rondani was unable to reach the grandeur of the head of the school in historical works, and is also said to have been too careful and minute in the accessories, especially in his fresco works. His pictures are exceedingly rare in the collections. Lanzi had seen only two, a Madonna and Child, and a portrait; the latter designed in the style of Giorgione. He died at Parma about 1548.
